Apart from mouthing populist sentiments, the Kerala Government had also sought to discredit the conservationists by claiming that the Silent Valley is indeed not a virgin forest, that illicit tree-felling and smuggling has been going on here since 1914. "This is like a plea for continuing rape on the ground that virginity has not been preserved", noted an editorial in the Hindu. And then there's this argument that the natural riches of the valley are not exclusive. The report of the multi-disciplinary survey team, led by geologist P. K. Thampi, states that several new species of animals, insects, flowers were noticed by the 11-member team which surveyed only 425 sq. km. of this area recently. "If a more extensive and thorough survey is not conducted before the dam is constructed, it would be difficult to say later what has been lost", P. K. Thampi adds. According to T. S. N. Moorthy a beautiful, non-poisonous snake has also been discovered. This snake wants to be carried away even by a man who attacks it!

That only one-tenth of the Silent Valley is being used for the dam is yet another specious justification put forward by the Kerala Government. But ecologists fear that elimination of even a tiny fraction of a virgin forest can prove disastrous and disturb the natural balance. The heart of the Silent Valley forests where the dam will be constructed, performs a very important function: it regulates the water supply to the plains, by retaining rainwater in the sub-soil and releasing it slowly. In this way the hydrologic balance is maintained. This averts floods and droughts in the plains. Soil erosion too is prevented and the climatic condition of the whole region is maintained.

"There are already complaints that standing crops in the villages around the forests are being raided by wild animals", adds M. K. Prasad. "Wild boar and porcupine are the most menacing among them: cattle lifting by tiger has also been reported. All this is due to the preliminary work on the dam site. Further pressure on and persecution of wild life by the inhabitants in the centre of all forests would force them out into the fringes of the forests. Already the crops in Mukkali colony have been trampled by elephants".

In 1970, the task force of the National Committee for Environmental Planning and Co-ordination (NCEPC), under the leadership of Zafar Futehally made a study of the Silent Valley and expressed serious reservations over the hydro-electric project. However it made a "serious mistake" by suggesting a number of safeguards in case the Kerala Government persisted with it. Around the same time, the Kerala Forest Research Institute too studied the situation, and in unequivocal terms cautioned the Government against plundering the valley. The Kerala Government seems to have suppressed this report.

The safeguards suggested by the task force were given great publicity by the Kerala Government, as it claimed to have the greatest concern for minimising the loss to the forests. They include: no colonies for staff and labour will be constructed within the boundaries of the reserved and protected forest areas. After the execution of the project, only the minimum maintenance staff shall be allowed to stay at the project site, provided they (a) will not keep cattle and goats, (b) will not bring any land under agricultural cultivation and (c) will assist fully in forest fire protection measures. No gun licences should be given in the project area. The project should provide funds and place them at the disposal of the Kerala Forest Department for compensatory afforestation of an area equivalent to that used by the hydro-electric project in the Silent Valley.

The safeguards do not provide any effective guarantee against certain climatological threats to the region. "Those who have favoured the project try to tell us that the requirements of human beings are more important than the preservation of a few monkeys and trees but they do not understand the ecological stability of these forests is crucial to the economy of the region", says M. K. Prasad. According to him this stability depends on the maintenance of the tree-cover.

The task force constituted by the NCEPC stated that if the present trees are replaced by others for silvicultural or horticultural purposes, or are removed for any other reason, the top soil will be washed away in one single monsoon. Following its denudation the land will become unproductive for any agricultural purpose. Such havoc has already been wrought at Idukki. Though this project began only in 1967, the approach road was constructed in 1954, allowing unrestrained encroachment and by the time the project was completed, the natural forest around it had vanished and the micro-climatic conditions underwent dramatic changes. The summer heat is now as intense as in the plains. Landslides are more frequent during monsoons and wells and ponds in the area dry up quickly in summer. "The Kerala Government may be serious on safeguards but how can one expect the officials of the Electricity Board to have genuine concern for ecology", Mrs Rukmani Arundale had said.

The report by KSSP also seeks to question the benefits that would accrue from the project. The report says: "The project envisages irrigation facility for about 10,000 hectares: irrigation has meaning only if it can give the required amount of water, at the required place and the required time. The experience so far does not indicate any possibility of realising all these three requirements simultaneously. Only where lift irrigation has been resorted to, has it been possible to assure water supply for irrigation. Lift irrigation requires either diesel engines or electric motors to lift water. The former is costly and has often proved to be unreliable because of the irregular supply of diesel. The latter has not proved altogether successful due to interruptions in power supply, unsatisfactory services and inadequacies in distribution".

What are the alternative sources for the immediate supply of power to the Malabar area? The KSSP noted: "The Idukki-Karnataka 220 KV line, if expedited and extended to Cannore, will be able to convey bulk power. A crash programme can make the transmission system effective enough in a year or two". By the time the Silent Valley project will be completed (say, by 1989), it will provide 522 million hydro-energy units whereas the region will require a minimum of 2,600 million units of hydro-energy. The construction of a thermal station, and that too of the coal-fired variety is strongly recommended but the powers that be seem to be bent upon this hydro-electric project.

The KSSP cites the examples of projects where priority was given to environmental considerations in deciding the fate of hydro-electric projects. In 1967, two dams across Grand Canyon of Colorado river in Arizona were not given clearance on account of their threat to wildlife. Tamil Nadu gave up the Moyar project to save the wildlife of Mudumalai and Bandipur region.

Janata routed in Sikkim

Is the clock being turned back ?

Asoke Bose

The victory procession

THE former Chogyal of Sikkim, Palden Thondup Namgyal, was encaged in a red box in 1975 and came out from a black one in 1979. The magician, the people of Sikkim, waved the magic wand in no uncertain terms. The people had cast their votes in the red referendum box which stood for the merger of Sikkim with India and abolition of the institution of the Chogyal. Through the black ballot box in the October Assembly elections they voted for Sikkim Janata Parishad (SJP), a regional Party neither registered with nor recognised by the Election Commission of India, which is avowedly against both the issues the red box had represented.

The full import of the results was brought home when jubilant supporters of SJP moved from the historic White Hall in Gangtok the vote counting venue, to the nearby palace gate chanting the 'Sikkim national anthem' that was banned by the Government of India after the protectorate Himalayan kingdom joined the Indian union as its 22nd State on April 27, 1975. What triggered off the midnight procession was the announcement of the result of the Dzongu scheduled tribe constituency where a diminutive forest ranger turned politician, Athuk Lepcha, humbled Kazi Lhendup Dorji, former Chief Minister and New Delhi's man in Gangtok.

The crushing defeat may cause the Kazi to retire from politics. It will take more than an able organiser to keep the disarrayed Janata Party workers in the fold. The turn of events have also prompted a number of deputationist IAS officers who were allegedly a part of "the Kazi's divide and rule policy and corrupt administration" to leave the State. The new Chief Minister, Nar Bahadur Bhandari, has levelled 93 specific charges of corruption against the former administration, demanding a CBI enquiry into them.

Bhandari is also determined to demand the recall of the Governor, B. B. Lal, for his alleged involvement in politics. Unconfirmed reports indicate that Bhandari may suggest the name of the Chogyal as the first citizen of the State. Bhandari's election symbol was a horse, the rein of which, he said, would be placed in the hands of the threesome Sikkimese brotherhood consisting of Nepalis, Bhutias and Lepchas. In his scheme of things the 50,000 strong Indians of non-Sikkimese origin who form nearly 16 per cent of the State's over 300,000 population are "outsiders" who should not indulge in local politics.

One of the primary reasons of the Janata Party's total rout was a sustained campaign that the Kazi's compliance to include 9,000 plainsmen electors was a conspiracy to enable them to take over Sikkim. The denial of franchise rights to about 25,000 Stateless people of Nepali origin, described as "noncitizen" only lent credence to the need of a crusade against the plainsmen.

Bhandari has, however, been able to rally round the SJP a considerable section of the people belonging to all the three communities who believe that the Party will figure out some effective way to force the Central Government to review the merger and the Chogyal issues and also keep the Indian plainsmen at bay. In order to muster support of a cross section of the people, Bhandari kept the other hot local issues like inclusion of the Nepali language in the Constitution's eighth schedule and the Presidential Ordinance giving effect to Lok Sabha Bill number 79 of 1979 withdrawing reserved seats for the Nepali community in the Assembly at a low key.

The elections over, some of the architects of Sikkim's merger have now swollen the ranks of hangers-on around Bhandari criticising their own act and blaming others more vocally than the Janata Parishad itself. The game of defections is also on and it has benefited the Janata Parishad raising its strength from 17 to a stable 19 in a house of 32 members. The Chogyal thought it was wise to be abroad during the elections with compensation involving lakhs of rupees still pending with the Central Government, so that he was not accused of politicking. But Prince Wangchuk, a tough young man who feels that the China bogey in Sikkim is merely an "alarmist opinion" maintained a telegraphic liason with his father in the USA about the election results. He also made a few of his rare public appearances in meeting Bhandari at a hotel in Gangtok Bazar after he was named the Chief Minister.

The main question now is, to what extent Bhandari will go on the question of the merger and the Chogyal at a time when the Central Government's unstinted support is essential for him to implement any of his election pledges. His promise of needbased wages to Government employees, social security for educated unemployed, paid panchayat office bearers who will be his eyes and ears will strain the purse of the State whose internal revenue does not even match the non-Plan expenditure but which enjoys the highest per capita development expenditure in the country.

There was disappointment writ large on the faces of some radicals when Bhandari did not make any reference to the merger and Chogyal issues in his first public speech after winning the elections. What he can attempt to do with reasonable hope of success is to persuade the Central Government to give the Chogyal a fair deal in property settlement and a respectable position in society, free from an organised canard always being directed at him.

L. B. Basnet advisor to SJP, who won the prestigious cosmopolitan Gangtok constituency felt one just needed a "rudimentary common sense to understand that the merger cannot be undone though it was, as Morarji Desai had agreed, illegal and unconstitutional". Bhandari's cryptic and repeated "no comment" to the questions therefore leads one to the conclusion that he is keeping the issues open only to ensure a wary Central Government's continued cooperation and further special treatment to the sensitive border State where the rain god still responds to the prayers of monks blowing massive horns and beating cymbals from the altars of mysterious Buddhist monasteries to give the State a fair weather for an election to be held.

Because Yera is the difference that the eye can't see

Yera's Colour Variation Polariscope sees minute stresses which can develop into cracks that the eye can't see.

What most people consider an extravagant waste of time, is where Yera's quality control begins. A great deal of care is taken for accuracy in visual inspection. But that's only the beginning. The colour variation polariscope pinpoints stresses and inconsistencies which no human eye can spot but which significantly alter quality and life of a glass.

Yera's Thermal Shock Test subjects glass to a wide range of temperature variation...so that it can withstand any normal shocks you give it.

How often have you poured hot liquid into a glass and seen it crack in front of your eyes? This rarely happens with Yera. The coefficient of expansion has been thoroughly tested to remove all possible accidents. This is merely one of the ways in which Yera ensures sturdy, reliable long-lived glass.

There is no copyright on design...but it's not so simple to imitate quality.

Yera has always been an innovator in design. And you know how it is with success. A fast selling design usually produces a flood of imitations. But the precision and high technical expertise that lead to fine quality are not so easy to imitate. That is why branded buying makes good sense. In the long run you get what you pay for.

Sometimes you have to pay a little more to save money.

In the long run quality pays. It pays in freedom from chipping and cracking. It pays in freedom from easy breakages. It pays in terms of longer life...a life that is guaranteed by over 30 years of glass making experience...Experience you can count on.

Bloody Wednesday!

No one knows how many died

ON Wednesday, October 17, the people of the largest industrial township in North India, Faridabad, were not talking of the familiar problem of labour unrest; they were witnessing a bloody vendetta. As groups of the city's two lakh workers trudged towards Neelam Chowk to keep a date with their brethren, policemen readied for action at the approach to the Chowk. When the workers reached the spot, they were bluntly told to disperse. They refused. Shots were fired, first in the air and then on the crowd, sparking off a wave of violence, arson and murder of a kind the city had never seen before. At the end of the day there were several dead and injured. The Government maintains eight people died—six on the spot and two others in hospital—and 19 were injured. Though the actual figures cannot be ascertained, dead bodies were seen being hurriedly removed from the trouble spots in police jeeps.

According to spokesmen of Faridabad's strongest and most active union, the CPI(M)-supported CITU, which is being accused of collusion with the Lok Dal to incite violence and discredit the Haryana Janata Government, the police action was totally unprovoked and premeditated. The night before the violence had erupted, they say, a large number of patients had been discharged from Faridabad's Badshah Khan Hospital and additional stocks of medicines were acquired.

Workers in the township have been on the warpath for quite some time now. Their main grievances relate to lay offs, closures, poor pay (a worker's average pay is Rs 150; many workers are kept as apprentices for years with a stipend of Rs 120 and often correct registers are not maintained of all the workers in a factory, and how much they are paid), recruitment of casuals in place of those retrenched, and attacks on workers by goondas hired by the managements. Some of the factories against which allegations persist are East India Cotton, Autopin, Ceraco Auto, American Universal, Precision Steel and Bharat Carpets. Before the trouble broke out, at least 25 factories in the area were on strike or under partial lock out. Workers also complain of excessive use of Section 144; hardly has a month passed since the lifting of the Emergency, when prohibitory orders have not been in force. In protest, a massive rally was organised by an All-Trade Union Action Committee consisting of representatives of CITU, AITUC, HLU, a faction of INTUC and some independent leaders on September 21, at which a 12-point charter of demands was declared and approved. The demands included withdrawal of cases against workers, arrest of the managements' hired goondas, grants of compensation to all workers, and a minimum wage of Rs 350 (three months ago the minimum wage was raised from Rs 160 to Rs 250, but even this is not being properly implemented by managements, CITU workers allege). At the same rally, a call was given for a bandh on October 6. The Government's response was immediate. Section 144 Cr P C was reimposed in the township after a gap of 25 days. The bandh was postponed to October 17, to avoid a breach of the prohibitory orders and also to give the Government more time to think.

Think the officials did, but on the wrong lines. Meher Singh Rathi, Haryana's Labour Minister came to Faridabad and threatened the Action Committee members with dire consequences if they went ahead with the bandh: "Faridabad ko police chavni bana doonga aur tum sab ko sidha kar doonga" (Faridabad will be swarming with policemen, and you shall all be set right) he was alleged to have told a group of workers. But the workers did not budge. If the bandh was to be withdrawn, negotiations should be held, they insisted. On October 15, another 20,000-strong rally was addressed by, among others, the local Lok Dal MLA, Deep Chand Bhatia, who told the workers to go ahead with the bandh, even violate prohibitory orders, if the authorities did not speak to them. There was no incident, however. Following the rally, prohibitory orders, which had been lifted, were reimposed around midnight on the 15th, when most workers were indoors and asleep. The announcement that Section 144 was in force was made in only a few areas of the sprawling industrial township.

The body of Kashmiri Lal Bali

It was not until 10 the next morning—when it was already too late—that the organisers of the bandh, preparations for which were made well in advance, came to know about the prohibitory orders. The Action Committee members began frantically spreading the news, but only a few could be informed. Hundreds of workers from all over Faridabad and the surrounding areas, from the many cotton, engineering, chemical, rubber and plastic factories began grouping up and moving towards Neelam Chowk from as early as 8.45 a.m. When they came to a railway overbridge—the immediate approach to the Chowk—a contingent of policemen led by Sub-Inspector Brahm Dutt, stopped the procession. The officer fired three shots in the air and then on the crowd, killing three workers. Furious, the workers charged ahead, overwhelmed the policemen, and beat the officer to death. Thus started a brutal worker-police vendetta, with policemen firing indiscriminately on the crowds, making lathi charges and bursting tear gas shells, the workers retaliating by stopping a train and burning two jeeps and two fire brigade vehicles, destroying property in some factories, and forcing shops and establishments to close down. The police chased the workers to their hideouts, and picked up the dead bodies and rushed them away. Eyewitnesses insist not less than 50 must have died and over a hundred were injured. In one of their encounters, a force of 25 policemen pursued a group of workers to Press Colony, took up positions on the stairs of a house and in front of a wall in the adjoining Jawahar Colony, and fired ten rounds. It is impossible to say where they aimed, but instead of a crowd of workers, the bullets tore through the temple of Kashmiri Lal Bali (42), who was standing on the roof of one of the houses in the locality, and ripped open the abdomen of another person, Jagdish Prasad (30), who was standing a few feet behind Bali. Two children who were playing on the roof, Surinder Kumar (16) and Anil Bali (12), Kashmiri Lal's son, were also injured. When this reporter met one of the injured children, Surinder, he pointed to the spot where Kashmiri Lal fell dead. A large mark of splattered blood had not been cleaned.

There is another version of what happened, of course — one less damaging to the authorities. The violence was a result of inter-union rivalry, and incitement by CITU and other leaders, including Mr Deep Chand Bhatia, who was later arrested. The workers were bent upon making the October 17 bandh a success, and on the fateful day, began forcing shops and establishments to close down They had prepared themselves for an organised aggression on the police. The police action was necessary to protect a train the workers had stopped, and an oil tank they threatened to set on fire, which might have caused an explosion that could be disastrous for the entire city. Mobs had burnt down police jeeps, fire brigade vans and a DTC bus, property belonging to a tyre factory, and lynched a police officer to death. They had no right to disturb peace and destroy public property if their demands —which the Government was yet to know about, anyway — were not met, said Haryana's Janata CM, Bhajan Lal in an angry statement. He refused to institute a judicial inquiry, but agreed to start a magisterial inquiry.

Rendered speechless

Calcutta TV does it again

Anil Grover

Sudhangsu Dasgupta

QUICK on the heels of the report in SUNDAY (October 7) on the censorship game being played at Doordarshan Kendra, Calcutta, they played the game again. Producer Abhijit Dasgupta's regular programme, Youth Time, this time telecast a debate ("This house believes that mass media aggravate youth unrest") on October 18, at 8.50 pm with six young participants, and chaired by Mr Sudhangsu Dasgupta.

While summing up the debate, Mr Dasgupta said something to the effect of categorising the various people who are affected by mass media, be they gentlemen or Communists. It was the usual debating technique of making a tangential remark about a current subject, and this was an innocuous dig at the very most. The reference was to the "power" tussle between the State power commissioner, Mr S. M. Murshed, and the then acting power minister, Dr Ashok Mitra, when (on July 6) the latter recalled a special taskforce which was on its way to the Santaldih power station to study its problems. This erupted into a battle of egos and Dr Mitra, it was hoped, would make an apology as becoming of a gentleman. Mr Mitra had then exploded: "I'm not a gentleman, I'm a Communist." The entire episode, including the remark owned by Dr Mitra himself, received nationwide coverage. But significantly enough, even at that time, Business Standard (July 8) reported: "Calcutta Doordarshan added its mite by suggesting in its Bengali news that no such incident took place"!

Possibly hoping for public memory to fade, the programme which was recorded in mid-July was only telecast in mid-October — not a regular practice. One might concede that this was at least a professionally polished move. But Calcutta TV wasn't taking any chances. So they simply switched off the sound track at the required moment. The attempt this time was to pass it off as a possible "technical defect"—so naturally no apologies were tendered to the viewers or to Mr Dasgupta, nor was his permission sought prior to the cut. And they very nearly succeeded in their game. All viewers I spoke to immediately after the programme were not even aware of the "cut", and those who had noticed, thought it was a technical defect either in their own TV set or the transmission. The two give-away clues were: the switch-on and off sound, and the contents of the statement which confirm any doubts. Mr Sudhangsu Dasgupta preferred not to comment on this though he agreed to reveal the nature of his statement. Evidently, while the "chop-suey" as reported earlier in SUNDAY (October 7) was horribly ham-handed, this time it was a study in the methodology of censorship! Calcutta TV is learning fast—even if this is a Left handed compliment.

Last time, it was argued by Miss Mira Mozoomdar, director, Doordarshan Kendra, Calcutta, that four minutes, not six, were cut. This time, it is argued by another official that "exactly 12 seconds of audio were erased." Is censorship divisible?

According to Calcutta TV, the 12 seconds of audio had been erased "with the intention to edit, not cut." It was scheduled for telecast "a week after recording, and the programmes had been issued to the Press to this effect." But last minute changes, especially with sports programmes (cricket) forced a postponement by three weeks each time. Meanwhile, two other Youth Time programmes were also held up for the same reason, and that is why this programme was eventually telecast three months later. "So the programme was not held back intentionally."

Meanwhile, the producer of the programme, Mr Abhijit Dasgupta, had to go abroad at 24 hours' notice ("on Dussehra day") and the required "rectification" could not be made. By the time he came back and rejoined ("on October 19"), the programme went on the air with the erased portion as it was. TV feels that three months later, the item had become outdated and at that stage, they "wouldn't have bothered to tamper with it". TV also feels that the statement by Mr Sudhangsu Dasgupta was "uncalled for and in bad taste", and they had therefore erased it.

Spot report

Bihar

United we stand a chance

PATNA'S Gandhi Maidan was festive with a milling throng on October 23 when the five-Party left democratic, anti-authoritarian, and anti-communalist combination of the Lok Dal, Congress, CPI, CPI(M) and Forward Bloc held a rally there. Perhaps Patna had not witnessed such a gathering since the days of JP's Bihar movement in 1974. Peasants, bare-bodied and also in colourful attire, adivasis with drums, bows and arrows and workers from all over Bihar had assembled there to listen to the speakers. The rally was held to condemn the Government's inaction in combating the crisis in Bihar caused by drought, the rise in prices and the shortage of essential commodities. But in effect, it demonstrated the strength of the alliance partners on the eve of the Lok Sabha elections.

People poured into Patna from the early hours of October 23. They came by trains, buses, steamers, trucks and on foot carrying flags and banners. Most of them were supporters of the CPI followed by supporters of the Lok Dal. The supporters of the Congress, CPI(M) and Forward Bloc were few and far between. And there were the supporters of Sibu Soren's Jharkhand Mukti Morcha, a group of armed adivasis. The preponderance of the red CPI flag made it for them literally a "red letter day".

Initially, there was an unseemly scramble as to which constituent would lead the procession. According to the original plan, the Lok Dal was to be in the lead, followed by the CPI, Congress and others. But this plan was upset when some Congress supporters, led by Ramlakhan Yadav, emerged at the head of the procession. Along with him was the Lok Dal chief of Bihar, Mundrika Singh, on a jeep, with elephants and camels marching ahead of them. When the procession, which was about 10 km long, reached the Gandhi Maidan it was already half full, with more people arriving every minute. Slogans there were aplenty —Hame chahiye lok shahi nahi chahiye tana shahi (We want democracy, not dictatorship), Sampradayikta murdabad (Down with communalism) and "Kheti ki fasal jhulsali hai, mantriqan ki masti hai (Crops are drying up while the Ministers are making merry)". At the meeting the alliance leaders— Karpoori Thakur, Abdul Ghafoor, Ramlakhan Singh Yadav, Chaturanan Mishra and others—called for the unity of the alliance partners.

But, till the time of writing, no unity has emerged, despite a number of meetings to this end. The rally has only had the effect of making the CPI more confident as had happened in 1975 when a CPI-Congress Anti-Fascist conference was held in Patna where the CPI stole the show. After the conference, the two Parties had drifted apart. Would it happen again? Soon after the rally at Gandhi Maidan, the CPI demanded that it would contest 26 out of the 54 Lok Sabha seats from Bihar. Besides, it has voiced its dissent over the "anti-workers' spirit" in Charan Singh's draft election manifesto. The CPI(M) has staked its claim to 10 seats. The CPI maintain that despite the fact that they have won a maximum of five seats in the past, that too in alliance with the Congress in 1977, they have acted as a balancing factor in no less than 20 constituencies and have helped other Parties win. The CPI(M) has never had any representation in the Lok Sabha from Bihar. Yet, this year, as their demand for seats has shown, they are more ambitious. This is probably because of their alliance with the CPI. The Congress has also set its sights on contesting a large number of seats, but is ready for a compromise. As for the Lok Dal, Karpoori Thakur insists on seeing the alliance through or at least a "seat adjustment".

But the partners have little choice before them. The CPI has a central directive not to have any truck with either the Congress (I) or the Janata. Nor can the Congress led by Ramlakhan Singh Yadav and Abdul Ghafoor, have an understanding with the upper castes-led Janata and the authoritarian Congress (I). The CPI(M) and Forward Bloc are in no position to dictate terms. The situation was summed up rather neatly by a CPI leader who said: "There is no option but compulsion".

There are, however, chances that the alliance may finally materialise. The seat adjustment would be roughly as follows: CPI(M) one or two, Marxist Coordination one, Jharkhand Mukti Morcha one, the CPI and Congress together about 20 and the Lok Dal the rest. If this is not agreed upon, the Lok Dal may concede some more seats to the other Parties. The "unwritten agreement" between the Janata and the Congress (I) to share the key seats and the fear that the upper castes would leave nothing unturned to defeat the backwards in the elections may force the alliance partners to unite.

IN his book White House Years, currently being serialised in Indian and foreign journals, Henry Kissinger says that "policy emerges when concept encounters opportunity". In Kerala where, the left and democratic unity encountered its opportunity to come to power, policy took a nose-dive and hid itself beneath the slag and slime of rank opportunism.

What was originally sought to be achieved in Kerala was a realignment of forces to replace the ruling united Front. The Front came into being as an anti-Marxist instrument a decade ago, a polarisation which today is negative nationally, and strategically unwise as far as the State is concerned. The new volte face in Kerala has led not merely to an anti-Marxist Front, but to an even more rabid formation — an anti-Communist Front of the type which toppled the first Communist Ministry two decades ago.

It was only in the last week of September that the ruling Front partners, including the CPI and the Congress, issued a joint appeal indicating their willingness to hold talks with the CPI(M) to forge a left and democratic front. To achieve this they had also agreed, in principle, to the dissolution of the State Assembly — a precondition laid down by the CPI(M). But the talks got bogged down over a proposed legislation which, controversial by then, had become a "prestige issue", with the CPI(M) demanding its withdrawal while some of the ruling Front partners like the Kerala Congress, the Muslim League and the Congress insisted on its passage. The CPI which stood firm in the beginning and through the negotiations finally gave up its stand in the "interest of left unity".

In analysing the present situation, we have to consider two political developments in the State since the talk of left unity began. In the recent civic elections the Marxists almost swept the polls. Their impressive victory at the long overdue civic polls, which took place after 20 years, gave them a new confidence and indicated how the winds were blowing. Taking note of this and the possibility of a left takover after the coming elections, the bishops gave a call to the two Kerala Congress factions, which are Christian dominated, to unite. Instead of dissolving the Assembly and going in for fresh elections, an alternate non-Communist Ministry was on their minds. There was much more to this call than a mere interest in their unity. Perturbed at the prospect of a combination of progressive Parties coming to power, the Church wanted reaction to consolidate. They knew that the obvious, even blatant, hint of a bishops' appeal was not lost on certain elements in other Parties also.

The failure of the talks on the issue of the land gift bill gave an unexpected opportunity for the anti-Communist elements in all the Parties to demand an alternate Ministry. The Muslim League and the Kerala Congress, which would have benefitted by the passage of the bill, took the initiative in the matter. They found instant support being extended to them by the Congress(I) and the Janata which were all along opposing the land gift bill. The Congress, which thought that 'political honesty' demanded the passing of the bill, was forced to go along with the Party. None of these Parties were interested in going to the polls since the Assembly had a life of another two and half years and because they thought that their manoeuvring would help them get power or at least its fringe benefits. Thus, instead of widening the left and democratic Front in Kerala, by a process of rea-

Haryana

The Lok Dal starts its campaign

OCTOBER 14, an unusually torrid day for the northern plains, was the day Chaudhury Charan Singh chose to declare war against the forces of evil which for him are represented by the Congress(I) and the Janata. Launching his election campaign in Kaithal, in Haryana, 100 kms from Chandigarh he observed morosely that his opponents would meet with failure. The PM's visit was bereft of the usual pomp and show one associates with a visit by the executive head of a country. Apart from the Deputy Commissioner of the district there was only one other dignitary on the spot to greet the Chaudhury when he alighted from an IAF helicopter — the Deputy Speaker Kanwar Vijay Pal Singh of the Lok Dal. But the meeting itself was well attended. Lok Dal partisans even claimed a crowd of four lakhs, but the more correct estimate would be far less. What is true is that such large meetings have rarely been held in this small town.

In the first of two speeches before leaving for Rajasthan on the second leg of his hurricane election tour, he declared "none of the Harijan Ministers or Chief Ministers has done for the Harijans what I have done for them", by way of proof that he was in no way anti-Harijan. When it came to explaining why he had parted company with Morarji Desai, he remarked "I made him the Prime Minister" and justified his decision regarding the parting of ways by saying that the former PM had turned out to be "abhimani" after that.

"If the Press continues its campaign of showering abuse on me," he added, "you can be sure that I am doing positive good for the downtrodden villagers". He explained the logic behind this by saying that the "newspapers are against me because they are controlled by capitalists whose enemy the Lok Dal is". Mrs Gandhi and Atal Behari Vajpayee figured prominently in his attack on capitalists and traders ("God forbid, if the Pakistanis drop a bomb on Delhi tomorrow, these dishonest traders would double the prices") Reacting to the charge of casteism against him, he said, "Let Mrs. Gandhi and Vajpayee declare that they will assure jobs to those who marry out of their castes and I will retire from politics and leave the Lok Dal." He lashed out at Babuji, saying "I preferred Morarji to Jagjivan Ram because I could not trust the latter who was a party to the declaration of the Emergency which sent us all to jail. I did it from my sickbed and a few months later the same Prime Minister had the audacity to demand my resignation when I was sick. What a comparison. And they call us defectors !"

But it was the tenor of the Chaudhury's speeches in the strongest of Lok Dal strongholds that left one surprised. There was none of the expected assertiveness. Mrs Gandhi too had visited the same town three weeks previously and she had vigorously attacked both the Janata and the Lok Dal. Also equally surprising was the failure to touch on the subject of the withdrawal of four Emergency cases against Bansi Lal, the former Defence Minister under a "secret agreement" between the Janata and the Congress (I).

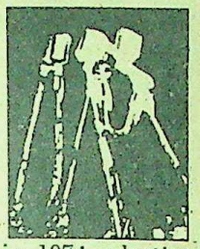
Orissa

It's Mrs Gandhi versus Biju



IN Orissa, elections have been held rather frequently in the Seventies. In 1971, there were elections to the Lok Sabha in March and the State Assembly in June. Three years later, in 1974, elections were held for the Assembly again. Depite half the State under feudal rule (the other half is comparatively well off) the Left movement is yet to sprout. Neither agricultural nor industrial labour is properly organised. Under such circumstances, in Orissa, personalities rather than issues dominate the election scene. The forthcoming elections will probably not be any different but some local issues can easily become rallying points.

From 1952 to 1961 it was the Maharajas versus the Congress. In 1961 Biju Patnaik came to power and since then his personality has dominated the political scene in Orissa. In 1967, he was with Mrs Gandhi and both of them proved to be negative personalities: "Biju Hatao" became the Opposition's slogan and the Congress was swept out of power. A coalition of Swatantra Party and the Jana Congress, a breakaway Congress group, ruled the State until the coalition broke down in 1971 and fresh elections were declared for the State Legislature.

In 1971, Indira Gandhi and Biju Patnaik parted company and the war of nerves began in earnest. In spite of the massive Indira wave which swept the country in 1971, Biju Patnaik successfully prevented the Congress from coming to power in Orissa. Patnaik's Utkal Congress, the Swatantra Party and the Jharkhand joined hands to form the Government. This coalition however did not last long. The 1974 elections brought Mrs Nandini Satpathy to the forefront of Orissa politics. She easily became a force to reckon with, but the Emergency and later her defection to the CFD pushed Nandini into the background.

The forthcoming elections will be a clear-cut contest between Mrs Indira Gandhi and Biju Patnaik; it will be a clash of personalities. Biju Patnaik today does not have the charisma of 1972. Predictably, the Opposition's election campaign will centre around inflation and bad Government. The Opposition is likely to harp on the point that Biju Patnaik did not live up to his promise of giving Orissa a steel mill and a shipyard.

People in this State have already started thinking about Mrs Gandhi despite what she did during the Emergency, because of the weak Government at the Centre and the scarcity of essential goods in the State. Ninety per cent of the electorate in Orissa live in villages and it is yet to be seen how far the promise of a "farmer Prime Minister" can affect the voting pattern. Candidates are, it is true, often selected on caste considerations but there is not much hostility between castes and this is therefore unlikely to be an issue in the elections. The same can be said of communalism. For the rural people of Orissa, Delhi is very far away and predictably local issues will decide the fate of the Parties.

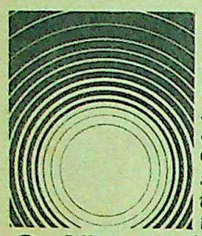
Andhra Pradesh

"Vengal Rao will be routed"



ARTHUR PAIS talks to Dr M. Channa Reddy, Chief Minister of Andhra Pradesh and one of Mrs Indira Gandhi's staunch supporters, on the issues involved in the elections.

Q: What are the main issues (as far as Andhra is concerned) in this election?

A: There are no local issues involved ; we are fighting to have a strong and stable Centre ruled by a progressive Party. The two year long Janata misrule has harmed the nation considerably ; our fight is to initiate a process to repair the situation.

Q: But your predecessor, Vengal Rao, wants to make this election a referendum against your two year rule as the Chief Minister...

A: He's welcome to.... I have full confidence in the people : we have stood by them. One of the earliest decisions taken by the Cabinet was to exempt small farmers who own 5 acres of dry or 2.5 acres of wet land from payment of land revenue. Take the May 1979 cyclone for instance : because the State Government moved in swiftly and took prompt measures to evacuate the people in thousands very few lives were lost. You know what happened during the 1977 cyclone ? Even though Vengal Rao was warned about it sufficiently in advance, he continued his stay in Delhi indulging in petty politicking. He didn't even show interest in the disposal of dead bodies. This time as soon as we got the warning, we moved in. If the State Government had not acted speedily, there would've been thousands of deaths, and we would have got all the sympathy of the world. I have no use for such sympathy, I am a man of action and since Andhra is cursed by periodic cyclones, my Government is going ahead with a plan to plant causuarina trees all along the coast for a width of 200 metres. After an interval, cashew and coconut plantations will also be started and we'll allow habitation only behind these plantations.

Q: But your Government is steadily acquiring an anti-people image...

A: Pure, malicious propaganda. I am a man of action and I cannot tolerate sycophants and people who indulge in sheer rhetoric. The other day people from C. Rajeshwara Rao's constituency asked me to set up a polytechnic : I promised and the project is being readied. The CPI leader made a public statement that for the first time he had come across a CM who stood by his word — and so fast...

Q: And yet the CPI is fighting against you ... in spite of Rajeshwara Rao.

A: He's a senior man in the Party and despite his personal goodwill, he cannot change his Party's attitude ... nor can he join the Congress (I). But I am glad to say that many Congressmen, particularly at the grassroot level, are deserting Vengal Rao and joining hands with Congress (I). B. P. Maurya who used to swear his loyalty to Mrs Gandhi (you know I got him elected from Andhra) now goes around saying fantastic things, that Congress (I) dissidents will walk out. He's indulging in mere wishful thinking.

Q As the person in charge of the election campaign for all the four southern States, how do you evaluate your Party's chances ?

A: In Andhra we will win all the 42 (seats). The Left combination led by Vengal Rao will be totally routed. Sometime ago Vasudevan Nair, the CPI leader, was telling me that the CPI and CPI(M) were going to be allies and this would create a problem for Congress(I). You're welcome to join hands, I said. Even in Andhra you may do so, I added. But he himself said that in Andhra such an alliance won't cut ice... Whatever my critics may say, people here are with me and with Mrs Gandhi.

In Karnataka we hope to win atleast 20 out of the 28 seats, and since the Left Parties in Kerala are isolated, Congress (I) should have a bright chance . We will win at least 50 per cent of the seats. And in Tamil Nadu, we should win a majority of the seats.

Q: You feel quite optimistic about Kerala. Despite Congress (I) losing heavily in the panchayat election. One hears that even C. M. Stephen is looking for a safe seat outside Kerala.

A: The scene has changed dramatically since the fall of the Vasudevan Nair Ministry. Now people in Kerala too are realising that only the Congress (I) can bring in stability and Stephen is quite optimistic.

Q: Do you think that the people in Tamil Nadu will buy the Congress (I)-DMK alliance ? Couldn't you have prevailed upon your "good friend" MGR to stay back with Mrs Gandhi ?

A: There's a complete and genuine change of heart in the DMK : It has realised that only Mrs Gandhi means business ... I will not comment on why MGR stayed out of the alliance, but this much I can say, we were gradually losing faith in him after he withdrew his offer to support Mrs Gandhi in Thanjavur.

Q: There have been specific incidents which have been followed by mass riots, like the Ramiza Bibi incident and the alleged police rape of Shakila who later committed suicide. This may cost your Party the Muslim votes.

A: These incidents were unnecessarily politicised. Facts show that the police acted within the framework of law. I refused to set up a judicial enquiry because I want the Centre to set up the norms: Over a hundred workers died last year in the Kanpur riots. Why wasn't a judicial enquiry started there ? Despite these two incidents, I am sure of the Muslim votes...they have more trust in Mrs Gandhi and in me than in other politicians. ■

SAHADEV RAI, 35, a roadside peanut vendor, in Calcutta, who hails from Madhubani district in Bihar, says : "I will vote once again for Indira Gandhi's Congress. Look at what the Janata did. Neither could they govern nor could they form a stable Government. Everything is so expensive that there is hardly any profit left for me. Onions cost Rs four a kilo. At least during Indira Gandhi's rule the prices of food items were not so high."

"Our painter recommended Dulux to us. Now I recommend him to our friends."

Bulu Guha

A one-time behaviour therapist in Canada and a teacher in New Delhi, Bulu today is a busy newspaper P. R. executive in Calcutta, but one who still finds time to be a dedicated housewife. With a charming home that's all her own creation—down to the specific shade of blue on her bedroom walls. Colour is important to her, so she studied the shade cards carefully, picked out her colour schemes—and left the rest to the painter. His choice was Dulux—and she was delighted with the result. Here's the story in her own words.

"My drawing room is on the small side, so I chose Dulux 'Buttermilk' to create an impression of space."

Q. What paint did you have in mind ?

A. I didn't know much about Dulux or any other paint. So I decided on the colours and left it to my painter to select the paint.

He's the one who recommended Dulux—and judging by the results, I'm glad he did !

Q. So you left the expensive decision to your painter ?

A. Yes. He'd painted some of our friends' houses, and we liked his work. After all we were 'new' to Calcutta—and, as they say, seeing is believing.

"Porcelain blue provides the balance in our bedroom. Because blue is a cool colour and we live in a warm city."

"I wanted a bold colour to arrest the length of this long and narrow passage—so bright pink was my choice"

Q. Are you satisfied with the result ?

A. Definitely. With Dulux's wide range I had all the choice of colours I wanted. And the walls and doors look as good today as they did 2½ years ago, when we first had them painted. In Calcutta's humid climate, I think that's pretty good !

Q. Would you use Dulux again ?

A. Would I ? Of course. And if we're still in Calcutta when it's time to repaint our house, we'll use the services of our painter again. In fact, right now he's doing a friend's flat—one I recommended him to, I'm proud to say.

Why did Pakistan attack?

A. G. NOORANI reviews Asghar Khan's book on the Indo-Pak war of 1965 to answer this and other questions

"PLEASE do not rub in my weakest and fatal point," Mohammed Ayub Khan would tell G. W. Choudhary whenever he questioned him on his fateful decision to go to war on Kashmir in 1965. He accused Foreign Minister Bhutto and Foreign Secretary Aziz Ahmed of misleading him. Choudhary served as Director-General (Research) at the Foreign Ministry from 1967 to 1969 and as Minister of Communications thereafter till 1971.

The consequences of that war were far graver than many imagined. First, Ayub lost the confidence of his real constituency of power, the armed forces, as well as his popularity with the people, especially after Tashkent. Second, the war exposd erstwhile East Pakistan's isolation from the West. If its security depended on China's help rather than the armed forces of Pakistan, why could it not ensure that help by its own exertions? Significantly, Sheikh Mujibur Rahman's famous six points were propounded in February 1966. Lastly, the war bred in Pakistan a false illusion of victory so that the Tashkent accord acquired in the people's eyes the image of a sell-out, very similar to that fostered in German eyes after 1919—of an "undefeated" army betrayed by the leaders at Versailles. Such illusions serve, in turn, to breed neurosis.

Air Marshal (Retd.) M. Asghar Khan's book is an interesting addition to the growing literature on that war by Pakistani writers. More so, the remarkable foreword by Altaf Gauhar who was close to Ayub. While their views on Ayub differ, hatred of Bhutto unites them. Together they help to answer the question: How and why did Pakistan decide to attack India and how and why did she stop the attack?

The bare facts were already well known. In May 1965, even before the Rann of Kutch arbitration agreement was signed, a force of some 30,000 men, known as the Gibraltar Forces, was set up under the leadership of Gen. Akhtar Husain Malik. In July, Ayub visited them at the headquarters in Muree and addressed them. On August 5 guerilla attacks were launched across the cease-fire line. Asghar Khan had relinquished office as Commander-in-chief of the Air Force on July 23 and knew nothing about what was brewing. It was a Pakistani initiative, entirely. Altaf Gauhar writes; "Asghar Khan is not alone in suggesting that the 1965 War was fought for no purpose. Nothing has been written so far which could give a dispassionate observer the feeling that there was some great principle or ideological position for which Pakistan adopted a course of action which was bound to lead to large-scale conflict. Nor is there any evidence that even at the political, diplomatic or professional level the operations had been properly planned."

It seems that towards the end of 1964 the Kashmir Publicity Committee—a Foreign Office front body—had recommended military action. Ayub Khan shot down the idea. Why did he change his mind six months later? Asghar Khan writes: "I found it difficult to believe that the President, who had always been cautious in his approach to international relations, particularly as they affected our contacts with India, should have agreed to a policy that had the germs of a conflict on a major scale. In the first week of August we read in the newspapers of the incursion of Azad Kashmir volunteers across the ceasefire line into Indian-held Kashmir. As these incursions began to increase in intensity it became obvious that a major shift had occurred in our policy towards Kashmir."

Operation Gibraltar was based on two assumptions—the Kashmiris were ready to revolt if promised guerilla support and India would confine military action to Kashmir and not cross the international frontier. Both were proved hopelessly wrong. The plan originated with the Foreign Office, and we have an authentic record of Bhutto's advice in his Government's White Paper on Kashmir published in January 1977 in his letter to Ayub Khan of May 12, 1965: "There is for the present at least the relative superiority of the military forces of Pakisan in terms of quality and equipment. "But, it would end with the passage of time. He added, specially, "India is in no position to risk a general war of unlimited duration with Pakistan." There could be "general war of limited duration". It is clear from the extracts of the letter that Bhutto did not think that India would regard an attack on Kashmir as one on itself despite its repeated declaration to that effect from 1951 onwards and most recently in April 1965.

The first four infiltrators gave away the whole plan in a broadcast on AIR on August 8. "The blighters have spilled the beans", Brigadier Arshad, Director of Military Intelligence, lamented. It is absurd to suggest that the defender is bound to conform to the level of the offensive unleashed by the attacker. India mopped up the irregulars as best as it could and occupied the Haji Pir salient. Pakistan marched into the Chamb on September 1, threatening Akhnur. Asghar Khan recognises that India was "left with little choice but to remove this threat to the security of their vital strategic areas and, rather than confine the contest to Azad Kashmir, decided to extend the area of conflict to West Pakistan."

All Pakistani accounts agree that India's march to Lahore came as a surprise. Controversy begins here. At a PNA meeting at Lahore on February 26, 1977, Asghar Khan alleged that Chen Yi, the Chinese Foreign Minister, had warned Bhutto when he passed through Karachi en route to Paris that India would attack Pakistan, but Bhutto had deliberately given information to the contrary. "After September 6, when I met Ayub Khan he told me that Bhutto had deceived him."

Interestingly, this accusation by Ayub does not figure in the book, which is published now as it was written in 1967. though he repeats his charge that Bhutto distorted his talks with Chen Yi. Asghar Khan is altogether wrong. The meeting took place on September 4 not "on 1st or 2nd". as he avers. By then Pakistan was well inside Chhamb and the Indian offensive might well have been launched on the 4th rather than two days later. Moreover, the possibility of Indian action should have been reckoned by Pakistan when it planned the whole venture, in May. Moreover, why should Pakistan depend on Chinese estimates of India's reaction?

Bhutto's letter seems to bear out the charge that he had assured Ayub Khan that India would never cross the international frontier. But one cannot exonerate Ayub as Altaf Gauhar does. Altaf, however, has some interesting revelations to make on this point. He writes; "My own recollection is that in an important meeting Mr Bhutto claimed that he had given the assurance on the basis of a communication he had received from the Australian High Commissioner. In another meeting two days before Bhutto left for New York to attend the Security Council meeting in which the ceasefire resolution was approved he said : 'an assurance is not a guarantee; what I conveyed to the President was the advice of the Foreign Office'. When some other participants in the meeting criticised him he broke down and started weeping bitterly. After he recovered he uttered a sentence which I shall never forget. 'This means the end of my political career.'

Aziz Ahmed had only one concern during the war. Except him no one should see the President. Mian Arshed Hussain, who was then Pakistan's High Commissioner in New Delhi, claimed in a meeting after the ceasefire that he had sent a message through the Turkish Embassy in New Delhi on the 4th of September 1965 informing the Foreign Office that India was planning to attack Lahore on the 6th of September. This message was duly received in Islamabad but never shown to Ayub Khan. When Aziz Ahmed was confronted with this, his only explanation was that he had not seen the message in time.

In his rejoinder to the Air Marshal on March 1, 1977, Aziz Ahmed said that Chen Yi did advise that "India would not launch a war against Pakistan at that time" and claimed that the minutes of the talks, at which he and Agha Shahi were present, were submitted to Ayub Khan.

Now, this may well be so. But what turns on the talks on September 4 when Pakistan had already crossed the Rubicon? What is amazing is Aziz Ahmed's claim that "our assessment at that time was that India was determined to launch an attack against Pakistan." This is a lie. If Pakistan had expected the Indian move, she would not have moved No. 7 Infantry Division located south of Lahore to the Chamb area.

Plainly, Aziz Ahmed's boast is false. Pakistan did not expect India to retaliate as it did. In 1976, the Defence Journal of Karachi quoted Maj.-Gen. Shaukat Raza as saying that, "On 3rd September 1965, the Chief of General Staff, Maj-Gen. Sher Bahadur, held a conference of Directors. We were informed that our troops had attacked Chhamb from across the ceasefire line in Kashmir. Lt.-Col. Riaz Ahmed (Historical Section) asked if adequate precautions had been taken for the defence of Lahore and Sialkot as the Indians were bound to react in these areas. The Director, Military Intelligence (Brig. Irshad), supported by Director, Military Operations (Brig Gul Hasan), assured the gathering that the Indians were in no position to start an all-out war."

So much for the manner in which the war was launched. How was it brought to an end? To begin with, despite its remarkable performance in the air, Pakistan's counter-offensive on the ground was successfully blunted and a war of attrition had begun. Asghar Khan went to Peking, Jakarta, Ankara and Teheran to seek help. He told Chou En-lai on September 10 that "Chinese moves on India's northern borders would help to reduce the pressure against us in West Pakistan." After consulting President Liu Shao Chi, Chou said that the "proposal had such serious implications as to make it necessary for them to discuss things with Ayub Khan. He suggested that they could meet at Peking or Rawalpindi or at any other place our President found convenient. I said that I would convey their wish to Ayub Khan. Premier Chou En Lai added that it was important for them to know whether we really meant to fight until our political objectives were achieved. I said that I had no doubt that Pakistan would fight to the end."

But China's ultimatum to India on September 16 helped Pakistan little. Reason ? It brought the US and the USSR on the scene. On September 14, US Ambassador John M. Cabot had told the Chinese representative at the Warsaw talks "to stay out of the Indo-Pakistani conflict". Otherwise, he implied, the US and other UN nations would retaliate against China. Choudhury's version that Ayub "slipped into China for intensive discussions" to take the Chinese into confidence about his decision to accept the ceasefire seems unlikely to be true.

In 1974 a Pakistani academician, Anwar H. Syed, wrote in his book China and Pakistan that "After the Chinese sent an ultimatum to India, the American and British Ambassadors advised him that the Chinese action might lead to a general, and possibly nuclear, war. Unwilling to risk a break with the United States, and unnerved by the thought of a larger war, Ayub Khan now appealed to the Chinese to withdraw the ultimatum". This is borne out by Asghar Khan and more so by the White Paper. When Asghar Khan urged Ayub to keep fighting, the latter kept saying "We are under pressure".

In his statement in 1977 Aziz Ahmed revealed that on September 19 the British High Commissioner, Sir Maurice James, had called on Ayub Khan with an urgent message from Prime Minister Harold Wilson. Bhutto and Aziz Ahmed were both present at the meeting. The burden of the message and the statement of the High Commissioner was that Pakistan must accept a ceasefire before the Chinese ultimatum to India expired. Otherwise, he warned, "the nuclear powers would take over". At this threat, to the dismay of the Foreign Minister and mine, Ayub Khan visibly weakened. The High Commissioner had won his point". The White Paper sets out the discussions at length. Pakistan accepted the ceasefire before midnight of September 22 when the Chinese ultimatum to India was due to expire.

It was after the ceasefire according to Asghar Khan — and not before it as Choudhury believes — that Ayub went on a secret trip to Peking with Bhutto, Nur Khan and Asghar Khan. This was after a conference at Tashkent had been agreed but before it was held. The Chinese criticised the conduct of the war but approved the trip to Tashkent.

Asghar Khan, also, learnt nothing from the episode. Despite the knowledge of Operation Gibraltar which he acquired later, he had no hesitation in declaiming in Lahore three years thereafter that "this was a war not only for the preservation of our independence, but for the preservation of our very existence" which was threatened by "Indian aggression". In the book however, he describes the war as having been "fought for no purpose". While attacking Bhutto for rashness, he tried to outbid him in demagogy as an anti-Indian hawk. On February 26, 1977 he asked Bhutto at an election rally "why had he sneaked into the Indian High Commission at Karachi through a bath-room ?"

It is in vain to expect him to inject any sense of realism into Pakistan's India policy. Altaf Gauhar is more sensible. He writes, "Asghar Khan holds that Ayub Khan yielded to foreign pressure when he could have carried on the war regardless of the unsatisfactory situation on the ground. If all the information and documents relating to the War were made public, Asghar Khan might revise his judgment." He points out that "few people outside the armed forces realise how close Pakistan came to disaster in the 1965 War due to inadequate preparation, facile assumptions and criminal Foreign Office advice. The full facts still remain to be disclosed." He further points out that "unless all the facts of 1948, 1965 and 1971 are made public, our people will go on living in a false world, scoring imaginary victories against fictitious adversaries." This is the task before Pakistan's leaders.

But they seem unwilling to undertake it. Why, even Altaf Gauhar holds that "if Asghar Khan remained in command of the Air Force he would have given the Operation a positive and decisive complexion, because of his devotion to the cause of Kashmir and his whole attitude toward war with India." Clearly, what they really regret even now is not the launching of the attack but its failure.

They criticise Anglo-American "pressure" on Pakistan quite oblivious of the fact that it was Pakistan which had first sought outside intention — by China. And without Chinese help could Pakistan have hoped to inflict defeat and impose its terms on India? On the day India retaliated on the Lahore front, September 6, the U.S. Ambassador met Ayub Khan. The White Paper records that "on no less than three occasions during that meeting the ambassador told the President India has you by the throat."

Both, the attack and its failure, are historical facts of relevance to the Kashmir question today. A nation which fails in its own chosen forum — the battlefield — cannot hope to achieve success at the conference table. Had Pakistan won the war, would it have held a plebiscite in Kasmir under the UN resolutions ? The war has cost Pakistan dear. But it is not too late yet for it to put the past behind it and seek a new relationship facts of the past and the realities of based on a candid recognition of the today.

It's her year... she deserves a special gift...

The Gift of Love

Children. Innocent. Beautiful. Our most precious possessions. So fragile. Handle them with care. Treat them with tenderness.

Realize that growing-up is a time of much happiness...and heartbreak. Assure your children that you are always there to run to—whenever they need you.

A child who is kissed and cuddled and truly loved grows up affectionate and well-balanced. Treasure and cherish your children so they may learn in their turn to treasure and to cherish. When you give them the gift of love now—you give them the capacity to love as well. It's a gift that will last a lifetime.

Carona Cares

A tribute to children in the International Year of the Child.

IN the burning issue of the recent rift between Shatru and Amitabh Bachhan, the usual stands have been taken by the two concerned parties. Amitabh is the tight-lipped (stiff-upper-lip, I should say) cold, offended person, deepening the mystery of what actually happened. It seems however, to have been sparked off by the release of Kaala Pathhar, irrespective of any other tensions there may have been under the surface before this. And needless to say, the other party in this cold war is Shatru, yakking about it to everyone. And with the shrugging of shoulders and the I-have-no-quarrel-with-him statements which he is making, there is the undercurrent of a taunt in what he says — he is very sure of his capacity he says; which means that the other person isn't.

IS the end of year proving to be a time for wedding in filmland? Following the Neetu-Rishi wedding scheduled for November 3 is a strong rumour that Shabana Azmi and Shekhar are going to follow suit as well. Maybe now her mom will be at peace, since her one wish has been that Shabana should marry.

Jezebel: What are the producers waiting for?

IN the flood of flop films that have certainly pulled Hema Malini down from where she ruled there is one which promises to be a resurrection for her — at least that is what trade circles predict. The film is Manoj Kumar's Kranti. Not only has she got a big good role, but Manoj has projected her in a very desi, sexy image which no one has done before. Trust Manoj the excellent visualiser to come up with the bull's-eye role for a falling star as in the case of Hema, or a rising one struggling to get up there, like Zeenat.

AND look who's going all out, at least verbally, to prove to the film world that she too, can act ... I mean really act. Like Zeenat, Tina Munim is now clenching a fist to all who care to listen and trying to assert that she wants to do dramatic roles of the type Benegal, Sathyu and Co. give their heroines. Imagine Tina playing a scheduled caste girl, an untouchable firebrand of the type Smita Patil played in Manthan. She wants to do at least the Rajashree type of films.

GHAR KI LAAJ the typical emotional family film which promised to draw swarms at the box-office, has not yet brought in the expected results. Perhaps like in most family films, a lot of month-to-month publicity will bring about the success Meanwhile Kaala Pathhar which has not been appreciated by many audiences, still has the largest number of prints showing in town, if that is any proof of its success. ■

IS there a deliberate campaign going on against Saritha? Now that her role in Nool Veli, a Tamil tragedy, is much-talked-about, and the film is on its way to becoming a hit, Telugu and Tamil magazines are coming out with a number of personal stories concerning her. Since the day a Telugu magazine flashed a photograph showing her with a man, believed to be her husband, Saritha is in the news! Of course she hasn't denied her early marriage and since she doesn't live with her husband, she has never felt the need to speak about her marriage to any journalist. Some gossip-columnists suggest that she ditched her engineer husband because her films are doing well at the box-office. But this columnist knows for certain that he wasn't even around when Saritha began acting in her maiden film, Maro Charitra. And she's quoted as having said that she was married when she was just 16 and all that she got from him was loads of unhappiness. As she continued working not only in Maro Charitra but in three other films subsequently, she continued living in a small house in a depressing part of the city. Now with three hits to her credit, she can confidently move into a new better house.

WHAT if Harry Pothen's dreams of making his ex-mistress and star Jayabharathy act in Hindi films went kaput? She has at last arrived — via Man Ka Angan, a dubbed version of her Malayalam hit, A Heart for Hire. The film was premiered in Hyderabad recently and has had a good run : it's slated to be shown in Calcutta and Bombay in November. The subject is impotency : Jayabharathy is married to a masculine estate owner (Raghavan) who just can't perform. So she goes back to her old lover (Soman) but the guilt haunts her and disgusted with her coldness, he has a fling with a drama actress. The film has quite a few bedroom scenes, showing Jayabharathy trying desperately to "warm-up" her impotent husband : cheap-thrills enough to titillate our sex-starved audiences.

POTHEN had plans to remake Rathi Nirvedham into Hindi, with Jayabharathy playing the seductress of course. He had her tutored by Asha Chandra but one understands that despite Pothen's lack of interest in the project, some other producers have approached her to do the film in Hindi. Since permission to remake the film may not be given away, as Pothen himself is the producer, a slightly different version may go to the sets soon. In the meanwhile will Jayabharathy do something about her ever-expanding waistline, please?

JAI GANESH is the popular choice for the second lead in films starring Sivaji Ganesan but nobody can say how long this association will last. In the past Messrs Muthuraman, Srikanth, Vijayakumar and Rajnikant used to be the favourites. Sivaji is rather sensitive about his co-heroes getting the credit he feels even today he can carry a film to success on his own shoulders and he isn't wrong.

ACTRESS Latha's brother Rajkumar, who bears a strong resemblance to Kamalahasan, is paired with Hindi starlet Rajni Sharma in an up-and-coming Tamil film Kashmir Kathali. He's already having many offers but he wants to go slow till the release of his maiden venture and with sister Latha's excellent PR network, he should be able to go places quite fast.

SHARMILA TAGORE'S presence in director Sankaran Nair's Malayalam Chuvanna Chiragugal produced a good performance : she played a call-girl but the front-benchers were a bit disappointed. They seem to remember Sharmila Tagore in An Evening In Paris and Talash. What's the use of importing a Bombay star if she won't add glamour to a film, they felt.

NEWCOMER Vanithasri had high hopes that her maiden venture Karai Kadantha Oruthi would make her a big star. She plays a gypsy and has bared herself with grace but the film was an out-and-out amateurish affair, a case of inexperienced cooks producing tasteless broth.

HAS actor Jai Shankar parted company with Karunanidhi after the ruinous flops like Aadu Pambey? The grapevine has it that Jaishankar isn't interested in having celluloid digs at MGR since his dreams of gaining popularity as the DMK hero didn't materialise.

SUMITRA says, "Don't believe rumours about my alleged flings." Frankly speaking she has had very little from the gossip-mills; in fact, she's one of those gentle, adjustable stars, and what's wrong if she really likes Ravikumar, the up-and-coming Malayalam actor?

WHO else, Flounder! Who else! Blacksmith Rusch, Franciscan monk Stanislaus. Preacher Hegge, rich man Ferber, and Abbot Jeschke. If during the lifetime of the abbess Margarete I was one and the other and successively this one and that one — her father, her kitchen boy, her opponents and victims — why would it not be conceivable that far away from her but wishing to help her by making pepper cheaper, I opened up the sea route to India to Portuguese caravels? Consider that the Sao Rafael dropped anchor off Calicut on March 28, 1498, at which time Kristin Rusch, an inhabitant of the Wicker Bastion, was pregnant with Fat Gret.

At first I merely toyed with this question along with my usual worries (Ilsebill), but then, when I'd started on my trip, it became an obsession. Possibly it was fear of the foreign surroundings that made me look for a role. (How was I to exist in Calcutta without one?) Or cursory readings in Hinduism beguiled me into extending my Eastern European rebirths to the Indian subcontinent; but I didn't want to have been Lord Curzon or Kipling. I finally said to myself: the abbess Margarete Rusch must have had some reason for marrying her elder daughter, Hedwig, to a Portuguese merchant, whose intention of opening a trading post on the Malabar Coast in southern India was explicitly mentioned in the marriage contract. It was decided that with the viceroy's permission the couple would take up residence at Cochin, and from there, as stipulated in the marriage contract, ship suitable amounts of pepper twice a year, for the feasts of Saint Martin and Saint John. The rule dating from the days of Vasco and of Alfonso d'Albuquerque that prohibited the entry of Christian women seems to have been relaxed, and the family struck root.

They settled in Cochin, where the merchant Rodrigues d'Evora and his wife, Hedwig, soon made a fortune in the spice trade—pepper, cloves, ginger, and cardamom—but the climate was too much for them. Along with four of their five children, they died before Margarete Rusch, who thanks to the stipulated spice shipments, was able to give Indian spices currency in Danzig and environs: tripe with ginger, millet curry, gingerbread, here in pepper sauce, pepper with anything and everything. And because my travel schedule included a visit to the seaport town of Cochin in the Indian state of Kerala, I decided to travel unofficially as Vasco da Gama. While still at the Frankfurt airport, though with my seat belt already fastened, I wrote in my sketchbook: Vasco returns.

He arrives in a jumbo jet. Actually all he wants to do is visit the black Kali and see her stick out her red tongue. Vasco has read all the statistics. Vasco knows what the president of the World Bank thinks about Calcutta. Vasco is supposed to deliver a lecture. As a precaution he has already written it down, in long and GUNTER GRASS, the famous German novelist, comes to Calcutta possessed with a sense of history and sees himself as Vasco da Gama on a return visit. Even the Enterovioform he carries does not save him from diarrhoea. short sentences. "By a rough estimate..." says his speech. Well fed, Vasco suffers under the problem of World hunger. After many rebirths, Vasco is now a writer. He is writing a book in which he exists down through the ages: the Stone Age, the Early Christian, High Gothic, Reformation and Baroque eras, the age of the Enlightenment, et cetera.

Immediately after the takeoff he quotes himself: Somebody ought to write a report on hunger down through the ages, comparing past, present and future hunger. The famine of 1317, when there was nothing to eat but manna grits. The meat shortage of 1520, when dumplings of many kinds were invented. Hunger in Prussia before the introduction of the potato, and hunger in Bangladesh. The gestures and languages of hunger are in need of study. Behaviour patterns induced by the anticipation of hunger. Evocation of past famines: the rutabaga winter of 1917; the soggy corn bread of '45. What it really means to be starving. We need a catalogue of hunger quotations, says Vasco to himself, toying listlessly with refrigerated and therefore tasteless Air India pate.

The goddess Kali is looked upon as the female aspect of the god Shiva. Her power destroys. When in the mood she demolishes man's precarious structures. We are living in her era. (Vasco thinks in passing of his wife, Ilsebill, who likes to smash glasses and is a great hand at wishing.)

Even before the fuelling stop at Kuwait his eyeglasses get broken. But he is not unprovided for. Because of the humidity in Calcutta, Vasco has bought cotton trousers, shirts, and socks in a tropical-outfitting store in Hamburg. Vasco is supplied with Enterovioform. Vasco has had cholera and yellow fever shots. Vasco has thrice swallowed coloured antityphoid capsules on an empty stomach. Vasco is carrying five pounds of statistics in his luggage. Vasco is the guest of the Indian government. This is known on board the jumbo jet. Vasco is really someone else and is known under a different name.

He ought to have spoken to his wool-gathering audience in Delhi about Kali and how she sticks out her red tongue, instead of citing roughly estimated figures replete with zeros, standing for protein deficiency, excess population, and mortality rates: abstract quantities worshipped only in footnotes, whereas the unfathomable Kali can be understood everywhere, but especially in Calcutta, on the Hooghly River. She who is hung with garlands of skulls and chopped-off hands. She the playful, commanding, terrible, Dravidian Kali. (She can also be called Durga, Parvati, Uma, Sati, or Padma.)

Still aboard the jumbo jet (without sleep), Vasco tries to construct a kinship between the neolithic goddess Awa, remarkable for her three breasts, and Kali, the four-armed strangler. He thinks up an uprising: Oppressed by matriarchy, the men in the swamplands of the Vistula estuary band together. In a frenzy of procreative activity (advised by the Flounder), they try to introduce the partriarchate. But Awa wins out and has a hundred and eleven men emasculated with stone axes. From then on she wears their dried penises strung on a chain around her vast pelvis, just as the Indian Kali decks herself out with chopped-off hands and skulls.

The moment he gets there, Vasco starts writing postcards. "Dear Ilsebill, everything here is strange..." Then, wishing to gain a visual impression of the strange country, he has his glasses made whole.

FOURTEEN ninety-eight: Vasco knows that he lied to himself then, just as he deceives himself now. Men are always rubbing up their aims to a high polish: For the glory of God... To save endangered humanity ... When what actually impelled him to find a sea route to India, the land of spices, was nautical ambition. It was other people, the "peppersacks", or shopkeepers, who made the big money.

At an evening reception (in his honour), some ladies who have studied in England question Vasco about the aims and motives of the women's liberation movement. Vasco tells them about a women's tribunal that is being held in Berlin but making headlines far beyond its confines. A captured Flounder, he tells them, is symbolically on trial; the Flounder embodies the principle of male domination; he is being tried in a bulletproof tank. Then Vasco suggests to the ladies that the liberation of Indian women be placed under the high patronage of the goddess Kali. (Mightn't Nehru's daughter, Indira, be an embodiment of her terrible aspect?) While pine nuts are being nibbled, his suggestion arouses interest, although the ladies, daughters of prominent Brahman families, prefer Durga, the mild aspect of the goddess; Kali, it seems, is more popular with the lower castes.

The next day Vasco doesn't feel like going to the museum; he wants to visit a slum. The slum dwellers look at him in amazement. He is intimidated by the cheerfulness of these poverty-stricken people and their unconquerable charm. The giggling of the ragged young girls who, because they have hips, show their hips. True, they beg with their hands and eyes, but they don't complain. (They're not starving, after all, just chronically undernourished.) It all looks so natural. As though that were how it had to be forever and ever. As though the growth of bigger and bigger slums was an organic process that shouldn't be disturbed, but at the most cured of its worst abuses.

Vasco (the discoverer) asks questions about work, wages, number of children, school attendance, family planning, intestinal flora, latrines. The answers confirm the statistics in his possession, no more. Then he is obliged to visit a large fortress (dating from his Mogul days) in which some units of the Indian army are now quartered. Looking down from the battlements at midday, Vasco tries to engrave a picture on his mind: five hundred ragged bodies lying in a flat field (whose grass covering has been eaten away by cows), looking as dead as if English machine guns, firing from the fort's embrasures, had mowed them down. Each bundle lies by itself. Dusty units. Corpses eager to rot. Their death-sleep warmed by the sun. Extras out of a colonial film, waiting for the next pan. A pity Vasco has left his 35-mm camera at the hotel. He makes a note of the word: death-sleepers. And I, he says, am supposed to have discovered this? In vain Vasco forbids himself to find these sleeping corpses, arranged by chance or some other law, beautiful. If he were tired and lay down among them he would look awkwardly out of place.

The chairman of the planning commission fills out a Nehru suit speaks past Vasco deep into the distance: We have, as you know, three thousand years of history behind us. We did not come into existence when that Portuguese discovered us by the sea route.

Vasco appears to be listening attentively while he tries in vain to recall the details of the 1498 landing at Calicut. (We sent a convict ashore to see what would happen.) The chairman of the planning commission explains that despite its infinitely various faces India is nevertheless one. No outsider can fully know us. Calcutta, he says, is indeed a problem, but there are many artists living in this fascinating city. And Bengali poetry...

AT the airport a wreath of flowers is thrown over Vasco's head. Flags everywhere (not on his account). The worldchampionship table-tennis matches, now being held in Calcutta, are viewed as a political event. The International Table Tennis Association has excluded South Africa and Israel, but the Palestinians have been invited. Only Holland protests. The Brazilian contestants lack a few inoculations and are quarantined. It has taken only four weeks to build the modern table-tennis stadium. The city government of Calcutta with its three thousand slum districts, here called bustees, is proud of the achievement. Because of the table tennis tournament all the hotels are full, so Vasco is housed in the great apartments of the former viceroy's palace, since independence the residence of the provincial governor. Vasco's room is twenty feet high: the bed, under its canopy of mosquitonetting, is in the middle. Two ventilators and three electric fans keep the air in motion. On the writing desk, two inkwells from Queen Victoria's day. Vasco jots down notes about the farm cook Amanda Woyke. Her correspondence with Count Rumford. Both wanted to combat world hunger with giant kitchens, she with her West Prussian potato soup, he with his Rumford soup for the poor. Vasco writes: But the Kashubians couldn't get used to potatoes just as esmolina is repellent to the rice-eating Bengalis, even when they are starving. So the Kashubians continued for a long time to eat too little millet, until at last they consented to fill up on potatoes.

The governor's palace is known as Raj Bhavan. On every side, quietly moving servants in slitted red coats under white turbans. They fold their hands when they greet Vasco. The soldiers in the corridors salute. The cook has been in the house for thirty-six years. He has cooked for Englishmen and their guests. At table four servants wait on Vasco. The aged cook calls his cooking European. At breakfast (ham and eggs), Vasco is served the newspaper with the latest word of the table-tennis matches. Through an aide the governor requests the honour of Vasco's company at luncheon. Vasco dreads the meal with the governor. (Good God! What am I doing here!) He wants to go home to his Ilsebill.

But Calcutta, this crumbling, scabby, swarming city, this city that eats its own excrement, has decided to be cheerful. It wants its misery—and misery can be photographed wherever you go—to be terrifyingly beautiful: the decay plastered with advertising posters, the cracked pavement, the beads of sweat adding up to nine million souls. People pour out of rail road stations which, like Vasco only yesterday, have daily diarrhoea: white-shirted maggots in a shitpile with Victorian Excrescences, a shitpile that dreams up new curlicues every minute. And on top of everything betel reddened spittle.

On foot across the Hooghly Bridge and back. On the left side junk for sale: worn-out shoes, coconut fibre, school slates, faded shirts, primitive tools, kitsch from Hong Kong, native kitsch. The right-hand sidewalk is bordered by groups of peasants from the surrounding villages selling purple onions, yellow, sand-gray, or bright-red lentils, ginger root, sugar cane, molasses pressed into cakes, unhusked rice, coarse-ground wheat, chapatty. The bridge, which has no central support, vibrates under the two-way traffic of bare feet, trucks, rickshaws and oxcarts. Suddenly in the midst of the crowd Vasco is overcome with joy. He too, wants to chew betel. But when he looks down from either bridgehead, there is nothing but misery: he is aghast at the sight of hollowed-out women and old men with shrunken heads upon whom death has set its mark.

There are no separate slums, or bustees, in Calcutta. The whole city is one bustee, or slum, and neither the middle nor the upper classes can segregate themselves from it. High school girls with their books can be seen plodding down the street among bundles of rags the same age as themselves, forming islands in the traffic, then merging again with the great, flowing mass. Wherever the traffic leaves a free space, there are people living in the roadway. Side by side with parks and rundown mansions one sees villagelike groups of cardboard and sheet-metal shacks. People flushed into the city by the last famine (just a year ago), those whom the bustees have expelled or found no room for stay on in such places. They come from Bihar; they are strangers among the Bengalis. At night they squat around fires outside the shacks and cook what they've been able to find in the garbage. The collecting instinct is all they have left. The fires are fed with cow dung or cakes of straw and coal dust. Here the Stone Age is staging a comeback and has already made deep inroads. The buses look like an archaeologist's dream. Vasco takes refuge in the governor's palace.The palace guard knows him by now.

On the programme: tea with a film maker who is flying to Chicago tomorrow to show American students his Calcutta film. Smilingly we converse—two sophisticated producers. Vasco asks about the possibility of a film in which a reborn Vasco da Gama visits modern India, fears the goddess Kali, comes to Calcutta, gets diarrhoea, and lives in the governor's palace. Then he talks about the cooks of his various time-phases: the neolithic Awa, the High Gothic Dorothea, the revolutionary Sophie, and the cooking abbess Margarete Rusch, for whose cookery a drop in the price of pepper was important. He mentions the Flounder and his activities since the Neolithic era. The film maker nods. Yes, he says, a similar fish in a similar function has been known in India since the Dravidian period, and this fish was hostile on principle, though ineffectually, to Kali.

Then the film maker talks about the next film festival and in passing, about the dead bodies in the streets of Calcutta, which are collected toward morning. It has always been this way. In 1943, when he was a child, two million Bengalis had starved because the British army had used up all the rice stocks in the war against Japan. Had a film been made about it? No, unfortunately not. You can't film starvation.

Wherever he goes in Calcutta, at the film makers, with Mother Theresa's nuns, at the governor's luncheon in his honour, everyone wants to know what his next book is about—as if that could make any difference to India.

Even on his visit to a bustee, the planner from the Department of Economic Planning asks him literary questions. Vasco explains himself in detail. The book deals with the history of human nutrition. It all happens in the region of the Vistula estuary, though actually it might just as well take place at the mouth of the Ganges or here on the banks of the Hooghly River. The goddess in his book is called Awa. Unfortunately he knows much too little about the Dravidian Kali.

Then Vasco takes refuge in statistical questions and gets answers he could have found in statistical tables. There are three thousand bustees in Calcutta. "We prefer not to call them slums." The population of the bustees ranges from five hundred to seventy-five thousand. That adds up to three million bustee dwellers. An average of eight to ten people to a room. Ten to twelve huts form an open square around a court. Excrement and kitchen waste flow down the main streets in open gutters. In this particular bustee the schoolroom holds some fortyfive children. A social worker is in charge of it. The same cheerfulness: so proud to have a school. Vasco tries to imprint the stench on his memory. Hallmarks of misery; the usual injustice. Extortionate rents are paid to hut owners who also live in the bustee. Everybody shits where he can and must. True enough, Vasco writes, but compared to Frankfurt am Main, the people here are alive. Later on he wants to cross out this sentence.

The bustee dwellers come from the countryside. To clean up Calcutta, says the planner, you'd first have to clean up the villages. So Vasco goes to the villages; mud huts under coconut palms. He sees the round storehouses, mounted on trestles to keep out the rats, but empty. A smiling peasant woman with a cluster of seven children sends her eldest boy up a palm tree. Vasco drinks the coconut milk and remembers. There's not enough water in the fields for the young rice plants. The roadside canal has been drained; it's supposed to be dredged no one knows when. The peasants are deeply in debt mostly for their daughters' weddings. They pay forty per cent interest. Untouchables are not allowed to help with the harvest. Men and women bathe in a number of pools where last month's rain water is fast evaporating. All bathe in their clothes. (Mohammedan puritanism followed by Victorian puritanism). All the children have worms. Vasco agrees: a beautiful village. He likes the coconut palms, the banana trees, the mud huts, the wormy children and the smiling women. But the village is sick and on its way to becoming a Calcutta.

China and Czechoslovakia are leading in the table-tennis matches. The newly built table-tennis stadium is almost empty, since the tickets are priced too high even for the middle class.

AFTER his four servants have brought him the morning paper and served his breakfast (poached eggs), Vasco visits the former premier of the West Bengal People's Front government. He finds himself facing an elderly gentleman, bolt upright in a white cotton garment stirred by the draft. No, he doesn't belong to the Moscow-inspired party, he's a Marxist Communist. Without bitterness he names defeats. Vasco learns how the Naxalites have split off and regrouped as a revolutionary movement. So many intelligent young people, says the Marxist with regret, and adds ironically: Of good family. When they found they weren't getting anywhere—because all the stories about "liberated territories" were Chinese propaganda—the Naxalites started murdering their former comrades, some four hundred Marxists. No says the old man, Maoism cannot be transplanted to India. Basically Naxalite radicalism is just another gesture of bourgeois impotence.

In this country, Vasco hears himself say, I'd be a radical myself. He decides (so many characters swarming inside him) to invent for his book a conversation between Lena Stübbe, cook at the Danzig-Ohra soup kitchen and Comrade August Bebel, who happens to be on his way through (1895), in which they take up the question of whether working-class women should emulate "bourgeois" cookery, or whether they require a proletarian cook book.

The melancholy (Brahman) Marxist sits in a bare room and flexes his knees. From time to time a laconic telephone conversation. On the walls, side by side with three wooden wild ducks that pass as ornaments, a small picture of Lenin. Only last week there were two attacks on comrades. In front of the house is parked a black automobile, surrounded by the Marxist's bodyguards.

Next Vasco visits poets. They read one another (in English) poems about flowers, monsoon clouds, and the elephant-headed god, Ganesha. An English lady (in a sari) lisps impressions of her travels in India. Some forty people in elegant, spacious garments sit spiritually on fibre mats under a draft-propelled fan; outside the windows, the bustees are not far away.

Vasco admires the fine editions of books, the literary chitchat, the imported pop posters. Like everyone else he nibbles pine nuts and doesn't know which of the lady poets he would like to fuck if the opportunity presented itself. Why not a poem about a pile of shit that God dropped and named Calcutta. How it swarms, stinks, lives, and gets bigger and bigger. If God had shat a pile of concrete, the result would have been Frankfurt. Calcutta airport is called Dum-Dum. The formerly British munitions factory there is still producing. Christian hypocrites used to say that the enormous holes made by the truncated, expanding Dum-Dum bullets spared the victims the usual tortures (of belly wounds, for instance). The surviving Naxalites are imprisoned in Dum-Dum Prison. Hope has no place in a poem about Calcutta. Write with pus. Rip off scabs...

A nun from Wattenscheid, belonging to the Order of Mother Theresa, takes Vasco to a lepers' bustee. A child is lying there, half dead. With her white hand, the nun shoos the flies away the half-dead child. Vultures are perched on the tile roofs of the stinking slaughterhouse across the way. All you can do is walk through step across, look away.

Vasco no longer knows where he is or has been. Now in a day nursery—so affectionate these two-year olds, Now in a school, where the children sing something Catholic with closed eyes. Now in a foundling home... a childless Brahman couple adopt the newborn son of an untouchable mother. Vasco wishes them well. Now milk is being distributed outside a dispensary—all so inadequate. A resolute nun keeps the crowd in order. Sister Ananda tells me what Mother Theresa says about the problems of Calcutta. "Maybe we're only a drop of water in the ocean," she says, "but the ocean wouldn't be full without us."

No, don't look. Step across. Stop your ears with lead. Practise glassy-eyed indifference. Leave pity in your suitcase with you shirts and socks, or stick a bank note in your guidebook at the place where it says "Calcutta." Or look. Stop. Listen. Feel moved and ashamed. Show your red tongue, because pity is small change and quickly dispensed.

Now in Kalighat, where the ragged bundles that are picked up off the street at night are (for once) given ample helpings of rice at Mother Theresa's home for the dying. Next door (at last) the temple of the goddess Kali. A priest explains and Vasco pays him five rupees. In the sacrificial area blood covered with flies recalls the goats that were sacrificed this morning. Young women scratch little good-luck symbols in the blood drenched clay. Close by there's a tree for mothers who wish for children, lots of children, another child, more children, more and more children, a child (or two or three) year in, year out. The mothers hang wishing stones on the tree. The tree is full of wishing stones, all signifying children, more children. Wherever Vasco looks, flowery madness and Catholic type Hindu kitsch. The black Kali is hidden behind the crush of the faithful.

Vasco stands to one side. He wants to know why she sticks out her red tongue. The priest explains that after Kali had killed all the demons (and other counter-revolutionaries) she couln't stop killing and only came to her senses after setting her foot on the chest of her recumbent male aspect, Shiva. Then Kali was ashamed, and for shame she stuck out her tongue. Sticking out the tongue has been regarded as a sign of being ashamed ever since. Nowhere has Vasco seen a minister, governor, Brahman or lisping poet stick out his tongue. He has seen the pale tongues of cows grazing gently in garbage. He has seen how undernourishment turns children blond. He has seen mothers dipping their whining babies' pacifiers in brackish sugar water. He has seen flies on everything under the sun. He has seen life before death.

Vasco takes refuge in the newspaper. Side by side with a story about the strike of the food truckers he reads the latest about the tabletennis matches. The members of the Swedish team have the runs. After a short stroll around town they flee back to their hotel in horror. Now they talk of leaving ahead of time. And Vasco writes his Ilsebill, now in her third month of pregnancy, horrified half sentences on a postcard showing a glossy picture of the black Kali: "This place defies understanding. Reason won't get you anywhere. The lepers are worse than I thought. I've met a nun who believes with all her might and is always cheerful. The heat is something. Leaving tomorrow. Flying to the Malabar coast, where Vasco da Gama landed..."

Send a postcard with regards from Calcutta. See Calcutta and go on living. Meet your Damascus in Calcutta. As alive as Calcutta. Chop off your cock in Calcutta (in the temple of Kali, where young goats are sacrificed and a tree is hung with wishing stones that cry out for children, more and more children). In Calcutta, encoffined in mosquito netting, dream of Calcutta. Get lost in Calcutta. On an uninhabited island write a book about Calcutta. At a party call Calcutta an example (of something). Rethink the Frankfurt/Manneheim area as Calcutta. Misbehaved children, women like Ilsebill who are never satisfied and men who live for schedules —curse them, wish them all in Calcutta. Recommend Calcutta to a young couple as a good place to visit on their honey-moon. Write a poem called "Calcutta" and stop taking planes to far-off places. Get a composer to set all the projects for cleaning up Calcutta to music and have the resulting oratorio (sung by a Bach society) open in Calcutta. Develop a new dialectic from Calcutta's contradictions. Transfer the UN to Calcutta.

When Vasco da Gama, hardly able to remember his first landing returned reborn to Calcutta he decided to level the city with ten thousand bulldozers and rebuild it by computer. Thereupon the computer vomited up three thousand sixteen story bustees another vast slum only deep frozen and much lonelier beyond hope of disaster and totally isolated, since all noise had been absorbed. And then Calcutta died, though the living standard had been raised just above the destitution level. Very little was lacking only the things that matter. People who multiply, as a form of self assertion. All the same says Vasco to himself infant mortality has dropped. Or perhaps if all the existing statistical charts and tables were pulped a new study could be financed on the proceeds. Let's not waste another word on Calcutta. Delete Calcutta from all guidebooks. In Calcutta, Vasco gained four and a half pounds. ■

Beginning November 4

This week the Sun and Uranus are in Libra, Neptune and Venus are in Scorpio, Kethu is in Aquarius and Mars is in Cancer. Jupiter and Rahu are conjoined in Leo and Saturn alone is in Virgo. The Moon will be moving through Taurus and Gemini from Aries.

ARIES (March 21 — April 20) A week of mixed fortunes is in store for you. You are advised not to depend on others; learn to be self-reliant. A lot of obstacles will be placed in your path. Your words will not carry much weight. The second part of the week is more favourable for your ventures. It would be wise to postpone important matters. Financially, this will be a bad week. Good dates: 4, 5 and 7. Lucky numbers: 4 and 7. Favourable direction: South-east.

TAURUS (April 21 — May 22) Do not hesitate to ask your friends for help. The problems which you are facing now cannot be solved without the help of influential people. For businessmen, this will be a busy week. New contracts and business deals are in the offing. Women and children will have an enjoyable time. Letters are not likely to bring good news. Good dates: 6, 8 and 9. Lucky numbers: 2 and 7. Favourable direction: South-east.

GEMINI (March 23 — June 21) Be on your guard throughout this week. Do everything very carefully, otherwise you may have good reasons to repent in the near future. Businessmen are advised to pay great attention to minute details. Differences with business partners must be solved amicably. Avoid harsh words in your own interests. You may have to undertake a short journey. Good dates: 6, 8 and 9. Lucky numbers: 2 and 7. Favourable direction: North-west.

CANCER (June 22 — July 22) An exciting week of fun and pleasure is in store for you. Soon everything should begin to proceed smoothly. Due to your forgetful nature you may lose a valuable object. Make a valiant effort to win over your enemies. A good week for speculation, gambling and betting. For romantic ventures, this is an ideal period. Stop worrying about debts. Good dates: 5, 6, 8 and 10. Lucky numbers: 1 and 10. Favourable direction: South.

LEO (July 23 — August 22) An unlucky week is forecast for you. New developments will need all your time and attention. Let your own intuition and hunches be your guide. Time is not yet ripe for you to achieve success. Avoid making nasty decisions. Financially, this will be a trying period. Domestic affairs, too, could pose a problem. Talk less and avoid all controversies. Good dates: 6, 7, 9 and 10. Lucky numbers: 4 and 9. Favourable directions: North and South

VIRGO (August 23 — September 22) A misunderstanding with business associates could prove very expensive in the long run. Try your level best to reach an understanding at the earliest. You will need the help of your close friends. You may inherit some property. Businessmen will enter into new contracts. Avoid doubtful love adventures. A bad week for gambling. Good dates: 6, 9 and 10. Lucky number: 1. Favourable direction: North.

LIBRA (September 23 — October 22) This is going to be a thrilling week full of adventures. Your achievement curve is likely to soar up. Letters will bring good news. For sportsmen this period should prove very lucky. Businessmen will have a roaring time. The domestic scene will be a source of joy and happiness. Take the advice of your elders before launching a new venture. Good dates: 5, 7, 8 and 9. Lucky numbers: 5 and 9. Favourable direction: North.

SCORPIO (October 23 — November 21) Go ahead with your schemes and plans. The stars favour you as never before. A lot of good things will materialise this week. Most of your problems are likely to come to an end. Even your enemies will come forward to help you. Take advantage of the prevailing trend to fulfil all your ambitions. You may inherit some property. Good dates: 5, 6, 9 and 10. Lucky numbers: 2 and 6. Favourable direction: South-west.

SAGITTARIUS (November 22 — December 22) Curb erratic tendencies. Professional, domestic and social activities should prove very satisfying this week. You must make full use of the favourable stellar influences. The achievements of your children will bring happiness. Do not be afraid to seek favours from those in authority. Check extravagance and keep your temper under control. Good dates: 4, 5 and 7. Lucky numbers: 4 and 5. Favourable directions: South and West.

CAPRICORN (December 23 — January 20) Deal tactfully with those in authority and show proper respect towards women and elders. Your affairs will progress and you may gain unexpected benefits. Guard against deception and treachery. Refrain from hasty decisions as they may prove very expensive. Look after your health. Do not be afraid to seek favours. Good dates: 5, 6, 8 and 10 Lucky numbers: 1 and 3. Favourable direction: East.

AQUARIUS (January 21 — February 19) You will be praised by your friends and relatves. This promises to be a good week for love and matrimonial affairs. Your family has no worries. Avoid making hasty decisions and vocational changes at this juncture. Take care of your health. You will be able to overcome all your problems. Domestic affairs could pose a problem. Good dates: 4, 5 and 10. Lucky numbers: 2 and 7. Favourable directions: North-east and South

PISCES (February 20 — March 20) Do not be afraid to adopt original business methods to maximise profits. Luck will smile on you this week. Members of the opposite sex will help you in unerpected ways. Exercise caution in love affairs. You need a long rest to regain physical and mental vitality. Good dates: 4, 8, 9 and 10. Lucky numbers: 5 and 6. Favourable direction: South

Game of the month – thunderbolt

The value of opening theory is much overestimated, but every so often someone comes up with a theoretical innovation which effectively decides the game on the spot. It is the risk one takes when playing theoretical lines that the opponent may have found in his home analysis something the books overlook, but such instances are relatively rare. The danger is no greater than that of crossing the road. Today's game, however, is an example of a grandmaster being run over. Black is happily following a line regarded by theory as perfectly satisfactory when he is suddenly hit by a thunderbolt, which the books had hitherto failed to mention. Bad luck.

SUPPOSE that you are in Four Spades with the following cards:

♦ Q J 9 6
♣ K 10 9 5 2

♦ 8 led — N / W E / S

♠ K 9 6 5 3 2
♥ A K 7 5

With both sides vulnerable, the bidding has been:

SOUTH	WEST	NORTH	EAST
—	—	—	1♦
dble	No	2NT	No
3♠	No	3NT	No
4♠	No	No	No

(South's bidding is debatable: he might have overcalled with One Spade instead of doubling, and he might have passed 3NT.)

West leads his partner's suit and dummy's Queen of diamonds holds the first trick.

Your first idea, probably, is to ruff one of your heart losers and hope to lose one trump, one heart and one club. So perhaps you begin with ♠ A, followed by ♥ A K and a heart ruff. Not so good when the full hand is:

♥ 10 8
♦ Q J 9 6
♣ K 10 9 5 2

♠ 10 8 4 — ♠ Q J
♥ Q J 6 3 — ♥ 9 4 2
♦ 8 — ♦ K 10 7 5 3 2
♣ Q 8 7 6 4 — ♣ A J

N / W E / S

♠ K 9 6 5 3 2
♥ A K 7 5

In dummy after the heart ruff you attempt to come to hand with ♦ A. West ruffs and leads a fourth heart, promoting a further trump trick for his side.

The far-sighted play of a club from dummy at trick two is an improvement. East may win and give his partner a diamond ruff, but West coupe avec son argent, as the French describe it. Communications are now fluid. West may try a second club, but when the Ace appears declarer can ruff and play two rounds of trumps, abandoning the heart ruff. He loses one heart, the other goes away on the King of clubs. The play of a club at trick two is an example of the Scissors coup.

The US Post Office does not normally issue stamps in honour of famous Americans until at least ten years after they have died. There have been exceptions. Presidents Kennedy, Eisenhower and Johnson were portrayed on memorial stamps issued within a few months of their deaths, respectively, in 1963, 1969 and 1973. Recent issues, observing the ten-year convention, have honoured Senator Robert Kennedy, Dr Martin Luther King and John Steinbeck, all of whom died in 1968. The Steinbeck stamp is the first in a new series which will portray literary celebrities. Its design is from a photograph by Philippe Halsman.

You don't have to choose between an oily hair style...

Now you can get today's "no-oil" hair style and more...

New Code 10 Tonic Hair Dressing

holds and nourishes hair, controls dandruff.

With LO-7 and Panthenol

Today's look is the natural "no-oil" look. But you know what this does to your hair: the scalp dries, dandruff follows. This combined with the lack of nourishment can lead to hair loss.

"No-Oil" Style

Now there's Code 10 Tonic Hair Dressing. With Panthenol and LO-7. For the natural "no-oil" look. Without the problems. This is how.

Your hair stays in place with Code 10. Naturally. The way you want it. Without feeling sticky, oily.

And your scalp and hair get all the care they need with Code 10. It has Panthenol, the proven hair vitamin to help hair roots utilise the nutrients in the blood stream. This gives your hair natural health and full body.

Anti-Dandruff Action

Code 10 also contains LO-7... a proven anti-dandruff agent. It helps clear dandruff, and stays on the scalp to keep it away.

Code 10 Tonic Hair Dressing does all this for your hair...without costing the earth!

The natural choice for the natural style

HOLENARSIPUR: Girl students shut their eyes and stifled their screams and everybody else were just taken aback in the SSLC examination room. It was not the questions that caused the shock—it was a candidate. The room invigilator, who suspected malpractices by a candidate, Ubhaya Kumar, wanted to make a body search of the candidate for unauthorised material. The candidate's compliance staggered the official. Ubhaya Kumar stripped it is said. The authorities have instituted an inquiry into the incident, it is learnt—Deccan Herald (G. Muthuraj, Mysore)

VIRUDHUNAGAR: Residents of Meesalur, a well developed village east of Virudhunagar, have unanimously decided to boycott the coming elections to the Lok Sabha. They have also decided to put up a notice at the entrance to the village warning politicians not to enter the village for canvassing. "We are no more gullible. Politicians! Retrace your steps" the notice says. Mr A. Nammalvar, speaking on behalf of the villagers, said they had met recently and decided not to vote for any political Party as politicians had driven the country to poverty, depriving the villages of their serenity and making the rural folk migrate to towns for a living. Following the example of Meesalur villagers, people of eight other villages in Aruppukottal taluk have decided to boycott the polls. According to Mr S. Velchamy, president of Aruppukottal Taluk Farmers' Association, the farmers also have decided to boycott the elections—Indian Express (Syed Muthahar Saqaf, Killai)

PATNA: A block development officer in UP, has sold the whole stock of foodgrains meant for the food-for-work programme and pocketed the money. Giving this information, the Union Irrigation and Agriculture Minister, Mr Brahm Parkash, told newsmen that it had been mentioned by the concerned district magistrate in his report—Times of India (Hazel Gomez, Meerut)

BHOPAL: Fourteen-year-old Gulab Bai's parentage is in dispute. In fact, all her life till the dispute arose, she had spent with her parents—Girwar and Shetanabai—in a small village in Sehore district in Madhya Pradesh. Gulab Bai was confused when all of a sudden one day a man and a woman, namde Kaluram and Reshan Bai, came and claimed they were her parents. The "new" parents lodged a complaint with the police. They had lost their child in 1970 and had now found her with Girwar and Shetanabai, they said. The claimant mother also said she had identified some marks on the person of Gulab Bai which confirmed that the girl was their child. The Superintendent of Police, Sehore district, referred the case to the Civil Surgeon Sehore, to help identify the girl's true parents on the basis of blood groups. The Civil Surgeon forwarded the case to the Medico-Legal Institute, Bhopal for its opinion. The institute opined that though anthropologically Gulab Bai was the daughter of the parents with whom she was living, the serological study showed she could belong to any of the sets of parents—The Hindu (G. Muthuraj, Mysore)

BOMBAY: Mr Paresh Parikh, a 24-year-old engineer student of Baroda, claims to have written the longest letter—1,875 metres. Mr Parikh told newsmen that he had wanted to break West German Thomas Neahos' record—1,223 metres long—since 1973, when it was established. He had been looking for a willing recipient. The letter, written in six months and weighting about 10 kg will be a "wonderful birthday gift" to his penfriend in Lucknow. It includes all the major events in his life, including his views on prominent personalities—Times of India (Hans Kumar Bhatia, New Delhi)

DELHI: A premature baby, "born dead" in a Delhi hospital on October 16 was later found alive. When the mortuary staff handed over the baby, a boy to the father, the grandmother insisted on seeing his face. When they uncovered his face the boy's eyes were rolling. "He is alive", the members of the family shouted with joy. Though the police have registered a case against the staff of Kasturba Hospital the doctors described the incident as a case of "medical miracle"—The Statesman (Subir Kumar Pal, Siliguri)

MERCARA: The striking men students of the Junior College here have vowed not to shave until they have a new Principal in place of the Principal-in-charge, Smt Cauveriamma. The college is closed at the moment but the students say they will continue the strike even after the college reopened. Students' union secretary Nanaiah and some other union activists said their opposition to Smt. Cauveriamma stemmed from among other things, her objection to students growing facial hair. She forced some students to shave their beards and moustaches, they alleged. They also alleged Smt Vauveriamma wrote adverse remarks in the transfer certificates of students leaving the college—Deccan Herald (K. Vasanth, Karnataka)

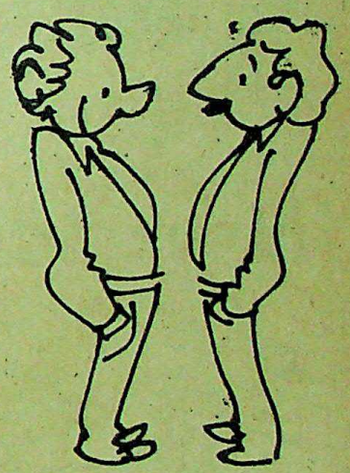
humour in real life



WHEN the idea of a holding company for public sector steel plants was all the rage, a steel plant official spent the better part of an evening at a party with his hands firmly planted in his pockets. His manner irked a guest who came and stood beside him, also with his hands in his pockets, and said: "Mr Sinha and I have decided to form a holding company"—Raghav Sen, Calcutta.

Bahuguna and Devaraj Urs: new equation ?

TOO TOUGH

PRIME Minister Charan Singh can be honest even at his own cost at times. The Lok Dal leader did some plain speaking when Congress president Devaraj Urs called on him on October 25. Urs arrived at 4.15 p.m., after his 90-minute meeting with Janata leader Jagjivan Ram. At five o'clock Charan Singh asked Urs to sit in at an interview with a senior journalist of a group of Calcutta-based newspapers. The Chaudhury used the newsman to convey what he thought of the Congress and its conduct as an alliance partner of the Lok Dal. Here are some of the answers which he gave, both for the benefit of the newsman and Mr Urs. On Tarakeshwari Sinha: "She was in the Congress (I) till the other day. I got her defeated in Samastipur (Mrs Sinha was Mrs Gandhi's candidate in the Lok Sabha by-election). She should not have made the statement against me. I expressed my differences with Nehru even when he was alive. Why should she open her mouth?" On the rumoured Congress-Janata alliance in some States which was putting strains on the ruling coalition: "My friend, I am not doing anything to jeopardise the coalition. Ask Mr Urs about his Party". The correspondent turned to the Congress president who sheepishly smirked and said: "I am not saying anything." At one stage the Chaudhury questioned the bona fides of Congressmen who criticised him for his views on land reforms. All Congressmen, he said in the presence of Urs, came from big landed families or represented high castes. "Look at their record in the field of land reforms in the last 30 years." But the real provocation which Urs stomached without even a feeble protest was when Mr Singh conveyed the distinct impression to the correspondent that at present he, more than anybody else in the country's political life, represented anti-Congressism.

UP THE BUREAUCRATS

IS the bureaucracy more powerful than the Prime Minister of India? Otherwise, how can an order of Prime Minister Charan Singh be flouted with nonchalance? The Prime Minister, after going through the BHEL-Siemens deal had ordered the removal of Mr V. Krishnamurthy from the position of Secretary, Heavy Industry Department, Ministry of Industry. To start with, Mr Krishnamurthy was asked to go on leave preparatory to his transfer to some other Department. Accordingly, Mr Krishnamurthy had gone on leave. But, lo and behold, he is back again as the Secretary of Heavy Industry Department. How could this happen? Top bureaucrats, including Mr Srinivasvardhan, Home Secretary, had a secret meeting. It was decided that the matter should be kept pending in view of the Home Ministry order that there should be no transfers at the top before the elections. The idea is to stall the transfer now and after the elections the political situation could be different.

OUTSIDERS, QUIT !

THE political orphan from Kerala, C. M. Stephen, who is now scouting round the country for a safe seat, made an initial foray into the rough and tumble of north Indian politics by inspiring rumours that he would be the Congress(I) candidate from New Delhi constituency. To get acquainted with the active workers of the Party in the constituency, Stephen got invited to the house of a journalist-politician who himself was an aspirant for the Party ticket from the same New Delhi constituency. One does not know whether it was by design or by accident but what happened at the dinner conclave of Congress(I) workers has given Stephen a fright. He was almost physically manhandled by Youth Congress(I) toughs who described his decision as a "cowardly act of running away from his old constituency in Kerala." Why should they surrender their seat to an outsider, they wanted to know. And what had he been saying when he had lingered on in the Congress(S) long after the split? In fact some Youth Congress (I) activists accused him of joining the Party only to become the Cabinet-ranking Opposition leader. Mr K. L. Bhagat, the Congress (I) boss, had a harrowing time in saving the situation. Now we learn that in order to appease an angry Stephen, the president of the New Delhi District Youth Congress (I) has been suspended from the Party.

Achieving a 77% credit/deposit ratio in rural areas, proves we aren't just another bank!

The popular belief is that all banks are the same. But, happily for us, here are facts which prove otherwise.

A commendable 77% record: what does it mean?
In simple language, it means that 3/4th of the money collected by us from rural areas has been put back for development work in those areas.

Interestingly again, against the 49% credit/deposit ratio achieved by the banking system in the country (rural and semi-urban areas combined), by the end of 1978, Indian Bank has scored 57%.

Strong amongst the weaker sections:
We have always endeavoured to do our best for the weaker sections. The endeavour is reflected in the fast-growing DRI accounts which have a much reduced rate of interest... From 12,731 accounts in this category in 1975, it went up to 24,582 in 1976, 28,693 in 1977, on to 32,711 in 1978.

Equally impressive is the number of agricultural accounts we are serving: 1,89,718 (Dec. 1978).

All these facts prove just one thing: we aren't just another bank!

This is a book no one can afford to miss.

Why?

Because one of the country's finest investigative reporters discloses, for the first time, the stunning, behind-the-scenes truth about what exactly happened during those days.

It is an extraordinary story. And that is why Ananda Publishers, the premier publishers of West Bengal, have decided to enter English publishing with this book.

Price : Rs 35.00

To be published soon Book your copy now

- Why did Morarji Desai sack Charan Singh from the Cabinet last year?
- How did Chandrashekhar and Vajpayee join hands to bring Chaudhury back to office?
- How did Raj Narain and Sanjay Gandhi work together to bring Morarji's downfall? Where did they meet? How did they operate?
- Was Balasubramanium planted in the PM's house by Sanjay Gandhi?
- When did Chandrashekhar and Nanaji Deshmukh tell Morarji to behave or quit?
- How did Madhu Limaye try to put off Y. B. Chavan's no-confidence motion which brought down Morarji's Government?
- What were Indira Gandhi's terms for the Charan Singh Government's survival?
- How did Biju Patnaik try to save Chaudhury's Government at the last minute?
- How did Jagjivan Ram's son Suresh Ram contact Sanjay Gandhi to make his father the PM?
- And, above all, what role did the President play in the whole drama? What was his game?

Barun Sengupta is a legend in West Bengal. His reporting in Anandabazar Patrika, the highest circulated daily in the country, has made his perhaps the most powerful pen in the country. Now he puts his talent and experience to piece together the still-unknown, sensational truth about those dark days. The author's sources range from Morarji Desai himself to Kamal Nath, the Congress-I heavyweight who played a key role in the various negotiations that dominated the political scene.

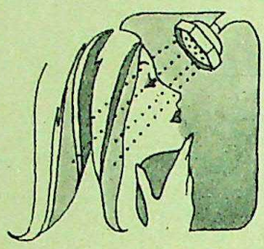
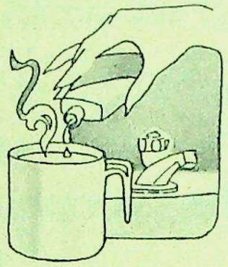
Must you suffer chapped skin and cracked lips every winter? Protect yourself these four ways!



1 All those hot, steamy baths you have every winter morning don't help a bit. You end up losing vital moisture and your skin becomes scaly and dry. Bathe in tepid water if you can't stand the thought of cold baths.

2 If you don't have the time to oil yourself, try this quick, simple alternative. After your bath, put in a few drops of olive oil—even coconut oil will do—into a mug of warm water and splash it all over your body. Then just pat yourself dry with a towel.



3 Those winter winds raise a lot of dust. And dirt and cracked skin are a dangerous combination. A good home remedy is a 'maida' and milk paste rubbed into the skin. Just see the dirt come out and your skin glow.

4 Boroline is a must in winter.

Massage the gentle, nourishing cream into all the affected areas—your face, lips, arms, neck, hands, elbows, waist and feet.

Boroline helps prevent chapping, peeling and rashes.

It also works as an antiseptic for minor cuts and abrasions and protects cracked skin from infection.

Agfa Photography at f/5·6

The Agfa Isoly II takes perfect snapshots in dim, soft light. Open the aperture wide to f/5.6 to get as much light as possible to the film. Set the shutter at 1/30 second, slow enough to allow correct image registration. Shoot from a distance of 1.83 m. with the Isoly firmly on a tripod. Use slow film for greater sharpness—125 ASA. The result? A perfect picture in low light.

The Agfa Isoly II is a great all-round camera. You simply adjust settings, distance and film to freeze a sports scene forever, capture every detail, near or distant, of a landscape or get close enough to snap a leopard snarling!

The Agfa Isoly II is built to German specifications and undergoes over 100 exacting tests.

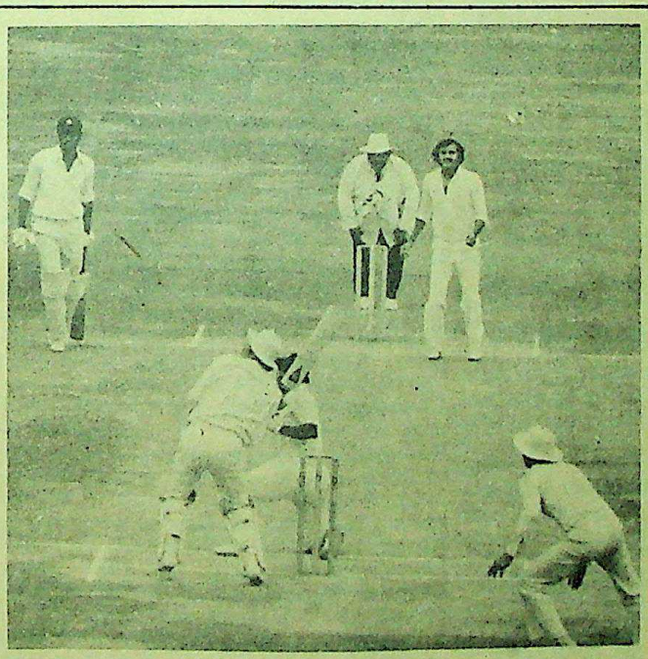
Rigging is going to be the bane of the 1980 elections. And preparations for this have already started. Politicians are even buying guns. Our correspondents report on some of the methods employed.

How is the RSS conspiring against Krishan Kant ? Will Kanti contest from Begusarai ? Election Special brings you the answers to all these questions. Plus an exclusive report on the relatives of prominent politicians contesting the elections.



The First Test between India and Pakistan at Bangalore resulted in a draw but not before the mammoth crowd had seen some wonderful cricket, interspersed with light-hearted antics. Roger Binny made a good debut on his home ground while Imran Khan predictably stole the hearts of the spectators. Strangely, no one seemed to mind that the game ended in a draw.

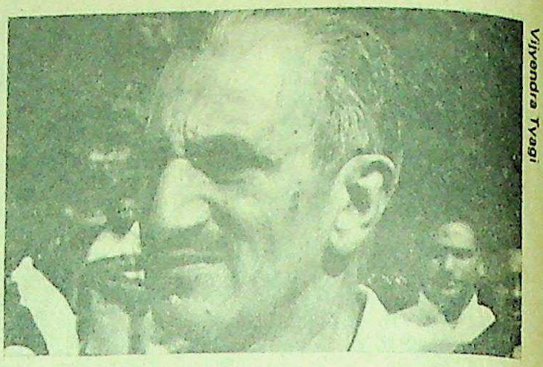
Yunus was not telling the truth

Say a host of eminent journalists who were criticised by Mohammad Yunus in his book "Persons, Passions and Politics"



Vijayendra Tyagi

KULDIP NAYAR: 'What has hurt me is that a reputable journal like yours should print lies'

I AM not surprised that Mr Mohammad Yunus, who has thus far felt ashamed to show his face in public because of the part he played during the Emergency, should now pick up the courage to write a book. He and others like him think that the people have forgotten their misdeeds. But they are in for a surprise.

What has hurt me is that a reputable journal like yours should print lies. But this is a matter which I shall take up with you later.

Mr Yunus has said that I was repentent of what I did and tried to make up with the then establishment through him. It is a lie. I am proud of what I write against the authoritarian forces, which Mr Yunus represents, and those who have followed my writings even after the release from jail know how I continued to write against authoritarianism all through the Emergency. In fact, soon after my release from jail I had a brush with Mr V. C. Shukla, the then Information and Broadcasting Minister, in the Press Club, Delhi. A Pressman asked him why the Government had ordered newspapers not to print anything about my case. Shukla said: "Kuldip Nayar's case was political". I got up and protested that the Minister had no business to say so when the court had said that there was no such thing and that the Government had detained me illegally. When he repeated the same charge, I said, "Prove it, or don't say it. I will not take this from you or anybody else".

It is difficult to catch up with the lies which Mr Yunus and his type tell. But then this is all that they do. He has concocted things and put words in my mouth to sell the trash he has written. All that I can say is that he is lying. The rest is between him and his conscience, if he has any.

Kuldip Nayar, now in the Indian Express, went to jail during the Emergency because of his opposition to authoritarianism.

INDER MALHOTRA

FOR a quarter of a century I have enjoyed the warm friendship of Mr Mohammed Yunus. It is for Khan saab to say whether this has been amply reciprocated by me. Since I have not discussed our warm friendship in public, I do not want to discuss publicly his present petulance. He may consider it justifiable but I believe it to be unwarranted. On personal matters, therefore, I will say no more.

As for Khan saab's insinuation that my friendships, perhaps, vary according to whether a person is in power or not, I will be content to be judged by my readers on the strength of my writings before, during and after the Emergency.

ROMESH THAPAR

I REFUSE to even react to the allegations of Yunus. What journalists did during the Emergency is far less relevant than what Mohammed Yunus did during the Emergency.

Romesh Thapar is the editor of Seminar.

PREM BHATIA: 'Full of slander and half-truth'

MOHAMMAD YUNUS'S reference to me as an ungrateful old friend carries a few factual errors which should be corrected to put the record straight. For instance, I have known Yunus since 1932 (not 1934 as he says), when I first met him in Peshawar. I was a member of the Punjab University cricket team led by Jehangir Khan, and we went to play not against the Islamia College but against the Peshawar Gymkhana.

Contrary to his complaint, I did not drop him dead after March, 1977. Yunus himself vanished from public view immediately after the rout of the Congress Party and the fall of Indira Gandhi. Perhaps he was so shaken by the election results that he started avoiding old friends like me. I managed to get his new telephone number (675356) from a mutual friend but it was impossible to track him down. He was then living in a one-room apartment in Vasant Vihar.

That was around April, 1977, and the following month I went away to England to meet our daughter. Soon after returning to India I took over as editor-in-chief of The Tribune at Chandigarh. It was, therefore, not easy to see Yunus. In any case I was under the impression that he avoided people like me before whom he had made rather boastful forecasts about Indira Gandhi's victory. He once told me that she would romp home with 400 seats and that even Jagjivan Ram would lose his security deposit.

It is true that I visited him twice or thrice at his residence and in his office during the Emergency but that was not to ask for any favours, as he will recall. He was an old friend for whom I had much affection, in spite of the fact that he is far from intellectually stimulating. Yunus will also recall that he did me the honour of having had dinner at my house at least on two separate occasions in the company of several mutual friends.

I do not remember in what connection I said that he made me feel good as an Indian. It is possible that I paid him that tribute for the work he did on India's behalf as the Prime Minister's "special envoy" during the Bangladesh trouble. He stayed with me at Singapore when I was High Commissioner there, and I must say that he stood up for India with much courage if not with conspicuous tact.

Whatever my personal opinion about Yunus, he has been very unkind to suggest that I called him "names" behind his back. One felt sorry for him in his wilderness, although I did on a few occasions say that his election forecasts were cock-eyed. But my own were not very accurate either.

As for my having "begged for two diplomatic assignments", this remark is again wide off the mark. My first assignment as High Commissioner was given to me by Lal Bahadur Shastri. Yunus was then nowhere on the scene and certainly not in the then Prime Minister's confidence. My second diplomatic assignment, as High Commissioner in Singapore, was communicated to me by the secretary of the Ministry of External Affairs in very flattering language and expressing the hope on behalf of the Prime Minister, Indira Gandhi, that I would accept the job because the P.M. wanted somebody to "match his wits" against Lee Kuan Yew for whom she obviously had great respect and admiration and whose friendship she was anxious to retain. That letter should be on the files of the Ministry of External Affairs, and Yunus may wish to have a look at it if he is permitted to do so.

Yunus is not a very educated person, and I do not quite know who vetted the manuscript of his book, which is full of slander and half truths. But I would say this about him: he used to be a warm-hearted friend which partially compensated for his bumptiousness and vulgar tongue. Apparently, he is now back in business because he thinks that Indira Gandhi, to whom he had been very loyal is on her way to 1, Safdarjung Road. New Delhi.

Prem Bhatia, after a long and successful career in journalism and diplomacy, is now editor-in-chief of The Tribune.

AJIT BHATTACHARJEA

THERE is no truth whatsoever in the allegation in Mohd. Yunus's book that I offered my services to Maneka Gandhi's Surya magazine. The allegation was made originally by Mr Khushwant Singh in the Illustrated Weekly, but he did not deign to notice my letter contradicting it.

Ajit Bhattacharjea, the well-known biographer of JP, is now editor of the Indian Express.

RAHUL SINGH

I HAVE always known Mohammad Yunus for his warmth, generosity and blind loyalty to the Nehru family. After reading his account in Sunday I must regrettably add another quality—his mendacity.

Since Yunus mentions me, I must put the record straight. He said that a tape of a Press conference he gave during the Emergency to foreign correspondents was handed over by my father, Khushwant Singh, to Indira Gandhi, despite the urgings of Khushwant's wife, daughter and son not to do so. Here are the facts. Alan Bradford, an American correspondent for ABC television (and a friend of mine), tape-recorded Yunus's Press conference. He later played the tape back to me. I was shocked at its contents and, as an Indian, ashamed at the foul language Yunus had used. He had utilised the Press conference specifically to abuse the four western countries whose media had condemned the Emergency—namely, the U.S., Britain, Canada (which had questioned our nuclear programme) and West Germany.

If I recall right, among the things he said was that West Germany had no business to criticise us when it had killed six million Jews during the Nazi era. Referring to the U.S., he raked up the old joke that something was wrong with President Gerald Ford's head because he had played too much football. And to illustrate his remark about Britain, he related a vulgar joke in which the word "bitch" figured prominently (so much for Yunus's false claim that the tape contained no "abusive language").

Since the Press conference was official and had not been off the record, with Bradford's permission I then played the tape to my father to show him what kind of characters were running the country. Though he supported the Emergency, he was equally shocked and he took the tape to Sanjay Gandhi who passed it on to his mother. Yunus must have been given a severe dressing down, because shortly afterwards the Information and Broadcasting Ministry — which was virtually being run by V. C. Shukla and Yunus — sent Bradford an expulsion order. Bradford naturally came to Khushwant in distress, and my mother told my father that since he had taken the tape to Sanjay Gandhi it was Khushwant's moral responsibility to get the expulsion order against Bradford revoked. This my father succeeded in doing after threatening to resign as Consulting Editor of Surya, Maneka Gandhi's magazine.

I mention all this in detail, firstly, to illustrate the foul and vindictive atmosphere that pervaded the country at the time (and to which Yunus made his own contribution), and secondly, to expose the untruthfulness of at least one incident in his account. The reader may well ask that if he has been dishonest once, how much credence can we give to the rest of his story? He also writes about Indian journalists having "no principles" and being "self-interested ideological clowns". A scrutiny of Yunus's own performance during the Emergency would lead one to conclude that this description fits him more perfectly.

HAMDI BEY

BECAUSE Mr Yunus does not know me personally he is not accurately informed about changes in my employment. I was not squeezed out of the Statesman. I was to have retired in March 1975 but the much and often maligned Mr C. R. Irani refused to sign the papers put up to him for my retirement by the personnel department as a matter of routine.

Mr Irani's refusal to retire a man who had throughout 1974 consistently reported against JP's movement in Bihar as undermining respect for parliamentary institutions would surprise his numerous critics. Mr Irani never concealed from me his support for JP but he never sought to curb my distaste for the movement. Yet during that critical year Kuldip Nayar and Saeed Naqvi were writing enthusiastically, sometimes dramatically, about JP's doings. Neither of them are any more in the Statesman. Their departure, though they are much younger than me, occurred about the same time as my leaving Statesman.

I left the Statesman of my own accord when in May 1975 Mr Aveek Sarkar made an offer. N. J. Nanporia, then editor of the Statesman and I were not getting on well. Nanporia was new to the Statesman and there were several of us who found him rather different from our ways of behaviour.

The columns of the Statesman are still hospitable to me. My relations with Mr Irani and Nihal Singh are cordial and remained so during the Emergency though in my writings I defended the Emergency as a logical sequel to JP's movement and censorship unavoidable in the face of the Press ganging up.

I fell in disfavour with my new employers—a fact about which Mr Yunus seems to have no information—after the March 1977 elections, and my job with them was attenuated and then finally terminated on December 31, 1978. One instance of this disfavour is that this statement, made in response to a request by SUNDAY, would be the first piece, if it is published, by me in that magazine after those elections though I had been a frequent contributor between June 1975 and March 1977.

Hamdi Bey was the Statesman's special correspondent at Lucknow and Gauhati and later became an assistant editor with the Hindustan Standard.

Wanted Indo-Communism

"IS a red sun rising" by Kewal Varma (November 4) was a well balanced and analytical article. Mr Varma has rightly pointed out how the Communist movement, even after 50 years, is dormant in Kerala and West Bengal. Advancement of national progress is impeded, due to the division of the human race into castes and so-called religions and cultural value systems in India. In this context, the Communists, must discover "Indo Communism" to solve the peculiar riddle of castes and classes, as Mr Varma has pointed out.

A socio-cultural revolution is the need of the hour and the path leading to such a revolution has already been laid in Tamil Nadu under the guidance of Periyar E.V.R.

V. A. Poonkudi Selvan, Thiruvaiyaru.

MR VARMA is wrong in stating that the CPI(M) did not join actively in the struggle against dictatorship and none of the important leaders were arrested during the Emergency. Jyotirmoy Basu, Har Kishan Singh Surjeet and many other leaders were arrested after the imposition of Emergency and so were hundreds of ordinary Party workers in West Bengal and Kerala.

The CPI(M) has struggled against dictatorship and the Party was the first to describe the rule of Indira Gandhi and her minion Siddhartha Sankar Ray as semifascist.

Pradeep Mayank, Lucknow.

MR VARMA's article was very appropriately timed, especially now that our country is in a political turmoil. Since Independence, whoever has been in power has never bothered to improve the living conditions of the rural areas. Our people are not at all interested who comes to power—they are more interested in living a healthy disciplined life.

B. N. Bose, Jamshedpur.

THE article failed to give an insight into the thinking of Indian Communists. Mr Varma points out: "The tragedy of Indian Communists has been that on the political plane, wherever there is a spontaneous national upsurge, they have a knack of remaining out of step with the mainstream." In fact, Indian Communists look for long-term values in any agitation or upsurge. Marx said: "Class conflict is inevitable in the transient phase of the development of the means of production." Indian Communists are waiting for that "transient phase" to start a matured revolution on the basis of class conflict which Mr Varma fails to grasp.

Sudhendu Ranjan Pandey, Bhagalpur.

IT is true that the "Communist Parties have been always making mistakes in India" as Mr Varma overheard in the CPI Congress at Bhatinda. Due to their blunders and splits, their strength has been decreasing constantly. Both the CPI and the CPI(M)'s relationship with Mrs Gandhi has been very well explained. They rescued her, either directly or indirectly, whenever she was in trouble.

The alliances which the CPI and the CPI(M) forge are simply breathtaking. They have aligned themselves with the most reactionary, feudal and communal forces like the Muslim League and the Kerala Congress at one time or the other since 1957. E. M. S. Namboodiripad and the CPI(M) leaders gave respectability to the Muslim League in Kerala by joining hands with them in 1957. Now the same Mr Namboodiripad calls Mr Koya a "Pro-Pakistani agent."

Besides, the Communist leadership is Brahmin-dominated and also includes rich landlords in the South. One fails to understand how Communism can thrive in India with such reactionary leadership. In fact, the CPI(M) Politburo does not have a single Muslim. This is a strange commentary on the 'communal' attitude of the Party.

Jubba Mahato, Bangalore.

MR VARMA has pointed out that the main difficulty of Communism in India is that it is a foreign ideology and thus cannot take roots in a tradition-bound country like India. But, Communism is a science and is not limited to any particular country. Before a class struggle a lot of struggles have to be waged.

Mr Varma thinks he may lose both bread and liberty under the Leftists. Let me assure Mr Varma and men like him that they need not be afraid of the Leftists unless they have connections with the vested interests.

Prateep Sen Gupta, Digboi.

No, never

GOING through the various articles on the Communists (November 4) one can rest assured that the "red sun" will never rise. A majority of Indians are subconsciously rationalists. Witness the strong and unwavering belief in a scientific law of cause and effect i.e. the law of Karma. Communism being illogical will never flowrish in India.

S. G. Balani, Bombay.

Vasco the vulture

ONCE again a "Vasco" has landed on our shares, determined to pick out maggots from festering wounds. It was interesting to note that naughty Vasco has been masquerading as a conceited and randy male, whose uninhibited (and unedited) designs would, by now, have registered with graceful ladies, who had offered delectable poetry, at the altar of a nordic God.

Incidently, Vasco has mentioned that he has collected a few pounds in body weight while "doing" Calcutta. Does not that remind you of an obdurate vulture, which gets its sustenance from dead bodies?

Damn it, old girl Calcutta, you asked for it!

Sudhindra Majumdar, Calcutta.

"DIRTY CALCUTTA" by Gunter Grass (November 4) was indeed a provocative article. I would not say it made very pleasant reading but the fact that the portrayal was true needs no argument in favour of it.

Gargee Dutta, Calcutta.

IT is astonishing to find such a pessimistic and obscene piece of literature as Gunter Grass's extract in a magazine renowned for its classy articles. The writer does not appear to have visited the better areas of Calcutta and the article leaves one feeling disheartened and hopeless.

Jacqueline Rosario, Calcutta.

GUNTER GRASS as Vasco has missed the human appeal of Calcutta. I am no Calcuttan but I have lived and loved the place. It is a friendly place and one where a woman need not be afraid of being treated with disrespect. I think it is also the people and their attitudes which make up a city not its dirt and squalor. Will some staunch Calcuttan come up with a more readable counter-viewpoint.

Priyamuada Balakrishnan, Madras.

GUNTER GRASS, in his brilliant account of poverty in and around Calcutta ends up confused and defeated. And yet he says: "Meet your Damascus in Calcutta". I feel that many of the volunteers from foreign countries are in fact meeting their Damascus in their service of the poor. The work for the poor in this city is the beginning of hope.

Jack Preger, Calcutta.

RIGGING

ITS HISTORY

By RAJENDRA SAREEN

COME election time, and the thoughts of Party managers turn to rigging. Politicians in power explore the prospects of getting away with it. Those in the opposition tend to believe the very worst of their adversaries, investing them with a degree of cunning, competence and resourcefulness, which if a ruling Party really possessed it would have no need to resort to rigging. There are, however, exceptions to the rule when a ruling Party decides to go the whole hog to violate the entire body of law and legality to sustain itself in power. But that has its own limitations which render it counter-productive.

Rigging, like sex, induces an alluring temptation. But, unlike sex, it does not consummate. A study of the rigging operations during the various elections in India and the countries near about, points unmistakably to a curious conclusion: rigging has never helped a loser to win, save in the rare case of an evenly balanced contest. Rigging helps only the winner to win. In that sense, the resort to it is a manifestation of the sense of insecurity rather than a potent instrument of political skulduggery. Once a political Party has lost its rapport with the electorate, no amount of rigging can help it romp home to victory. And, conversely, when a political Party has emerged as a credible factor in the consciousness of the electorate, no amount of administrative razzle dazzle at the instance of a shaky ruling Party can prevent a winner sweeping the polls.

An interesting aspect of rigging is that it is not necessarily resorted to by only a ruling group. It can be an equally effective instrument in favour of a Party contending for power, even without an effort on its part, if the electorate is up in arms against the ruling Party.

Let us first dispose of the exception to the rule, of which there is just a single example in the history of Indian politics. This happened in 1951, when Sheikh Abdullah, ably assisted by those two brilliant strategists, the late Bakshi Ghulam Mohammed and the late Mr D. P. Dhar, conducted the first elections to the J and K Assembly. All of the 42 candidates put up by the ruling National Conference in the Kashmir valley and one from Ladakh area were declared successful unopposed after the nomination papers of every other candidate had been rejected by the returning officers. A few days later another 22 out of the 30 candidates became successful from the Jammu province. The remaining eight candidates of the Praja Parishad left in the field decided to boycott the polls in protest against this highhandedness, and the National Conference captured all the 73 elected seats in the State Assembly. Nobody has been able to better that record in winning elections unopposed. But, such a coup d'grace became feasible only because of the fact that the entire Indian Press and political leadership preferred to turn a blind eye to that outrage in the name of 'patriotism'. Even so, the whole thing would have come unstuck if the electoral process had not been choked off.

A quarter century later Sheikh Abdullah won a convincing victory in the first truly free and fair elections in J and K and successfully humbled a powerful combination of central leaders and disgruntled local politicians. For the rest, rigging operations in India have run true to form. Whether it was in West Bengal and Bihar in 1971 and again in 1972, or UP in 1974, rigging only helped the winner to win.

The hazards of rigging are illustrated by the fate that overtook the late Mr Z A Bhutto. When the going got rough for his PPP in March 1977, he authorized selective rigging. Once it was known that this easy path to victory was available, some among his intrepid flock really went to town, and the whole thing stank to high heavens. At the conclusion of the polls, two things became clear. First rigging had been resorted to in some 50 odd seats. Second, Mr Bhutto's PPP would have won some 105 to 110 seats out of 200 even without any rigging. The groundswell of opinion against his strongarm methods of governance during his five-year rule found in the rigging a flashpoint that ignited a mass movement which culminated in a coup d'etat and Mr Bhutto ended up on the gallows.

But if Mr Bhutto was guilty of rigging the polls, Gen. Zia has gone a step further and given a new dimension to the business of subverting the sanctity of the electoral processes. He reneged, in October 1977, on his commitment to hold an election after it was clear that Mr Bhutto's PPP was way ahead of the other contenders, who had emerged as the General's Party. The murder case against Mr Bhutto, the disqualification proceedings against every senior and not so senior leader of the PPP to debar them from the contest, introduction of separate electorates, complete overhaul of the established electoral processes and practices, large-scale arrests and flogging of political workers have dominated Pakistan's politics for the last two years. But alas, the General is even more unsure of his ground today than he was in 1977. The result : indefinite postponement of the polls, which were originally scheduled for November 17, and complete ban on political activity. This is the most extreme example of a rigging operation which is currently going through the third year of its duration with no end in sight.

The Janata Party was the beneficiary of a massive rigging operation in 1977 in the running of which it had no hand. And even if it had been aware of what was happening and had wanted to stop that, the Party could not have done a thing about it. So great was the feeling against Mrs Gandhi in March 1977 that large numbers of people cast bogus votes in favour of the Janata candidates without any prompting from anyone. The polling staff turned a blind eye towards this. But, as it turned out later, the Janata candidates would have won any way, and even if the estimated 10% bogus votes cast in their favour had not materialized the results would still have been the same. Wherever the electorate chooses to give a winner a 50,000 or more vote margin, no amount of rigging can change that into a defeat.

One example that illustrates the point relates to the election of the CPI leader, Mr Sohan Singh Josh, who won the Taran Taran constituency of the Punjab Assembly in 1937 on a Congress ticket. Raja Raghbir Singh of Rajasansi in Amritsar district, the candidate of the ruling Unionist Party, announced his candidature with a massive feast where thousands were fed. His campaign was run along majestic lines with vehicles, placards, liquor and food in plenty. Mr Josh campaigned magnificently but without seeking to match his adversary's resources. His riposte was to ask every elector who voted for him to pay a rupee each to help him finance his austere campaign. Mr Josh earned a tidy sum, and won the election. But in 1946, Mr Josh lost as convincingly as he had won in 1937.

It takes a leader with tremendous guts to go to the electorate. On the eve of the 1952 elections most State leaders had developed cold feet because they were not sure of their ground. They approached the late Mr Nehru to postpone the polls to allow a little more time to them. Mr Nehru refused. The results far surpassed even the most optimistic estimates of the Congress campaign managers. Had Mr Nehru faltered then, that would have been the end of India's democratic aspirations, with disastrous consequences for the country's political unity and economic progress.

What Nehru refused to do, lesser men cannot afford to do. Therein lies the assurance for the safeguard of our democratic polity. Just as it is beyond dispute that poll irregularities and high-handedness are facts of our political life, let there be no mistake that the institution of elections has survived as an effective mechanism for the exercise of the people's right to choose their Government. ■

ITS GEOGRAPHY

By KEWAL VARMA

THE modus operandi of rigging differs from State to State, region to region. It is most widespread in western UP and North Bihar. In jat-dominated western UP, harijans in villages are invariably not allowed to vote. During my tour of the Meerut division to cover the 1977 elections, whenever I would ask a group of rural harijans for whom they were going to vote, invariably their reply would be: "Babuji, what is the good of telling you for whom we would vote. Who will let us vote?"

In Bihar, not only harijans but even people belonging to the backward castes are not allowed to vote. When there was a strong Indira wave in 1971, the Congress (O) could manage to win three seats there which were out of proportion to its real popular strength. In that election, the Rajput and Bhumihar lobby was supporting Congress (O). The tacticians of Congress (O) planned to win five seats, but unfortunately polling officers of two constituencies fell sick. Hence, only three Congress (O) stalwarts, Digvijay Narain Singh, Satyendra Narain Sinha and Shyam Nandan Mishra could win.

Generally, when in a region a single community is dominant numerically, consisting about 25 to 30 per cent of the population, and is politically and socially aggressive and economically well-off, the possibilities of rigging are quite strong. However, rigging is not really possible unless the administration either openly connives at or acquiesces to it. In western UP, jats are aggressive and well-off, thanks to sugarcane cultivation and the green revolution. There are not many jats in the civilian administration, but they make up this shortcoming by their numbers in the police and armed police services. These forces are also put on election duties.

In Bihar both the civilian administration and police forces are dominated by rajputs, bhumihars and their upper caste brethren, the brahmins and kayasthas. In the Samastipur byelection last year, the administration at the grassroot level was openly supporting the bhumihar Congress (I) candidate Tarakeshwari Sinha. One rajput DSP even physically assaulted a Janata MP when he was visiting a polling booth. It must be said that in small pockets, ahirs and kurmis who have acquired some newfound economic strength have started imitating the upper castes in this regard. But the largescale rigging is done by the upper castes.

The hard rural reality is that large sections of the population are hopelessly dependent, socially and economically, on the dominant castes. The poor virtually live on the crumbs thrown by the rich. They work on their fields and in their homes. Even the common land is virtually under the possession of the dominant sections. For all practical purposes, the poor are bonded labour. And the upper castes use this oppressive strength at the time of the elections. When some poor people tend to defy these strings, they are tamed with lathis and the police.

These strings operate independently of Parties. About 25 years ago, I went to cover a by-election in Punjab. The village was a stronghold of communists. At the end of polling, it became clear that harijans had voted against the communist candidate in favour of the Congress. When the comrades were reviewing the position, they would mention the name of the harijans, one by one, and say: "Let that bastard come to collect mustard leaves from my field, I will beat him up; he did not vote for us". However, it is a different story now: in most cases, the dominant castes have deserted the communists.

Rigging, West Bengal-style, is entirely different. The CPI(M) does detailed advance planning. It registers bogus voters in the voters-list, roughly 20,000 to 30,000 per parliamentary seat. Then its volunteers start moving from booth to booth casting these bogus votes. They remove the ink on their fingers with a special oil. On an average, a volunteer will cast six to seven votes. This is impersonation on a large scale, but it is possible only if a Party has a large force of trusted volunteers. No other party can match CPI(M) in organised cadre. Indeed, this is a display of CPI(M) discipline and strength.

The Congress adopted a different method in 1972. In some places, polling officers connived with the Congress and allowed its volunteers to "capture" booths. In other places, Congress volunteers exploded bombs to scare away the voters and the polling officers. Then they took hold of the bunch of ballot papers, stamped the Congress symbol on them and dumped them into the ballot boxes. In a number of booths, all the votes were "cast" within two hours of the start of voting. In the constituency of Jyoti Basu, for instance, the voting was over by 12 noon. It is estimated that mass rigging took place in at least 36 constituencies.

However, it must be noted that the Congress could resort to rigging only because it had enlarged its political support base by 1972. As a result of CPI(M)'s Big Brother attitude and its politics of violence, there was a revolution in the middle classes. This was evident in 1971 when Priya Ranjan Das Munsi defeated a highly respected CPI(M) leader Ganesh Ghosh. Between 1971 and 1972, the CPI(M) percentage of votes declined From 31.98 per cent to 27.25 per cent. The Party would have lost in any case; rigging was only overkill. But in 1977, the Congress could not resort to rigging except in the seat of Saugata Roy, because it had totally lost the support of middle classes. In 1977, there was such massive support for the Janata in the north that there was massive rigging in favour of the Janata Party. The Congress volunteers got so demoralised that they left the polling booths much before closing time.

General experience shows that where the dominant castes have even 40 per cent support, they can resort to rigging and raise their vote to 51 per cent. Whereas the have-nots can rig only if they already have 51 per cent popular support, and have lathis in their hands and strong organisation. Then they can raise their voting to 55 per cent or so. The brutal Indian reality is that might is right. Today, every candidate needs not only popular support, but also lathis and, in some places like Bihar, country-made guns—not to forget a strong organisation.

'Dadas' down but not out

OLGA TELLIS reports on how block votes are purchased in Bombay's slums

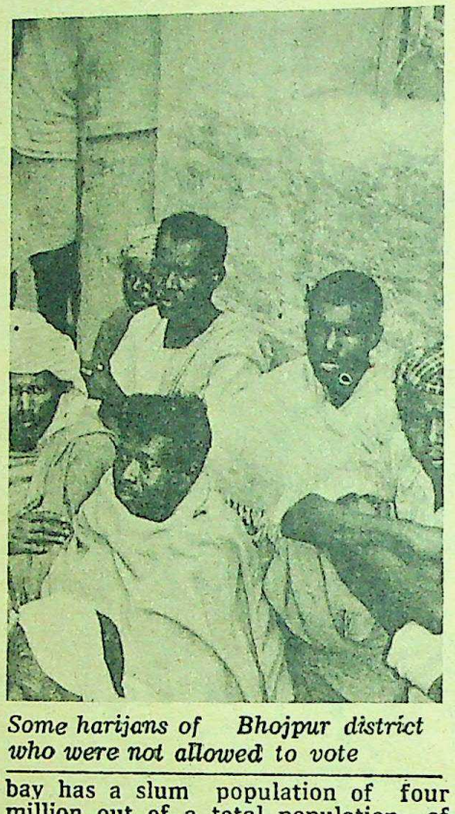
"I have 500 votes, what are you prepared to give?" asks a slum dada (boss) nonchalantly to a prospective candidate. The candidate if he is a greenhorn, is perplexed and may quote the sum at which he could purchase the votes. But if he is a veteran Parliamentary/Assembly contestant he just dismisses the dada as he knows that the dada influence is on the wane except in massive slums like Dharavi and along the Eastern Highway where slums are mainly dens of vice and violence.

There is a scheduled caste-inhabited slum in the Fort area that asked a prospective candidate for a 'mandir' in return for their support. Another near Cama Hospital wants a TV set in return for their 300 votes. Another at Mangalore Street wants a gymnasium. They never ask for anything that concerns the development of their zopadpattis, says one legislator All they ask for is social clubs, chairs, mandirs and carrom boards One slum at the southern tip of Colaba told a legislator that "we are with you, but just see that you give us water after the elections".

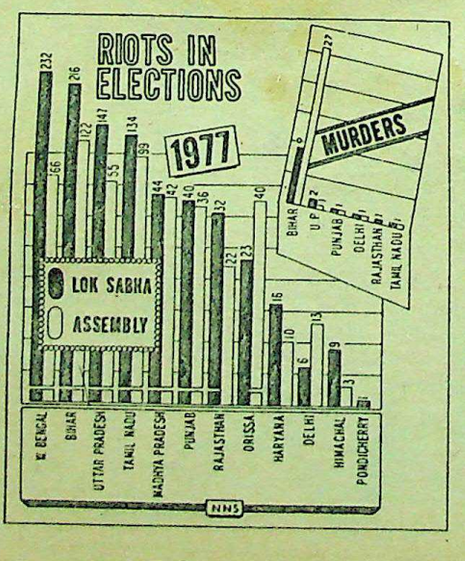
These are but a few, insignificant instances of how slum votes can be swaved and which has over the years given rise to a situation that is as perplexing as it is axiomatic — that slum votes can be purchased in bulk and that goonda power has a role to play in so called democratic elections. This blows the myth of democracy and its 'for the people-by the people-of the people' chorus because it is the dada who decides with his muscle power, in many cases, which way the votes will go and his decision usually goes in favour of the highest bidder.

However, this is also not wholly true right now. During the 1977 elections the late Mr. Gokhale was alleged to have given utensils and saris to slum families in his Bombay north (west) constituency and his resources, with four-colour posters and all, were far greater than the Janata's wealthy Mr. Jethmalani's. Yet the latter won that seat. One reason for this could be the Janata wave. When there are waves like the Indira wave of 1971 and the Janata wave of 1977 then the dada influence is negligible. In fact, it is said that Congress strongman Gulab Joshi of Vile Parle had to hide his face during the 1977 elections.

This time there is no wave, either for Indira or Janata, in Bombay city and so the possibility of dadas playing their role is not ruled out. Bombay has a slum population of four million out of a total population of 7.7 million. They are spread over 600 slum pockets from south Bombay to Thane in the easternmost suburb and Dahisar in the westernmost suburb. During an election they form the largest single bulk votes that can be garnered by prospective candidates. Slum voters also turn out in the largest numbers. It is estimated that voting is as high as 75 per cent in the slums. Of the four-million slum dwellers a minimum of two million are voters



Some harijans of Bhojpur district who were not allowed to vote



The dada is the godfather of the slum and people are prepared to listen to him because he is their 'sarkar'. When they don't have Rs 200-300 for the cremation of their loved ones he is the one who loans the money. He wields influence in the Municipal Corporation, police and even with the State Government, which is necessary because many of the slums are illegal and the only way they can get facilities like tap water, sanitary toilets and electricity is through the 'sifarish' given by their dada to the powers that be.

The dada influence is the strongest in Dharavi slum which has 1,20,000 people of all regions but predominantly from Tamil Nadu. In this slum there is plenty of room for rigging, according to people in the know of the ways and means of achieving this. The returning officer who is usually a Maharashtrian is not familiar with the tongue twister Tamilian names. They talk a language he does not know and this makes impersonation, one of the popular forms of rigging, a cakewalk.

Other areas where the dada influence holds sway are Jogeshwari, 10 km off the main road, Anandnagar which has 400 huts, Vikasnagar where illicit distilling goes on freely. It is understood that people in these slums own nothing legally and therefore they are at the mercy of dadas. If they don't do what he says he harasses them, their survival is at stake and so voting is influenced by these dadas who roam menacingly, showing their muscle power in their unnumbered cars.

In the slums from Trombay to Ghatkopar, populated by hapless quarry workers, the owners of the quarries determine the voting pattern of the people. These people, mostly from Andhra and the drought hit areas of Maharashtra, are at the mercy of the owner who pays them a pittance for 10-12 hours, work a day, yet demands his pound of flesh at election time. There are eight new slums of quarry workers in the Jogeshwari-Dahisar belt and four in the Kurla-Ghatkopar belt and two in Andheri.

THE Government is also a dada to its slum dwellers on Government and municipal land. For the last 25 years, for instance, there has been the gigantic, sprawling Daurinagar slums on either side of the Western Express Highway on Government land. They have had no facilities like electricity or tap water over the years. In fact, a huge wall was built to cover it from the eyes of the ever-complaining Prime Ministers and VIPs who have to pass the area to and from the airport. This area inspired Air India's hoarding 'An Air about India'. Only recently, after the announcement of the mid-term poll, has the Government sanctioned water connections. They have also put up four lampposts in the area for the over 5000 huts!

Dadagiri, says one social worker, is not only physical but emotional. Party feelings are exploited to the hilt and so are caste feelings. For instance, the Tamilians vote the way the DMK or AIADMK brethren in Tamil Nadu tell them. The Haryana bhaiyas have their own Chaudhury who gives them a call from their gaon (villege). 'Dadas' also use the service of the "aunty" who runs speakeasies in slums. It is said that during elections even the grocer shops and bars do not take money from key workers of political Parties that dominate the slum. The aunty is given money by the dada and in return she permits the poster stickers and other Party helpers to have a free run on the bar.

There is, however, a distinct trend emerging in the slums whereby the dada influence is minimised, although not eclipsed, due to the rise of local committees. The Bharatiya Harijan Yuvak Samiti for instance, appeals directly to youngsters in the slums to vote intelligently. They are given talks on the backgrounds of various candidates, with promising results. This happened in Mithanagar slum in Goregaon. In the Mayanagar slum, young people boycotted the municipal elections because they realised that the dadas had fooled them over the years and they got nothing for the slum people besides promises.

Every suburb till Dahisar has its slums and through this belt on the Eastern Highway it's the same story of fear and of the dada. The slums of Ghatkopar, Kurla, Bhandup, Deonar, Chembur are in the grip of dadas.

The dada phenomenon in the slums, vis-a-vis elections, is a Congress legacy that was nurtured over the years as a shortcut to getting votes without really working for the uplift of the area. The political activists in the slum areas were replaced by the dada who, because of their shady, seedy background and involvement in the "underworld", makes it easier for the politician to deal with him. This in turn leads to the malfunctioning of democracy because dadas could also be used to create "artificial" waves in favour of the Party that paid the highest. Dadas set up 60 per cent of the slums and took over management in the rest of the 40 per cent.

The curbing of the influence of the dada in the last five years was brought about ironically by a Congressman, Mr. Prabhakar Kunte, when he was Minister for Housing. He pushed through a comprehensive Rs. 20-crore slum improvement scheme which led to the formation of various mandals, committees and created a general consciousness of their rights among the slum people. The slum people automatically created local committees to demand and see through the execution of what the Government promised by way of electricity, roads, sanitation, tap, water, etc., and this went a long way in checking the influence of the dadas.

Bihar is worst of all

ARUN RANJAN reports on booth capturing

ALL the political Parties in Bihar seem to have arrived at a consensus on one point : there will be rigging during the forthcoming polls, and they must try and ensure that in the areas where they command support, they do not allow their opponents to poll too many votes. How far the decision to return to boothwise counting will embarrass them into caution, or how many legal disputes will ensue after the results are announced, cannot be predicted, but if what happened in the past few elections, particularly in the panchayat elections of 1978, is any indication, then rigging has entered a new age. It began with "bogus voting", or illegal voting in the names of people who were dead or missing from the area but whose names remained on the electoral rolls. Then came the era of intimidation, with lathis, and bands of people roaming around in jeeps armed with bombs and guns. Now political goondas are taking up positions in certain villages, and forcibly preventing anyone from voting. Not every booth is captured, true — but about 30 per cent of the voting can now be presumed false.

Booth capturing is prevalent due to the weaknesses of democracy as practised. It shows the impotence of the administration and also reveals the callousness towards the people. The masses can prevent booth capturing if they are interested in preserving democracy, because after all, only about 10 people prevent about 5,000 people from voting, but they are often indifferent. It would, moreover, be too simplistic to blame only the administration or political Parties. In reality, this is the work not of a Party but of a small group of people who are mostly criminals, under the guidance of individual candidates. But Parties abet this by turning a blind eye; indeed, certain Parties have been admitting criminals as members either on a permanent or a temporary basis. This explains, too, the close affinity between politics and crime. Political gangsterism is proof of this. In 1978, there was an important by-election from Samastipur. The candidates were Mrs Tarakeshwari Sinha and Ajit Mehta (Janata), supported by Karpoori Thakur. The question was : Who would win? Most newspapers in their reports assumed that the

Politicians are buying guns

THE Home Ministry is worried about the situation in Bihar; the production of illegal firearms has doubled in the State. In the interior villages, ironsmiths normally turn out a variety of guns for professional criminals; now politicians are also placing their orders. According to one estimate, the number of small factories manufacturing firearms illegally is between 500 and 600. Of these, 250 to 300 are in the Nalanda-Monghyr belt. The rest are spread over villages in the districts of Patna, Aurangabad and Rohtas. According to intelligence reports politicians are ordering armaments at wholesale rates. Fantastic prices are being offered to ironsmiths and they are being given large advances. Many factories have shifted to larger premises.

During the Durga Puja vacation this year, many students stayed back in their college hostels. According to a hostel superintendent, many of those who stayed behind were campus goondas-cum-politicians. They spent their holidays collecting firearms. On investigation this allegation was found to be true. During the last two years, college hostels have played a significant role in the State's caste-ridden politicis. Many hostels have, over the months, collected lathis, spears and country-made pistols. Now, at the command of politicians student-goondas have converted their hostels into mini armouries.

One politician who returned from a tour of his constituency in northern Bihar confided to a journalist : "My trusted volunteers have refused to help me this time. They are afraid of the threat to their lives. For a small sum of money they do not want to risk their lives while capturing booths". The same mentality pervades the entire State. The atmosphere of violence and armed struggle has forced many volunteers and Party workers to withdraw from the fray. The vacuum is likely to be filled by hardened, professional gangsters. It is clear that guns, bombs and goondas will be used on an unprecedented scale in the coming elections.

candidate who would be supported by the master booth capturer of Begusarai, Kamdev Singh, would emerge victorious. Till the time of polling speculations ran rife about whom Kamdev Singh would support.

This is the way a youth leader, Vijay Krishna, analyses the situation. He says that since the very inception of Parliamentary democracy in this country, bogus voting has taken place. During the Seventies, booth capturing came into its own. The reason was again simple — bogus voting involved a lot of trouble : making a list of voters, finding out who were alive and who would vote, substituting them with bogus voters, removing the indelible mark from the finger etc. In the Hindi speaking belt the biggest difficulty was organising bogus women voters. In some areas in Bihar and UP even prostitutes were used as bogus voters. There are even cases of men adorning burkhas and posing as women voters. All these problems, it was found, could be solved in one stroke, by capturing booths.

The art of booth capturing was explained in detail by an experienced politician : "Booth capturing is done in two ways — official and unofficial. The unofficial method is more in use. There are three methods of doing this. First, if you have many supporters, then you come early in the morning and line them up at the booth and cast your votes before your opponents arrive. Where manpower is evenly balanced, guns and bombs come into play. Some 20 to 25 persons get down from jeeps and trucks, start firing guns, and bursting bombs. When the voters flee in fear of their lives someone enters the booth and stamps all the ballot papers in his candidate's favour. The third method is used where your supporters are numerically few. Some are then placed in the queue, and they ocassionally keep on creating trouble. A good half an hour is wasted by the polling agent in trying to bring the situation back to normal each time there is a disturbance. Meanwhile polling remains at a standstill. If this happens about five or six times, a total of two to three hours is wasted. Not only this, all this can effectively prevent the supporters of the opposing candidate from capturing the booth. This is known as 'negative booth capturing' and is done by local hoodlums.

"Official booth capturing is an easier task. It is totally centred around individuals. There are two or three ways of going about this task. If your Party is in power, then you can easily manipulate the posting of magistrates, polling agents, policemen and district magistrates who are sympathetic to your cause. To prevent this, once the elections are announced, transfer of officials is restricted by the election commission. But the State Governments try to get around this rule by forwarding excuses or by transferring officials three months before the elections. At present, in Bihar, there is a controversy going on regarding the Inspector-General of Police, R. Lal, who belongs to the backward castes. The backward castes believe that if R. Lal remains the IG then they will get some official support. The forwards too fear that this may happen. One Minister has also submitted his resignation and announced that he would not withdraw it till the IG was transferred. If a candidate cannot get a suitable polling agent transferred to his constituency, then, on the night before the elections attempts are made to buy him off. The agent is given a splendid dinner, backed with alcohol. And the next day's programme is decided by promises of money and caste considerations. When even this does not succeed, then on the day of polling, the polling agent is threatened not to obstruct riggers or last-minute attempts are made to get him over to their side. The security arrangements for the presiding officer and polling personnel are so inadequate that even a small threat is enough to make them surrender. Some presiding officers are so clever that they know precisely which party is strong and they come to terms with it in fear of their lives."

In Bihar, some people are disappointed at the prospect of the polls being held on one day. Since armed gangs go around in jeeps and trucks capturing booths it may not be possible for them to do as much as they could if the elections are held on two days. Their modus operandi is : After having captured booths on one day, they go to another constituency the next day and capture other booths. Two candidates come to an agreement and get the same people to capture booths for them.

In some places help is required from the local people to capture booths. In such cases people from a particular caste capture booths for a candidate from their own caste like the bhumihars in Begusarai, kurmis in Nalanda, yadavs in Patna, brahmins in Mithila, rajputs in Aurangabad. Formerly, the rajputs and the bhumihars were the leaders in this field but now the yadavs and the kurmis have also learnt. Two things are clear from this. First, the politicisation of particular castes or groups in recent times. Second, this is also a symbol of change in political equations.

In 1971, in the Lok Sabha elections the Indira wave was backed up by booth capturing. In 1977, too, thanks to the public support the Janata Party enjoyed, it was possible for them to capture booths. This reporter's vote was cast by the Janata supporters in the Kadam Kuan area in Patna in the 1977 Lok Sabha elections. In the 1980 mid-term polls, booth capturing may well surpass all previous records. The backward castes are out to fight. In the final analysis, booth capturing simply proves that the politicians have lost faith in themselves, the electorate and in the elections. The eventual victim is democracy. ■

THE BANGALORE TEST

ASIF IQBAL'S IMPRESSIONS

Nikhil Bhattacharya

FIRST DAY

THE first thing I would like to mention is that when I went over to the ground it was really a heartening sight to see that it wasn't raining and that all the boys were doing some loosening up exercises and getting some batting practice. The look of a dry ground was very heartening because till yesterday we were thinking that probably we would have to struggle to play today. I had slight problems with my health overnight, and I wasn't sure whether I would be 100 per cent fit. The atmosphere was great because we knew there were going to be many people and, like in Pakistan, you could see that everything was buzzing. The moment we left the hotel we saw people going towards the stadium, something which one always associates with a big majlis.

The thing which appealed most was the moment you entered the stadium —I felt it anyway. As a player. That there it is, a full house and a full stadium. Nothing is better than to perform in front of a full house. The whole atmosphere of the stadium, with the sun shining, gave us some kind of inspiration, after having those three or four days of rain when we didn't play enough cricket. Everyone was trying to touch me, or touch the players. Everywhere there were shouts of "Good luck". There were shouts of "Hope you'll score a hundred". I think the crowd has been tremendously good, because as I was going down the steps towards the ground to meet the other boys, and to have a knock, I don't think there was even a single unkind remark. There were people always either wishing me luck, saying "We hope your team will do well" and "we hope you will do well". They were looking forward to seeing a good day's cricket from the Pakistani team. It's important, because that gives you inspiration and you feel that, look, we are away, it's not our home ground, it's not our country, and yet the people are so sympathetic, so friendly, always wishing you and hoping you'll do well. I think this will help the team's performance a lot and it was quite noticeable here especially.

As for the toss, which decides many a thing on a Test ground, before we went out to toss I went into the dressing room and I had a chat with the boys and I was trying to find out as to what we should do if I won the toss. Majid and I had a long talk about the look of the wicket and we were of the opinion that we should bat.

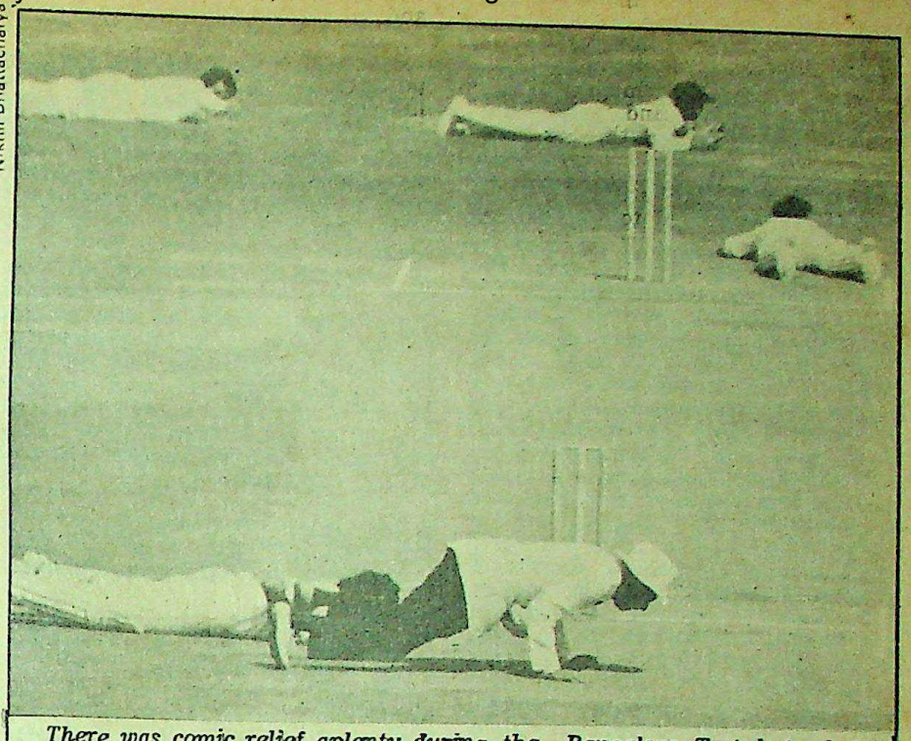
With that whole team of photographers trying to take snaps of both of us as we walked towards the wicket...I have never experienced tossing in a Test match because I have never captained Pakistan. Besides, the importance of winning the toss on Indian wickets is pretty great, I think, and that's why I can very well remember when Sunil spun the coin and I shouted "heads" and when it did land "heads" I suddenly got a shiver of excitement, or a shiver of tension. Winning the toss really pleased me And without hesitation I told Sunil that yes, we would bat.

I would say that it was a most satisfactory day, yes. I wouldn't call it an exciting day. It was a satisfactory day, because I think excitement comes when the thing is all over, when the Test is won or lost, or when the series is finished, that's when it comes. I think a captain's job is not only just taking his own decisions and looking after his own performances. More important than that is the performance of the other ten who are in the team, and looking after them, which I'm still in the process of doing. I think I was very happy at the end of the day although unfortunately we lost a wicket in the last over. I would have been happier if Raja were still there. In the very first three or four overs, when Majid and Mudassar were being beaten, we were sort of sitting on tenterhooks and I was sort of debating the decision, whether I had done the right thing or the wrong thing in electing to bat. When Majid was finally out, I was slightly unhappy because I thought maybe I'd made a wrong decision. I'm very happy now that I did make the right decision, because I think I did mention it to the boys before that the first few overs would probably help the bowlers more than the batsmen. Zaheer and Mudassar played exceptionally well, but unfortunately Zaheer got out.

SECOND DAY

PAKISTAN losing an extra wicket in that last over, with me having to face the last three balls of that incomplete over, had made things quite different. I reached the wicket, knowing that the ball just taken was a new ball and my feelings at that moment were, had we not lost that extra wicket, we would have had a lefthander there along with a righthander, and would have given the bowlers an unfortunate time.

Nikhil Bhattacharya



There was comic relief aplenty during the Bangalore Test but what took place during the first day definitely took the cake. Fifty thousand spectators were treated to the rare sight of all eleven Indian players, the two Pakistani batsmen and the umpires prone on the turf. For several moments no one knew what was happening but then they realised that a swarm of bees had caused the fifteen men to fling themselves flat on the ground. The interruption did not take long, but Zaheer Abbas did not realise that the danger had passed and Indian skipper Sunil Gavaskar had to walk over and pat him on the cheek as if to wake him up.

Today the nervous tension was much more, because yesterday I was just sitting in the dressing room or the pavilion, watching the boys play. But today I was right in the firing line. To start with, yes, I was...I did have a bit of tension. The team, however, was in high spirits, when we went for our morning training. It may sound superstitious: I normally don't practise—I think this goes for Zaheer too; we don't practise before our turn to bat comes.

When I was out I was not very happy because I think it's criminal to get out after getting going. It is better to be out for nought than get that many runs and get out. I got back to the dressing room. I conveniently dozed off for 45 minutes or so, only to hear now and then a loud cheer from the crowd and I knew obviously that another wicket had fallen, and the loud cheer was not because Imran had hit a six or someone else had hit a four.

REST DAY

ALTHOUGH it was supposed to be a rest day and we were looking forward to having a peaceful and quiet day, my day started at seven when the first phone call came. It was from some journalist who wanted to interview me. This was followed by about half a dozen phone calls. I had optimistically asked the hotel operater to "wake" me up at nine—and it was quite amusing that at nine o'clock sharp the operator phoned and said, "This is your morning alarm". And all these other calls had come before!

We were supposed to go and offer our Friday prayers. And because we felt that if we all went together there would be a lot of chaos, we went to different mosques. I, along with some of my very old schoolfriends who had come all the way from Hyderabad, not only to watch the Test but also to be with me, some of them I was seeing after 20 years, we went to the Jama Masjid. We arrived just about a minute before the prayers were due to start. I was in my national dress — salwar kameez — and I was wearing a pair of dark glasses with my Namaz cap on top, thinking that I was very well disguised. When I entered they were about to start their prayers and I thought I could quickly sneak off just afterwards, but that was not to be because I suddenly heard one whisper — 'There's Asif' — and the word spread. And as soon as we finished our prayers we wanted to sneak off, but there was no chance. As soon as I finished they crowded around and kept touching me almost to make sure that I was for real. And suddenly rupee notes were coming out of their pockets for autographs, and there was a lot of confusion. A funny thing happened as we were leaving. The person I was with took out what we thought was the token for the slippers we had left outside the mosque, and instead the passes for the racecourse came out. And suddenly we heard, "My God, look at them! Here they are at the mosque, and straight from here they're going to the races!"

We did go straight to the races. I had a lovely day, starting with the fact that I managed to speak to my wife and kids, who are in London, the first thing in the morning. They're following the Test from there. I went to the races where I was to present a cup, and I also won a couple of races myself. So I had a very good day. In the evening we had this team dinner just to find out how the first two days had gone, and if there were any suggestions on how to tackle the Little Master Gavaskar and the others, how best to contain them. And then Taslim Arif — who is the best singer Pakistani cricket has produced — came up with the idea that Sunil bats with a 45 degree angle bat, and Dilip Vengsarkar bats with a 90 degree angle bat and the field should be placed accordingly. So Mudassar suggested that instead of going to the cricket ground with a cricket kitbag we should take a geometry box with us. In the end we decided that since the wicket might provide a little bit of turn to the bowlers from the beginning — after using the quickies for three or four overs, we would immediately start giving the spinners a go.

THIRD DAY

Today, what with the rain clouds hanging overhead, we offered a prayer that it shouldn't rain at all when the pitch was completely covered. As it turned out, there was no rain, and when we went to the ground this morning to start the match the clouds were pretty high and there was not much chance of rain, despite our prayers.

The day began on a very quiet note, with both Sunil and Vengsarkar playing confidently. Both of them carried their bat upto lunch although Imran bowled well. But he wasn't getting much out of the wicket. We thought 'Right, we're out here for the whole day, and we should try and do our best and try and get at least Sunil out as fast possible'.

We tried various ways, and at times we were thinking of making quick changes to give almost everybody a bowl—luckily Pakistan has got many allrounders who bowl in some form or the other—just to rattle the rhythm of the batsmen. But we had no luck at all till lunch. And when we got back to the dressing room we kept on talking, hoping and praying that we could get Sunil out. We would really solve many problems for ourselves, and then we could concentrate on Vishy. Sunil is such a fine player of quickies and specially on a wicket that is giving no response at all to the bowlers, so we thought that we would just try and keep on plugging at him.

We did manage to get both Sunil and Dilip out in the lunch to tea period. When we saw Yashpal coming to bat it was quite surprising, because Yashpal did not field at all in the whole two days of our innings. He fielded for maybe two hours, and yet he came out to bat—and the ease with which he batted made me feel that he must have made a remarkable recovery from the backstrain or whatever he had. He played well, and so did Vishy, although he gave plenty of chances to the bowlers by playing all the strokes that he had—and yet he was still there at the end of the day's play.

FOURTH DAY

On the fourth day the morning started when I learned through the hotel telephone operator that it was Imran's birthday. The operator said that he had been trying to get through to Mudassar Nazar, who is Imran's roommate, but since the morning the whole telephone system had been jammed with calls for Imran from various places and various people. Everybody wanted to wish him. I noticed when I went towards the coach that there were two girls carrying beautiful bouquets of flowers to his room. When Imran came to join us he said his room was full of flowers and messages. I thought it was a really nice gesture from the people of India. In the coach, Javed Miandad, who is always trying to create mischief of some kind, said, "Imran, it must be nice to be 30" knowing fully well that it wasn't his thirtieth birthday. This made everyone laugh and put us in a very good mood.

At about 10 o'clock we were informed that we would not be starting on time because of bad light. Play began eventually at 10.35, and I was really surprised even at that, because I thought the light wasn't fit enough. But the umpires decided so we went out and in the second over we had Vishy out, off Ehteshamuddin, caught behind, and that was Ehtesham's first Test wicket. I thought Vishy must have had very good eyesight, because in that light he managed to get a nick on the ball. But after that it became almost certain that we wouldn't be playing because it was getting dark.

We went back to the dressing room where there was a birthday cake for Imran Khan which the hotel had sent, and we had this party with all of us standing around and singing 'happy birthday'. Imran cut the cake and then half of it was sent to the Indian dressing room. And Sunil, Vengsarkar, Doshi and Kapil Dev came to wish Imran. After that, we started playing indoor cricket with a tennis ball. And then we started counting the telegrams Imran had received, and it went into hundreds.

FIFTH DAY

On the last day of a Test match one usually feels sort of tense and excited. Either you're going to win or you're trying your best to save the match, but knowing that there wasn't even the remotest possibility of finding a result it was very difficult to gear oneself up to participate in the rituals of the day.

As a captain I felt that all I needed to do was try and get the boys some practice and with that in mind, I decided that it would be better to try and give the boys bowling practice and do some match practice which is very vital in fielding and bowling. The only thing that was quite noticeable was the dampness all around the field but not actually on the wicket. The boys were also quite surprised that more than half the stadium was full even before the match started, although we had been told by the England team that was here in 1975-'76 that when they were playing in Calcutta and England needed 18 runs to win on the last day there were nearly 80,000 people watching.

I had a very attacking field almost for the whole of the two days that India batted but today I had a slightly less attacking field, and although the Indians at stages were scoring very freely yet we managed to get them all out before they surpassed our total. Of the bowlers in our team, I think the unluckiest one was Iqbal Qasim who, despite his exceptionally good line and length, didn't manage to get any wickets and it was quite funny that Majid — who is a non-regular bowler now — kept getting wickets. Every time he got one Iqbal was running to him and saying "For God's sake rub something on my left shoulder for luck so that I can also get at least one wicket". Majid I thought deserved the wickets he got, however. With Imran rattling Dilip Doshi's three stumps off the ground he neared his own personal achievement of getting to the hundred wicket mark. He needs two more wickets and he was very keen that I declare the innings after about 45 minutes of batting when after scoring 60 to 100 runs India would be in no position to score those runs and he could have a bash of a four to five over spell and he could try and get those two wickets to get his 100th wicket. All very well to think of as a joke but in a Test match you don't really do this kind of declaration.

When it all ended it was a kind of disappointment but also it was a relief knowing that it was my first Test and that I hadn't lost. I won the toss which, I think, was the first round that I won and then we did have a very slim lead against India which also gave me confidence. With this in mind and with the players more confident now with the shivers of the First Test over I think we can look forward to an exciting series.

OTHER TESTS

TAVLEEN SINGH reports from Bangalore on the tamasha

CRICKET fever spreads faster than flu and although the hysteria that had gripped Delhi from the moment the Pakistani team arrived had softened, South Indian style, by the time we got to Bangalore, there was little doubt that the fever still raged.

Dark clouds blotted out Bangalore as we landed and more than one of my fellow passengers looked distinctly anxious despite the cheery banner at the airport entrance saying 'The Test match begins at the West End, welcome to the Indian and Pakistani teams'. On the flight from Delhi were the Pakistani ambassador, Mr Abdus Sattar, and various cricket lovers and organizers for whom Bangalore meant only one thing—the first Test between India and Pakistan. A group of youths with vastly flared trousers and very dark glasses played spot the celebrity' while we waited for our luggage. "Look, there's Prasanna, he used to be my hero. And isn't that Polly Umrigar?"

The teams were staying at the West End—one of those old fashioned places with gabled roofs and sprawling grounds that remain from the Raj. The grounds and the hotel corridors were spilling over with youthful enthusiasts, many of whom seemed not to recognize Zaheer Abbas who sat in the lobby talking to former Test cricketer, Vijay Mehra. Zaheer looked relaxed and not unduly perturbed at all by Test-eve tension. He said he was excited rather than nervous because it would be his first Test match in India. "I keep wondering what the crowd will be like. I'll tell you one thing, if they are sporting and cheer for us as well, they will see some of the finest cricket ever." Imran, who was being followed around by his usual bodyguard of girls, said that he was not feeling anything special, but on Asif's face were clearly visible signs of tension. "Of course I'm tense. It's because this is the first series in which I have been given the captaincy. All I can say is that the sooner it starts the better it is."

The West End hotel seemed to have become a separate world—the password to which was cricket. If you knew the password you belonged and were able to share in the extraordinary camaraderie and warmth that held the world together. Women, I quickly discovered, were not accepted, except in terms of extra-curricular activity, or on the fringes as groupies. For me there were many explanations to be made—what was I doing in Bangalore, what did I know about cricket, what possible kind of story could I be doing? The more explanations I made the more dubious glances I got.

G. Sharma

On the evening before the Test while the two teams met separately to discuss strategies and pre-Test problems over dinner, the cricket correspondents, from India and Pakistan, met in the hotel bar to discuss former series and old times. They admitted that the current series had generated much more excitement than almost any other in recent history. "It's like what it was when England used to play Australia in the old days," said Dicky Rutnagur, a veteran of many Tests. I told him that I was quite keen to spend some time in the dressing room with the players to pick up reactions and that kind of thing, only to find yet another place, along with the team bus, in which women were not allowed.

"My dear," Dicky said, as if explaining to a child who has yet to learn the rules, "there is no question about a woman being allowed into a dressing room. In all these years there have been only two occasions when I have seen a woman in the dressing room, once in Bombay when a poor bloke had a stroke and was brought into the dressing room. He, in fact, died, so his wife was allowed in. The other time was when Nottingham had a woman physiotherapist and even she only managed to get into the dressing room at Lords because the team said they wouldn't go without her".

Women, I found the next morning, were a rarity in the Press enclosure as well, and if I caused a few eyebrows to shoot skywards, there was a minor tremor on the second day when a sexy little number in tightly draped sari appeared in the enclosure without notebook or Press pass and apparently with cricketers rather than cricket on her mind.

THE morning of November 21 was an answer to the prayers of the approximately 50,000 people who had taken leave, reported sick, bunked school and gone through God knows what else to see the beginning of the Test. After four days of rain, there were almost clear skies and dry weather.

The players were in the field practising for over an hour before the match was due to begin, and the already packed stadium roared approval every time one of the stars did his bit. The excitement was contagious, and by the time Asif Iqbal and Sunil Gavaskar began their walk to the middle of the field for the toss, it was as if nothing else in the world was as important as the result. Zaheer need not have worried at all about the crowd's sporting spirit, they were so enthusiastic about the Pakistanis that I began to wonder which side they were in fact on. A large proportion seemed to have put national considerations aside and opted for the favourite team which was clearly Pakistan. Mainly because in terms of stars they were way ahead, with Gavaskar and Kapil Dev being hardly any competition at all for Zaheer, Asif, Imran and Javed Miandad who, according to one consensus in the ladies' toilet, was the most popular.

For my part, as a non-follower of cricket, I kept trying to analyse what it was about the game that made so many people in the world firmly believe that there was no better way to spend five whole days of one's life. Failing to find an answer, I asked a hardened cricket correspondent, who said, "Well, they've stopped throwing Christians to the lions so, there has to be some other kind of mass entertainment". A cynical simile, but a good one.

Most of the cricketers said later that it was only inexperienced players who got really nervous, but Javed Miandad admitted that when he played in Australia it sent a shiver down his spine, because the crowd was so vocal and so aggressively one-sided. "Imagine a crowd of over 70,000 people shouting , 'Kill, Lillee, kill'." Gavaskar said that when they had been in Pakistan last year they had also faced a one-sided crowd, "Whereas look at the crowd here, they seem to us to be cheering more for the Pakistanis than for us".

The Pakistanis seemed to appreciate the support, and not once did they refuse to sign the hundreds of autograph books that were constantly being thrust under their noses. Although Imran Khan was put off now and then and said he had shortened his signature to just Imran. The college girls who swarmed around him did not seem to mind, "Because he is so handsome," they said, "and of course because he's a good bowler". A Pakistani correspondent said that they had consciously built Imran up when they covered the matches last year. "Imran is a phenomena for the subcontinent. He is tall, fair, good-looking and he's a fast bowler. India hasn't seen a fast bowler since 1932," he said.

The Indian team was, naturally, not attracting as much attention but, according to Gavaskar, nobody minds. After all this was the first Pakistani team here in nearly 20 years. The Indian team did not get this kind of attention in Pakistan last year; there were no hero-worshipping girls, mainly because there were no visible girls at all. "I remember at parties like this (the Pakistani ambassador was hosting a dinner) Bishen would always begin, 'Ladies and gentlemen'. He stopped doing it after a while because there were never any ladies."

Socially, Bangalore had little to offer, compared to the 'Grab-a-cricketer' approach that is currently to be seen in Delhi. Nevertheless, there have been the occasional forays into discotheques with such exotic names as 'Peacock' and 'Topkapi' and the teams have been kept on their toes by the cricket groupies that have become part of the fixtures at the West End hotel.

The game did begin, the cricket groupies continued to haunt the West End, increasing daily as the match drew to a close, and cricket fever remained unabated. The morning of November 24 began with the arrival of SUNDAY which had the effect of a minor bomb shell among the Pakistanis and made me realize that India and Pakistan are separate. My story on "Night cricket for the Pakistanis" caused many of them to tell me that stories like this were often misunderstood in Pakistan, and as a cricket correspondent added that the last time the team had done badly in England, reports of carousing had reached the homeland, and some people had demanded stern action against the players. I would like to clarify here that the emphasis of my story was meant to be not on their womanizing so much as on Delhi women's 'Pakistan cricketerizing'. In fact, to set any lurking doubts at rest, I would like to add that what is particularly impressive about the team is their professionalism.

I spent the third day of the Test sitting with the Indian players, the only other non-player in the enclosure being Mehmood, the filmstar. There was virtually no conversation or comments of any kind till Gavaskar got out for 88 towards the end of the day, when there was a sudden buzz of nervous conversation and a deepening of tension. Applause for the Indians was thankfully louder than it had been for the Pakistani batsmen despite the fact that a portion of the local Muslim population had decided to be distressingly religious in their support. The people that have been most embarrassed by this kind of religious rather than genuine support, are the Pakistani players themselves and they were often heard telling their fans off.

The fourth day of the match was distinguished more for being Imran's birthday than for any other reason since there was hardly any cricket, thanks to bad weather. Imran received hundreds of telegrams, hundreds of cards, several cakes and several bouquets of red roses, personally brought by several female fans. But he did not get what he most wanted: five wickets faster than any other bowler in the history of Pakistani cricket.

I write this as the last day's play comes to an end with Zaheer and Miandad batting and the crowd yelling for Gavaskar to bowl. From the excited shouting and cheering, it appears that they do not seem to mind the match being a draw. Tomorrow, Bangalore can go back to thinking about things other than cricket: riots in Hyderabad, elections in January or whatever. At the moment, with only about an hour of play left it is still difficult to believe that this cricket field can stop being the hub of this city so soon, or ever.

Between the overs

NOT one of the 50,000 spectators at Cubbon Park seemed to mind that the First Test ended in a draw. They certainly didn't have much to complain about, even though practically a whole day was lost to rain. They saw the Pakistanis build up a huge total despite the early loss of Majid Khan and then saw India come perilously close to matching their opponents' score before the tail folded up 15 runs short of the target. When the tourists went in to bat once again on the final day, the spectators entered into the spirit of things and treated the proceedings like festival cricket, urging Gavaskar to allow Vishwanath to bowl and then imploring him to take a shy at the wickets himself. Gavaskar sportingly obliged in both respects but prankster Javed Miandad had other ideas. When the crowd bayed for Gavaskar in the dying minutes, he shook his head in disagreement and pointed to Kirmani instead.

Miandad, who mixes his brilliant strokeplay with natural showmanship, proved beyond doubt that he is the live wire of the Pakistani team. In his first innings, he was rapped on the pads by a delivery from Shiv Lal Yadav and the crowd appealed lustily for lbw. Without a moment's hesitation he took a few steps towards the pavilion, in jocular response to their shout. Later, when he miscued a shot off Binny, he stuck out his tongue in self mockery and caught the umpire looking at him. He instantly looked contrite and made a sign of apology, while his fans screamed for more. On the last day, when he was at the crease once more in Pakistan's second innings and the crowd jeered him because of his slowness, his reaction was to hold out his bat to a section of the stands and ask them if they could do better. On one occasion, when a stray balloon drifted onto the field during a dull period of the Indian innings, he chased it and placed his white cap on top of it. But despite his best efforts, the balloon refused to stay still and he had to burst it and replace the cap on his head while umpire Gothoskar tried unsuccessfully not to grin. Incidentally, it seem that his favourite T-shirt for warming up is one with a typical Packer slogan emblazoned on it — "I'm into cricket, balls an' all."

That there is nothing more enthralling than a duel of talent between a fast bowler and a batsman was borne out in this Test. The crowd sat as if spellbound while one-time Packer speedster Imran Khan, who was used in short spells by his captain, pitted his skills against those of diminutive Indan skipper Sunil Gavaskar. The latter was reading his adversary perfectly and did not seem at all intimidated either by his pace or the way he was swinging the ball. It did look as though Sunil had a life at 48 but the only other mistake he made was his last when he played forward to Abdul Qadir and gave Javed Miandad a catch.

The Indian middle order rose to the occasion of trying to overhaul the Pakistani total magnificently but the last four wickets fell for the addition of only six runs. Yashpal Sharma, who was among the runs consistently against the Australians — except at Kanpur — played yet another valuable innings.

Roger Binny made an impressive Test debut on his home ground, cheered all the way by the crowds. Although he had no luck with the ball, he made adequate amends with his batting. From the very first ball he faced, he was sighting the ball well and his second scoring stroke was a boundary off medium pacer Ehteshamuddin. He would have had a six to his credit as well, but a powerful shot off Wasim Raja landed barely a yard inside the boundary line. It did not take him long to start stroking freely although eventually it was Imran who lured him into indescretion. He bowled a bouncer with the new ball to the Bangalore all-rounder, who got quickly into position and hooked the ball to the boundary. But it was the very next ball, an identical delivery, that had Binny mistiming another hook to be caught by Ehtesham. His was a sound innings in every respect and it was a great pity that he should fail by only four runs to score 50.

Judging by the First Test, it seems we are in for an enthralling series.

The need to stop Muslim communalism

By M. J. AKBAR

NINETY per cent of this country is sane, and it is this 'silent majority' of Hindus and Muslims and Christians and Sikhs and others which constitutes the great strength of our society. Ten per cent is paranoidly communal or oppressive, and that poses the greatest threat to the liberalism of our society, and to the unity of our country.

The price for the history of the 1940s has not been fully paid, and perhaps it will be a long time, and another generation will have to be born and die before this cancer of the heart which has already taken such a dramatic toll can be controlled and operated out of the body politic. The RSS and the Jamaat-e-Islami cannot be the doctors to do this. The RSS chief Guru Golwalkar has publicly stated his desire to subjugate the minorities in his Bunch of Thoughts. Nor is the RSS in a position to repudiate Golwalkar, even for cosmetic purposes, even as part of a grand strategy towards achieving "power in ten years", as its indoctrinated cadre will revolt against any display of weakness—after all, their strength lies in their fanaticism, and for the convinced and dedicated, revisionism cannot be the answer to any challenge. Indeed, the RSS prides itself on the challenges it has faced and survived. The revisionism which the RSS leadership indulged in during the Emergency, by appealing to Mrs Gandhi for mercy (it was Balasaheb Deoras who wrote the letters to Mrs Gandhi) has become a source of embarrassment which the RSS people try and avoid discussing these days.

But the biggest impetus to the RSS comes not from the adversity faced during Government crackdowns; its source of growth lies in one source of its birth: Muslim communalism. It is true that Muslim communalism does not have the strength or the organisation of Hindu communalism; it does not have the brazen spokesmen of the RSS calibre; it does not have the power and the structure which the RSS has constructed particularly since March 1977; and its venomous power is not as channelised or as effective. But the absence of these traits does not make it harmless. Not merely do Muslim communalists endanger themselves by their activities, but they lend an awful stench to a community already sinking in the mire of much greater problems, that of poverty and ignorance. And this, in turn, fuels baseless myths and sometimes legitimate fears on the part of the majority. After all, under the surface of Hindu-Muslim relationships there is always a keg of powder; it requires only one person's mischief to light it.

AS all the world and its meanest uncle knows, there is a cricket series going on between India and Pakistan at the moment. Despite all the apparent and the sincere bonhomie, all the applause and the genuinely warm affection that promises to make this one of the best tamashas ever, there is an underlying tension, a dark, brooding tension which no one will admit to because it is so embarrassing, and could be so potentially destructive. And that is communalism. The problem might not have been so serious were elections not around the corner; but now there will be many people waiting to exploit this subterranean tension in order to achieve electoral gains. We have already seen how the Congress (I) has tried to use the seizure of the Holy Kaaba to wean Calcutta's Muslims towards its side: hopefully, the condemnation of this by the Congress (I) high command will dampen such enthusiasms within its rank and file. But a greater danger lies in the cricket: particularly now that the transistor radio has made cricket a national frenzy.

Some Muslims themselves will give enough cause for resentment. Disturbing reports have already reached us of a number of Muslims loudly rooting for Pakistan in the Bangalore Test in an obnoxious display of communalism. Bangalore has just undergone a communal riot in which, according to Mr Khushwant Singh in New Delhi, "The facts clearly made out aggression on the part of Hindu militants to gain political capital for the forthcoming election. Muslims who had used a plot of land as an Idgah for centuries wanted to build a college on it. This was challenged in court by a local Hindu politician. The court upheld the Muslim ownership. Frustrated by the judicial verdict this politician character organised the local goondas to disrupt the Id-uz-zoha prayers by driving a herd of swine into the congregation. For once I felt that this kind of conduct should have been punished in the traditional way: blackening the faces of the miscreants and parading them around the country"

But whatever the provocation, counter communalism is not the answer. This sort of thing only tends to lend credence to RSS accusation that the loyalty of the Indian Muslim cannot be trusted. The truth is that just as the RSS represents a small, albeit very vocal and dangerous, percentage of Hindu opinion, the Muslim communalist is also only to be found on the fringe of the community. And it must be up to the Muslims themselves to keep extremists in check.

We are passing through uncertain times, when intemperate wolves are on the prowl, when decency and sanity are under attack. The leaders, having failed to provide food, and having few remedies to alleviate hunger, are turning to social issues to take them back to their corrupt and heartless capital cities that control the country. What an irony! In a country where 48 per cent is living below the poverty line, and more are sinking under that thin dividing line every day, social wars rather than class wars will probably determine the fate of the next lot of leaders.

Nobody likes to write about these truths: it is somehow considered "not done" to call communal people communal. And when Muslims display unpalatable traits, as they often do, they must be censured as much as anyone else—mollycoddling will not serve. In this particular instance, it is not a question of somebody supporting the Pakistan side or not. they are a fine cricketing team, and marvellous human beings. And thousands genuinely want them to display their exceptional talents. But it is when support for them is not given on the grounds of their abilities, but as a sign of anti-Indianism that one must draw the line. There are many Tests ahead, and maybe the least important of the tests will be the battle of wits and skills between the players. The larger test will be for our society. The handful of Muslims who are trying to make this a communal battle, are anti-social criminals.

It is time for the sane 90 per cent, who form the true India, to stand up and get vocal. Battles are not won by silence — or by looking the other way.

Spot report

Chandigarh

The conspiracy against Krishan Kant

THE RSS issue which the Janata leaders have been so vehemently proclaiming a dead issue, still seems to be the main dissenting point in the Party. There is fresh proof that the RSS issue is proving unpalatable to large sections of the Janata. In Chandigarh, for example, bitter infighting has broken out between the pro and anti-RSS factions of the local Janata Party.

In a letter to the Janata Party president, Chandra Shekhar, the president of the Chandigarh Janata Party has stated : "You must have seen reports in the newspapers about the so called Janata workers meeting where a resolution was adopted taking 'Strong exception' to the nomination of Shri Kishan Kant from the Chandigarh constituency asking the High Command to change it 'before it is too late'. If it is not changed they will put up Shri Ram Swaroop Sharma against the Party candidate.

"The fact is that the nomination of Shri Krishan Kant, as the Janata Party candidate from Chandigarh by the Central Parliamentary Board has been generally welcomed by the people of Chandigarh... Nevertheless, a disgruntled section of the erstwhile Jana Sangh local leadership, which has been active in replacing Shri Krishan Kant for the Party ticket due to self-centred policies and ideological considerations, has not ceased its anti-Party activities, even after the Janata Party's declaration of candidature of Shri Krishan Kant from the Chandigarh seat. It is the same section which has been carrying on a vilfication campaign against Shri Krishan Kant among the people of Chandigarh and organising demonstrations, whispering campaigns, meetings, Press publicity, public statements and Letters to the Editor. One of the highlights of the campaign was the ugly demonstration against Shri Krishan Kant even on the occassion of the anti-Betrayal Day rally as early as August this year, in the presence of Shri Atal Behari Vajpayee ...

"Dismayed by the enthusiastic response that the Janata Party and its candidate is getting from the people of Chandigarh and frustrated by the denial of the Janata Party ticket to the ambitious leader of the erstwhile Jana Sangh, this section of the so called local leadership called a meeting of professedly Janata Party members, but in reality a section of the RSS-Jana Sangh elements on Sunday, November 11, 1979 and threatened the Central leadership with the declaration of the candidature of Shri Ram Swaroop Sharma, who was president of the erstwhile Jana Sangh and presently general secretary of the local Janata unit. The meeting was unauthorised and by no stretch of imagination could be described as a Janata Party workers' meeting... In the efforts to defy the Party decision the local former Jana Sangh elements are being encouraged by some national leaders of the erstwhile Jana Sangh as well as leaders from Punjab and Haryana..."

Angered at this posture adopted by the RSS elements the local Yuva Janata has started distributing photostat copies of letters written by certains members of the RSS group during the Emergency to the Government authorities begging for mercy. One of them, written by Prem Sagar Jain, an ex-president of the local Jana Sangh unit reads : "I am a detenu here under MISA for the last one year in sub jail Chandigarh. At present I am an ordinary member of the Jana Sangh, but three years back I was president of the local unit.

"As already stated in many memorandums, I fully agree with the 20 point programme of our Prime Minister and after seeing its implementation I honestly feel that this programme has done a lot for the poor, backward classes and downtrodden people. (The) morale of the nation has become high and there looks a sense of discipline in every sphere of life. (The) economy of the country is on a strong footing where agricultural production, industrial production has increased manyfold. I don't think there is anything more which our Party wants to do. The urge of the Party has been fulfilled by the policies of our Prime Minister. There should be no place for sectarian and communal politics... I have been suffering from knee arthritis. I was sent to the PGI by jail authorities. But after 20 days treatment no relief was felt. I am a patient of acute bleeding piles... In view of the above facts I have decided not to take part in any political activity in the future. So I retire from politics. Kindly consider my case of release sympathetically. I assure you that I will abide by the conditions if any imposed my me."

The Janata Party leadership and the local Yuva Janata unit have, however, decided to support Krishan Kant

UDAYAN SHARMA

To The Home Secretary,
U.T. Chandigarh

Sir,

I submit as under:-

1. That I have been detained here under MISA on political grounds for the last one year. At present, I am an ordinary worker of Jan Sangh.

2.(i) That I have been suffering from knee arthritis due to which I cannot walk easily and cannot sleep smoothly. I got a number of medicines at Jail and I was also sent to P.G.I. I attended Physiotherapy Department for 20 days, but of no avail.

Hema cuts short Palkhivala

JUDGING by the large crowds — around 75,000 strong — and the fact that they did not have to hire crowds and lorries, the National Party's first public meeting rivalled the maiden election meetings of the Janata and Congress (I). The crowds thronged Bombay's Shivaji Park to see their favourite stars in person. Mr Nani Palkhivala, who is accustomed to making long-winded speeches on the lawns of the cricket club, had to cut short his speech to give way to Hema Malini to propose the vote of thanks. The misconception thus continues in the popular mind which equates the National Party with a group of glamorous filmstars rather than a hitherto apolitical group 'forming an alternative to the corrupt politician' as Mr Palkhivala described it.

The National Party, in September, had grandly announced that it would contest 500 seats in the Lok Sabha elections. But Dev Anand was not so optimistic when this reporter contacted him at his special Party office at the Sun'n Sand. He had earlier, at the rally, announced: "Whether the men we back are five or 15 they would be men of character and integrity". He told this reporter, "Anyone who is brilliant, a professional, and not a seeker of power we will back". And how many such brilliant professional non-seekers of power were the National Party planning to back? "Well, we have Mr Upendra Trivedi contesting from Gujarat, and we will possibly back Mr Nani Palkhivala if he is willing". Who else? "There are three people from Delhi, we are having negotiations with them... I can't divulge their names just yet but they aren't professional politicians and they certainly aren't filmstars". The rumour is that one of these could be Justice V. M. Tarkunde, the civil rights lawyer.

With all the ballyhoo in September about the National Party being the 'third alternative', after the Congress (I) and the Janata, it has finalised just one candidate for the elections, possibly the only person yet who has met its stringent demands on the sort of people it wants to back. With the sort of line they were trying to hand out, that of a fresh alternative to the octogenarians that are in the fray, they have yet to get rid of either the showbiz image of the Party, or the capitalism that their right-wing laissez-faire draft manifesto propagates. They have joined with Mr Ramakrishna Bajaj's group comprising traders, industrialists and 'intellectuals', and are trying to justify their alignment with these people and the common man by saying, as Mr Anand has in a recent statement, that "though we are big-budget filmmakers we know what the common man is thinking. Don't forget, we make films for him every year..."

Dev Anand has gone on record as having said that almost all the Parties have offered them seats, "as if to say that all that we want is to get into Parliament. They don't realise the higher purpose of forming the National Party: that of eliminating the people who have feathered their nests for 30 years at the expense of the common man. These are the people who we have to throw out, by getting the National Party in power". However, he told me that "we have not completely ruled out the possibility of having understandings with the established Parties or established politicians. As things stand today we are trying to get good people and we will make a few concessions if we have to". He said that the National Party campaign would begin in earnest by December 1. "I'm doing my best for the Party. I've been president for only five weeks though the Party has existed for two months, and I'm working on two fronts—getting members enrolled and getting candidates".

The National Party has 15,000 members in Bombay alone (the membership fee being Re 1) according to Mr Anand but this is a pitifully small figure if one remembers Mr G. P. Sippy's statement that within two weeks of the establishment of the Party they were expecting to get one million people enrolled. Will the dream merchants, be able to make their own dreams come true?

Will Kanti contest from Begusarai?

WILL Kanti Desai contest the Lok Sabha elections from Begusarai? According to some Janata leaders in Bihar, Kanti may get the Janata ticket to contest from this constituency. And, apparently, there is some basis to this. Maheshwar Prasad Singh, organising secretary of the State Janata Party and a close lieutenant of Satyendra Narain Sinha, chief of the Janata Party in Bihar, has sent a letter to Kanti saying that the people of Begusarai want him to contest from this constituency. He also sent duplicate copies of this letter to Jagjivan Ram and Chandra Shekhar. According to a Janata MLA from Bihar and a confidant of Maheshwar Singh, Mr Jagjivan Ram, on receiving the letter, started pursuing the matter from Delhi and advanced Kanti's name as a possible candidate from Begusarai and even mentioned it to Chandra Shekhar. The Janata leaders in Bihar, who had so far not been taking the matter seriously, suddenly decided to do so. Some other Janata leaders at the Centre also sent directives to the Bihar Janata leaders to treat the matter seriously. The bhumihars in Begusarai were quite happy at this development since they consider Morarji Desai to be a bhumihar. At a controversial meeting held in the last week of November to decide the candidates for the elections, the issue of Kanti contesting the elections from Bihar had come up. But as no decision was reached, the proceedings of the meeting were forwarded to the central parliamentary board of the Janata Party.

Maheshwar Prasad Singh is believed to be very close to Morarji Desai. An incident which took place some years back shows how this happened. Maheshwar Singh had gone on a visit to Delhi and was staying with Tarakeshwari Sinha. At dinner one day where a common friend of Tarakeshwari and Morarji Desai was present, Tarakeshwari Sinha started criticising Morarji. This angered Maheshwar Sinha, who left his food, packed his bags and left. This common friend who was present, reported the matter to Mr Desai who was pleased with Maheshwar Singh. Since then the two have been very close. After Ram Sundar Das became the Chief Minister of Bihar, Maheshwar Singh, on the basis of his relationship with Morarji Desai, started flexing his muscles and tried to dominate both Ram Sundar Das and S. N. Sinha. When Karpoori Thakur was the Chief Minister, Maheshwar Singh was his most vocal critic. In fact, he came into prominence when he started issuing statements criticising Karpoori. It is rumoured that Maheshwar Singh is going to be appointed as the chairman of the Bihar Water Development Corporation. Whether Kanti contests from Begusarai or not, Maheshwar Prasad Singh is certainly gaining in the bargain.

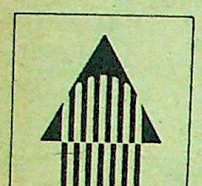
Asides

The importance of being relative



POLITICS has a habit, once it enters a family, of staying spreading and trickling down generations. So much so, that Indian politics today seems to be dominated by groups of blood relations who, for better or worse, consider themselves eminently qualified to guide this nation's destiny.

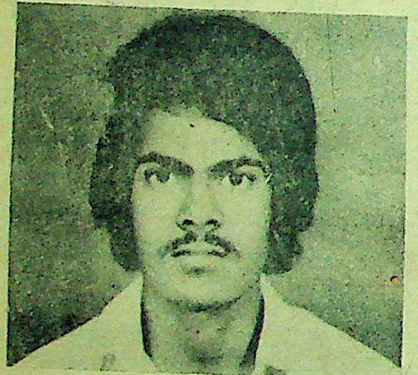
Apart from the most obvious instances of Indira and Sanjay Gandhi, Morarji and Kanti Desai, Jagjivan and Suresh Ram, there are several other families that come to mind. Pandit Kamalapati Tripathi of Varanasi had reared his three sons with the hope that some day they would emulate their father. The price he has had to pay for this is a divided house today. He is facing a revolt from his second son. Mangalapati, a businessman in Delhi, and his wife, Nalini, popularly known as "choti bahuji," who do not agree with his Congress (I) links. Supporting Kamalapati in the family fight are his eldest son, Lokpati, himself a former UP Minister, and his wife, Chandra, popularly called "bari bahuji." Mrs Chandra Tripathi wants to be the Congress (I) candidate from the family's traditional constituency of Chandauli. But Nalini has publicly challenged her "bari bahuji" and threatened to oppose her sister-in-law if she contests. Though both women wielded strong influence on their father-in-law for years, matters came to a head when Nalini began suspecting him of favouring "bari bahuji" and Lokpati. Nalini has been promised a Lok Dal ticket by none other than Mr. Raj Narain himself, who is being accused of having incited her to revolt. In a public statement Nalini said : "If the Congress (I) fields Mrs Chandra Tripathi from any constituency, I shall also fight from the same constituency against ner ... Though from the very beginning all my esteemed family members have been actively associated with the Indian National Congress led by Shrimati Indira Gandhi, I felt that owing to vested political interest it has been evident in the Congress (I) that some persons belonging to one family are getting special preference in allotment of tickets (with the result that) the image of his great organisation has been damaged before the common electorate ..... While announcing this decision to contest against a member of my own family, it gives me pain but I feel it my pious duty to declare this for the sake of purification of politics ..." "Chhoti bahuji" can depend for support on her youngest brother-in-law, Mayapati Tripathi, who heads the Yuva Bahini, a wing of the Youth Congress (I), and who accuses his father of having surrenderd to Sanjay Gandhi.

Another example of a powerful "bahuji" is Shiela Dixit, daughter in-law of Uma Shanker Dixit. Shiela, endowed with good looks and an elegant carriage, has been a considerable help to her father-in-law in his political life. She is friendly with Mrs. Gandhi. Another example of personal friendship growing out of political association was that between Prabhavati Devi, wife of the late JP, and Mrs. Gandhi. The two were so fond of each other, that they always made it a point to meet when they were in the same town or city.

When Devi Lal was the Chief Minister of Haryana, it was Om Prakash, his youngest son, who controlled the levers of power...and so brazenly that it earned him the epithet "Masterji." Om Prakash was alleged to have placed his proteges in the Assembly and Government committees, and held "durbars" at dak bungalows wherever he travelled in the State, as though he was as important, or more important, than the CM. "If I was there, I would have saved the Government," he is allegd to have said about his father's defeat in the trust-vote that eventually saw the fall of his Ministry. Chaudhury Charan Singh is known to be unhappy with the way Om Prakash behaved; the PM had a good deal to be unhappy about. Among other things, Om Prakash was arrested in connection with a case of alleged smuggling of watches. The incident had prompted Devi Lal to publicly disown his son, but the young man is irrepressible. Lok Dal spokesmen credit him with the view that the Chaudhury is incapable of governing the country.

Pratap Singh, Devi Lal's eldest son, is, on the contrary, opposed to both his father and younger brother. Indeed, he has almost habitually opposed his father in politics, having first fought the elections as an independent candidate, later joining the Congress (I), regretting the action and finally shifting to the Janata. Politically, Om Prakash is as much of a problem to Devi Lal as

The voter



M. S. SHANKAR, 23, a freelance journalist in Secunderabad, Andhra Pradesh says "I'll vote for the Indira Congress not because of the dynamic leadership of Channa Reddy or for his caste politics in the State, but because only she can run a Government at the Centre for five years without making the voter go to the polls before the term is over. We have gathered enough experience from the Morarji Desai Governmnt and from the Charan Singh Government. We want peace in the land where we live. And only Mrs Gandhi can provide this".

MRS H. GILL, 40, is a college lecturer in Bombay. She has decided to vote for the Congress. She said : "I will vote for the Congress. I shall do so because, I think, the Congress has the same views as the Congress (I) minus Mrs Gandhi and her son Sanjay. I admit that Mrs Gandhi has a good personality and has the capacity to govern the country, while the Congress has no charismatic leader. But in Mrs Tarakeshwari Sinha, it may have a fine leader. I would like to see a woman holding the Prime Minister's post".

Sanjay is to Mrs. Gandhi and Surender Singh is to his father Bansi Lal. Though Surinder Singh was among the few Congress candidates to win a seat in the 1978 Assembly elections in Haryana, his activities have been a constant source of embarrassment to Bansi Lal.

Jagjivan Ram's son Suresh, of the Suresh-Sushma scandal fame, is an MLA in Bihar. He is known to be Babuji's most efficient negotiator and is responsible for all arrangements made for meetings between Babuji and most other leaders. He had earlier been offered a Rajya Sabha seat but refused it. Suresh was the man behind Babuji and the Shahi Imam getting together at a recent "dinner" because of his good relations with the Imam. Babuji listens to his son's views. Suresh's wife, Kamaljit Kaur, who sued him for divorce following the Suresh-Sushma affair, is now a Lok Dal ticket-seeker, perhaps anxious to wreak vengeance on her husband and father-in-law. Mrs. Kaur has in fact, contested against Suresh in an earlier election.

Kamala Bahuguna, wife of Hemvati Nandan Bahuguna, is an example of how powerful the hand of a wife can be. Mrs. Bahuguna, who was herself an MP from Phulpur (UP) in the dissolved Lok Sabha, was responsible for bringing her husband and Mrs. Gandhi together on various occasions due to her personal equations with Mrs. Gandhi. So efficient is she in organising election campaigns and such is her popularity, it was even said she would defeat her husband if she contested against him in Allahabad.

Similarly, among Charan Singh's advisers, the most trusted and influential is Gayatri Devi, his wife, popularly known in the Lok Dal fraternity as "Mataji". She is said to have persuaded her husband to take a number of politically crucial decisions, including leaving the Congress to form the SVD in 1967 a gamble that paid off and many o the Chaudhury's decisions when he was the Home Minister. She is also said to have objected to Mr. Raj Narain's frequent visits to the Chaudhury's house and even told him not to come too often.

There are countless other cases, of well-known and not so-well-known politicians sharing common lineage. Abida Begum, widow of Fakhruddin Ali Ahmed is a Congress (I) ticket-seeker in the coming Lok Sabha elections, Sheikh Abdullah and Begum Abdullah, Kashmir's most powerful politicians, have a son, Dr. Farooq Abdullah, who was educated abroad, and is being discussed as Kashmir's next Chief Minister. Mrityunjay Prasad, son of the Late President Rajendra Prasad, who was previously in the Congress (O), won on the Janata ticket from Bihar in the 1977 Lok Sabha, elections. He is a very austere person, talks very little and is often seen in the Central Hall of Parliament sitting quietly by himself. The 76-year-old Maniben Patel, daughter of the late Vallabhai Patel, was elected on the Janata ticket to the last Lok Sabha from Mehsana in Gujarat. Rasheeda Haque Chaudhury, wife of the former Industries Minister, Moinul Haque Choudhury, had won on the Congress ticket in the 1977 Lok Sabha elections from Silchar in Assam. Harkishen Shastri, son of the late Lal Bahadur Shastri, is likely to contest the coming elections but is not sure which Party to join. The late Zakir Hussain's son-in-law, Khurshid Khan, is a well-known supporter of Sanjay in the Congress (I). Sumitra Kulkarni, grand daughter of Mahatma Gandhi, is a member of the Rajya Sabha. In Tamil Nadu, the former Chief Minister Karunanidhi's son, Muthu, is in acting, and per se, in politics. Muthu is married to a harijan, and his father carefully quoted this fact repeatedly in his public speeches. Muthu fell out with his father and at one point, Karunanidhi, blaming MGR for leading his son astray, had to call in the police when his son arrived in a drunken state at home.

In West Bengal, two of the most respected leaders are brothers—Ajoy and Bishwanath Mukherjee. Ajoy Mukherjee was a former Chief Minister, and his brother is in the CPI. Bishwanath Mukherjee, who, except for the last Assembly election, had never succeeded in winning had even stood against his brother once in 1962. His wife, Gita, will be standing as the CPI candidate from Panskura, having got one of the three seats given to the CPI after the Party came to an electoral understanding with the Left Front. Siddhartha and Maya Ray, who were with Mrs Gandhi during the Emergency, when Mr Ray was the Chief Minister of West Bengal, are now in the Congress, having fallen out with Sanjay, who opposed Mr Ray. Kamaraj's nearest relation, his nephew, Ashai Thampi, was the only DMK candidate to have got elected in 1977. He had defeated K. Manoharan, now Tamil Nadu's Finance Minister. The President of India, Sanjeeva Reddy is the brother in-law of the great communist leader, Nagi Reddy. Mohan Kumaramangalam, the former Congress Minister who died in a plane crash, was the son of Dr Subbaroyen, the former Central Minister from the then Madras State in Nehru's Cabinet. The son of C. Keshavan, former CM of Kerala, K. Balakrishnan was in the RSP, and in fact, was jailed when his own father was in power. The family, however, remained intact. The list is endless.

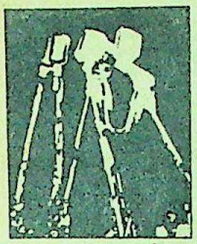
Old war, latest battle



THOUGH it's a parliamentary election, the focus here is on two local political bosses who hate each other's guts: MGR and Karunanidhi. "On Ayudha pooja day merchants open new accounts—"we're only renewing old accounts," declared Karunanidhi on September 30 while felicitating Mrs Gandhi in Madras. He called Mrs Gandhi an "incomparable leader of this country". Though Karunanidhi justified his Party's alliance with Mrs Gandhi as a paramount thing in the national interest ("We have judged the Janata Government for two years. They will never be able to provide a stable Government"), his main concern was to break the alliance between Mrs Gandhi and MGR's AIADMK. Naturally he didn't grudge allotting 24 out of 40 seats (from Tamil Nadu and Pondicherry) to the Congress(I) whereas the DMK and the influential Muslim League will share the others. "How could Karunanidhi be so magnanimous?" a reader asked Cho, the politician-journalist. "To defeat MGR, Karunanidhi is even prepared to surrender all seats", quipped Cho. The last general election returned only one DMK contestant; surely this time the Party will do better. "People seem to forget that the DMK's friendship with Mrs Gandhi dates back to 1969 when 24 DMK members of Parliament stood by her," recalls Murasoli Maran, MP. "We made no demands then; we never asked for Cabinet berths and our friendship continued till 'interested' parties started interfering", he said. "Two years of illwill shouldn't stand in the way of our ten-year-long friendship," chimed in Karunanidhi, who has already asked his Partymen to forget the "misdeeds" of Mrs Gandhi: like sacking his Government in 1976 and setting up the Sarkaria Commission.

In the meanwhile MGR, often accused of slippery politics, has allowed the Left Parties, the Congress and the Janata to join the AIADMK-led front against Mrs Gandhi. The man who used to swear by Mrs Gandhi till the other day, now calls her a betrayer, a person who has made peace with a corrupt politician whom she had thrown out of office just three years ago. All of a sudden MGR too has discovered the word "authoritarianism".

DMK leaders did try to get the CPI and CPI(M) to join them in an alliance, trying to capitalise on their disillusionment with MGR's "anti-labour, anti-farmer, anti-student" policies, despite the presence of Mrs Gandhi in his alliance. Explained Maran: "In 1967 the DMK and the Swatantra Party had an alliance to fight the Congress; at the same time the DMK also had an alliance with the Marxists. We could work out a similar arrangement this time". But the moment Mrs Gandhi blamed the CPI for pressing her to set up the Sarkaria Commission, the local CPI boss Kalyansundaram lost no time in expressing his disgust. "I had submitted a memorandum against the DMK Ministry in 1972. Mrs Gandhi waited till 1976 to set up the commission," he wryly observed. Surely Mrs Gandhi's remarks prompted the CPI to stay out of the DMK as well. The CPI and the CPI(M) thought of a third alliance for a few weeks. The idea was to rope in the Congress (which had some well-known MPs, like C. Subramaniam and R. Venkatram in the dissolved Parliament) and the non-existent local Lok Dal.

Karunanidhi

In the meanwhile the CPI also tried to break the AIADMK-Janata alliance but MGR seemed to have suddenly developed an affection for the Janata and refused to budge. In the meanwhile Devaraj Urs flew to Madras, had a long chat with MGR and on October 25 instructed the Congress to make an alliance. "It's not a programmatic alliance," he said, "and we will have only a seat understanding". Urs also said that MGR is not against his kind of land reforms. A couple of days later, the CPI(M), whose alliance with MGR during the Assembly elections had turned sour, and which had accused MGR of feasting on the blood of peasants and workers, also joined him, forgetting the presence of the Janata in the alliance. "After all, the Tamil Nadu Janata doesn't have the Jana Sangh in it", quipped a Party boss, and added cynically "Even if it were so, don't you think authoritarianism is more dangerous than communalism?" Once the CPI(M) joined the alliance the CPI walked in too, and MGR is now confronted by all the alliance members, demanding a number of seats. The AIADMK is going to contest at least 24 seats, the Janata has asked for eight and the Congress wants at least 10. The Janata leaders argue that in the Assembly elections their Party polled 16.40 per cent votes against AIADMK's 38.10 per cent, Congress-CPI's 20.10 per cent and DMK's 24 per cent). The CPI and CPI(M) have asked for three seats each.

And there's Nedumaran's Tamil Nadu (Kamaraj) Congress, a very minor Party formed in protest against Mrs Gandhi's alliance with Karunanidhi, and Kumari Anandan's Gandhi-Kamaraj Congress. Though Kumari Anandan is in a mood to go it alone, MGR has been trying to bring him into the AIADMK-led alliance. Last year, Kumari Anandan walked out of the Janata, protesting against P. Ramachandran's lack of vision and inefficiency: surely if his Party contests against the Janata in the southernmost constituencies, the Janata will certainly find a challenge.

The DMK leaders go around saying that Mrs Indira Gandhi will not only bring stability at the Centre but will also help Tamil Nadu achieve more in the industrial and agrarian sectors. Corruption is a major issue: Karunanidhi and the Congress (I) leaders accuse MGR of allowing his Partymen to mint money from hooch dealers, liquor smugglers and corrupt businessmen. He is also accused of neglecting the farmers and letting the police after them even without much provocation.

And MGR's AIADMK, too, harps on corruption. That the Sarkaria Commission had strongly indicted Karunanidhi was bad enough and now that Mrs Gandhi has committed the mistake of aligning with the DMK, it is a unmitigable evil, MGR says. Of late he has also been warning people against allowing a single dynasty, a single queen mother and a single prince to rule the country. Even if he himself has a chance to rule for more than a decade, he would come out and fight against himself, asserts MGR. MGR's alliance partner is the Janata Party, and Congress (I) leaders say that this just proves that MGR, who had shown very little concern when Muslim minorities suffered during communal riots in Pernambet and Dharmapuri, does not really care for the minorities.

The Christian voters are also warned not to vote for the AIADMK led alliance—for secularism seems to be the concern only of the Congress(I) and the DMK. References to O. P. Tyagi's Freedom of Religion Bill are constantly made in Tirunelveli and Kanyakumari where the Christan population is quite substantial.

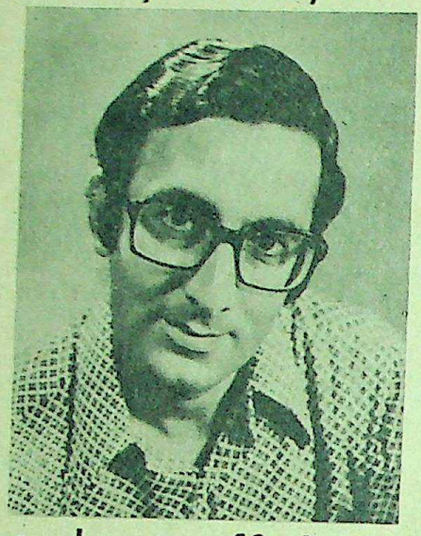
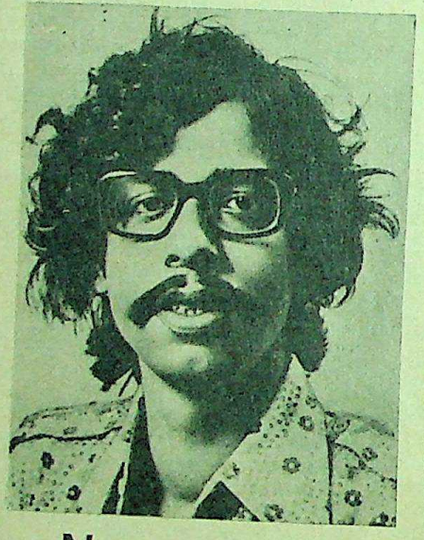
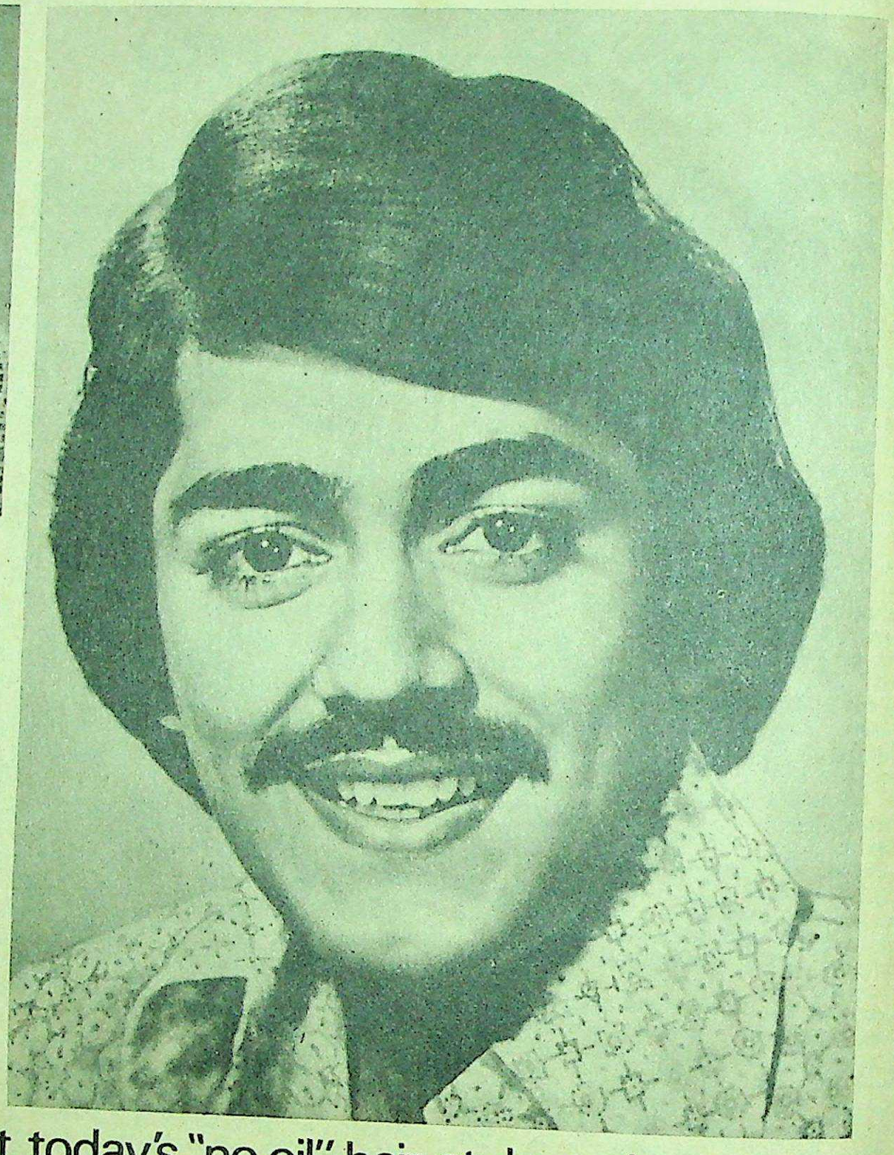
You don't have to choose between an oily hair style...



and a scruffy look.





Now you can get today's "no-oil" hair style and more...

New Code 10 Tonic Hair Dressing

holds and nourishes hair, controls dandruff.

With LO-7 and Panthenol

Today's look is the natural "no-oil" look. But you know what this does to your hair: the scalp dries, dandruff follows. This combined with the lack of nourishment can lead to hair loss.

"No-Oil" Style

Now there's Code 10 Tonic Hair Dressing. With Panthenol and LO-7. For the natural "no-oil" look. Without the problems. This is how.

Your hair stays in place with Code 10. Naturally. The way you want it. Without feeling sticky, oily.

And your scalp and hair get all the care they need with Code 10. It has Panthenol, the proven hair vitamin to help hair roots utilise the nutrients in the blood stream. This gives your hair natural health and full body.

Anti-Dandruff Action

Code 10 also contains LO-7... a proven anti-dandruff agent. It helps clear dandruff, and stays on the scalp to keep it away.

Code 10 Tonic Hair Dressing does all this for your hair...without costing the earth!

The natural choice for the natural style

Courage of convictions

NOT everyone may regard Rajmohan Gandhi as a true journalist. But that is only because a "working journalist" within the meaning of the Act has come to mean a professional hack who ostentatiously denies conviction while never ceasing to serve his master of the day through clumsily slanted stories. This is then flaunted as the objectivity that is regarded as essential to the reporter's existence.

The special correspondents and representatives stationed in New Delhi by most of our national dailies offer ample evidence of this parody of impartial coverage. Under Mrs Gandhi's last incarnation as Prime Minister there flourished a "kitchen cabinet" of newspapermen who faithfully mirrored her views as their own in the columns of Blitz, the Deccan Herald and the Times of India. That coterie may have vanished, but you need only read G. K. Reddy in the Hindu to guess at the Government's future actions. Dilip Mukherjee once did it in the Times with almost equal sophistication. Saeed Naqvi serves the same purpose on the Indian Express but far more bluntly. Nothing could be more blatant, however, than Abu Syed's Current which makes no pretence whatsoever of concealing a loyalty that shifts with the political wind.

Men like Rajmohan Gandhi are rare in this self-seeking and hypocritical circle. His commitment to Moral Re-armament may not appeal to many people. His crusading zeal may sometimes seem almost boyish in its fervour. But there can be no denying that his Himmat was among the few publications in this country (all of them small magazines) courageously to challenge the Emergency dispensation. Believing what he writes, his position is not movable. His attitude to politicians, whether in office or opposition, is determined by a personal code of ethics that may or may not be acceptable, but is never inspired by the hope of gain. Bernard Levin of the Times (London) and Peregrine Worsthorne of the Daily Telegraph are similarly two Fleet Street men whose views are often resented, but whose integrity is never questioned.

All the more reason, therefore, to welcome Gandhi's decision to contest the Lok Sabha polls from Jabalpur on the Janata ticket. The Himmat chief editor is not afraid to announce his stand and not apprehensive of the possible consequences of such a public declaration. Arun Shourie and Nayantara Sahgal, both prominent in the Express for their fulminations against Mrs Gandhi, or for that matter, A. G. Noorani who takes a swipe at her in any publication that will offer him space, would also command the same respect if they cast off the protectively misleading cloak of journalistic objectivity and cared to emerge in their true political colours.

This applies no less to journalists who take advantage of the same artificial immunity to support Mrs Gandhi in a manner that suggests only personal and political loyalty. Two such names for Congress (I) tickets that are being bandied about at the time of writing are those of Vishwabandhu Gupta (Tej and Sun) and Khushwant Singh of New Delhi. Their advocacy may be perfectly legitimate. But paeans of praise should not be inflicted on readers in the guise of non-partisan coverage. That is where the dishonesty lies. Maneka Gandhi and her Surya India at least make no bones of their loyalty. Neither does K. R. Malkani in Organizer.

Other journalists who might be persuaded to creep out of the anonymity of the woodwork and declare themselves at the hustings by the time this is published are B. G. Verghese, Romesh Thapar and Kuldip Nayar. Some would add Atal Behari Vajpayee, M. L. Sondhi and Rajinder Puri to that list; but they are really politicians first and newspapermen second, if at all. Vajpayee, like L. K. Advani, has spent too long away from the Organizer to claim any kind of credible professional status. Puri's columns in the Illustrated Weekly of India and later in Blitz are already a distant memory. They were in any case, a product of the political euphoria that followed the rout of the 1977 elections rather than valid journalism.

Verghese, Thapar and Nayar can best be described as maverick Janata camp followers. Like Rajmohan Gandhi, they too would be admired if they came out into the open. But the crucial difference between them and Gandhi—and this will probably prevent them from running the risk of hoisting political colours — is that the Himmat editor has not grown corns from perching on the fence.

The need for clarity, for an unambiguous defining of where people stand, is all the more necessary because the industry itself is (possibly always has been) surreptitiously playing politics in a big way. It did so during the Emergency, not by open editorial criticism which would have been unexceptionable, but by pouring money into the Janata kitty, clandestinely printing and distributing Jayaprakash Narayan's speeches and by helping what was then the Opposition in various substantial ways. However laudable such underground action might be in terms of defending democracy, it is not a newspaper's rightful function.

The Press in India is not an insurgency force. Nor should its institutional views and actions be governed by the private animosity that might exist between a proprietor and Mrs Gandhi or the no less irrelevant friendship between the owner and Morarji Desai. Even less germane are the personal equations between senior journalists and individual Ministers or officials.

But these connexions dominate the collective attitude which is furtively expressed only because the Press lacks the courage of its convictions. Rajmohan Gandhi must again be saluted for dispensing with such pernicious subterfuge. Honesty demands that other journalists who share his commitment, no matter on which side of the fence, follow his example.

Calcutta Muslims go on rampage

They damage property, and themselves

Police action during the demonstration

FRIDAY, November 23, 1979. 3.30 pm. Policemen take up position before the American Cosulate on Ho Chi Minh Sarani in central Calcutta. The main gate of the consulate is locked from inside. Within ten minutes the area before the consulate is cordoned off by the police. Some distance away a two-thousand strong procession of Muslims carrying black flags to protest against the invasion of the Grand Mosque at Mecca is seen, led by the Congress (I) leader Subrata Mukherjee and the Central Calcutta District Congress (I) minority cell convener, Ishret Nazir Azad. About 300 yards away from the American consulate, at the crossing of Camac Street and Ho Chi Minh Sarani the police stop the procession. Slogans are raised: 'Down with the CIA and Jyoti Basu'; 'Curb American imperialism' and 'America stop evil designs'. Amidst the slogan shouting an effigy of US President Jimmy Carter is burnt. Suddenly two crackers which had perhaps been stuffed in the effigy go off with deafening bangs. The police immediately start a lathi-charge to disperse the procession. The lathi-charge halts the procession and some people even flee, leaving shoes and chappals behind.

Meanwhile some persons from the procession try to advance towards the consulate gate. The police, attempting to stop them, fire many rounds of tear gas shells and when that does not cow down the demonstrators, the police fire a single round. This happens when a police wireless van is attacked at the crossing of Kyd Street and Free School Street, quite far away from the American consulate. The firing takes place before a deputy commissioner of Police. Within about 15 minutes the police are able to remove the demonstrators from the consulate area. This angers the demonstrators who retreat in a disorganised manner. Some move off towards Mullick Bazar, others towards Park Street and Kyd Street. Some of them run to Theatre Road, near the Russian consulate. By then it is almost dark and the streets are filled with people returning home from offices. To confuse matters further, there is a power cut. In the darkness two trams and a Calcutta State Transport bus carrying passengers are set on fire at the crossing of Park Street and Acharya Jagadish Bose Road near Park Circus. Passengers leave the vehicles in panic and in the melee some are seriously hurt. Shops hurriedly pull down their shutters and those who are not fast enough have theirs looted. Some fire brigade personnel who arrive on the spot to put out the fires are beaten up by the violent crowd.

While the mob turns more and more violent and fires rage, Mr Subrata Mukherjee and Ishret Nazir Azad visit the American Consulate to present a memorandum. The memorandum states that "the incident of Kaaba Baitullah (Holy place at Mecca) in which so many innocent Muslims including the Imam of Kaaba Baitullah were mercilessly killed inside the Holy Place is painful to all of us...We highly condemn the Government of USA for their conspiracy into this painful incident and from the humanitarian point of view the Hindu, Muslim and other castes also condemn the Government of USA." Emerging from the American consulate, Subrata Mukherjee, before a handful of bystanders and the police, says in a loud voice: "Mr Jyoti Basu's police have beaten up innocent people with lathis and fired tear gas shells on them. They have even fired bullets. Jyotibabu give us the reasons for this police torture and harassment."

Mr Subrata Mukherjee and Ishret Nazir Azad complain that at least 200 people have been injured in the lathi-charge. I try to check this statement from the police headquarters in Lalbazar but the Calcutta Police Commissioner, Mr Sudhanshu Sinha, has no idea how many persons have been arrested. Some people, however, had set fire to trams and buses. According to him, when the procession started from Haji Mohammad Mohsin Square at about 3.00 pm it was a peaceful one. The demonstrators' original plan was to go to the American consulate on Ho Chi Minh Sarani via Dharamtola Street. Suddenly the procession changed course. Why it did so was not disclosed by those who led the procession. Eventually the procession reached the consulate via Free School Street through Camac Street and was stopped before the consulate.

Later on the same evening I contacted Mr Subrata Mukherjee on the phone and asked him about the burning of the vehicles. He said that members from his procession had nothing to do with either the burning or the looting. The Chief Minister, Mr Jyoti Basu, was out of Calcutta. CPI(M) leaders, worried about the unfortunate incident, contacted Mr Basu and asked him to rush back. The Chief Minister returned late at night and went directly to the CPI(M)'s Party office on Alimuddin Street. Earlier the senior CPI(M) Minister, Mr Krishnapada Ghosh, told newspapermen: "Whoever is trying to disrupt communal harmony by violence and anti-social activities will be dealt with severely."

Was the intelligence department of Calcutta Police aware of the plans of the demonstrators? It was only at the last moment that the Deputy Commissioner, headquarters, B. K. Saha, arrived at the American consulate along with another Deputy Commissioner, H. A. Safwi, who was hurt in the stone-throwing by the demonstrators. When it became clear the next day that the violence would not spread, the people of Calcutta heaved a sigh of relief that one more risk of a communal flare-up had passed.

Altogether about 50 persons were arrested. Calcutta's Muslim dominated locality, Metiabruz observed a day's peaceful bandh on Saturday, November 24. The bandh had been jointly called by the Congress (I) and the Muslim League. Three processions were taken out on the day of the bandh in which, according to reliable estimates, a few thousand people took part. Police sources, however, maintain that only about 500 people took part in each procession.

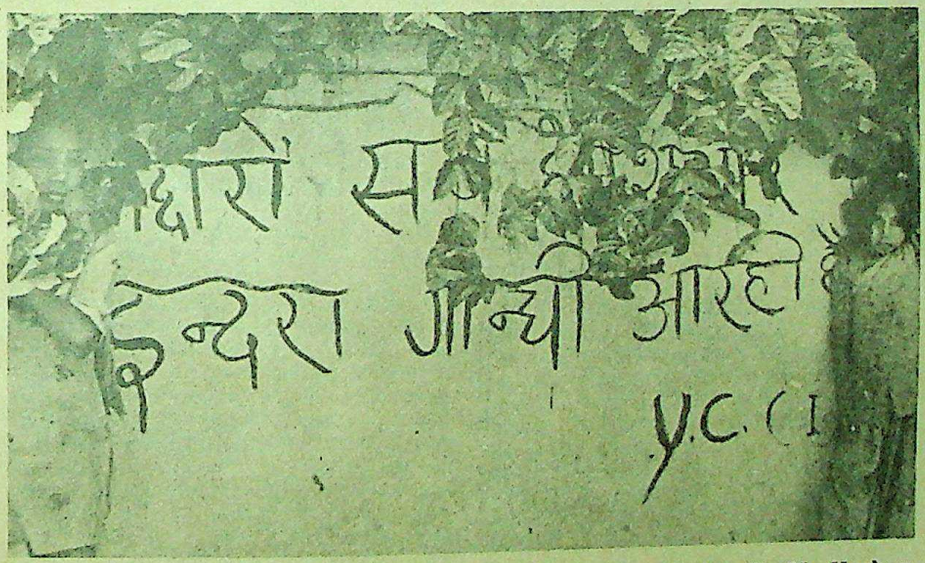
'Mrs Gandhi is coming back'

The Pandit brothers have been warned



"BEWARE traitors, Indira Gandhi is coming back" — this Youth Congress(I) slogan appeared sometime in mid-November on the boundary wall of No 12 Eastern Avenue in Maharani Bagh, residence of Mr K. P. Mushran, one of the partners of Pandit Brothers and brother-in-law of Mr P. N. Haskar, principal secretary of former Prime Minister Indira Gandhi. The slogan on Mr Mushran's wall is the only slogan in the whole of Maharani Bagh — one of the posh colonies of the capital — and it is quite obvious that Mr Mushran had been singled out by Mrs Gandhi's Youth Congress to drive home the message.

The message was first made clear to Mr Mushran, it may be remembered, during the Emergency on July 15, 1975 when he, Mr R. N. Haksar, another partner of Pandit Brothers and uncle of Mr P. N. Haksar, as well as Mr Mathur manager of the firm, were arrested ostensibly for violating the price-tagging laws of the Emergency. Months of harassment, persecution and humiliation followed and although there were a number of people who faced the same music during the Emergency with little reason, the victimisation of the brother-in-law and uncle of the once all-powerful P. N. Haksar will remain a unique chapter in the history of the Emergency.

It is worthwhile to recount the graphic description by Mrs P. N. Haksar in her book on the case of the Pandit Brothers published shortly after Mrs Gandhi was shunted out of power. To quote a passage from the book where she describes the condition of Mr Mushran after he came back to his residence from the police station: "The food was on the table. We sat down to lunch but Mr Mushran remained standing in the same posture as before. His hands upraised, his head slightly bent, muttering and mumbling to himself. As if half demented. Saraswati Didda (Mrs Mushran) asked him to wash his hands, which were black with ink. At the mention of his hands he started screaming, 'No no no! I will not wash my hands. I want to smear this ink on her bloody face. Am I a criminal? Why should they take my finger prints, hand prints, palm prints...'. He started swearing again. It went on for a long time, and we did not know how to pacify him. Ultimately Asha fished out an old newspaper with a blown-up photograph of Mrs Gandhi. Kamtabhai (Mr Mushran) smeared the photograph. Then with his hands which were still black he smeared his wife's cheeks and also that of Asha's and mine. Somehow this comforted him and he agreed to wash his hands and sat down to lunch. Mr Mushran had gone in the morning without any breakfast and was hungry. He started eating, but the moment he looked at his hands, he would stop eating and start swearing again."

Since those days, much water has flowed down the Ganges. But the enmity towards Haksar has evidently not died down. In an interview last year with an American professor, Mary C. Carras, who wrote her biography, Mrs Gandhi made a snide comment about Mr Haksar buying land for Rs 6,000 and then selling it for Rs 26,000. Haksar in a letter to the Illustrated Weekly of India which published excerpts of the interview, denied the allegation saying that Mrs Gandhi had got the facts mixed up.

Close encounters of the Uttam-Supriya kind

Matinee idols have their differences

The tiff leads to fierce argument. The hero loses his temper and hits the heroine. She staggers, falls down, hurts her knee. Doctors, ambulance, nursing home. Back home again. She calls the police for protection. Goes to court with the same plea. The police guard the entrance to her flat. She goes to court again, this time to withdraw her complaint against the hero. She is no longer frightened of him. And, then....

LOOKS like a script out of the Salim-Javed mill. But this is for real. The hero of the script is Uttam Kumar Chatterjee, 54, the glamour-boy of the Bengali film world for over a quarter century. Hindi film buffs, perhaps, remember him for his role in Amanush but he has to his credit quite a few other Hindi films (Chotisi Mulakat, Bandi, Kitab, and Duriyan.) His current assignments in Bombay include a crime thriller Plot No 5, in which he has been cast opposite Sarika, the multi-starrer Deshpremi (co-stars : Amitabh Bachchan, Dharmendra) and Dabedar (co-stars: Dharmendra, Shriram Lagu, Maushumi) The heroine: his protege and close friend Supriya Devi, 42, who is still remembered for her brilliant performances in two of Ritwick Ghatak's early films—Komol Gandhar and Meghe Dhaka Tara—and of course for her courage in accepting the lead role in Amrapali that required her to appear on screen scantily clad. She is also not a stranger to Hindi films. (Remember Dur Gagan ke Chaon Me with Kishore Kumar in the lead ?)

Uttam and Supriya have been very close friends for over 15 years now. But even before that they knew each other well as they lived in the same neighbourhood in south Calcutta. Uttam was a friend to Supriya's elder brother as well. She had been a great fan of his even in her salad days. But then, everyone of her generation was. From a mere fan, Supriya grew up to become a co-star of her hero in Basu Paribar where she played the role of Uttam's young sister. That was in the early fifties. But it was in the early sixties at an outdoor shooting of the film Lal Pathar that their acquaintance developed into an intimate friendship. While shooting for the film Supriya fell ill. Uttam spent many sleepless nights nursing her. "It was then that I started to feel a deep attachment for him", Supriya tells her friends.

Soon after that, Supriya with her daughter Soma, moved to an apartment in Calcutta's Moira Street, having been separated from her husband Biswaranjan Choudhuri, an executive in a Calcutta newspaper. The friendship with Uttam flourished. Finally, in 1964, Uttam also shifted from his Bhawanipur residence to Supriya's apartment. Uttam's wife Gouri Devi and son Gautam, however, preferred to stay back in his ancestral house. Thus began a torrid and turbulent period in the lives of two stars of the Bengali screen.

With passing years, however, strains began to show. Supriya could never approve of the female fans chasing Uttam. These fans seemed to be everywhere. This has been a major cause of irritations for her and strained their relationship. Her daughter Soma has been another. Uttam is very fond of Soma and has always delighted in pampering her. Soma too loved it. But Supriya felt that such pampering would go to the child's head and spoil her. Frequently, Uttam and Supriya argued over this, the arguments often leading to tantrums. When Soma got married to Prasun Goswami, a very affluent person and a linguist by profession, some three years ago and went to Switzerland to live with her husband both Uttam and Supriya felt relieved.

Europe, however, failed to hold Soma. Even the seaside chalet in Spain that her husband bought for her could not keep her away from Calcutta. She came back with her baby daughter. With her return, the old quarrels revived even more bitterly as Soma stubbornly refused to go back to Europe and initiated some very serious efforts to enter films. Supriya suspected Uttam might be encouraging Soma in her efforts. Eventually Some got the break in Kalankini Kankabati in which Uttam and Supriya had been cast in the lead roles and of which Uttam is the director ! This did not make things easier.

So when Supriya announced her retirement from both the screen and the stage on October 17 from her nursing home cabin and said that she would not be available even for the films already assigned to her, everyone smelt trouble. For, her announcement affected Uttam the most. It meant that the film Kalankini Kankabati which had progressed considerably would have to be shelved. Replacing Supriya in the lead role and starting the film all over again would be an expensive proposition. Supriya did not have many more assignments at hand other than this film. Her only other major assignment was the lead role in a north Calcutta stage production. But the theatre quickly secured her replacement and was not affected at all by the announcement.

And, finally Supriya herself confirmed the suspicions. She returned to her apartment on November 1 after about a month's stay in the nursing home. Two days later, she rang up the commissioner of Calcutta Police, asking for police protection against possible attempts by Uttam Kumar to enter her residence. Uttam was out on shooting in north Bengal and was expected back in the city on that day, she informed the police commissioner. She also confided in him that she even feared violence. The Park Street police station arranged for periodic checks on Supriya's apartment by its regular patrols for that area. A general surveillance was prescribed. But nothing happened on that day, nor on the following day, although Uttam had returned to the city and lodged himself in a hotel. This presumably dispelled some of Supriya's fears but she still wanted the vigil to continue. However, she was advised on November 6 that the police could not possibly continue with their watch for an indefinite period unless they were so instructed by a court.

Since Supriya was sick and unable to attend court, her brother Anil Banerjee approached the court seeking the necessary orders for the police. A petition was moved by him before a metropolitan magistrate of Calcutta asking for an order restraining Uttam Kumar's entry into Supriya's apartment. That was on November 9. Supriya's contention was that Uttam Kumar had been staying as a paying guest in her apartment which she had rented in 1962. Their relationship became strained because Supriya protested against Uttam's objectionable manners. On September 29, Uttam picked up a quarrel with her on a filmsy ground, abused her in the most filthy language and assaulted her mercilessly causing dislocation of her left knee and other wounds. Following this she had to undergo a surgical operation. The matter was reported to the police and at the intervention of the local public Uttam deserted her apartment threatening reprisal.

The magisrate drew up proceedings against Uttam Kumar and directed him to explain by December 12 why he should not be restrained from entering Supriya's flat. In the mean time, the order said, Uttam was restrained from committing any cognizable offence at Supriya's flat. The court directed the police to ensure peace in Supriya's flat and conduct an investigation into the matter and report back by December 10. The police posted guards at the entrance to Royal Court, the apartment complex where Supriya lived.

WHEN I visited Supriya Devi on November 15 she appeared very upset and was having second thoughts over the matter. Papers, scrolls and certificates admiring and acknowledging Uttam's services to the screen were still there on the landing walls before Supriya's flat. Beautifully framed, they were so numerous that the wall could scarcely be seen. Dominating the drawing room was a life-size photograph of Uttam and Supriya both garlanded and beaming at each other — seemingly straight out of a wedding scene. Certainly there was no visible evidence in the flat suggesting that the friendship between Uttam and Supriya was over. On the contrary, Uttam seemed to be everywhere. Supriya sat on a divan, her legs fully stretched out, and fed her granddaughter. She was angry with the newspapers for carrying the reports of the proceedings in the court on her complaint. "Why do you publish such things, they only add to bitterness", she said. It was instantly clear that she was already sorry for her acts. She spoke fondly about Uttam, his fragile heart condition and how her actions were going to hurt him. "Look, he even paid my medical bill at the nursing home", she said. Then she talked about her long friendship with him. "We have been so close for so long that it is difficult to forget about it just like that". She was certainly under severe emotional stress. She even admitted that her fears about reprisal were exaggerated. "Certainly, I should not have approached the court", she admitted. At the same time she hinted that it was the police who had egged her on to take this drastic step. She would now like to forget it all as an accident. Yes, they had fights. She was injured. "But tell me", she asked, "in which family are there no quarrels and tiffs". She made it clear that her affection and admiration for Uttam had not faded at all. "I have no grudge, no complaints against him and I will certainly cherish his memory for providing me with the best time of my life". Her eyes sparkled as she spoke and I, for one, was convinced that the worst was over.

Supriya had already asked the police guard and patrol to be withdrawn the previous day. Finally on November 20, her brother Anil formally approached the magistrate praying for the withdrawal of the case filed by him earlier. "In the interest of the parties concerned, Supriya Devi does not want to proceed with the present proceedings any further, and hereby withdraws the petition with the allegations therein. There is no apprehension of breach of the peace and no useful purpose will be served by proceeding with the case any further", the petition said.

Uttam too had been greatly upset at the developments. At the shooting for the film Darpachurna, one of his current assignments, he was called NG several times. This is film-terminology for doing a bad take. For an actor of the calibre of Uttam Kumar, this has never happened in many years. Apparently he had been lacking in his usual concentration. When newsmen approached him for his version of the story he dismissed them with a terse "no comment". Even his friends found him sullen and sulky, hardly in a mood to talk. But he did tell some of his friends that he had rung up Supriya and his agonies would be over soon. It is hard to guess whether all his agonies are over but certainly he is a more relaxed person now after the proceedings against him had been withdrawn.

But what really happened on September 29? The version doing the rounds at the Tollygunge studios says that it all started over an argument on purchases made by them in the USA. The two had just returned from a trip to America. It was the navami day of the Durga Puja There were a few guests at their flat. There was some talk about who bought what presents for whom. At this Uttam is said to have remarked that he could not buy very many presents because Supriya spent most of the money for her purchases. Supriya flared up and said that her purchases included presents for Uttam's wife Gauri Devi, his son Gautam, the daughter-in-law, and even the child his daughter-in-law was expecting then. "And, yet you tell me I am selfish...you have been giving me a bad name always...", Supriya is said to have retorted. The argument soon turned fierce.

Even then the matter would not have come to a head had it not been for the presence of Ratna Chatterjee, a film-producer and Mrs Montu Ganguly (Montu boudi to her admirers), a Calcutta socialite. Suddenly they became the focus of the verbal duel between the two stars. Supriya appeared greatly irritated at their presence. "Time and again I have told you not to bring them in to my house", she is said to have shouted. Uttam retorted by saying they were his guests and deserved more respect from her. Supriya shot back: "This is my flat and you must respect my wishes". And, so the arguments went on and on. Finally, Uttam lost his temper and smacked Supriya on the face. She fell down and hurt her knee. For the next two days she received medical treatment at her apartment. But when the physician attending to her saw that her knee was not responding to treatment and had swollen up, she was advised to get herself admitted to a nursing home which she did on October 1.

What next? When I put this question to Supriya, her reply was: "Nothing. I want to be left alone, I want to live in peace". Whatever she might have meant by that, it is now certain that Uttam is moving back to her apartment. Just the kind of thing that Salim-Javed would have prescribed for the closing shot. The hero and heroine clutching each others hands, their backs to the screen, receding further and further away. And, The End. Or, is it?

WHAT I STAND FOR

The Prime Minister explains what his policies mean

By CHARAN SINGH

THERE are some generally held beliefs about me and my socio-economic ideas. These beliefs do not probably reflect the correct position. I owe it to the people to explain some of these ideas as best as I can.

I wish, however, to make it clear that I cannot and do not insist on the complete acceptance of all my ideas. For instance, I believe in smaller States. A State like UP, Bihar or Madhya Pradesh is too big, in my view, to be administrated in a manner that will be in tune with the urges and aspirations of the people. This is true of some other States also. It is also my belief that the remarkable progress made by some of the smaller States may provide a clue to how the States may be re-organised. Besides, a number of States having comparable populations may be able each to send an equal number of representatives to the Rajya Sabha. But then these are personal views which I cannot foist on others. I have to recognise that in the plurality of Indian politics, some flexibility is called for. How can I, an ordinary practising politician, present for national acceptance all my views on social or economic matters, let alone insist on it?

The views I would express need not necessarily reflect those of any Party, including mine. But, I think, it would be useful to present them for an objective debate.

Let me begin by quoting from the Mahatma. In a letter to Jawaharlal Nehru on October 5, 1945, Gandhi said, "I am convinced that if India is to attain true freedom and through India the world also, then sooner or later, the fact must be recognised that people will have to live in the villages, not in towns. Crores of people will never be able to live at peace with each other in towns and palaces".

Gandhiji recognised, however, that this is an ideal difficult to reach with the kind of development that has already taken place in the world. Hence he went on to say in the same letter to Nehru: "You must not imagine that I am envisaging our village life as it is today. After all, every man lives in the world of his dreams. My ideal village will contain intelligent human beings. They will not live in dirt and darkness as animals. Men and women will be free and able to hold their own against anyone in the world... No one will be idle, no one will wallow in luxury. Everyone will have to contribute his quota of manual labour. I do not want to draw a large-scale picture in detail. It is possible to envisage railways, post and telegraph offices etc. For me it is material to obtain the real article and the rest will fit in to the picture afterwards. If I let go the real thing, all else goes".

Mahatmaji's letter started a brief correspondence with Panditji. They also met during this period to discuss their ideas. Summing up these discussions, Gandhiji wrote to Nehruji on November 13, 1945: "The impression that I have gathered from our yesterday's talk is that there is not much difference in our outlook. To test this I put down below the gist of what I have understood. Please correct me if there is any discrepancy. (1) The real question, according to you, is how to bring about man's highest intellectual, economic, political and moral development. I agree entirely. (2) In this there should be an equal right and opportunity for all. (3) In other words, there should be equality between the town-dwellers and the villagers in the standard of food and drink, clothing and other living conditions. In order to achieve this equality today, people should be able to produce for themselves the necessaries of life, that is, clothing, foodstuffs, dwellings and lighting and water. (4) Man is not born to live in isolation but is essentially a social animal, independent and interdependent. No one can or should ride on another's back. If we try to work out the necessary conditions for such a life, we are forced to the conclusion that the unit of society should be a village, or call it a small and manageable group of people who would, in the ideal, be self-sufficient (in the matter of their vital requirements) as a unit and bound together in bonds of mutual cooperation and interdependence".

Panditji, as far as I know, accepted Gandhiji's summing up of their mutual correspondence and personal discussions.

Herein, perhaps, lies the clue to my social and economic ideas. Gandhiji, while setting forth an ideal, was prepared to accept approximations. There is a mass of material in Gandhiji's writings to dispel the general belief that he was against industrialisation. He said, "I am not against industry but against industrialism". Here is another quotation: "As a moderately intelligent man, I know that man cannot live without industry. Therefore, I cannot be opposed to industrialisation. But I have great concern about introducing machine industry. The machine produces much too fast, and brings with it a sort of economic system which I cannot grasp. I do not want to accept something when I see its evil effects which outweigh whatever good it brings in. I want the dumb millions of our land to be healthy and happy, and I want them to grow spiritually. As yet for this purpose, we do not need the machine. There are many, too many idle hands. But as we grow in understanding, if we feel the need of machines, we certainly will have them. We want industry, but let us become industrious. Let us become more self-dependent, then we will not follow other people's lead so much. W shall introduce machinery if and when we need them. Once we have shaped our life on ahimsa we shall know how to control the machine".

He added, "What I object to is the craze for machinery, not machinery as such. The craze is for what they call labour-saving machinery. Men go on saving labour till thousands are without work and are thrown on the open streets to die of starvation. I want to save time and labour, not for a fraction of mankind but for all. I want the concentration of wealth not in the hands of a few, but in the hands of all. Today machinery helps a few to ride on the back of millions. The impetus behind it all is not the philanthropy to save labour but greed. It is against this construction of things that I am fighting with all my might".

The clue to Gandhiji's economic philosophy can be had from the following quotations also : "As a distinguished son of India put it — he is no other than Sir M. Visveswarayya — whereas an Englishman owns 30 slaves — or is it 36 ? — I speak subject to correction — an American owns 33 slaves. Personally, I think there is no room in true economics, which is convertible with religion, for the owning of slaves whether they are human beings, cattle or machinery. There is no room for slavery in economics".

Panditji (Nehru) had differences with Gandhiji but there is evidence to suggest that in his last days he was coming closer to Gandhiji's views.

Gandhiji felt that if we can so manage the economy that production and distribution are near simultaneous, there is less scope for exploitation, for concentration of power. Gandhiji understood both the value and compulsion of industrialisation and did not object to it. What he wanted was a course of development whereby man will not become a victim of a process leading to exploitation, depotism and slavery.

I have done little more than preach what Gandhiji had presented as a practical and valid economic policy. Panditji had differences with Gandhiji but there is evidence to suggest that in his last days he was coming closer to Gandhiji's views.

No one in this world can wish away industry, even big industry. I have heard some people say that if "small is beautiful", "big is bountiful". This may be so. But bigness should not lead to concentration of economic power, large-scale unemployment and poverty. There is also a limit to mass production if there is no purchasing power and, consequently, if there is no market for the goods produced.

That is why I plead for cottage industries in the main, as also small-scale industries where they can serve the national purpose better, and even heavy or large-scale industries where they are inevitable. It should be clear that in the kind of world in which we live, we have not only to continue but rapidly expand industry, even heavy industry, for self-reliance, for defensive strength, for helping agriculture and a myriad other purposes. The infrastructure wisely laid by Panditji has stood us in good stead in difficult times. In fact, if we can think of small industries today, it is in some measure due to the infrastructure built by Panditji.

IT would be impertinent for ordinary men like me to speak of differences with titans like Panditji. Before we became free, Panditji was the tribune of the people. All of us were his humble lieutenants. Till his death he was India's undisputed leader, as even Dr Ram Manohar Lohia once called him.

He is the architect of our Republican Constitution. He planned and executed brilliantly a foreign policy which raised India in the world's esteem. He ushered in the era of planning. And he launched this country on a massive course of technological and industrial development. His guiding role in the formative years of our independence will be remembered with gratitude by the people of India for ever.

History, however, is a relentless persecutor. No great man of any land has ever escaped the closest scrutiny of history and fiercest criticism. How can Nehru, by virtue of his greatness, escape this historical analysis ?

Can anyone deny that his essays in planning were not always rewarding, his industrial policy led to monopoly, his elections gave rise to the ascendancy of money power, his Constitution permitted the cavalier dismissal of State Governments and dissolution of State Assemblies, and his economic policy led to dependence and foreign domination of our internal policies as well as to unemployment and widening income disparities ?

Such an analysis does not take away from the greatness of the man, the majesty of his vision and the mightiness of his effort. An adulator is not the only kind of a follower a leader needs. And Nehru needs no adulators.

Even in his lifetime I freely expressed my opposition to some of his policies like cooperative farming and state trading in foodgrains, on which questions I had to resign my membership of the State Government in UP. I held then and hold now that while he planned for India's rapid economic growth, he failed to take into account the country's factor endowment as also the fact that, as Gandhiji used to say, the real India lives in the villages. So he did not fully appreciate the consequences of the kind of development which he planned and executed.

After several five-year plans and investment of tens of thousands of crores, there is mass unemployment and mass poverty. It is obvious, therefore, that there were some distortions in the past economic policies which need to be corrected.

THERE is, as I have often said, poverty in towns as in the villages. But the stark fact is that the bulk of the poor live in the villages. How do we remove this poverty ?

Fortunately, the new agricultural technology provides us great scope for a massive increase in farm output. Imaginative irrigation schemes should help us overcome the vagaries of weather to a great extent. Other inputs have to be provided at easily procurable prices. Without incentives to farmers, food output may stagnate as it did till some years ago in the absence of a proper input and pricing policy. We can no longer afford to go back to the era of continuous and large-scale import of foodgrains. Agriculture remains the mainstay of our economy.

New technologies make it possible even for small farms to be economic. Thus, faster agricultural growth can provide gainful employment to a large number of people and insure the country against the shortage of foodgrains, pulses, sugar, milk, edible oils, etc. At the centre of agriculture is the farmer and he will have to be treated with respect and gratitude. He must be assured of remunerative returns for his labours.

The problem today is that far too many people depend on land and it is impossible to provide them even a subsistence living. The era of large farms has to be ended. Such farms breed a feudal and slave relationship. Many a landless labourer lives the life of a bonded slave. They have to be liberated. Even after big farms are broken up, there would be considerable pressure on land.

Therefore, other methods of gainful employment have to be found, and they have to be found in the villages themselves, lest there is migration to towns and the resultant explosive situation of urban growth with all the attendant problems of congestion, slums and pollution. This gainful employment has to come from rural industries, social infrastructures etc. This will also bridge the economic and cultural gap between the towns and the villages, besides ending social oligarchies.

I plead for cottage industries in the main, as also small-scale industries where they can serve the national purpose better, and even heavy or large-scale industries where they are inevitable...

Finally, the unemployed, the landless and the other rural poor will have to be organised. Such organisation is difficult. Some extreme forms of action have been self-defeating. Today, landless people or agricultural labourers alone constitute one-fourth of our people, marginal farmers owning less than one hectare contributing an equal number. The only way of organising the rural poor is to get them employed in local social and economic enterprises and develop their collective bargaining power not only with the village rich but also with the urban lobbies.

Many people call me a kulak leader. What they mean is that I represent the rich peasantry. My whole life, writings and work as a Minister in UP are a testimony to the falseness of the charge. UP is the only State which, because of my crusade, did not permit the resumption of land by landlords. I stand for radical land reform, for small, semi-medium and medium holdings, the principle being that land should be so distributed that it can be managed economically by a family without employing labour or employing minimal labour during sowing and harvesting periods.

I am against cooperative farming and cooperative industries as distinguished from farming (and industrial) cooperatives for various reasons. The kisans in India have a strong attachment to land and only through a violent liquidation of kisans can they be deprived of this direct association with land. Besides, this will lead to bureaucratisation of farm development. Further, India's manpower endowment does not permit of such cooperative farming.

ALL my life I have held that caste indignity is adding to the misery of economic deprivation of the poor, particularly in the villages. The harijans were called the sons of God by Mahatma Gandhi; the condition of an even larger number of so-called backward castes was no better. Mere sentimental approaches, however, will not solve the problems posed by caste tyranny. A permanent solution will be found only in abolition of the caste system lock, stock and barrel and of the overlordism in land and in industry as also emergence or development of a labour-intensive economy on a national scale. A social revolutionary like Periyar E. V. Ramaswamy may be needed in every part of the country.

Atrocities on harijans have been continuing for centuries. Political parties exploit this tragic situation for petty ends. These cannot be ended by mere dramatic visits to affected places.

I HAVE held and continue to hold the view that it is iniquitous to confer increasing benefits on the organised sector of the working class when vast masses are half-naked, semi-starved and shelterless. Growing social alienation with growing development is a paradox of our times. Perhaps one of the remedies lies in stern action against ostentation and extravagance in private and public expenditures. Austerity in high places has to be enforced with relentless speed. Only then can we appeal to the working class to join in the effort to remove poverty and unemployment. Much of the urban administrative infrastructure may also have to be dismantled so that scarce resources can be used for productive employment, not mere desk jobs. An even more enduring solution lies in the dispersal of productive activity, which will necessitate statutory demarcation of techniques. This will require revolutionary changes in the educational and administrative systems.

ONE of the manifestations of lopsided development is the migration of people from the villages to towns in search of jobs. Many of them do not get jobs and have been forced to live a miserable life in slums. Apart from imaginative housing schemes, projects for mass employment alone can end this pathetic situation. Meanwhile a census of the urban poor and massive rehabilitation schemes will have to be undertaken.

Urban problems like housing, transportation, traffic hazards, law and order, cry for immediate solutions. The police system has to be revamped. Dispersal of offices and housing schemes near places of employment will have to be thought of. Further construction of head offices and industrial projects in towns having, say, a population of half million in the last census, will have to be prohibited. The public school system will have to be replaced by fast expansion of schooling facilities with free education for the economically weaker sections. Perhaps a new urban police force may have to be raised to help children, old people, women and others cross the roads, get into or get down from buses. A human approach to urban problems is necessary.

OUR secularism does not mean any neglect of the rights of the majority community or pampering of any single community. But it must be recognised that minorities in any country will always have a sense of insecurity and it is the duty of the State and the majority community to remove this sense of insecurity. As an Arya Samajist, I stand for radical reform of Hindu society and abolition of dowry, caste hegemony and indignity of women. But the personal laws of minorities, say, in regard to marriage, divorce and inheritance have to be protected because the changes have to be the result of a reform movement within these communities and not an imposition by the State. There will, however, have to be a criminal code equally applicable to all the inhabitants of the country.

All places of worship of all religions will have to be protected by the State and fullest freedom of faith and its practice has to be preserved. Any aggressiveness by the minority communities can only be born of a fear complex. The solution lies in removing the fear complex. Officers whose duty it is to protect the people's civil rights have a special responsibility.

THE semi-federal character of the Indian state was largely a reflection of the upsurge of nationalism against political subjugation by the foreigner. Gandhiji, who brought about this upsurge, recognised, however, that aspirations of different cultural and linguistic groups cannot be stifled.

The farmer will have to be treated with respect and gratitude. He must be assured of remunerative returns for his labours.

Indian unity and strength would be preserved only if the people were made to feel and act together as members of a large fraternity, only if they had a sense of participation in governance. This was possible only if there was a devolution of power down the line. Perhaps the time has now arrived to think of a new federal order. The Centre, of course, has to be strong for defence, for protection of people's democratic rights, for economic stability and for the maintenance of standards of professional excellence.

PEOPLE have not sufficiently realised the significance of the assurance in my first broadcast as Prime Minister. It was not merely a negative approach that no language will be imposed. It was a positive approach that an acceptable lingua franca has to be evolved. We will have to convene a conference of all political Parties and Chief Ministers to consider this sensitive matter. Meanwhile, we have to provide that no language, indigenous or foreign, is imposed on any section of our people.

I STAND for open society, open administration, open government. I oppose excessive secrecy except where compelling national interest so demands. Equally, I stand for open, even if controversial, functioning of political Parties. India's problems can be solved only through the struggles of her people. The poor in the towns and the villages have been awakened and can no longer be put down. Civil liberties—even the right to satyagraha when these liberties are threatened—should be the solid foundation of our political progress. Any concept of absolute power, any idea of a short-cut through authoritarian ways to the people's emancipation is alien to my temperament.

The plurality of political Parties is inevitable in a country of our diversity. We cannot stop the organic growth of diverse political philosophies.

The police system has to be revamped. The dignity of the policeman has to be preserved. The policeman should be seen to be the friend of the people. Criminal investigation systems will have to be strengthened.

IT is now generally recognised that population is mainly the result of poverty. By a direct attack on poverty, illiteracy and superstitions, we can stabilise population. While the services have to be rapidly expanded, the scarce resources of the country have to be spent on the ending of poverty and the raising of the social, economic and cultural status of the people which will have an abiding impact on population control.

I FIRMLY believe that the intellectuals, so-called, speaking from a pulpit cannot educate the people. The masses have enough wisdom to educate themselves. As a famous man said, if you tell the people what the situation is, they are intelligent enough to solve their problems. Roberto Rosselini said, "We have in an excess of talk, made possible by mass communication, created a sub-culture based on false intellectuality and non-knowledge".

Knowledge is not always the equivalent of wisdom. In my view, communication, more particularly official media, should be people-oriented and not government-oriented. The culture of sermonising to the people must be replaced by the culture of learning from the people.

Publicity and propaganda are generally a debasing culture. We have seen the extent of debasement during the Emergency. The information infrastructure must be greatly simplified. We must have an institution of village communicator who can be no more than a purveyor of objective information and who can help the people summarise their own experiences for themselves. We may have to think of a large number of village theatres, village reading rooms and village libraries.

We must think in terms of a very large number of transmitters, each catering to no more than a few lakh people. The emphasis should be on giving the greatest scope for the cultural expression of the local people. Control of such transmitters may vest in people's institutions to the extent possible. We have to think in unconventional ways. Similarly, we must think of a large number of rural newspapers to be run by the people themselves. Control of people's minds either by governmental media or by the privately owned big-business metropolitan media should be eliminated.

Having said this, I wish to assert that, with all its faults, the Press has to be free from governmental control. Its dependence on governmental largese must be eliminated. Even if the Press is against me and my policies, as it generally is, I do not believe in curbing its freedom. The press has to recapture the revolutionary role which it played during the Gandhi era.

THE people of India have been cheated again and again. They are naturally sceptical about anything new resulting from a mere change of government or personnel. How do we remove this cynicism and despair? How do we strengthen their faith in the democratic process? How do we frustrate the ambitions of adventurists propagating a false theory that political absolutism or extra-political authoritarianism alone can keep the country together and solve its problems?

Austerity in high places has to be enforced with relentless speed. Only then can we appeal to the working class to remove poverty and unemployment.

Till August 15, 1947, the initiative remained with the people. Therefore, even in bondage, there was a spirit of challenge, participation, expectation. On August 15, 1947, the initiative passed on to the Government. The people became incidental to governance, except for a brief moment when their vote was needed. Thereafter, a handful of operators—politicians, bureaucrats, the urban lobbies, the business-industrial complex—took over. People have no control over their destiny. State power has become so powerful and the influence of the lobbies over the state has become so pervasive that people's struggles are ruthlessly put down by a combination of state power and economic as well as social oligarchy.

Thus, our development, though impressive, largely benefited a small class, promoted modernisation of consumption, as Dr. Lohia called it, and deepened the drudgery, poverty and misery of vast numbers of a long suffering people.

The new alliance which we have forged is an effort to bring the people into the scope of governance. It is never too late to try again to impart to the people a new hope. Youth is a state of mind. Gandhiji was past 60 when he undertook the Dandi March. He was 73 when he launched the "Quit India" movement. He was 78 when he went to Noakhali. Youth represents a passion for justice, a spirit of revolt against tyranny of every kind.

Why are people disenchanted? I think this is because most of us live in the past and in the present. We do not look to the future. There was the erosion of an ethos, first in the closing years of the Nehru era and again after the epochal events of 1977 whose significance was not reflected in the culture of governance that followed.

The administrative process has overtaken the political process. Bureaucracy is not the executive in our democracy. It is only an instrument of people's political will. Expertise can help only if it is an aid to this political will, not a substitute for it. Therefore, the political process must be fortified.

My first appeal is to the professional intelligentsia, not to stop with sermonising as politicians do. They must find an answer to the paradox of economic growth and simultaneous social alienation. They seem to have been overtaken by consumerism and precedent orientation which have robbed them of the excitement and adventure of intellectual challenge and response. They must regain their partisanship with the common people and evolve creative ideas of quickly solving the problems of poverty and social alienation.

The collective strength of the working class shall be asset to the political process. I would only appeal to them, as I appeal to businessmen and industrialists clamouring for profits, to consider, while making their demands, how they can share the fruits of development with crores of people who have no shelter, no food, no clothes, no work.

Those who are in power should prove their sympathy with the downtrodden by manifest evidence of simple, even austere, styles of personal life and administrative behaviour. All of us should accept sacrifices. All of us should sit together and consider how quickly we can provide drinking water, approach roads, basic sanitation and health care to the rural people, how quickly we can eliminate the grinding poverty in the towns and the villages. Harijans and the landless poor have to contend with caste indignity besides economic deprivation. The breaking of this age-old iniquity should be the common purpose of democratic Parties.

I invite all those who believe in a new value system to come together to safeguard the political process against inroads of fascism and authoritarianism and against the emergence of extra-political forces. After this consolidation, India will be ready for the next stage of ideological clarity and differentiation. ■

BETWEEN the husband and wife, poor Dabboo is more badnaam than his wife Babita because he hides nothing from anyone. His roving eye is known more through his own mouth than by the accounts from others. In case someone misses out something, he promptly mentions his youth, handsomeness and (ahem) virility and moans that he cannot get good catches in the shape of girls. He always talks like a steamy bachelor. But the point, not to be missed, is that Babita is no less. She may not be all that khulam-khulla about her affairs but has her fun too. The other day she walked into a posh restaurant of a five-star hotel, hanging onto the arm a fair, handsome man around her age. The two picked out the quietest table in the room and absorbed themselves with each other and a small lunch, oblivious of the eyes that watched them eat

Shabana Azmi: for me to know...

Phal S. Girotra

SANJEEV KUMAR'S mother passed away last week. This tragedy left him sorrowing on more than one account. She was the only person whom he loved and now that she is gone, his close friends say that he will neither give nor receive true affection any more. The second reason is that he could not get married before she died: she always wanted him to marry and bring a bahu home. And he never seemed to make up his mind who he should select from among the various girls revolving in his orbit. Now he might suddenly take the plunge, or, possibly never marry.

NOW look at the change in Raakesh Roshan. Who would have thought that this meek, mild, young star would get involved in a controversy with a director? This controversy about Ikraar — which has now been blown out of proportions by the two parties concerned, reveal the sudden brash attitude adopted by Raakesh. He tried all he could to assume superiority over the new director, Kailash Advant just because the man was trying to get a foothold in the industry. Raakesh conveniently put on the airs of a celebrated, established star. Now the sugar-tongue hero with the chocolate-pudding face and innocent eyes, defends himself in a typically filmi way so much so, you are left convinced as to who the villain is: Kailash of course!

SARGAM still remains the most widely liked and biggest crowd-puller among current films. Producer N. N. Sippy is slowly coming to be known as the Midas of the film industry, with a string of golden jubilees behind him. He continues however to be the usual, good-humoured, self-effecting being that he is.

THERE was something about Neetu just before she got engaged to Chintu, which preserved her youth and glamour. Now that she is chucking away her career, she has begun to look careworn and stale: and the pair of them, Chintu-Neetu, already look long-married. The way they walked into a party recently, with Chintu looking very high and she looking a bit embarrassed and on her mental toes, in case he committed a faux pas. As Chintu talked and swayed his arms around, you could see the mounting tension on Neetu's face. At one stage, when it appeared that things will get out of hand, Neetu tried to steady him physically and with a quiet word. He rushed her away and snapped at her rudely. This appears to be the "in" thing for the young couples of the film world.

ONE of Shabana's girlfriends insists that one may know Shabby very intimately, but the one thing you might never guess is her weakness for members of the opposite sex: she never lets it out and even cleverly shrugs off rumours when you try to pin her down. But her fondness for male company is a sure thing — when you see how many kills she has made and is still making, with Shekhar Kapoor the only ostensible one by her side. ■

KHAAS BAAT

WHAT was Seema doing with MGR recently? She didn't meet him to ask him to preside over her birthday celebrations or switch on the camera in one of her new films. Exasperated by malicious gossip published in some Tamil magazines (whose editors owe allegiance to MGR's AIADMK), she decided to meet MGR himself. And she says, to her utter surprise he promised to take action against the magazines concerned, and atleast one of them, the most vicious one she says, is not being published anymore. Mild gossip used to give her, great thrills, she says, but she cannot stand bored, poisonous minds churning filth calculated to harm her career.

IN her very first film Oh Manju, in Tamil, teenage heroine Kavita was made to take off her red blouse and stop an advancing train. The "hot" scene was calculated to keep the box-office busy but there wasn't much life in it, and there wasn't much of a bosom (at that time) which Kavita could display, and the way the film got bombed, nobody thought Kavita would survive. She has not only survived, but has steadily acquired a decent status in Telugu films. After Jaya Pradha, Jayasudha and Subhashini, she's considered a reliable box-office factor but in Tamil films her career is yet to warm up even though she has appeared in successful films like General Chakravarthy.

REKHA's appearance in Meendum Kokila, a Tamil film sponsored by Kamalahasan, isn't a brief, special appearance, says the actor. She plays a film-actress and it is a full-length role. Sridevi plays the parallel lead. This is the first time Rekha is appearing in a Tamil film but this isn't the first time she's speaking Tamil on screen. In the ill-fated Imaan Dharam she played a Tamilian labourer, and the delightful scenes in which she kept swearing in Tamil saved the film from being a total disaster (at the box-office)—at least in Tamil Nadu.

Rekha's acceptance of the lead role in Meendum Kokila is a special gesture of goodwill towards her friend Kamalahasan. And there are speculations if she'll feature with him in his first ever Hindi film, a remake of the super Telugu hit Maro Charitra. The Hindi version is being produced by L. V. Prasad, who till Jaya Vijay flopped, was known as Madras' Midas. Prasad's hits include Sasural, Milan and Bidaai. He also had ten consecutive hits in Hindi.

The highlight of Maro Charitra was a long dance sequence featuring Kamalahasan: besides the film had any number of comic scenes which kept the audiences amused. It became a hit in Andhra, It scored a golden jubilee run in Bangalore, and surely, large non-Telugu audiences saw it there. Its producer thought of dubbing the film in Tamil but the Telugu version now being shown at Madras is drawing packed houses and it's bound to go beyond a silver jubilee (in morning shows). Saritha was the debutante heroine who later made it big in Tamil too. The Hindi version may not have her: surely the producers cannot risk having two south Indians in one package, however attractive it may turn out to be.

Suphal

Kavita: better performance now

THERE's some gloom in K. R. Vijaya's camp: two films sponsored by her proved terrible flops. One was Velli Ratham, one of those films about a woman who'll do any damn thing to save her husband. And then there was Neela Malargal, which after running full-house for three days suddenly dropped dead. And this was despite Kamalahasan and Sridevi's presence.

IN the good old days there used to be box-office rivalry between the two most popular stars: MGR and Sivaji. Now, it's between Kamalahasan and Rajnikant. At the moment Rajnikant is doing better: his last two films have clicked very well whereas Kamalahasan's last two releases turned out to be nightmares but Kamalahasan is taking it cool: flops aren't new to him he says. In fact his career started with not-so-successful films.

NOW that Rekha has "condescended" to act in a Tamil film, will Hema follow suit? Hema's market in Bombay is so slippery, she may accept a film, say, if Sivaji Ganesan acts opposite her. Her mother is currently making three Tamil films, and she was going around saying that Hema is far too expensive for a Madras-type film. Well, is she still very expensive after Meera, Dillagi and Dil Ka Heera?

THE happiest people in Malayalam films, specially in those juvenile sex films, are the young boys approaching teenage. They get so many chances to hug and smooch their heroines (till the hero turns up). And they're hardly blamed if these films flop.

SEEMA has replaced Jayabharathy in Harry Pothen's camp: she is acting in two films being produced under his well known banner: Supriya. And now that Supriya is in much better financial shape, than when Jayabharathy walked out on Harry Pothen, Seema should have reasons to be happy.

Beginning December 2.

This week the Sun and Neptune are in Scorpio, Venus is in Sagittarius and Kethu alone is Aquarius. Jupiter, Rahu and Mars are in Leo, Saturn is in Virgo and Mercury and Uranus are in Libra. The Moon will be moving through Taurus and Gemini from Aries.

ARIES (March 21 — April 20) You are strongly advised to keep away from disputes and controversies. Arguments with people in authority are sure to go against your interests. Deal patiently and tactfully with those around you. Be cordial and courteous to ladies. The financial front will show some improvement. You may undertake an important journey in the near future. Good dates : 4, 5 and 7. Lucky numbers : 4 and 6. Favourable direction : West.

TAURUS (April 21 — May 22) You can make a lot of changes on the business and financial front. This is the right time for entering into business deals regarding property and investments. Legal suits may be decided in your favour. Translate plans into actions, make necessary changes and do not be afraid to seek favours from those in authority. Good dates : 2, 3, 6 and 8. Lucky numbers : 3 and 6. Favourable direction : South.

GEMINI (May 23 — June 21) Use your foresight in professional matters. If you use your intuitions in good measure you will reap abundant rewards. You will prosper on the financial front to no end. It would be wise to make the right investments. Do not be afraid to adopt new and original business methods. Keep your temper under control. Good dates : 2, 3, 5 and 7. Lucky numbers : 1 and 10. Favourable direction : South.

CANCER (June 22 — July 22) Your problems have not come to an end. You are likely to remain perplexed and apprehensive as to your welfare. But the future is not as bleak as you think. Do not lose heart. There is some likelihood of disappointment on the domestic front. Avoid legal suits and unwise speculation. Extravagant tendencies should be curbed at all costs. Any wrong move may prove very expensive. Good dates : 4, 6 and 8. Lucky numbers : 3 and 9. Favourable direction : West.

LEO (July 23 — August 22) Success on the financial front is assured. A bout of illness may however dampen your spirits. Secret sources will contribute to your prosperity. Important people will favour you. Refrain from making erratic changes. Intellectual and artistic pursuits are not likely to progress. A female relative may oppose your plans. Good dates : 4, 5 and 6. Lucky numbers : 2 and 9. Favourable direction : North-west.

VIRGO (August 23 — September 22) You will enjoy a fair -measure of success and happiness. Do not enter into contracts or business deals which may backfire in the long run. Refrain from lending and borrowing money. Domestic affairs will require a lot of your attention. Some people at home may suddenly fall sick. This period is unfavourable for marriage and courtship. Good dates : 2, 3, 6 and 7. Lucky numbers : 9 and 10. Favourable direction : South-west.

LIBRA (September 23 — October 22) You must utilise the favourable stellar influences operating in your favour at this juncture. Secret sources will extend appreciable help. You will do a fair bit of travelling in the near future. Make suitable changes to suit your plans. Womenfolk will prove particularly helpful. Avoid doubtful love adventures. Check extravagant tendencies. Do not lose your temper. Good dates: 4, 5 and 6. Lucy numbers: 6 and 9. Favourable directions: South and West.

SCORPIO (October 23 — November 21) You will enjoy yourself in the company of children and pet animals. Social activities will keep you busy throughout this week. You may fall in love once again! Elders and those in authority will prove cooperative. Exercise caution in your financial dealings and any misunderstanding with business associates should be settled in an amicable fashion. Good dates: 3, 4, 6 and 7. Lucky numbers: 3 and 4. Favourable direction: North.

SAGITTARIUS (November 23 — December 22) You will face humiliation this week. Do not depend on others since no sort of help will be forthcoming. Take time and make up your mind. Plans should be formulated carefully. The latter part of this year is favourable, so postpone things of importance to a later date. Regarding finance, there will be paucity of funds. Good dates: 3, 5, 7 and 8. Lucky numbers: 3 and 5. Favourable direction: East.

CAPRICORN (December 23 — January 20) Your friends will not be very affable towards you this week. Avoid bad company. Do not go into any sort of controversy or useless small talk. Don't take any hasty decision. Your problems will aggravate at the end of this week. Women will find happiness and acquire costly presents. The time is not opportune for love affairs, matrimony or speculation. Deal tactfully with elders. Good dates: 4, 6, 7 and 8. Lucky numbers: 5 and 8. Favourable directions : South and East.

AQUARIUS (January 21 — February 19) The stellar portents are somewhat conflicting. However, some good fortune including inheritance and new friends are forecast. This is an opportune moment for asking favours of employers and relatives. Courtship and marriage are in the offing. Financial benefits through elders are forecast. Your health will not pose problems. Good dates: 2, 5, 7 and 8. Lucky numbers: 1 and 6. Favourable direction: West.

PISCES (February 20 — March 20) Use tact and circumspection in all your dealings. Patience and courage are required to combat the problems on the domestic and professional fronts. Do not embark on new ventures. Enterprise and good sense should show the way. Do not take unnecessary risks. Children will contribute to your happiness. Good dates: 5, 7 and 8. Lucky numbers: 7 and 9. Favourable direction: South-west.

Vital facts about Colds and Flu and how to fight these ailments

"Anacin is a big help for quick relief from the miseries of colds and flu" says Nurse Natalia D'Souza

What causes colds and flu?

Air-borne viruses from infected persons spread colds and flu. Normally, the body resists these viruses. But over-exertion or under-nourishment weakens the body and lowers resistance to infection.

What are the symptoms?

Bodyache, heaviness in the head, sneezing and a runny nose. Flu is often accompanied by shivering, discomfort and sweating. Cough, sore throat, loss of appetite and fatigue may follow.

Can it lead to complications?

Neglected cases may lead to pneumonia and infection of the upper respiratory tract.

How does Anacin help?

Anacin relieves the misery of colds and flu. Anacin is strong—it contains more of the pain-reliever doctors most recommend all over the world. Anacin is trusted by millions. It is a combination of medicines like a doctor's trusted prescription. So at the first signs of cold or flu take Anacin four times a day.

What else should you do?

- Drink plenty of fluids, boiled water, orange or sweet lime juice
- Eat nourishing foods
- Rest adequately
- Gargle with antiseptic or salt water
- Keep rooms properly ventilated

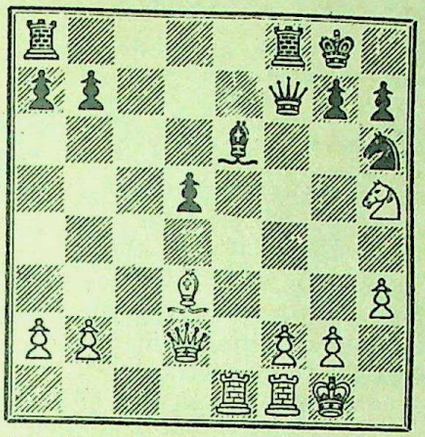
chess

Harris (Black)



Finn (White) to move
Position after Black's 21st move

The Varsity Match

THE ANNUAL duel between Oxford and Cambridge is one of the longest running fixtures in chess today, with a history dating back to 1873. But for the occasional tiresome World War, the sequence of matches has been uninterrupted since that date. This year's event was sponsored by Lloyd's Bank and played in London at the RAC Club—an excellent venue for the match.

A couple of curious facts about the Varsity Match. Firstly it is the only chess match in England to be reported regularly in the Soviet media—British counter-espionage take note. Secondly, almost every member of the English team has played in a Varsity Match. Clearly this event provides a useful pointer towards the future constitution of our national team.

Evidently dissatisfied with only having won the last nine successive meetings, Cambridge (rather unsportingly) extended the sequence to ten, though not without difficulty. In fact the final result was in doubt until the very last moment.

CAMBRIDGE			OXFORD
(Oxford had White on the odd numbered boards)
1. S. Taulbut	½	½	D. Macpherson
2. C. Crouch	½	½	P. Sowray
3. S. Knott	1	0	N. Benjamin
4. M. Pagden	½	½	J. Branford
5. K. Harris	0	1	S. Finn
6. A. Berry	1	0	P. Carey
7. J. Friedland	0	1	C. Hill
8. Jane Anson	1	0	Annette Rogers
	4½	3½

The inclusion of a ladies' board is a very welcome and recent introduction. However, male supremacy must have the last word, so the rules are that the ladies' result only counts if the men's match ends in a tie—which is precisely what happened. So in the final analysis it was Jane Anson of Trinity Hall who eventually carried the day for Cambridge.

Still, Oxford need not be too downhearted about the result. It was the most closely contested for many years and Oxford did have the consolation of producing the best game of the match on board 5.

White: S. Finn (Pembroke College, Oxford). Black: K. Harris (Queens College, Cambridge). French Defence.

I DO NOT normally revive hands that have been used in this column during the recent past, but this one will bear a second look on its merits and because Robert Sheehan has added a most interesting gloss.

Dealer, South. E-W vulnerable.

	♠ K 5 ♥ A K 7 5 2 ♦ J 10 9 5 ♣ K 5
♠ 8 3 ♥ Q 4 ♦ K Q 7 4 ♣ J 8 7 4 2	N W E S	♠ Q 7 ♥ J 9 6 ♦ A 8 6 3 2 ♣ A Q 9
	♠ A J 10 9 6 4 2 ♥ 10 8 3 ♦ — ♣ 10 6 3

In the South American championships South opened Three Spades, North raised to Four Spades, and West led ♥ Q, won by dummy's King. The declarer ruffed a diamond and ran the 10 of spades, to avoid West gaining an entry to lead through dummy's King of clubs.

It looks natural for East to return a diamond, but this gives the declarer no problem: he ruffs, draws trumps, and runs ♥ 10, losing at most a spade, a heart and a club.

Henry Tarrab, sitting East, kept the game alive by returning a far from obvious card, the 9 of clubs, which ran to dummy's King. Declarer can make the contract now if he plays Ace and another heart, because if the defenders do not continue clubs the King of spades will draw the outstanding trumps. Not knowing that the trumps were 2-2, South led several rounds of spades, arriving at this position:

	♠ — ♥ A 7 5 ♦ J ♣ —
	♠ 2 ♥ 10 8 ♦ — ♣ 10

When ♠ 2 was led, West threw ♣ 7 and East completed a fine defence by discarding the Ace of clubs, the only saving card.

But East could have done even better! Study the effect of returning the Jack of hearts when in with ♠ Q. This defeats any line of play by the declarer.

The Second Daily Telegraph Bridge Quiz, by G. C. H. Fox (Robert Hale, £3·95) is derived from Fox's popular Christmas competitions. The section on declarer's play relies rather heavily on elimination technique, but there are excellent hands in the section on defence.

WHEN this stamp, showing a wood-burning locomotive complete with cow-catcher, was issued in the Central American republic of Honduras in 1898, the Honduras National Railway was a narrow-gauge line running about 40 miles south from Puerto Cortes, on the Atlantic coast. It had been intended as an international short cut across the isthmus to the Pacific but a $20 million loan raised in London and Paris to finance it was diverted by the Honduran commissioners to less altruistic purposes. Even the stretch of line actually built was in poor shape and far from straight, for the contractors were paid by the mile, so that they profited at every turn. Although the locomotive stamps have never been expensive, a complete set of 8 still costing only about £2, forgeries were made, mainly to include in cheap packets for young collectors.

A POPULAR attraction for holidaymakers in Cornwall, the Old Post Office at Tintagel was probably built during the 14th century as a manor-house. Its name is a misnomer, for it was used as a post office only between 1844 and 1892. The owner then decided to sell it for redevelopment, but it fortunately escaped the fate of other old buildings in Tintagel because a group of local artists, led by Miss Catherine Johns, bought it and resold it in 1900 to the National Trust for £100. To raise funds for its upkeep, the Trust sells four stamp-like labels. The 5p label has a view of the Old Post Office itself. Other designs feature the oak-leaf emblem of the National Trust and a portrait of Octavia Hill, the Victorian social reformer who helped to found the National Trust in 1895. Although they have no postal validity, the labels may be stuck on postcards to be cancelled at the Old Post Office with a distinctive postmark.

BOMBAY: "Canards" exploiting human susceptibility to superstition are being spread by "vested interests" to ruin the plastic bangle industry, according to the President of the Plastic Bangle Manufacturers' Association, Mr Bogilal Gandhi. The "insidious campaign" by non-plastic bangle groups would have people believe that the husbands of women wearing plastic bangles and the brothers of spinsters would die, Mr Gandhi told a press conference. The campaign had "spread panic" and hit plastic bangle sales. Mr Gandhi said the association had written to the Prime Minister, Mr Charan Singh, requesting an investigation into the campaign —The Hindu (S. Varadarajan, Bhilai)

BANGALORE: At a village in Sirsi taluk of North Kanara district the people do not want to take medicines from a doctor couple posted at the Government dispensary there just because they are Harijans. This was stated by Mr K. H. Ranganath, Agricultural Minister, while inaugurating the Karnataka State convention against authoritarianism and communalism. The Minister decried the attitude of the villagers and said they must give it up. The doctor-couple had been asked to continue to serve the village and had been assured of protection. Husband and wife have to be posted to the same place, according to Government policy—The Hindu (S. L. Prasanna Kumar, Bangalore)

RAIPUR: One million of Surguja district's population of 1.3 million in the Chhattisgarh region of MP are yet to see a railway engine, although it was introduced in India 125 years ago. Revealing this to newsmen, Mr Samar Vijay Singh, president of the Surguja Lok Dal, demanded the construction of the 210-km Bushampur (Surguja)-Barudadih (Bihar) railway line, which had been sanctioned by the Janata Government — Times of India (K. P. Sharma, Dhanbad)

BROACH: Three kilograms of hair, teeth and bones were removed from the stomach of an Adivasi woman by a surgeon at the Rajpipla hospital near here. The 20-year-old Adivasi woman was admitted to the hospital after she complained of a severe stomach pain. She is reportedly progressing well—Times of India (Wasi Bilgrami, Sahibganj)

SHIKARIPUR: A case of a woman living by tea has been reported from a village near here. The only source of sustenance for Shivamma (50) of Begur, near here, for the last 15 years has been tea, it is claimed. Shivamma, who is said to be physically active and works in fields, consumes only a few cups of tea a day, it is said. The case came to light when the woman was admitted to the hospital here for a medical check-up—Deccan Herald (H. Munti, Bangalore)

MADRAS: A ruling Party member, Mr Pannal Sethuraman, complained to the Speaker of the Tamil Nadu Assembly that he found a three inch nail in his seat. He displayed the nail and a pencil which he said was also in his seat. The member said that he had found the nail in his seat and that he had ignored it. The Speaker, Mr Munu Adhi, said he would look into the matter, if the member gave a written complaint. The Leader of the House, Mr K. Manoharan, said that the Speaker should acquire the nail and the pencil from the member as they had become the House property—The Hindu (V. M. S. Ramakrishnan, Coimbatore)

SONEPUR: A railway engine ran on the track without any driver and derailed after hitting the diesel-tank pipeline which burst and over 6,000 litres of diesel were destroyed. The damage to the locomotive and loss of diesel accounted for a loss of Rs 5 lakhs to the N. E. Railway. An inquiry has been ordered into the accident — The Indian Nation (Pradeep Kumar Mathur, Patna)

ROURKELA: An actor playing the role of a constable found himself in the police station here as accused. Seemingly overwhelmed by the applause he received from the audience for depicting exploitation during authoritarian rule, he came out of the stage at the end of the drama without changing his uniform. Finding the superintendent of police without uniform in the crowd, he frivolously tried to arrest him. The SP ordered the police inspector present there to take him to the police staion, where he was charged wih impersonation. When the SP asked for two cups of tea the policemen on duty served only the SP and refused to extend the courtesy to the visiting 'constable'. The 'guest constable' then revealed his identity — Balakrishna Das, an Oriya film actor. The drama was staged by the Ganjam Kala Parishad, Barhampur — The Statesman (Rai Mohan Das, Orissa)

COLD WAR HOTS UP

AS FAR as infighting is concerned, the Lok Dal is hardly any exception to the rule. And its contradictions often become very amusing. The cold war between Chaudhury Charan Singh and Raj Narain is now well known, and these differences were bound to aggravate after the Chaudhury appointed Satpal Malik, his youthful supporter from the BLD days, one of the national secretaries of the Lok Dal. But the man most perturbed by this appointment is not Raj Narain, but G. D. Solanki, the Chaudhury's eldest son-in-law. Solanki and his father-in-law have had a curious love-hate relationship. So far Solanki had been saying that as long as Raj Narain did not leave the Chaudhury, the latter would not get anywhere. But after Malik's appointment, he has turned his attack on Malik, calling him an "agent" in Chaudhury's camp. Solanki is so angry at this appointment that he's gone berserk.

JANATA NOT FAR BEHIND

KRISHAN KANT, the Janata nominee from the Chandigarh seat, friend of Chandra Shekhar from the "young turk" days, and one of the first people in the Janata Party to raise his voice against the RSS, is becoming a symbol of the frustrations of the non-RSS people in the Janata Party. Although his friend and Party leader Chandra Shekhar has given him the Chandigarh seat, the RSS and the Jana Sanghis have not forgiven Krishan Kant for attacking them. And they are determined to see that he is defeated. They have even decided to put up a rebel candidate against him, R. S. Sharma. Sharma, an old RSS hand, was in jail during the Emergency, like the Congress "young turks". But unlike Chandra Shekhar and his friends, Sharma wrote abject letters of apology to the Indira Gandhi Government to come out of jail, in a familiar display of cowardice. But today he is the RSS nominee. When Krishan Kant contacted Vajpayee, Advani and Chandra Shekhar to try and settle this problem he got the same response: 'We did not know...this sort of thing should never happen'. But nobody as yet has done anything except provide lip sympathy for Mr Krishan Kant. Can people like him survive in the Janata Party?

STAR WARS

AND the chase for star support continues. The National Party newly created by the Bombay film industry, which drew respectable crowds in Bombay, seems to have aligned itself with the Janata Party: and the leadership of Babu Jagjivan Ram is the main reason for that. One cannot think of a single star supporting the Lok Dal-Congress alliance. But Mrs Gandhi has her supporters in the celluloid world too, the most prominent being Nargis and Sunil Dutt. And of course, Amitabh Bachchan is a personal friend of the Gandhi family. To gather more stars on her side, Mrs Gandhi sent Arvind Kumar, former editor of Madhuri. He conveyed this message: forget the Emergency, let us be friends again. One does not know yet how well Mr Arvind Kumar succeeded.

BATTLE OF THE BOTTLE

BELIEVE it or not, the contest in the South Delhi constituency is not really between the Congress(I) and the Janata, but between Coca Cola and 77. The reason: the Congress(I) candidate is Charanjit Singh, whose firm used to bottle and market Coca Cola before the Janata Government axed the drink out of the country. Charanjit Singh's workers condemn this decision and promise the voters of their constituency that they will bring back Coca Cola if they are sent to power; the Janata workers defend the birth of Double Seven. Let's see which drink suits the electorate's palate better.

GHOST IN THE MACHINE

MOHAMMAD Yunus's book Persons, passions and politics, which hits out sharply at a number of Delhi journalists, has created quite a stir in the capital. But what has intrigued many is the fact that nowhere in his book has Yunus criticised Mrs Uma Vasudev who wrote an adulatory biography of Mrs Indira Gandhi but as soon as Mrs Gandhi was shunted out of power, did a volte face and wrote a sharply critical book called Two faces of Indira Gandhi. According to an insider, the reason for Yunus's silence on Mrs Vasudev is that she was the ghost writer of his book. While Khan Saheb's proficiency in Urdu is well known, written English has never been his forte. Khan Saheb was once called by P. N. Haskar "a brainless wonder created by Indira Gandhi."

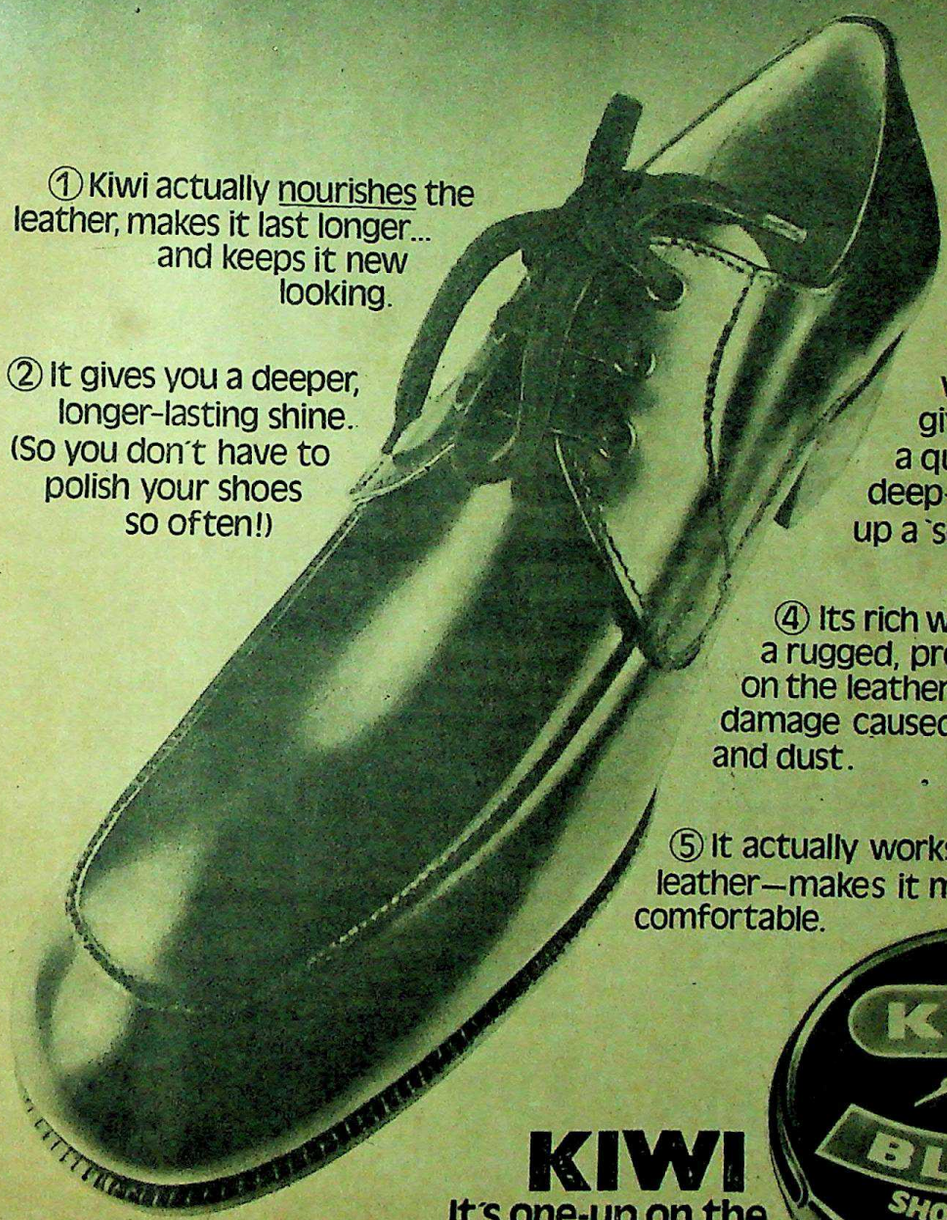
Yes. Any shoe-polish can give you a quick shine. But only Kiwi can give you all these extras :

Any other polish only gives your shoes a surface shine... which soon wears off. But Kiwi does more for the leather. Much more.

Because Kiwi is specially formulated. With a uniquely high proportion of rich, creamy, nourishing waxes. And these thick, rich waxes soak deep down into the leather... to work their goodness into it. The result? 5 important extras that the other polishes can't match. Look...



① Kiwi actually nourishes the leather, makes it last longer... and keeps it new looking.

② It gives you a deeper, longer-lasting shine. (So you don't have to polish your shoes so often!)

KIWI

It's one-up on the other shoe-polishes. (Because it's rich with wax.)

Fly the world with us. We know the way.

Many ways, in fact. From both Delhi and Bombay. Via our fleet of 747's.

From Delhi

We fly west-bound five times weekly. Twice a week non-stop to Frankfurt. Twice a week through Karachi. Once a week through Bahrain. And every flight continues on to London and New York. We also have regularly scheduled east-bound flights to Bangkok, Hong Kong, Tokyo and Los Angeles.

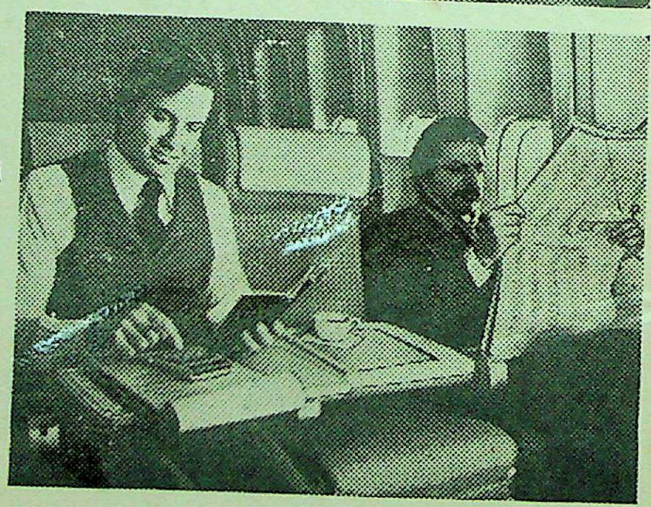
From Bombay

And now you can fly to either London or Hong Kong from Bombay, too. We have twice a week non-stops west-bound to Frankfurt and on to London and New York. And east-bound flights twice a week to Bangkok, Hong Kong, Tokyo and Los Angeles.

Three classes of service

And when you fly the world from either Delhi or Bombay, choose the class that's best for you. Luxurious First Class, with the exclusive reclining Sleeperette seats.

Or the Business Class—the special section of the plane created especially for business travellers. With an empty seat beside you whenever possible, and a choice of meals including Indian vegetarian cuisine. Or Full Service Economy Class, which offers international service no matter what price you pay. So, see your Travel Agent, and suggest Pan Am.



PAN AM

We fly the world the way the world wants to fly.

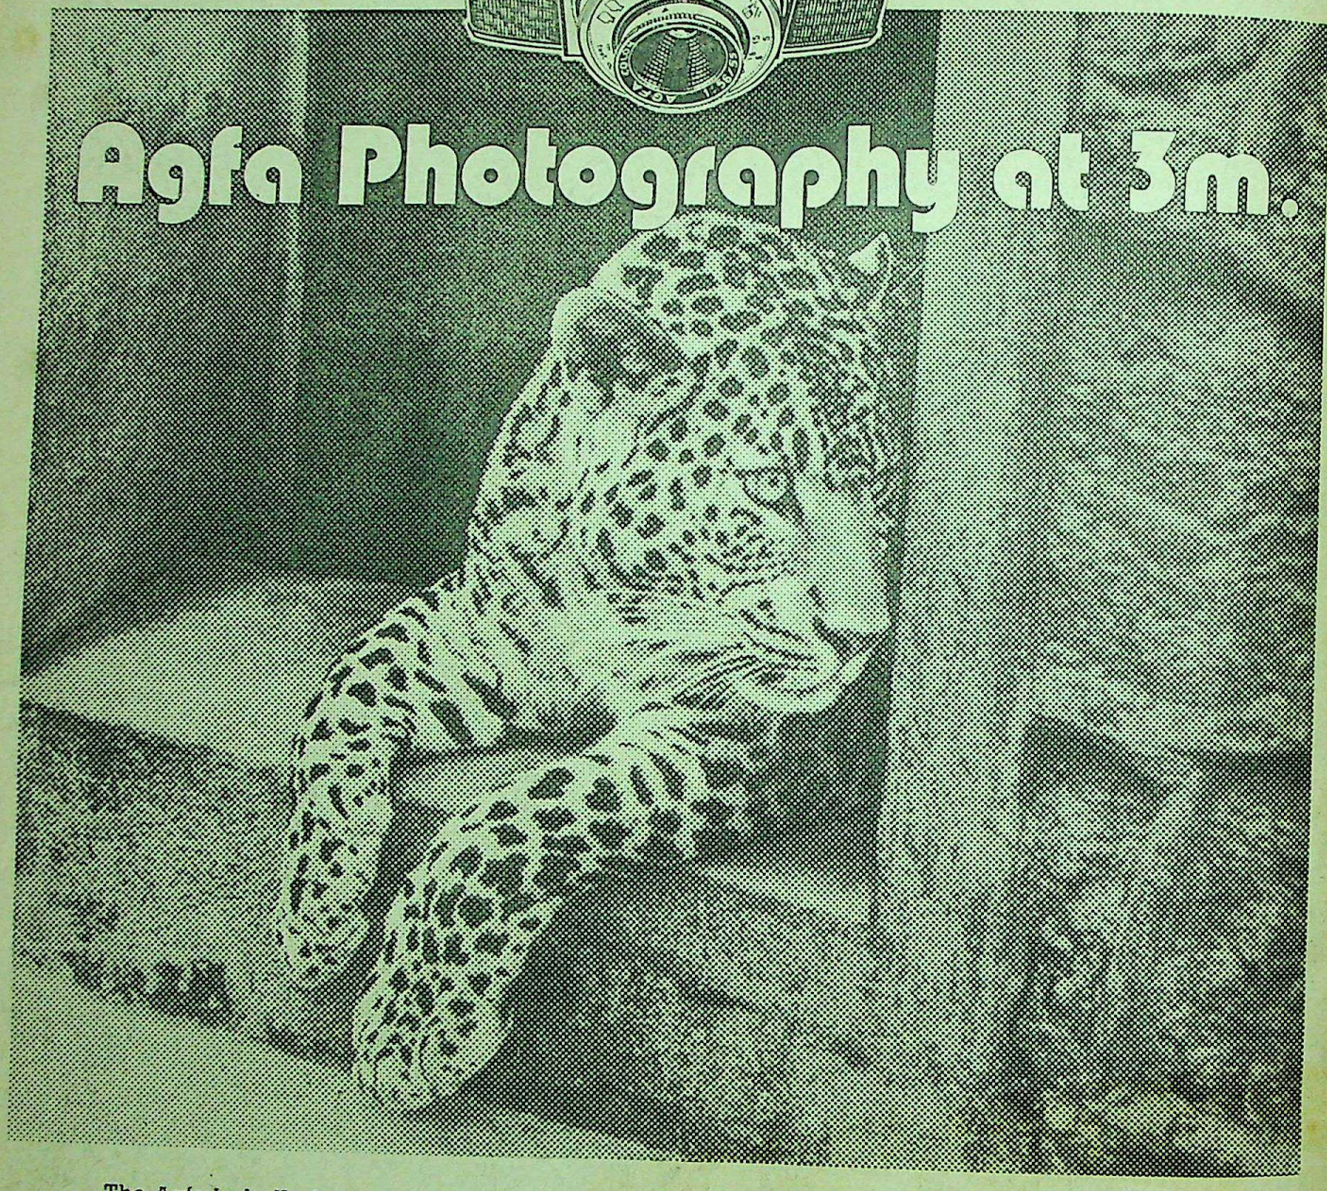
Agfa Photography at 3m.



The Agfa Isoly-II takes perfect snapshots at close range. Set the aperture to f/8 to get just the right amount of light to the film. Set the shutter speed at 1/30 second, just fast enough to avoid camera shake. Shoot from a distance of 3 m. on slow film—125 ASA—for greater sharpness. The result? A perfect close-up every time.

The Agfa Isoly-II is a great all-round camera. You simply adjust settings, distance and film to freeze a sports scene forever, capture every detail, near or distant, of a landscape or take a perfect picture in dim, soft light.

The Agfa Isoly-II is built to German specifications and undergoes over 100 exacting tests. See this fine camera soon at your friendly Agfa dealer.

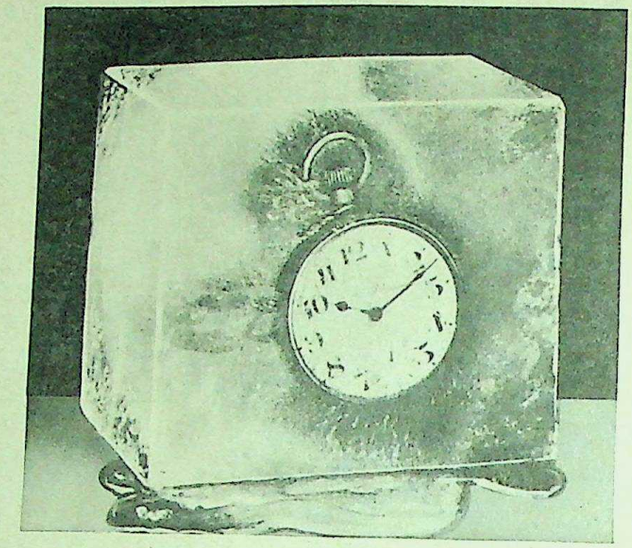
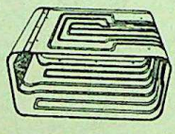
The Quicker Cooler!

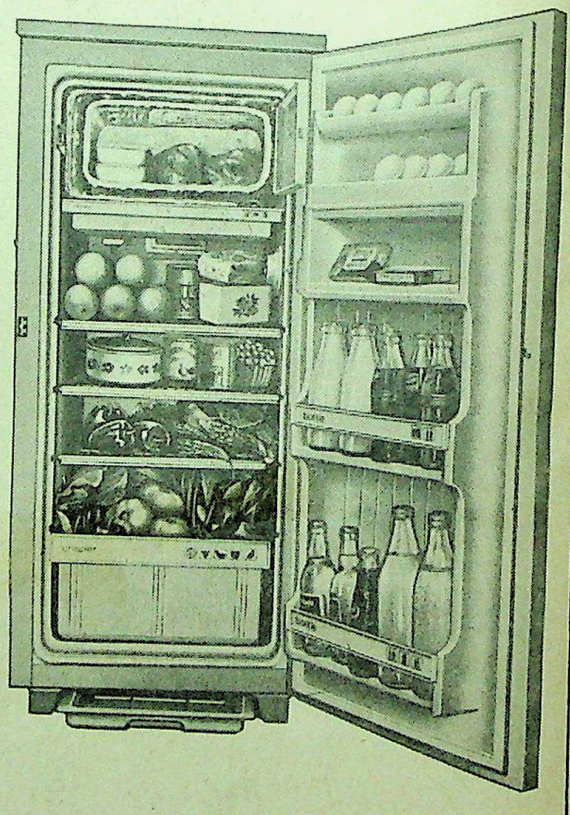


Allwyn Prince 165

Only Allwyn has the Roll-Bond Freezer. For faster, more efficient cooling. Time it and see!



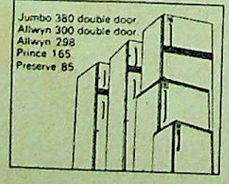
Our Roll Bond Freezer is absolutely unique. Here the cooling tubes are not placed outside the freezer as in other fridges. They're integrated into the freezer walls. Naturally, cooling takes place much faster. Ice cubes form much quicker. And the overall operating efficiency of the compressor is significantly improved. Today, only Allwyn offers you this feature. That's why it's called the Quicker Cooler.



Other advanced Allwyn features are:

- Auto-defrost with a self-draining tray
- High-efficiency, noiseless, super-compressor
- Crack-proof, high impact polystyrene liner
- A cleverly designed interior for optimum space usage
- Free laminated table top

And remember this: Allwyn is the only Indian fridge with over 30 years of experience behind it.



ALLWYN

Better living starts with Allwyn.

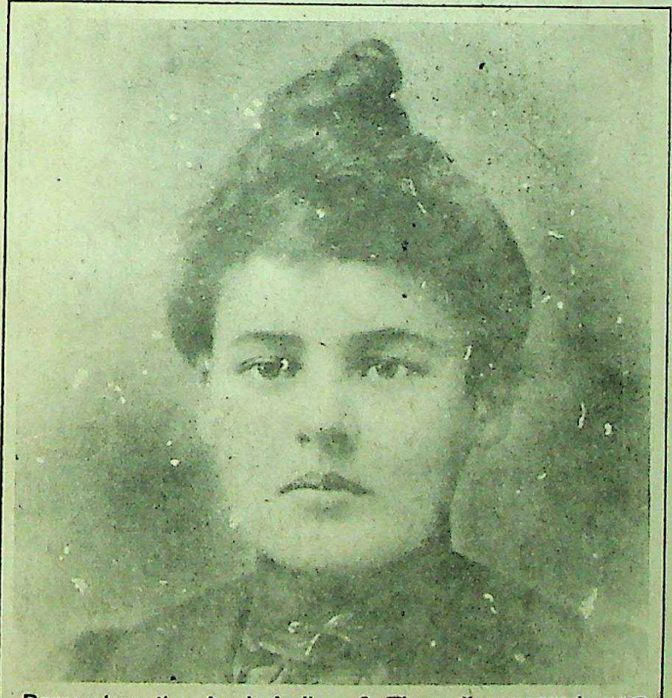
March 16, 1980

The Janata seems to be totally devoid of any survival instincts. And as it splits again with the departure of Babuji, the opposition seems hell-bent to self-destruct.
Where does Chandra Shekhar stand ?
What are the underlying socio-economic causes ?
What are Babuji's plans ?



Remember the Anglo-Indians ? They disappeared even as they dug roots. The railways, customs, police and major ports were formerly their happy hunting grounds. Today they survive only in schools and hospitals. But they have done themselves proud in the armed forces. Why did they ever leave ?

Caste kills

THIS refers to your cover story on Parasbigha and Dohiya by Saumitra Banerjee and Arun Ranjan ("A cry of terror", February 17) I feel the Government and other political organisations should try to identify the root cause of such sad incidents: how do meek and simple villagers turn suddenly violent? One thing is clear—that Bihar is irretrievably divided on caste lines, and this is helping the feudal lords. A similar incident occurred later at Punpun, in Pipra village on February 25. All those attacked were harijans again.
Anil Kumar Ojha, Motihari.

RECENT happenings at Parasbigha and Doniya have seriously threatened the very foundations of democracy and the federal structure: if the state governments fail to discharge their own duties of preserving law and order, the people will be bound to lose confidence in them and naturally turn to the Centre for redress.
Gautam Kumar Sinha, Calcutta.

THE report mentions that the Supreme Court's verdict was dishonoured by Ram Niranjan Sharma, who was murdered. What action did the Bihar Government take to protect the Court's verdict? If such action had been taken, I am sure the gruesome murder would not have occured. After all, it is the duty of the Government. Central or State, to implement court orders. It is useless spending taxpayers' money on law courts if their verdicts are dishonoured by the governments themselves.
Randendra Mukherjee, Siliguri.

WHAT really surprises me is that in a country which gave birth to humanists like Kabir, Guru Nanak, Sankardev and Vivekananda human life itself seems worthless. We Indians claim to be a pious people, in spite of genocides committed repeatedly in the name of caste, religion and language. In reality, it is vested interests that are to blame for all these. Opportunists who call themselves leaders are gambling with the lives of innocent citizens.
Prateep Sen Gupta, Digboi.

THOUGH caste hatred has a major role in the butchery, the fact is that as long as India remains a Party-based democracy, nothing can rid her of this cancerous social trait. The possibility of communists exploiting the situation is also imminent.
K. S. Raman, New Delhi.

THE memory of Parasbigha had hardly faded when Pipra was in flames. Again harijans were the victims of this carnage. It is said Pipra is an area infested with Naxalites and criminals. The harijans were persecuted by them since long.
Khan Basera, Patna.

See our Pipra report—Editor

JUST as I was reading your cover story on Parasbigha and Dohiya. I came to know about the incident at Pipra. Quite irrationally, I started counting on my fingers the number of carnages Bihar had seen in a brief one year.
Chandrashekhar Dubey, Bhagalpur.

Reason eclipsed

I HAVE gone through the reports on the eclipse by Raghu Rai, Nirmal Mitra and Ajoy Bose. The display of ignorance and stupidity on the occasion of the total solar eclipse by even men in responsible positions has made us the laughing stock of the civilised world. Pseudo-scientific reports on the hazards of watching the eclipse in the Press and the radio created a situation of near-panic. During the eclipse, streets were deserted as people everywhere shut themselves indoors. And we talk of nuclear energy and space research!
Gautam Kumar Sinha, Calcutta.

RAGHU RAI's photographs of the eclipse were excellent. The text by Mr Mitra describes beautifully the setting and impressions of the eventful day at Konarak.
Shirsanka, Calcutta.

MR MITRA has successfully brought out the anti-social and irrational nature of the practice of "pollution" among caste-conscious Hindus. It is also clear that All India Radio was more keen on propagating religious fallacies rather than presenting scientific explanations. It would be pertinent to quote Bertrand Russell: "Fear is the main source of superstition and one of the main sources of cruelty. To conquer fear is the beginning of wisdom, in the pursuit of truth as in the endeavour after a worthy manner of life."
V. A. Poonkodi Selvan, Thiruvaiyaru.

THE eclipse provided welcome relief for those of us fed up with politics. This 'celestial loadshedding' eclipsed all the contemporary brouhaha, from Ayatollah Khomeini to Assam aliens. In one of his brilliant essays, "On comets", Bertrand Russell wrote about man's curiosity in the past over the "appearance" and "disappearance" of comets. The fact is comets never appear or disappear. They are made to by superstitious men.
Roma and Arindam Ghosh, Nagpur.

MY attention has been drawn to "The TV Spots Muddle" (February 3). I am surprised to note that a publication of the Ananda Bazar Group, which has a matchless reputation for observing the highest ethical standards in the profession of journalism has allowed the publication of baseless and malicious insinuations under the garb of comment. It is most surprising that the editor did not screen the article before actual publication.

I am not concerned with what Ashish Rajadhyaksha has written about others but as far as the National Council of Advertising Agencies (NCAA) of which I happen to be the President, is concerned, it is a most respectable and fully recognised organisation. All the 46 agencies which are members of NCAA are accredited to the IENS as well as the Government of India. No single non-recognised agency is a full-fledged or associate member of NCAA. NCAA is also the only professional body that organised the National Advertising Congress in India most successfully. It is singularly dedicated to the cause of raising the standards of advertising in India. Therefore, the insinuations of the author with regard to NCAA are wholly unjustified and uncalled for.
Vishwanath, President, The National Council of Advertising Agencies, New Delhi.

Ashish Rajadhyaksha replies: 1) Almost all the agencies known to have struck it rich after the new accreditation rules do in fact belong to the National Council of Advertising Agencies. 2) The NCAA has refused to support the Advertising Agencies Association of India in fighting a policy that is demonstrably detrimental to the interests of all above-board agencies, small or big. 3) The imposing sounding number of 46

members that the NCAA talks of contains practically none of the more reputed agencies, and the combined billing of all 46 cannot be over 10 per cent of the total business placed with the media annually, some 130 crores.

One is not trying to say that the 46 agencies do not have a right to start their own organisation. One is not—and this is important—trying to side with the AAAI in anything more than the limited pointed of the particular issue. In fact, lack of space forbade me from writing some more about the erstwhile racketeering of the very people who are so righteously renouncing corruption in the new system.

Instead of so righteously accusing me of 'baseless and malicious insinuations' and similar high rhetoric Mr Vishwanath might well have spent his time more fruitfully by explaining just why his group has refused to side with the AAAI. At least that might have put to rest the suspicion that the only reason could be the benefits the new system appears to offer some of its 46 members.

THE article has focused very effectively the racket going on at Bombay and Delhi Doordarshan in regard to the time allotted for the commercial advertisements and the priority in bookings. As alleged in the article, it is very shocking that the I and B Ministry is giving a boost to such backdoor methods of booking advertisements. We, on behalf of the viewers, small manufacturers and small agencies demand an enquiry. Members of the opposition Parties in Parliament should also ask for a thorough enquiry and help stop this menace, otherwise the genuine and small agencies which do not want to be a part of such tactics may suffer. Ultimately the middle and small manufacturers will find it very difficult to advertise their products with a limited budget.

Nikhil Buch, Convener, Bombay Doordarshan Darshak Sangh, Bombay.

THE article is obviously 'sponsored' and is a crude attempt by the few big advertising agencies to pressurise the authorities to end the 'time rationing' scheme so that the monopolistic strangehold of the agencies over TV commercials is perpetuated. That the author has indulged in lies and half-truths is evident from the following: Neither the author nor anybody else visited our firm, ADWEL, nor have we ever offered to "manage" bookings with Chitrahaar out of turn to any advertisers; the author alleges that agencies like ours sprang up only during 1979 when the booking position of TV commercials became very acute. In fact, ADWEL got accreditation in 1975 and prior to 1979 ADWEL booking of TV commercials was about Rs five lakhs a year. It is now only about Rs two lakhs; the article says that ADWEL specialises in outdoor advertising like hoardings. Is it a crime or is there any ban that outdoor agencies cannot do TV advertising. It will 'shock' the author to know that some of our Radio and TV Spots have won appreciation from even advertisers whose accounts are being handled by big agencies; and we do not know anything about ADWEL being a member of NCAA which, according to the author, has been formed by the 'inner circle of agencies'.

The booking already sent by five big agencies for April 1980 totals up to more time than the total time available over TV commercials. This fact alone demonstrates that the monopoly racket of big agencies must be busted by schemes like 'time rationing'. Small agencies and advertisers warn the I and B Ministry to be aware of such blackmailing attempts because already the Ministry has succumbed, wittingly or unwittingly to the lobbying by the big agencies by deciding to double the telecasting charges for Still Spots—a policy which may squeeze out both the small agencies and advertisers from doing TV commercials because most of the Still Spots are booked by them.

D. Sabharwal, ADWEL, Delhi.

What next?

THE book review "Domes of fortune" in the February 17 issue was marvellous. Is your next pick the "Pillars of glory"?

Chandra Shekhar, Allahabad.

I HAD occasion to go through Alan Brien's book, "Domes of fortune" some pictures from which were brought out in SUNDAY under the heading "Keeping abreast of the times". The book is a narrative of the varieties of female breasts as seen from different angles. In Sanskrit classics, especially Kalidas's Kumarasambhawan and Vatsyayan's Kamasutra, the description of female breasts in far more captivating. At one point it is said that when Brahma (the creator) conceived of the idea of creating woman, he prepared a compound after decades of research, and lovingly named it Saunaaryam (beauty). After shaping all other parts of the female form, he was still left with some matter that he thought of using in the best possible way. He pondered for a while, smiled, moulded the matter into two bowls, and stuck them on two sides of the woman's chest. He gazed at the creation and admired it. Nowhere has the prominence and charm of female breasts been better described as in Indian classics. No less immortal than the poets were the gifted yet unsung sculptors who carved their dream figures in stone. Breasts display all the varied charms of womanhood. Brien's book failed to bring this impression through.

Shivanath Prasad, Muzaffarpur.

Brute force

MY blood boiled as I read the report "Brutality at Narainpur" (February 10) about the murders, rape and other acts of barbarism by the police of Independent India. The incident will remain a black spot in the history of the Indian Police force, which is notorious for its brutality, corruption and partisanship, anyway. The atrocities by caste Hindus on the landless harijans were definitely committed with the active connivance of the police. The reason for such behaviour is perhaps a belief that no government will ever take action

K. Ramu, Bangalore.

THE Narainpur outrage was far worse than any communal or caste riot. Here the guardians of law and order were the criminals. Policemen, especially those belonging to the UP Provincial Armed Constabulary, are notorious for criminal activities. In her book Reason Ruined, Primila Lewis, who was once a prisoner of the Delhi Police, gives an authentic first-hand account of police barbarities, including the rape of petty women criminals. Cruelty is a general rule with the police all over the country,

Kuntala Datta, Calcutta.

Maiden show

PIOUSJI writes in Khaas Baat (December 30, 1979) about Hema Malini that: "...she had bared her pretty shoulders for her very first film Sapnon ka Saudagar". Incidentally, this was not Hema's first film. Her first film was in Tamil: Ethu Sakhyam, made in 1962 when she was a girl of 14 (born October 16, 1948).

Samir Kumar Sutradhar, Khutapura.

Fun? None

THE total of the digits of 1980 is nine. Add nine to the total of the digits of any number and you will get the same result. There will be no difference. The "interesting feature" ("Fun with numbers", Opinion, February 70) Mr Ghosh has noticed is not true for 1980 alone but any year whose digital total is nine. Judging by the standard of the brainteaser, I shouldn't be surprised to see you publish ones like: "Think up a number add eight to it, subtract eight, and you get the same number."

T. S. Venkataramani, Madras.

"FUN with numbers" was not fun for me. One should know that all pure numbers are between zero and nine. The rest are combinations of these numbers. Hence, adding any digit with nine will always add up to the same number: thus 9 plus one equals 10, and one plus zero is one.

Withering away of the Janata

BY KEWAL VARMA

THE Janata is a strange creature. It quarrels when in power, it splits when out of power. It has disproved two common theories : power is a great cementing force and adversity makes strange bed-fellows. This fact alone should be enough to prove that there must be some important socio-economic reasons for even the residual Janata to split.

The tragedy of well-wishers of the Janata is that it is sought to be kept together on the basis of only democracy. In 1980, democracy alone cannot be the basis of a political Party. It could have been, had complete social, economic and political tranquillity been prevailing in the country. But it is not. In many areas, the conflict of interests between different social groups has assumed such proportions that it is not possible to harmonise the interests. Such conflicts can be resolved in favour of those sections which succeed in capturing political power. Parties are instruments to capture power and democracy is the framework in which this power is used. It is also a painful reality that with 48 to 50 per cent of the people living below the poverty line and with an aggressive social order under which Harijans are burnt alive and culprits go scot free, democracy has little meaning for a majority of our people.

While democracy alone cannot become the basis of a political Party, it can certainly become the basis of a movement. It is said that the return of Mrs Gandhi has once again made democracy a central issue in India. This is, perhaps, an over reaction. With Mrs Gandhi winning the elections, there are many who would like to give her the benefit of the doubt. But if democracy is visibly threatened again, what prevents different political Parties, otherwise pursuing antagonistic social and economic goals but committed to the democratic framework, from coming together to defend democracy? In the period between 1975-77 the CPI(M) joined hands with staunch anti-Communists like P. C. Sen but they parted company soon after Mrs Gandhi was out of power. A political Party is more than a movement. It is possible to build up a movement on a one-point programme, but a political Party has to have homogeneous social and political objectives on a number of important issues to stay together. Babuji, whom the "democratic" Press all of a sudden wants to reduce to a political "untouchable", was sharing his inner thoughts when he said : "After the general elections (1977), I had misgivings about the viability of the Janata Party. I reasoned that people belonging to such disparate groups as had come together to form the Janata Party with only one common objective of overthrowing the Emergency regime would not stay together for very long."

In retrospect, it would not be proper to blame Charan Singh's personal ambitions alone for the split in the Janata. His personal ambitions could predominate those of the Janata Party only when this coverged with three other factors : a big fall in the prices of agricultural produce, articulation of backward castes-upper castes conflicts and a spate of communal riots. For two years, 1977 and 1978, the peasants had been the loser in sharing the national cake as the prices of their produce were falling and the prices of manufactured goods they had to buy, were increasing. In fact, the Janata Party split on the day the farmers had to sell their potato at 10 paise a kilo and burn their standing sugarcane crops. In this situation, if Charan Singh had not split the Janata, he would have been politically finished. Similarly, with the sharpening of caste conflicts and total alienation of Muslims from the Janata, it was only prudent to react to the issues, rather than remain passive.

EVEN the formation of the Janata Party was a strange quirk of history. The disparate groups which formed the Janata Party had been, for decades, pursuing antagonistic social and economic objectives. These were the Jana Sangh which had Hindu rashtra as its ideological cornerstone, the Congress (O) which was formed to give a rightist slant to economic policies, the Swatantra which had been unashamedly pro-capitalist and pro-price rise, the BLD whose sole preoccupation was to promote the interests of peasant proprietors, the Lohia Socialist group which consisted of militant social democrats and the PSP which was an insipid social democratic Party. There were some individuals like Jagjivan Ram, Chandra Shekhar and H. N. Bahuguna, who were broadly left-of-centre politicians ploughing their lonely furrows. They came together primarily because they were prepared to compromise to an extent to capture power. This, however, did not necessarily mean that the social forces they were representing had also got tired and were ready to sacrifice their interests.

When these Parties faced difficulties under the Emergency, JP influenced them and superimposed on them a confused, vague and hypocritical slogan of 'total revolution'. The 1974 and 1975 upsurge against Mrs Gandhi in Bihar and Gujarat in essence was a backlash against feudal and semi-feudal forces resulting from the signals given to tamper with the system. Then, once the dust settled down, it was not difficult for Mrs Gandhi to reclaim Gujarat. If she has not been so successful in Bihar, it is because in the meantime the backward castes have become more articulate. JP, irrespective of the social forces which those agitations strengthened, jumped into the fray to utilise the movement to serve his Utopian objective of 'total revolution.' In 1974, in the course of a discussion, JP admitted that landless Harijans, poor peasants and the working class had not joined his Bihar movement. He also admitted that students who are mostly from the upper castes and landed classes were in the forefront of the movement. In the villages, invariably the largest landholder was the supporter of the JP movement. When questioned on how he could achieve total revolution with such forces behind him, he got annoyed and said : "Let me first capture political power then I will outmanoeuvre them." No wonder, JP died a frustrated man. This is the tragedy and fate of all those who consider themselves to be above social forces.

Look at Babuji. He admitted that all along he had strong reservations against the RSS. But he said : "I had reasoned that if I possessed the necessary leverage to implement the socio-economic programme of the Janata Party, in case it came to power after the elections, I would be in a position to check and contain the unhealthy trend of the people who lacked in commitment towards their programme". No tears need be shed for Babuji for his self-deception, not to speak of the wide benefit of the doubt granted him in assuming that he ever seriously bothered about such things.

Of all the groups which formed the Janata Party, only two, the Lok Dal and the Jana Sangh are sure of their independent strength. Hence they have been continuously working to see that their distinct social support base is not obliterated in the elusive search to form a national party embracing all classes. The Lok Dal resolved its dilemma by walking out of the Janata Party. The Jana Sangh has been postponing the decision, partly in the hope of capturing the whole of the Janata Party and partly because its top leadership, particularly, Atal Behari Vajpayee and L. K. Advani have been paralysed by the conflict between their heart and head. In cooler moments they realise that the RSS ideology has reached a dead end, but because of sentiments or lack of conviction, they cannot break away from the RSS. So we see an interesting situation. Vajpayee writes an article, then goes to Nagpur and apologises. Advani asserts, "I am proud of my RSS association", yet he cannot stop the RSS from working openly against his colleague in the national executive, Mr Krishna Kant, and then at first agreeing that the Jana Sangh leaders will not participate in RSS activities and later going back on it. No wonder in this situation even their best friend in the Janta Party, Chandra Shekhar, has turned against them.

THE position of Jana Sangh elements becomes more anomalous with the RSS continuing to poke its nose in purely political matters. Much has been said about Balasaheb Deoras' tilt towards Mrs Gandhi. Take another sensitive political issue—the agitation in Assam. RSS leaders have been going to Assam and trying to give a communal twist to the agitation. It issued an official statement that Bengali Muslims should be thrown out and not Bengali Hindus. In fact, the RSS stamp is so deeply imprinted on Jana Sangh leaders that in an unguarded moment even a liberal leader like Atal Behari Vajpayee reveals his RSS colours. He virtually said that the Janata failed because it fielded Babuji and the country is not prepared to accept a Harijan as Prime Minister. There are a hundred and one good reasons why the Janata failed. Perhaps the most important was that its secular credentials were not accepted because of the Jana Sangh. Similarly, the personal factor which went against Babuji was not that he was a Harijan but the impression he gave on the eve of the elections that he might defect to Mrs Gandhi's camp. But Vajpayee, with his brahminical bias instilled in him by the RSS ideology, finds fault with Babuji on the ground that he is a Harijan!

A last desperate act

EVER since the results of the mid-term polls spelt doom for the Janata Party, Babu Jagjivan Ram had been thinking of the possibility of forming a new Party. It is true that the ageing leader had never been comfortable in the Janata since the very day he joined the Party. But Babuji's innate inertia to make a move and his obsession to become Prime Minister had always held him back.

After Morarji Desai resigned from Prime Ministership in July, last year, Babuji had made a strong bid to replace him but Charan Singh beat him to the post. When Babuji with the help of Mrs Indira Gandhi managed to force the Chaudhury to resign in August 1979, fate in the guise of President Sanjeeva Reddy thwarted him again.

There was still some hope for the Janata Party to come to power in the mid-term polls. Although there was tremendous pressure from his son, Suresh Kumar, to come to an understanding with Mrs. Gandhi, Babuji after a lot of prevarication which gave jitters to the Janata, finally decided to stay on in the Party. It was only after the Janata rout in the polls, that Babuji's hopes were dashed. There was very little left for him to continue in the Janata. After being paraded as the only able national leader, who could lead the country, Babuji was reduced by the poll results to the favourite 'whipping boy' of various Janata politicians since he had failed to deliver the goods. Frustrated in his quest for power and humiliated every day by his Party colleagues, Babuji got increasingly desperate to leave the Janata. One alternative was to join the Congress (I) and Suresh Kumar met Sanjay Gandhi a number of times to work out some arrangement

After one of Babuji's chief lieutenants, Bhajan Lal, crossed over with his Government in Haryana, there was speculation about a similar move by Babuji. But Jagjivan Ram had no Government to cross over with. Consequently, his bargaining power with Mrs. Gandhi was not much. In fact, Mrs. Gandhi was shrewd enough to realise that Babuji would be of much more use to her as a Trojan Horse inside the Janata than as a member of her Party which already had innumerable contenders for power and position. The example of Bahuguna also weighed heavily on the mind of Babuji and must have vitally influenced his final decision. Even if Babuji himself could accept the post of a figurehead in the Congress, Suresh Kumar was not ready to kill his own political future so soon. The meeting of Babuji's supporters in late February also revealed that not many members of the Lok Sabha and Rajya Sabha would follow him to the Congress (I). Even bitter critics of the RSS like Ram Dhan and Krishna Kant came out against leaving the Janata Party hastily.

But there was no way Babuji could stay on in the Party any longer. His attempts to raise the dual membership issue had failed to draw support from the anti-RSS group itself inside the Party. Most members of the Janata had some reservation or the other about the RSS but nearly all were reluctant to be associated with Babuji as well. The announcement by Babuji disassociating himself from the Janata, therefore, was the move of a desperate man who neither had a support base nor enough moral credibility. For the moment, it is highly unlikely that more than ten MPs would join Babuji's Party. Of these ten, seven are members of the Rajya Sabha of whom four will retire in March, 1980.

Babuji's attempts to draw people from other political Parties have not been particularly successful so far. Although, there are some in the Congress (U) like Rajni Patel, Priyaranjan Das Munshi and Purabi Mukherjee who would like to unite with Babuji, important leaders like Y. B. Chavan and even Congress President Devaraj Urs are extremely reluctant to go along with Jagjivan Ram. There is, of course, no question of any association with the Lok Dal, since according to Babuji, Chaudhury Charan Singh is his worst enemy, even more than the RSS. The Left Front has been cautiously optimistic about the formation of a new Party by Babuji, but apart from the odd electoral adjustment for the Assembly elections, they are not expected to associate too much with it. For the moment, the emergence of Suresh Kumar on the political horizon will be a major aspect of Babuji's Party. According to sources close to Babuji, he will be given an important position in the Party and will look after the organisation.

lation of the contradictions within the opposition. They think that unless there is a Congress-type all-India, all-class Party, Mrs Gandhi's challenge cannot be met. Mrs Gandhi is certainly a big beneficiary of the historical legacy of the nationalist movement. The Congress had retained substantially its multi-class support base for a number of years after Independence. The first signs of a big erosion in this base became visible in 1967. The lost ground was sought to be revived in 1969. However, the 1971, 1977 and 1980 election results have proved that the committed support base of the Congress has considerably shrunk. If it won the elections in 1971 and 1980 it was because of a wave and floating votes. These floating votes can desert the Congress (I) as easily as they came over to it. The Congress of today has been most shabbily put together by Mrs Gandhi and her son. Such an organisation will be swept off its feet in the event of a mild adverse current. Further, a party which is sought to be made a pale version of the Congress will not be durable. Janata's additional handicap is that it is looked upon as being more rightist than the Congress (I). It could not discard its image even by electing Chandra Shekhar as its president. Stability in Indian politics will come only when Parties are formed on the basis of relatively homogeneous social groups. Attempts to keep the support of the poorest and the richest in the country can succeed only temporarily. This is because class formations among the poorer sections have become more distinct and their degree of articulation is increasing. The national cake is too small to be shared equitably between the rich and the poor.

It is, therefore, not accidental that in the last decade only the left movement in pockets of West Bengal and Kerala has proved to be the most durable political force. Unlike other Parties, the left concentrated on relatively homogeneous social forces. The only other Party which has stood its ground, albeit in a limited manner, is the Lok Dal but the tragedy of the Lok Dal is that by reflecting peasant individualism and parochialism, its leaders have become inherently incapable of broadening its support base. This was amply illustrated during Charan Singh's six-month tenure as Prime Minister. The Lok Dal has, perhaps, reached its limits. On its own, it cannot go very far from what it achieved in the last parliamentary election. But the peasantry can be a very useful political "cannon fodder" in an alliance among relatively homogeneous social forces. Unfortunately, Charan Singh and his jat and ahir brigade articulate peasant proprietor-landless Harijan contradictions more than contradictions between the peasantry and the traders and the peasantry and industrial capitalism. This naturally limits the scope of an alliance in which Charan Singh is a major partner.

THE stability in the Party system could come only if a new chapter is opened. Objectively, there is scope for a rightist Party which could articulate the interests of the proprietary classes and of a social democratic Party. Potentialities for a rightist Party should not be ignored. In the last 30 years of economic development, the propertied classes have expanded both in the urban and rural areas. With the abolition of the zamindari system and the green revolution, the institution of peasant proprietorship up to the middle farmer level has consolidated. Even though the propertied classes are still in a minority, they wield considerable political influence because of their economic strength. It is a safe bet that Mrs Gandhi is the most trusted and enlightened representative of the propertied classes. On the other hand, the left of the West Bengal and Kerala variant is showing no sign of rising to the occasion and filling the vacuum at the national level. At the moment one can see an alternative only in terms of personalities. Those who have potentialities are Babuji, Chandra Shekhar and Devaraj Urs. H. N. Bahuguna, who is sulking in the Congress (I), could be a dark horse. Unfortunately, Y. B. Chavan has shown no promise in the last three years. Apart from public stature, what will matter is perception and perseverance. Socialists can play an important role in building a national alternative since socialists have nothing to lose except their second class citizenship status in the Janata and the Lok Dal.

One has to reconcile oneself to the fact that the entire process will take some time to be set into motion. In the short run perhaps more defeats and frustrations are in store. Attempts to secure instant relief by having either a hold-all unity or electoral adjustments will not succeed much. Many commentators prove their point by reeling off voting percentage figures of the last parliamentary elections. But in political arithmetic, two plus two is rarely four, it is either five or three. It is five when there is adjustment or unity of relatively homogeneous social forces, it is three when social forces are antagonistic in the context of articulation of current issues. At the moment there is no Emergency-type issue which will relegate normal social and economic antagonism in society to the background. When caste articulation has been taken to such a pitch, can a Rajput be made to vote for a backward caste Lok Dal candidate? Similarly, will a chammar who voted for the Janata in the last election in the hope of Babuji becoming Prime Minister, vote for the Lok Dal candidate in the coming Assembly elections? The experience of the recent parliamentary by-elections is not very encouraging. Roughly speaking, the position will be like this. If the Lok Dal candidate is of the backward caste then the Janata will be able to transfer only 40 per cent of its votes for him and the balance of 60 per cent may go to the Congress (I). If the Lok Dal candidate is a non-backward caste person then that 40 per cent may increase to 45 or 50 per cent. The Lok Dal, perhaps, may be in a better position than the Janata to transfer the bulk of its votes to a Janata candidate in the event of an electoral alliance. Since the Assembly elections are now round the corner, it may not be feasible to escape some ad hoc response to the compulsions of elections. This ad hocism will, however, lead nowhere. So, sooner rather than later, conscious attempts will have to be made to open a new political chapter in India without which a degree of durability cannot be imparted to the Party system.

Countdown to the split

By AJOY BOSE

A FEW weeks after the mid-term poll results were announced, at a Janata Party high command meeting discussing the election rout of the party, the ever ebullient and sometimes profound Piloo Mody made a sudden intervention. "Can anybody here tell me why the Janata Party won in 1977"? he asked. There was an embarrassed silence. "See! There is no answer," continued the Janata member, "we do not know why we won in 1977. And we don't know why we lost in 1980. What's the point in a post-mortem?"

For the Janata Party, history has been indeed repeating itself according to the classical Marxian dictum, the first time as tragedy and the second time as farce. When Chaudhury Charan Singh, Raj Narain, Madhu Limaye and George Fernandes left the Party last July, many Janata politicians including some senior leaders claimed that after the 'defectors' left, the Party would be far more cohesive. In fact, most scribes had painted the Chaudhury as the villain of the piece and reduced the whole Party split to the political ambitions of Charan Singh and other 'defectors'. The bitter in-fighting among the various political groups in the Janata Party which continues till today, has completely demolished this myth.

The portents of an impending crisis in the Janata Party were clear even in January just a few weeks after Mrs. Gandhi was back in the chair, RSS chief Balasaheb Deoras made an impassioned plea to her expressing his and his organisation's full support to her "even if she did not want it." At the same time, there was growing criticism amidst the Janata ranks of the two erstwhile pillars of the Party—the RSS and the charisma of Babu Jagjivan Ram.

The Janata Party had gone into the mid-term polls with Babuji as the head and the RSS as the tail. Jagjivan Ram was expected to provide the charisma and the RSS its muscle and organisation. Unfortunately for the Janata Party, the head repelled instead of attracting while the tail, if it wagged at all, did so for Mrs. Gandhi.

The consequent rout of the Janata Party in the polls therefore also resulted in a major loss of face for both Babuji as well as the RSS. Balasaheb's public support to Mrs. Gandhi and increasing reports of Babuji acting as her Trojan Horse in the Party, further vitiated the atmosphere in the Janata. Ironically, the two groups in the Party most bitterly opposed to each other were Babuji and the Jana Sangh constituent. While leaders like Atal Behari Vajpayee, Nanaji Deshmukh and Sundar Singh Bhandari increasingly blamed the failure of the Janata Party on Babuji and privately abused him as "unreliable and Mrs. Gandhi's stooge", Jagjivan Ram and his friends did not spare the RSS in both private and public discussions.

Even the arbitrary dissolution of the nine State Assemblies by Mrs. Gandhi failed to contain the growing rift between the different constituents of the Janata Party. On the very day after the dissolution, Babuji indicated the extent of his alienation from the Janata Party. In a surprise statement in Kanpur, Babuji announced that he was calling a meeting of his supporters on February 23 to decide whether he should stay in the Party. He also announced that the Janata Party will not enter into electoral pacts with any of the Opposition Parties. Furious at this public statement by Babuji, other constituents of the Janata Party reacted strongly. Surendra Mohan refuted Babuji's statement on electoral adjustments with opposition parties the next day saying that this was not the official Party line.

On February 20 Chandra Shekhar went even further to hint that he would not mind Babuji leaving the Party. He said that he could not understand the propriety behind Babuji's calling a separate meeting of his supporters. Atal Behari Vajpayee was even more categorical. "Those who want to leave the Party need not invent excuses for it," he said, reacting to Babuji's letter to his supporters which accused the RSS of working for Mrs. Gandhi. On February 23 and 24 over 200 supporters of Babuji met and bitterly criticised the RSS and most speakers were unanimous that it was not possible for Babuji to continue in the Janata Party. The few who tried to advise a less hasty course were shouted down. Among them were Ram Dhan and Krishan Kant, both bitter critics of the RSS but who still maintained that Babuji should not leave the party. "Mrs. Gandhi is the biggest authoritarian," said Ram Dhan but this was greeted with boos and jeers from most of the audience among whom were interestingly some who had already joined the Congress(I). Meanwhile, six Janata leaders including Ashok Mehta, H. M. Patel, N. G. Goray, Ravindra Verma, S. M. Joshi and Gauri Shankar Rai—all belonging to the Congress (O) and Socialist constituent, urged Chandra Shekhar to take action against Babuji. An emergency Janata Parliamentary Party meeting was called on February 25 to take a decision on Babuji's activities.

Just as it seemed sure that Babuji would either be thrown out of the Party or leave it himself, he did a sudden volte face. In a surprise move which left Party politicians and newspaper scribes completely bewildered, Babuji attended the Parliamentary Board meeting on February 25, and expressed his regrets for criticising Janata leaders like Chandra Shekhar and Vajpayee. The unconditional apology took the wind out of the sails of Babuji's critics and the Board meeting ended on an amicable note. The same night, however, Babuji did yet another somersault. In a letter to Chandra Shekhar, he raised the question of dual membership again and asked the Party president to settle the issue immediately. Jagjivan Ram said that he and his supporters would not compromise on the 'RSS connection' of some of the Janata leaders, particularly since the RSS had worked for Mrs Gandhi in the polls and even after the rout of the Janata, extended public support to her.

The crisis in the Party started all over again. Next morning, L. K. Advani wrote a strong letter to Chandra Shekhar expressing his and the Jana Sangh constituent's anger and regret about charges of "dual loyalty" raised by Babuji. In protest the Jana Sangh members boycotted the National Executive and the Parliamentary Board meeting. Instead the Jana Sangh members held an emergency meeting at Advani's house where softliners like Advani and Vajpayee were hauled up by Jana Sangh workers and leaders for compromising on the RSS issue. At one point in the meeting, most of the members wanted Advani to declare immediately that they would quit the Janata and form a separate Party. Among those who favoured leaving the Janata were Sundar Singh Bhandari, Kushabhao Thakre and S. P. Mathur. Nanaji Deshmukh, although otherwise a RSS hardliner was trying to follow a middle path. For perhaps the first time in its history, the Jana Sangh rank and file publicly expressed its anger with some major leaders. Men like Vajpayee, Advani, and Bhairon Singh Shekhawat were abused openly as "impotent political stooges" who have been selling the Party and the RSS for paltry Ministerial privileges. The workers reminded these leaders that whatever political status they enjoyed it was because of their connection with the RSS. The leaders were told categorically that unless they were able to stop the "canard against the RSS" by Janata leaders, they would either have to quit the Janata or the RSS as well as most of the Jana Sangh workers would disown them.

Meanwhile at the Parliamentary Board meeting, the militant mood of the Jana Sangh constituent had scared most of the other constituents of the Janata Party temporarily. A sudden departure by the Jana Sangh group could well mean the disintegration of the Party. While many of them were secretly of exactly the same opinion as Babuji, they were eager to bring about a compromise formula to save the Party. Most of them were furious with Babuji for antagonising the Jana Sangh constituent, and Chandra Shekhar himself was of the opinion that Babuji had become a first rate liability to the Party. The Parliamentary Board refused to pass Babuji's demand for the Jana Sangh to completely dissociate with the RSS. Instead they took a softer line and wanted a solution to be worked out on the basis of the July 1979 formula which called for office-bearers of the Janata Party and Members of Parliament and State Legislatures, not to take part in the day-to-day activities of the RSS. Hoping that it would placate the Jana Sangh constituent, Chandra Shekhar sent a strongly worded letter to Babuji the same night, criticising him for shifting his earlier stand and for his "unbecoming behaviour as a responsible member of the party". The next day Babuji resigned from the leadership of the Janata Parliamentary Party in protest and from all indications, it seemed that it was only a matter of time that he would either be thrown out of the Party or leave it himself.

Babuji's departure has already signalled the start of the disintegration of the Party. Seven members of the Rajya Sabha including Dinesh Singh, Ganpat Bhagat, Subedar Prabhu Singh, Shivendra Singh, Nathu Singh and N. P. Naidu are expected to leave with him. Two members of the Lok Sabha, Satadev Singh and Nihal Singh are also likely to follow Babuji. There is also a strong feeling that the Bihar strongman and Lok Sabha Member Satyendra Narain Singh along with his two family member MP's might leave the Janata. Satyen Babu is particularly upset about the way RSS workers behaved in his constituency during the mid-term polls. He has already written a letter to Chandra Shekhar complaining about how the RSS worked against him and has even submitted a list of workers who tried to defeat him. If Satyendra Narain Singh leaves the Janata, the Party would hardly be left with any base to fight the coming Assembly elections in Bihar.

The rest of the Party is also singularly unhappy. The Socialists are a divided lot. On one hand is Surendra Mohan who is not all happy at the prospect of remaining in a Party dominated by the Jana Sangh constituent. He is very keen on Chandra Shekhar working out an arrangement to revive the old Janata but this time without the Jana Sangh. Madhu Dandavate is against such an arrangement, however, and is keen that the Janata Party remains in its own. Dandavate has hopes that his name might be proposed to either replace Babuji as the leader of the Parliamentary Party or as the president of the Janata. Dandavate feels that the Janata cannot do without the Jana Sangh constituent for the present and is willing to co-exist with it. The Socialists are further confused by the efforts of Raj Narain and Madhu Limaye to reconvene Socialists of all Parties together and work out the parameters of a new Party or united democratic front. Surendra Mohan is reportedly very keen on this idea. The Congress (O) constituent is not quite sure what to make of Morarji's new bid for leadership in the Party and a political comeback. Mr Desai has completely forgotten his pledge last year to retire from active politics and has been making frantic visits to almost every Janata leader's house to further his position of becoming the leader of the Janata Parliamentary Party. While Morarji is himself not a member of Parliament, he is quick to point out the example of Mrs Gandhi who was leader of the Congress Parliamentary Party without being an MP. Morarji reportedly met the Rajmata of Gwalior also and asked her to plead his case to the Jana Sangh constituent for its support. And presiding over this huge mess that is the Janata Party today, is a sad, confused and embittered Chandra Shekhar. For the moment he is playing for time. He admits that the 'dual membership' issue cannot be put into cold storage. He also knows that most of the present-day Janata politicians have become completely redundant. What he hopes is for a national Party with a popular base and progressive ideology. What he has, however, is a disintegrating Party which could be wiped out completely after the Assembly elections.

'The RSS has a secret alliance with the Congress (I)'

Q: Would you tell us about the new Party you propose to form?

A: The idea is to have a strong opposition Party, which will be secular, which will be free from casteist and communal influences and will be working for the establishment of a socialist society. The talk at present is authoritarianism. Any opposition Party which is democratic cannot tolerate any concentration of power in the hands of either an individual or a group of individuals. That is a negation of democracy. All my life, I have stood and worked for democracy. Any infringement of democratic norms with have to be resisted and I will always be ready to resist any such tendency. Any Party I am associated with will stand for democracy and will resist all efforts to concentrate power, either political or economic, in the hands of individuals, groups or classes. It will fight authoritarianism relentlessly.

Q: In your statement of March 7 announcing your decision to split the Janata Party, you had said, and I quote: "It seems as if they (RSS) had a secret alliance with the Congress (I). Do you have any concrete instance to substantiate this?

A: Yes, it is not just inference. As a matter of fact, this was based on a statement that was made by the ex-Chief Minister of Gujarat who issued it (the statement) immediately after Mr Balasaheb Deores' statement. I have been drawing upon the statement of the ex-Chief Minister of Gujarat who has been very close to the Jana Sangh (and is so) even at present. In his subsequent statement he has declared that he would continue with his combination with the Jana Sangh in Gujarat. Besides there are many evidences to this effect right from the days since Mr Balraj Madhok came out from the Jana Sangh.

Q: But the Jana Sangh people say that Mr Deoras was not correctly reported...

A: But Mr Deoras himself has not contradicted it. The whole thing is, when such a thing appears in newspapers, it is taken as correct until it is contradicted. Until now that statement or interview has not been contradicted by Mr Balasaheb Deoras.

Q: But there had been persisent reports also about your alleged talks with Congress (I) leaders prior to the last Lok Sabha elections.

A: There are certain persons who are always interested, and some newspapers also in spreading canards. I don't know whether they have been chartered by some Parties or agencies to malign me. Just the day I had held a Press conference, the next day comes the Hindustan Times (with some allegations or speculations). I think some of the newspapers have been entrusted with the work of maligning me on this score. Such allegations had been made for the past few months but I continue where I was. In view of that experience... for people to go on repeating the falsehood...Everyday it was coming... Everytning was falsified. Still they persisted...

I think some newspapers have been entrusted with the task of maligning me.

Q: You also say in your March 7 statement that the "nation is today confronted with an array of grave dangers..." It is nearly two months since the new Government has come into power. Do you feel this Government will be able to meet these dangers you spoke about?

A: The problems are very grave and great and the problems are difficult for any Government. I will not judge the competence or success or failure of this Government on the basis of functioning of the last two months. I will give them more time. But the style of functioning on authoritarian lines is evident.

Q: You have also said in your statement that there is a "total lack of clear formulation of ideological or programmatic policies of the Government". Would you elaborate?

A: Up till now nothing has come. If it comes then I can elaborate. We are faced with a grave economic crisis. Up till now no formulation has come from the Government as to how they are going to surmount these difficulties and when it (the formulation) comes, it should cover both the ideological and the programmatic...But nothing has come.

Q: Your statement also talks of the nation's moral and economic strength having already been dangerously depleted through total unconcern and incompetence of the preceding Government. In this connection, could you elaborate what should be our attitude, approach and policy towards our neighbouring countries in general and in regard to the Afghan question in particular, with reference to the role of the super powers?

A: I have always held that success or failure of the foreign policy of any Government would depend upon what relations it has with its immediate neighbours. There is no use of having friendly relations with remote countries without striving hard to have good relations with our immediate neighbours. I have always held, and I stick to it, that we must strive hard to have good relations with our immediate neighbours. Fortunately, we are a much larger country both in size and in population and naturally the responsibility of a larger country is greater insofar as friendly relations are concerned. Because some concessions by a bigger Party are regarded as a generous gesture whereas any concession by a smaller country is regarded as surrender. We must have good relations with those countries. The Afghan question has brought big powers on the border of India and escalation would be of great consequence to our country. I therefore demand that the presence of all foreign powers—direct or indirect — in Afghanistan should be immediately withdrawn as a first step. I have said nothing new. We have repeated it at international forums.

Q: There has been talk of an alliance between various Parties for the coming nine Assembly elections. You have said you would have nothing to do with casteist Parties. What about others?

A: Newspapers bring all sorts of reports about adjustments of seats between various Parties. Nothing concrete, it appears, has been achieved up till now in this direction. It would be a good thing if multiplicity of candidates of political Parties is avoided. Of course, in this country you cannot rule out the possibility of a large number of Independents. It would be a good thing if political parties can evolve something to avoid this division of votes and several contestants and Parties.

Q: In view of your coming out from the Janata Party on the communal issue, do you visualise the possibility of all former Congressmen from other Parties coming together to form a solid block of ex-Congressmen?

A: Well, there is, I think... I would put it, not immediately, but in the course of time. Not immediately.

Q: Do you think it would have been better if you had come out of the Janata Party immediately after the mid-term election results were known without so much of mudslinging we witnessed during the last two and a half months?

A: Well, it would have been better. But I did not want at that time to take any step merely on gossips and rumours unless I was myself convinced that a part of the rumour was correct.

Q: You have said that you did not leave the Janata Party in the midst of the elections because that would have been unethical. The question being asked is whether it was ethical for you to have left the Congress in 1977 in the midst of the elections?

I do not think Suresh Kumar will have a big say in the new Party.

A: 1977 was not a comparable year on any account and in 1977 when I left, nobody was sure that the Janata Party was going to win ...It was a grave risk that I had taken but there are all sorts of people today who can be made to write all sorts of things. I have seen one of the columnists writing that in 1977 I made calculations before I left...

Q: What do you think of the credibility of Indian politicians in general?

A: Well, the last two years has been a period of uncertainty, equivocation and generally of non-performance in several fields and if people are angry, that is quite justifiable.

Q: Do you think Suresh Kumar will have a big say in the new Party you propose to form?

A: I don't think so. The thing that Suresh has been doing, in the case of others might have brought him praise. He was offered a ministership in Bihar in Mr Gafoor's Cabinet. And even without consulting me he declined to accept it at a point when the invitation was given to him for the swearing-in ceremony. When the parliamentary board decided in 1977 to give him a ticket for Rajya Sabha, he declined at that time. This year, many people wanted him to contest a seat for the Lok Sabha but he declined. All these things should have brought praise in the case of sons of others. But because he happens to be my friend—my son—and there are interested parties to malign me, he also is maligned without any justification. His credentials are these. In the 1977 elections, Suresh Kumar worked very hard for the success of the Janata Party, and without any reward. Then somebody complained that he was against my joining the Ministry. If he was against his father joining the Morarji Ministry, it should go to his credit, not to his discredit. All these things. How many sons are there to persuade their fathers not to join a Ministry?

Q: I have been seeing you Babuji for so many years right from my cub reporter days. Are you confident of leading a new Party?

A: Today this country stands in need of a political Party which, as I have said earlier, stands for democracy and will not permit any infringement of the democratic norms. The Party should be secular, secular not in the accepted sense that it should not be communal. In the complicated social structure of this country, casteism is a factor which should be reckoned with. Such a party should be free from caste as well as communal bias. Ours is a poor country. Socialism can only ensure to the vast masses, labouring classes, a status in society and adequate reward for their labour. We have to restore the dignity of labour which was there at one time in our own country. Labour was not only respected but even worshipped.

"Dual membership can't be put in cold storage"

The Janata Party president CHANDRA SHEKHAR told AJOY BOSE

Q: How do you see the developments in the Janata Party in the past few weeks?

A: Quite disturbing. I did not expect that these developments would take place after such a crushing defeat. It is human nature that at a time of calamity or (in a) adverse position people try to cling together and face the challenges unitedly. But there are certain people within the Party who cannot resolve their differences. This can only be explained as an excuse for some people to get away from the Party—that is the only explanation I have. I don't understand the logic behind their attitudes. The only logic is that they want some pretext to leave the Party.

Q: There is a feeling that you are the only link holding a disintegrating Party together. How long do you think you can do so?

A: I don't think this would be a correct analysis. The fact is that it is not a disintegrating Party. This Party was never united or cohesive in the past. Many elements came together after the Emergency and luckily they got power—I think (that) was the uniting factor. Now that there is no power, in the face of defeat, all of them are feeling frustrated. Well not all of them, but many of them are feeling frustrated. They are fighting against each other. But I am not the only link, there are many workers who are determined to continue their fight against authoritarianism and they are the real source of strength of the Janata Party. Individuals are important, but they are not as important as you presume them to be.

Q: You mean that if certain individuals leave the Party, it will help the Party to be cohesive?

A: I can't tell you about the individuals, but people who don't (have) their hearts (in) running the Party, who do not have the patience and endurance to face the difficult days, leave the Party. That really does not add to the problems of the Party but in many ways solves the problems of the Party. If you are facing a difficult period, there is no point in frittering away your energy in fighting against each other.

Q: If Babuji leaves the Party, would it help in making a more cohesive Janata Party?

A : I can't say. Just by Babuji leaving the Party, you can't make the Janata Party more cohesive. For this you have to go through a period of struggle. You have to go a long way to make the Party cohesive. Only Jagjivan Ram going out will not solve the situation. There are other factions which (can) make problems in the Party. I don't think some individuals going out or some individuals coming in will make the Party more united.

Q: Has the dual membership issue been put in the cold storage for the moment?

A: It can't be put into cold storage. It has become a live issue. Both sides have taken rigid attitudes. There are people who have real apprehensions about the functioning of the RSS. This is nothing new. They have had these apprehensions in the past. In the begining, I tried to strike a compromise on that issue and if you remember in July, 1979 when the split was there, I met Balasaheb Deoras. I was coming from Madras and he was kind enough to come to Nagpur airport and we had a brief talk for 20 minutes. I tried to persuade him that this has created an apprehension in the minds of certain people and why doesn't he himself say that those who are Members of the Legislature or Parliament or office-bearers of the Janata Party will not take part in the activities of the RSS. He agreed to that formulation and he said at that time that if I made such an announcement he would not have any objection because the power was there and everybody was trying to find some solution to the problem.

Now the same solution was suggested at the recent national executive, and unfortunately, our Jana Sangh friends, I mean former Jana Sangh friends, took a very rigid posture. Later they made some gesture that they were ready to think over it but it was as if it was a great concession they were bestowing upon some friends in order to save the Party. But at this moment if they go on saying that their first loyalty is to the RSS and only their political loyalty is to the Janata Party, it becomes very difficult to know where is the line between political loyalty and their loyalty to the RSS. That is the apprehension in the minds of certain people. So unless and until there is some desire on both sides to strike a compromise, I think it will go on agitating the minds of the people and will go on creating trouble for the Party. I don't think that the dual membership can be put in the cold storage. A decision will have to be taken this way or that.

Tarun Chakrabarty

Q: I believe that there have been a number of complaints by Janata Party members that the RSS worked against the Party. Why did these people expect the RSS to work for them in the first place?

A: They should not have. That was wrong on their part. This is what I told them. If you want the RSS to be delinked from the Party, why should they also want the RSS to work for them? That was a ridiculous position. I don't understand the mind of these people. That is why I say even these people are not quite serious about their stand on the RSS. But I am ready to give concessions to these people for such frivolous attitudes to this issue. I think that this problem will remain because you know, the RSS is no ordinary organisation. It is very highly organised institution and they have a day-to-day function everywhere. Whether they have an impact on the society, right or wrong, whether the apprehensions are genuine or not, I shall not go into that. So it is bound to agitate the minds of people at every crucial moment. This thing should be cleared up — that is what I feel.

Q: Why do you think the fromer Jana Sangh leaders are not ready to snap their links with the RSS?

A: The whole thing is that there is a feeling among people that the RSS is an organisation of a band of workers. Everybody wants to utilise their services for political advantage. Whether they belong to the erstwhile Jana Sangh or they don't, everybody wants to cash in on the organised capacity of the RSS. But when the question comes of the apprehension in the minds of the minorities that has been created because of the long history of the RSS, they have not been able to swallow that. That is the whole problem. They want to take the advantage but they are not ready to take the odium of what the RSS has been known in the country for such a long time.

Did JP clear the RSS ?

By BHOLA CHATTERJI

IF the Jana Sangh faithful is a "fascist, then I too am a fascist": who could have possibly said that way back in early 1975? Particularly, when the Jana Sangh was wont to make a fetish of its anti-secular-obscurantist-authoritarian political ideology? Who else but a morbidly communalist Hindu, you would probably say in retort. Well, you have guessed wrong. It was none other than Jayaprakash Narayan who made that statement. This, according to the March 6, 1975 issue of the Motheriana, the Jana Sangh mouthpiece, was what JP said while addressing the 20th annual conference of the Jana Sangh held in New Delhi.

To get the point one has only to refer to the not so distant past. In his presidential address to the Second National Convention Against Communalism on December 28-29, 1968 JP said: "India being a country of many religions, almost every religious community has its own brand of communalism. They are all pernicious, but Hindu communalism is more pernicious than the others...Hindu communalism can easily masquerade as Indian nationalism and denounce all opposition to it as being anti-national...Some like the Rastriya Swayamsevak Sangh might do it openly by identifying the Indian nation with Hindu Rashtra...When the Sangh (RSS) was under a shadow after Gandhiji's murder there were many protestations about its being entirely a cultural organisation. But apparently emboldened by the timidity of the secular forces it has thrown its veil away and has emerged as the real power behind, and controller of the Bharatiya Jana Sangh. The secular protestations of the Jana Sangh will never be taken seriously unless it cuts the bonds which tie it so firmly to the RSS machine. Nor can the RSS be treated as a cultural organization so long as it remains the mentor and effective manipulator of a political party."

He did not let the matter rest here. Referring to the "RSS itself", JP observed that "if it has the good of India at heart it should convert itself from a narrowminded Hindu organization to a broadbased Indian organization and admit into its ranks the young from all communities and train them...to be disciplined, loyal and united citizens of India. They (RSS) would earn the gratitude of India if they did that, but if they persist in their present politics and happen to make headway they will most certainly kill the soul of Hindu Dharma and sap the foundations of the nation." Needless to say, JP was not oblivious to the mischief potential of other facets of the problem of communalism. In the course of the same speech he said: "I have time only for one more religious communalism, that of Muslim communalism. Certain facts of Indian history and misinterpretations of Islam, coupled with reaction to Hindu communalism, have produced a type of Muslim communalism that is becoming a danger both to the Muslims themselves and to the country. There is one body that I would like to identify particularly as a source of such danger—I mean the Jamaat-e-Islami." At the same time, JP wanted it to be clearly understood that minority communalism was not only a response to Hindu communalism but also would grow in volume "if Hindu Rashtra and not Bharatiya Rashtra becomes the goal of the predominant Hindu community".

Between then and 1975 the country had changed and, with it JP's diagnosis of the malady. As he put it in Prison Diary, "The country is heading for a downfall, not only moral but also the economic, social and cultural degradation of at least 40 per cent of the Indian people who live below the poverty line. One is reminded here of a statement of Benu who, while defining democracy, had said that it did not only mean a government established by the people's vote; it also meant that the people had the power to oust their rulers when found unworthy to rule. Democracy has almost ceased to exist in India today. The pyramid of the political structure still stands on its apex. The same is true of the educational and almost all other spheres of public activity. It is a tragic story that beggars description."

JP was almost persuaded that the alchemy of struggle would bring about a qualitative change in the ideas and attitudes of the political Parties. Anticipating the question whether the participation of opposition political Parties in his movement was "an unmixed evil." JP said: "My unhesitating answer is No. Its first result...is that it lends strength to the movement. But the more important thing is that the parties undergo a sea-change in the process. True, this would not happen in a State where there is no strong non-party leadership in the movement. But in Bihar it has happened. All the parties involved are committed to the aims of total revolution and to the dynamics of change: struggle." Even as he said this he had grave doubts about the wisdom of taking to the course that he did. He could well realise that this involved the complex issue of ends and means, that the ideal he had set himself was hardly compatible with the tool he was obliged to use. That in a way explains why he said that "the ideal never gets translated into practice without suffering deterioration". Taking one thing with another, one cannot avoid drawing the conclusion that the compulsion of events left JP with no alternative to putting a premium on expediency. Circumstances alter cases and JP, who had all along insisted on sticking to the straight path of principled politics and whose major preoccupation had been the question of ends and means, seemed to have veered round to the point that a lesser evil could be employed to get to grips with a greater evil: "the Congress monopoly of power at the Centre".

But it did not take long for him to realise that he was mistaken in his reckoning. Immediately after the March 1977 parliamentary election it became quite clear that the period of sweet reasonableness was over. The succession of events confirmed that the RSS had not changed a whit, that it was determined to throw a spanner into the works. Much sooner than most others had expected, JP woke up to the fact that his concept of total revolution would be reduced to a mockery if the Janata Party continued to associate itself with any variety of communalism.

Soon after his return from the US, where he had gone for medical treatment, JP stated in unadorned language that the RSS was a malignant growth in the body politic of the country. In an interview to Samayika Varta, a weekly, on September 13, 1977 JP said that the RSS had no justification to continue its separate existence "in the changed circumstances". Speaking in the same vein he observed: "In the course of my contact with RSS leaders as well as cadres, I have noticed a change in their outlook. They no longer have a feeling of animosity toward other communities. But in their heart of hearts they still believe in the concept of Hindu rashtra."

That said, he advised the RSS to "disband itself and merge with the youth and cultural organizations of the Janata Party". If that was not possible the RSS should at least "open its doors to members of all communities, including Muslims and Christians, and make it possible for members of all castes and communities, including Harijans, Muslims and Christians, to hold the highest office in the organization". He also suggested that the RSS front organisations should join the Janata Party's front organisations. "If this is not done," JP warned, "there will be great potential for discord and conflict in future". And he reminded the RSS people that he had hopes that "they will give up the concept of Hindu rashtra and adopt in its place that of Indian nationhood, which is a secular concept and embraces all communities living in India". His hopes, however, withered away much before he went the way of all flesh. ■

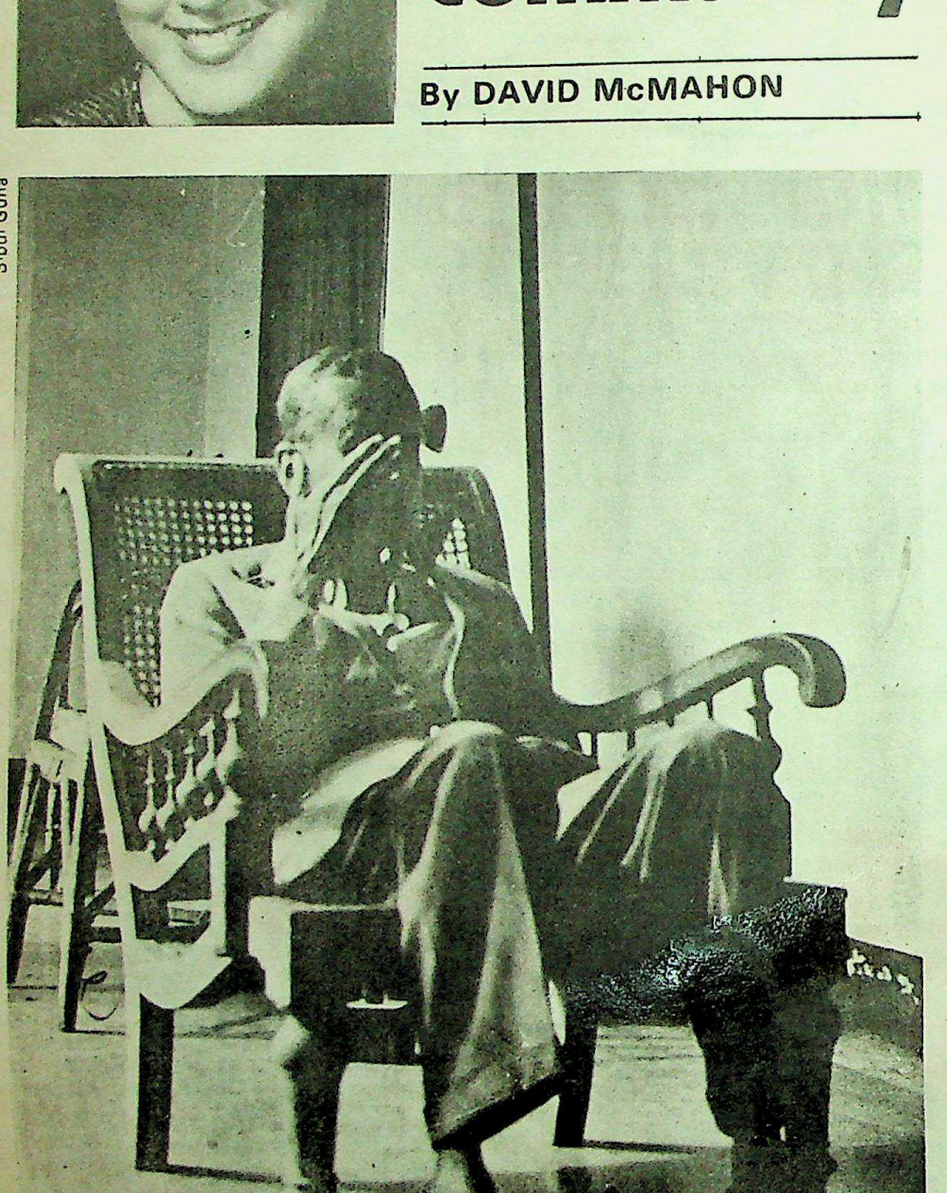
ANGLO-INDIANS

The forgotten community

By DAVID McMAHON



Sroul Guha

A COUPLE of centuries ago, according to legend, one of my ancestors who was then an Irish citizen, decided that the Emerald Isle was not good enough for him. So he sold his property lock, stock and barrel and used the profits to pay for his passage out to India which was for him a wonderful land of polo, sahibs, sundowners and Hindoos. Although there is a parallel line of thought which suggests that he was evicted from Ireland because he was a sheep thief, no one has ever been able to prove this intriguing theory. He liked India, stayed on and raised a family which later intermarried. Thus his descendants—my ancestors — became known as Anglo-Indians, or people of European descent in the male line whose parents were habitual residents of India.

It is not difficult to discover why Europeans, or, more specifically, Britishers, of that time were so prone to intermarriage. In the early days of the East India Company there were very few Englishwomen here in India and so even in a large settlement like Madras, tedium was the order of the day and the only thing to look forward to was the weekly Sunday dinner. A writer in the Calcutta Review of 1845 describes these men as "desperate adventurers... who sought the golden shores of the East to repair their broken fortunes. They cheated, they gambled, they drank, they revelled in all kinds of debauchery". Burke however, thought differently. "There is nothing worse in the boys we send to India, than in the boys we are whipping at school, or whom we see trailing over a pike, or bending over a desk at home," he affirmed.

However he may have been, he was denied the company of women of his own race since the regulations of the East India Company forbade Englishwomen sharing the risks and privations of their men. They therefore wasted no time in moaning about their fortunes and accordingly chose their partners from the women of the land. Such marriages were considered respectable and they continued. although with decreasing frequency, until the Renewal of the Company's Charter in 1833, when the existing regulations about residence in India except by servants of the Company were withdrawn. The opening of the overland route via the Suez Canal made the trip out to India infinitely less tedious, with the anticipated result that there was a great influx of Englishmen and women into this country. At around this time two novel terms came into being: One was the "fishing fleet" and the other was "return empties". The former referred to the droves of women who left England and came to India with the sole intention of hooking husbands, while the latter, predictably, referred to those unlucky maidens who failed in their endeavours and had to return to their homeland. One charge that has been frequently —and often maliciously—levelled against the Anglo-Indian community is that it retains the characteristics, manners and lifestyle of the British. The reason for this is fairly simple. The British husband found it easier, call it laziness if you like, to teach his Indian wife the English language than to pick up her vernacular. Thus the English language, customs and practices became the dominant strain in such families and they have retained this character even today. It is difficult to find a member of the community who can speak a national language with any degree of proficiency. There are some notable exceptions, of course, but they are few.

There are still others who speak of England as being "home", regardless of whether they have ever set foot on English soil or not. My closest friend in school had been born and bred in Calcutta but he never really thought of the city as being home. To him, it was a surrogate hometown and I always suspected that he secretly dreamt of London, although he had only been there once, as a child, and probably could remember nothing about the city. During the 1971 Indian tour of England and the historic victory of the tourists under Ajit Wadekar we used to follow the series very closely. During the day we used to scan the school notice boards for the latest scores and at night we used to slink into a friendly prefect's room to follow the Tests on his radio. The fall of an English wicket would send us into soundless jigs for joy (soundless because we risked having our pocket money docked if we were caught) but he would sit alone in agony. After India had clinched the series, a number of us pulled his leg about whether he wanted to revert to Indian citizenship.

Scratch most members of the Anglo-Indian community and you find a person whose first love is sport. The noted sports commentator, A. F. S. Talyarkhan, writing in the Times of India in 1968 said "India's hockey grew thanks to the greatest hockey-playing entity the world will ever know : the Anglo-Indian community of the country". This is more than true. In 1926 an Indian Army hockey team which was about to depart to New Zealand played a practice match against an impromptu Anglo-Indian team from the North-western Railway. The carefully selected Army team was well and truly trounced. Two years later, at the Olympics, the Indian hockey team swept aside all opposition, scoring 23 goals against their opponents without conceding even one. Of the 11 playing members, eight were Anglo-Indians, while the manager and two of the three reserves also belonged to the community. It would not be out of place to add that this Olympic team had been beaten by a scratch Anglo-Indian team from Bombay. Leslie Claudius, who represented India at four successive Olympic Games, was described as one of the greatest half-backs the world has ever seen. His son Robert, affectionately known as "Bobby" had just returned to Calcutta after participating in the World Cup hockey tournament at Buenos Aires when he was tragically killed in a scooter accident.

IT is interesting that today no one pokes more fun at the Anglo-Indian community than the Anglo-Indians themselves. And we have one man in particular to thank for this ability to laugh at our own faults. This man is no longer in Calcutta, but in the long years he spent here, Ken Stewart was a hallmark in the city. A marriage was never the same if Ken was not around; we tried to postpone our christenings if the proposed date did not suit him; no club function was ever a success if he was not the Master of Ceremonies.

It wasn't that Ken thought there was anything wrong with Anglo-Indians—he was a staunch one him self ("A thick one" he described himself, using a favourite phrase of the community). But it was he who taught us that there is no essential difference between the various strata within the community. Ken was no preacher but his message was always the same—"Smile, things are never quite as bad as they seem". His jokes are still told at parties by people who try and pass them off as their own but the one I like best was related to me by Mr. Neil O'Brien, the Anglo-Indian MLA from West Bengal and the butt of the joke in this case. He had given Ken a lift home one evening and the latter did not miss the opportunity to quip "How many people can claim to have an MLA for a driver ?" Ken was a wonderful mimic and always had his audiences in splits of laughter with his acts though, according to a general consensus, his imitation of a tailor (the inevitable "durzee" to every Anglo-Indian family) was the one that cornered the most laughs. It was the same act over and over again but it never failed to delight his fans. He would appear dressed for all the world like a harassed tailor, with a long shirt over a checked lungi, a measuring tape draped untidily around his neck and the usual bundle of clothes over his shoulder. Then he would launch off into a long tirade against those imaginary customers who gave him the most trouble. It is ample proof of the rapport between Ken and the rest of the community that his victims always laughed loudest at the jokes.

It was not long before Ken's brand of humour brushed off on the rest of the community. Soon everyone began cracking jokes about Nizam's and their famous "kathi" rolls which have somehow become synonymous with the Anglo-Indian community. The "kathi" shop became the focal point for a "gup" or the Anglo-Indian equivalent of a chat. The latest "khabbar" was who had "labjao-ed" (hacked, as in kite-flying) whose girlfriend, or who had been putting on a lot of "kunni" (another allusion to kite-flying, meaning putting on airs and graces). It was a sad day for the community when Ken announced that he was leaving the country for good and the resultant "Ken Stewart Farewell Show" was sold out well in advance. No hall could possibly have accommodated the number of people who wanted to say goodbye to Ken and so the organisers decided on an outdoor musical festival at La Martiniere School. It was a stifling hot summer evening but every chair was occupied an hour before the concert began and thousands who could not find their places stood for seven hours, from five in the evening till midnight, till the last notes of the music had died away. One of the most touching moments came when Ken was overcome by emotion during his farewell speech and could only blink the tears from his eyes while thousands of his friends chered him as they had never cheered before. Usha Uthup, the famous singer who has always held a special place in Calcutta's heart, hugged Ken and burst into song, but after a few bars her voice broke and then it was only the band that played on in the growing darkness.

CHRISTMAS for the community is without a doubt the greatest time of the year. It is a time for new clothes, for family reunions, for listening to Christmas carols on cold nights. It is a time for joyous celebration, for gathering around Christmas trees in living rooms, decorated with tinsel and imitation snow. It is a time to go out carol singing in groups and to hear the haunting notes of carols like "Silent Night"; it is the season for milk punch and homemade wine, for grandmother's cakes and plum pudding, for kulkuls (one wonders at the origins of such a name) and rose cookies. For the ladies it is an opportunity to try and lift a good recipe from a neighbour. Each family has its own recipe, handed down from generation to generation, for the traditional Christmas cakes. Often these recipes are closely guarded secrets and so it is very rare to find two cakes in different households that taste the same

The Anglo-Indian is gregarious by his very nature; it is in his blood. He places great stress on the practice of visiting friends and relatives, while clubs too form an integral part of his lifestyle. The club to him represents a home away from home; there are three typically Anglo-Indian clubs in Calcutta alone and each one perhaps is a legend in its own right. The first is the Grail Club on Park Street, which still has a very high percentage of Anglo-Indian members. The second is the Rangers Club, founded in 1896, which gained fame through sport, its dances and its well run Sweep which enabled the club to donate lavishly to various charities.

The most famous of the three is the Dalhousie Institute, affectionately referred to as the DI and sometimes as "The Lousy Institute". It was founded on the site of what is today Telephone Bhavan but the club premises were later shifted to Jhowtalla Road. Although it is in no way a club exclusively for members of the Anglo Indian community, there is a spirit about it which is very difficult to describe and which the members refer to as the "family feeling". It is a place for everyone, young and old alike, with its tennis courts, swimming pool, billiard tables, table tennis tables and of course a well-stocked bar. Social functions at these clubs are ample evidence of this family feeling and no such function is ever complete without a dance. It is always more than likely that, even if a dance has not been scheduled, there will be one by the time the show is over. And if the music is not loud enough, it doesn't really matter, because everyone will chip in with a bit of singing. The popularity of the Dalhousie Institute is always most in evidence at the traditional New Year dance, when the tables are crammed to capacity and it is not just the cold that causes the couples on the floor to dance a little closer. And on the stroke of midnight, the musical chimes strike twelve and the problems of the past year never seem further away as hundreds of voices break into "Auld Lang Syne".

THE railway colonies were once a focal point of Anglo-Indian life and the premier of these was the one at Kharagpur, a two-hour drive from Calcutta. We heard our fathers speak in glowing terms of the sporting life in the township, of the fabulous dances that used to be held at the railway institute there, and of the hospitality that was so legendary. But the Kharagpur of today is very different from the one our fathers knew and loved. Apart from the distinction of having the longest railway platform in the country, there is little else of interest there. The township is laid out in neat squares, the boundaries of which are narrow tarred roads that are surprisingly smooth. Very little traffic traverses these roads, apart from the occasional bus or cycle rickshaw. There are the old bungalows by the side of the roads, each with its own plot of dry land that was once a garden.

Age has begun to show. The railway institute, the scene of so many wonderful functions, is now derelict and is scheduled to be pulled down. The bandstand where once, not so long ago, brass bands played regularly, has not seen a coat of paint for many years. "There have been more changes here", Mr Rupert Wainwright told me, "more perhaps than I can ever describe to you. This used to be a thriving colony, a happy colony once upon a time, with plenty of social life, but most of the Anglo-Indians have left now". There is no bitterness in his voice, only a trace of resignation and nostalgia. He knits his brows as he tries to explain what he means. "Our children are the ones that suffer here, so a lot of them go to Calcutta to work. They stay there in hostels and come and visit us whenever they can. Even those who opt for college must leave here and go to Calcutta so you can realise what a deep sense of loneliness there is here. I have a daughter who is working in Calcutta, a son who is studying there and one daughter is working as a nurse in Patna. My other daughter and two other sons are still with me as they are still of school-going age." Mr Wainwright, who was a member of the BNR (Bengal Nagpur Railway) hockey team that won the Beighton Cup many years ago, suddenly looked very tired when I asked him about sport in the colony. "We once had the finest talent in the country here in this colony, but all that has changed now." He smiled suddenly and said "You must be getting tired of that phrase by now, but it is a fact. Our Anglo-Indian boys—the few that are left here now—will find it difficult to attain the standard and proficiency in sport that people of my generation did. This is not to say that they do not have the same interest or aptitude, but there are just not enough of them left".

What he said is true, although a team of Kharagpur boys acquitted themselves well two years ago in the inter-railway tournament. I watched a few of them at a practice session at the colony's stadium. The game clearly meant more to them than the blazing afternoon heat but they did not quit their tireless running and dribbling till the shadows began to lengthen. While they tried to outwit each other, the sweat dripping off their brows, I noticed a middle-aged gentleman sitting about twenty yards away from me, watching the game intently. I mistook him for a resident of the town, so I walked up and began talking to him. Jerry Lonneaux, I discovered in the course of the conversation, was indeed Kharagpur-born although he now stays in Calcutta. He was more philosophical about the changes that had taken place. "Yes, it has changed unbelievably, but then that again is only to be expected, isn't it ? Still, it does come as a bit of a shock to see how this place has altered. I come here every year with my old mother. We spend about a month here and I always see more changes with each visit. The whole place is so different from the colony I remember."

"The day will come" he told me as he stubbed out his cigarette and slowly exhaled with what seemed to be a sigh of sorrow, "when there will not be a single Anglo-Indian left here. The older ones will die, their children will move on because there will be no future for them here." Teenager Vernon Wainwright echoed a similar sentiment that evening when I sounded him out in an attempt to grasp the problems of the youngsters in the colony. "I am not ashamed to be an Anglo-Indian," he told me, "but I'm willing to face facts. The education here is all right up to a certain level but I will do my college in Calcutta and stay on there to work. Personally, I feel that the era of the Anglo-Indian railway colonies has come to a close."

WITH the death of the railway colonies, the centre of Anglo-Indian life is Calcutta, in which city is represented every section of the community, from the poorest at Tiljala to those who occupy the posts of executives in various firms. They are spread out all over the city, although there are some areas which are practically mini-colonies for the community. But the community is diminishing in this city as well and there are considerably less Anglo-Indians now than there were, say, ten years ago. Many have migrated, either to England or Australia: the vast majority to the latter country. In some cases whole families have left; in others individuals packed up their bags and tried to make a new life for themselves in other countries. Some have made their fortunes, some have not but the community continues to thin out considerably.

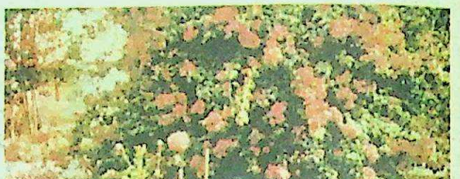
My eldest brother Keith migrated to Australia ten years ago, and shortly after he was granted Australian citizenship, he came out on a visit to India. His new nationality led to quite an incongruous situation when he came to see me in Darjeeling, where I was in school. When my brother decided to extend his stay in the hill station, he had to take special permission, as a foreign national, in order to do so. My mother, one of my other brothers and I accompanied him to the authorities. One of them sanctioned his extension without any delay and then asked my mother if she would allow him to ask her just one question out of curiosity. My mother said yes, although she did look a little puzzled. "Madam" said the bemused official, "how is it that you have two Indian sons and one Australian son ?"



As a result of mass migration, there are cases where children leave the country one by one, until the parents are left alone, with nothing to look forward to after retirement except perhaps a meagre pension and a bleak little flat. To this end there is an essentially Anglo-Indian innovation: the home for the aged. In the absence of a joint family system, such institutions guarantee a roof over the heads of those who no longer have a means of supporting themselves. For a very nominal sum they are cared for, fed and nursed at these homes. In case they do not have the money to pay, there are certain trust funds that provide the money. The atmosphere at these places is a poor substitute for the family life that these elderly folks have been denied, or conversely, that they can no longer afford. But they have the satisfaction of knowing that all their needs will be taken care of and most of all that they do not have to face the loneliness and alienation that is almost always linked with old age.

THE Mary Cooper Home for the Aged in Calcutta is well maintained and preserved. The lawns are neatly cropped, the two-storeyed building is kept immaculately clean and the brass fittings sparkle. As one enters there is a colour photograph of Queen Elizabeth, one that must have been taken many years ago. The corridors are sunny and clean. Outside, in the grassy courtyard there is a birdpond with a pigeon drinking out of it. Nearby there is a goblin in colourful clothes, complete with cap and butterfly net and it is only at this stage that one does a double-take and realises that both the goblin and the pigeon are fashioned from cement. Both are the creations of one of the inmates of the home, a Mr Nelson, who died many years ago and whose wife used to look on my three brothers and me as her sons until she died early last year.

She used to tell us stories about life at the home whenever she used to spend the day at our house. "They are very good to us," she would say, "but at the same time it can be difficult to get on with everyone. All of us are getting on in years and we all have our own idiosyncracies which do not always suit others. So there is sometimes friction but on the whole we are as happy as we can be in such a situation. Certainly we get all the attention we want." Sometimes, when she was worried or preoccupied, her outlook was different. One day, when she was particularly gloomy, she told us "You know, the worst thing about being in a home like this is that you know it is the final stage of your life. You shift into a room which you sometimes have to share. Maybe you linger on for a year, maybe five, maybe ten; but you know that your days are numbered. You know that you are going to die and it will only be a matter of time. When someone here dies, everyone wonders whose turn it is going to be next, but no one discusses it in the open."

WHEREVER there have been Anglo-Indians, there have been flowers, a truth that exists even today. Flowers were very much a part of my childhood, when our sprawling lawns were ablaze in winter with sweetpeas, cannas and beds of some of the most massive dahlias I have ever seen. One of my most vivid memories relates to the Winter of the Queen's Dahlia. My father was determined that his prize dahlia be entered in a flower show which Queen Elizabeth, on a visit to India, was to judge. So it was that a huge white beauty became known as the Queen's Dahlia. No one was allowed within a five yard radius and all games in the vicinity were naturally taboo. The Queen's Dahlia grew and prospered and everyone breathed easier as the great day drew nearer. But one of my brothers, a pugnacious southpaw named Brian, who must have been about twelve years old them, hit a sizzling four during a game of cricket which unfortunately snapped the stem of the Queen's Dahlia. No one spoke, which was understandable in view of the gravity of the situation. I was too young then to be included in the proceedings but I do remember that my brother Mike found a piece of thin, very strong wire and carried out instant surgery so that the Queen's Dahlia stood proud once again. That evening however I forgot my enforced vow of silence and chattily told my father what had happened. I don't recall what took place after that, but I do remember that it was a long time before I was allowed to play cricket with my brothers again.

But the flowers, which have always meant so much to Anglo-Indian families throughout India, have withered away. The once immaculately trimmed hedges are now dusty and ragged while the lawns are overgrown with weeds. The Anglo-Indians are a sadly depleted community today. Those that remain on in India live on memories of days gone by. A festival or a celebration is never the same without those members of families who have left the shores of the country for ever; without the friends who are now thousands of miles away. It is a sad community which has more or less resigned itself to the fact that it faces extinction in the not-too distant future. Anglo-Indian representation in Parliament is scheduled to come to an end in 1981, despite the best efforts of men like Frank Anthony, and a number of brows are furrowed with apprehension. Those who prefer to quit the country will grab the first chance they get; those who stay on will see their children intermarry.

It will not be very long before there is nothing left of the Anglo-Indian community except legends and old, dog-eared photographs.

Torn between two worlds

By COLIN McMAHON

I AM an Anglo-Indian and proud to be one. All that has to be said about this minority community has been, perhaps, touched upon in the books by Herbert Stark, Frank Anthony, Reginald Maher and others. I have no pretensions to add to their contributions on the history of the Anglo-Indians. Leaders like Sir Henry Gidney, Frank Anthony and A. E. T. Barrow, helped by others of lesser stature, gained recognition and constitutional guarantees for their community from the Government of India after the country gained Independence.

The Anglo-Indian is a product of a union between East and West. For over a century we were referred to as Eurasions, half-castes and country-born. Our women were looked down on as chhee chhee. These descriptions all have derogatory connotations. Sir Henry Gidney's efforts resulted in establishing a nomenclature more in keeping with the union between East and West and the Anglo-Indian has been clearly and unambiguously defined in the Government of India Act of 1935 Article 366 (2): "An Anglo-Indian means a person whose father or any of whose male progenitors in the male line is or was of European descent but who is domiciled within the territory of India and is or was born within such territory of parents habitually resident therein and not established there for temporary purposes only."

The Calcutta Police Force formerly provided gainful employment to very large numbers of the community but today the picture is very different. One can practically count them on one's fingers. The Railways, Customs, Post and Telegraphs, Licensed Measurers, Port Commissioners and large mercantile firms were all served by the Anglo-Indians to a very great extent, but now their almost total absence is all too noticeable.

Take a look at the playing fields in schools and on the Maidan. The Rangers Club was the only Anglo-Indian club in this city that could field two full and equally competent teams in football, hockey and cricket. All these sides could hold their own against the best available, not only in Calcutta but also from outside the city. Today's story makes very sad reading. The club's social activities were once the talk of the town—they still are, but not in the same terms.

THE services still have their nucleus of the Anglo-Indians who continue to make a name for themselves in the Rolls of Honour. Members of the community acquitted themselves honourably in both confrontations with Pakistan and perhaps even today some Anglo-Indian names remain household words. There were the Keelor brothers, then Squadron Leaders, who literally exploded the myth of the invincible Sabres used against us by the Pakistanis. Both brothers, Trevor and Denzil, shot down a Sabre each while flying Gnats, which were till then considered inferior to the F86 Sabres. No less than them were heroes like Wing Commander William MacDonald Goodman—whose Mystere pilots wreaked havoc against the opposing forces—and fliers like Tony Mousinho and Group Captain Lloyd. Lt. General Pat Dunne, who gained so much fame, was an Anglo-Indian too.

A question that appears pertinent to me is why the Anglo-Indians left this country in their thousands after Independence. Were they unmindful of the community's glorious past? Why has the community failed to respond to the Indian Government's generous attitude to them, and what has happened to their sense of loyalty? In spite of the oppression of the British for over a century, thousands have migrated to the British Isles and thousands more to the Dominions. Entire families who migrated did not always go to the same destination and very often part families remained on in India. Why did the Anglo-Indian Association at the Centre fail to tackle this problem properly and why did the West Bengal Branch actively help in accelerating this exodus?

Two very far-reaching consequences stem from this mass migration. The community has reached its lowest ebb and faces extinction in possibly a hundred years from now. Avenues for employment are being restricted not by unwillingness on the part of employees but by the fear that the Anglo-Indian is a time server and will leave as soon as it is convenient for him to do so. In spite of rigid immigration rules in Britain and the Commonwealth countries, coupled with stringent financial rules governing money that can be taken out of the country, the Anglo-Indian is still leaving. ■

An Opposition divided

By BARUN SENGUPTA

CAN the Opposition put up a joint fight against the Congress (I) during the next Assembly elections? To me, it seems to be almost impossible. Though they are all aware that no single Opposition Party can defeat the Congress (I) in any of the States and though it is clear even to a child that only a united Opposition can put up some strong resistance to Mrs Gandhi, it would still be stupid to expect the Opposition to close their ranks. The Opposition is now more divided than it was during the Lok Sabha elections. And, I am afraid, they will be further divided in the coming months.

The truth is that apart from the CPI(M) no Opposition Party is too keen on putting up a joint fight against Mrs Gandhi. The CPI(M) has proposed one Opposition candidate in all the constituencies. Not a joint front as such—only an adjustment of seats. But the CPI(M) is no force in those nine States. The dominant forces in those States are the Janata Party and the Lok Dal. And the situation within these two Parties is so confusing at the moment and personal relations between the top leaders of these two Parties are so bitter that they cannot be expected to complete the difficult and complicated task of adjustment in about one thousand Assembly constituencies.

The Opposition can broadly be divided into five groups: the Jana Sanghees and the RSS men, the old Congress people and the opportunists, the non-Communist Left, the pro-Moscow "progressives" and the CPI(M). The Jana Sanghees and RSS men belong mostly to the Janata Party. The old Congress people and opportunists are in the Congress (U), Janata Party and the Lok Dal. The non-Communist Leftists are in the Janata, Lok Dal, Forward Bloc, RSP and PWP. The pro-Moscow progressives are in the CPI, Congress (U) and Lok Dal.

The Jana Sanghees and the RSS men are still the most organised Opposition political force in the country, though their mass base is not that strong. Mrs Gandhi and Sanjay Gandhi still consider them to be their main adversaries. There are virtually three opinions within this Jana Sangh-RSS group. One group thinks that it should try to build up a broad anti-Mrs Gandhi front immediately and arrange an adjustment of seats with all the anti-Congress(I) forces. This group is headed by Atal Behari Vajpayee. The second group, headed by L. K. Advani, thinks "we should not hasten to forge an alliance again which may appear to be opportunistic and unworkable to the people". They would prefer to wait and allow all the anti-Mrs Gandhi forces to come closer during the process of a long struggle. The third group wants a dialogue with Mrs Gandhi and her son. They argue that with the presence of the Russians in Afghanistan and the threat of Pan-Islam, all patriotic Indians should come closer. They think Sanjay Gandhi is a patriotic Indian first and then everything else. This group is composed of some diehard RSS men.

The old Congressmen in the Opposition now can be divided into two groups—those who fought against Mrs Gandhi in 1969 and those who were with her till 1977. The first group is still bitter towards Mrs Gandhi, they want to stop her at all costs, but they think that no arrangement can work with a person like Charan Singh. So they do not want any adjustment with the Lok Dal. Some of the Congressmen who opposed Mrs Gandhi and Sanjay Gandhi in the post-1977 period wanted a resolute and united fight against the mother and the son. They are not unwilling to join hands with the Jana Sanghees and the RSS men. Some others of this group are still bitterly opposed to the Jana Sangh and RSS and want a united front against the Congress (I) minus the Jana Sangh & RSS.

One can write page after page about the political opportunists in the Opposition today. One of the biggest opportunists on the Indian political scene today, Charan Singh, is strongly for a broad-based, anti-Indira front at the moment. He is no longer very anti-Jana Sangh and RSS. He is keen to join hands with the progressives and Leftists also. However, he has only one stipulation — he should be the leader of this front or adjustment. To the credit of this old man, it must be admitted that he is unafraid of CBI raids, unlike some of his senior former colleagues and has a strong personal base in UP and Haryana.

The other senior political opportunist of the country, Jagjivan Ram, is now playing the most disruptive role in the Opposition. The mother and the son are playing a game through him which can be compared with the game they played through Charan Singh and Raj Narain in 1979 to bring down the Janata Government. If Babuji can play the expected role successfully he may expect "a respected position in the Cabinet and immunity from this or that raid". But would not the example of Bahuguna keep him under constant fear and uncertainty?

The non-communist Left is a small force composed of the former Socialists, PSP-men and other small Parties. All of them want a broad-based front against Mrs Gandhi and they are not allergic to anyone. But, they are not a major force and hence they cannot positively influence national politics very much. The pro-Moscow Communists and progressives are also no major political force of the country. But, with their tact, experience vital positions in different Parties, money power and generous support of the pro-Moscow Press, they play a vital role in all the political manoeuvrings in Delhi. Alas, they are also divided now! Some of them are anti-Mrs Gandhi while others support her. This difference of opinion on the tactical line of the group is expected to continue till clear "friendly advice" comes from abroad.

The major Left force of the country, the CPI(M), though trying to put up a bold face against Mrs Gandhi publicly and advocating a resolute united fight against her, is also trying to buy peace with her secretly. Two of their Politbureau members have met some persons close to Mrs Gandhi and Sanjay separately since the Lok Sabha polls and have pleaded "peaceful coexistence." But the Party as such does not trust her and if there is a joint front to stop Mrs Gandhi they would welcome the idea.

Needless to say, this complicated and confused situation in the Opposition suits Mrs Gandhi and Sanjay perfectly. If they cannot bring almost all the important state Governments under Congress (I) rule and if they cannot secure a two-thirds majority in the Rajya Sabha they cannot go ahead with all their plans and programmes "to strengthen the country". So, till they do that they will try to keep the Opposition divided. I have no doubt, some of the Opposition Parties and leaders will go on helping them in this task.

Introducing the Khasis

By PRADEEP DASGUPTA

Subir Roy

Ward Lake, Shillong

MR J. N. CHOWDHURY's diligence in presenting a continuous narrative of the entire cultural and political history of the Khasis within the compass of a single volume is commendable. Any outsider seeking a broad knowledge about Khasis, one of the most advanced tribal communities of the country, will surely find the book immensely useful and interesting. The 426-page volume not only draws profusely on the accounts of all earlier writers on this and allied subjects, but also contains two illuminating articles by two noted literators of the Khasi-Pnar (Jaintia or Synteng) segment of Meghalaya. Mr Chowdhury, now above 60, has mostly lived in Shillong which is the hub of Khasi life as well as the State capital of Meghalaya. Besides, being associated with the Research Department of the Government of Arunachal Pradesh since its inception, he had access (which was "denied to or ignored by many Khasi writers", as pointed out by Mr S. J. Duncan in his foreword to the book) to all rare materials relevant to the subject of his study. All these undoubtedly make the treatise an authentic one, though its author does not claim to have done very original research on the Khasis.

Geologists say that the beautiful hilly tract, inhabited by the colourful Khasi people and described as the "Scotland of the East", originated long before the emergence of the Himalayas. The Khasi-Pnar people are amongst the earliest migrants into the north-eastern region of India, but there are controversies about their origin. Like all other tribes, the Khasis have their own legends to say that they came down from the heaven with the help of a golden ladder and chose to remain on earth. However, according to Sir E. A. Gait, the Khasis are "a remnant of the first Mongolian overflow into India", whose language "is the only surviving dialect in India of the Mon-Khmer family of languages". But while there are no two opinions about the identity of the language, others differ with Gait about the ethnic origin of the Khasis. According to Rajmohan Nath (Background of Assamese Culture), for instance, the Khasis and the Syntengs owe their origins to the same racial stock called 'Besatis', as mentioned in the Periplus of the Erythraean Sea (first century AD), which lived in the northern neighbourhood of Sumatra in a territory named "This". The Besatis people were Austric. Mr Chowdhury believes that the Khasis are basically Austric, though they acquired some Mongoloid characters in the process of their migration in prehistoric time. He agrees too with E. T. Dalton in his observation that the Austric-speaking people, who steadfastly adhered to their ancient faith, also largely retained their original language.

Mr Chowdhury's comparative approach to the Khasi matriliny and his narratives on the Khasi dress, culture, arts and crafts and religion also make interesting reading. These are factual details narrated by earlier writers in their monographs and the author has hardly added anything to them. One would, though, have expected him to dilate elaborately on the "winds of change" which have affected Khasi society, particularly since the advent of the British in the hills and following Independence, so much so that the Khasi people, in spite of the poverty of a large section of them in the rural areas and retention of some of their original social and cultural usages, can no longer be recognised as "tribals".

Writing his book, as he did, in late 1977, Mr Chowdhury could take a little more pains to further enrich and embellish the chapter on "political events" instead of stopping at the birth of the state of Meghalaya, in which the Khasis constitute a majority of the population. Indeed, the last two decades are a very important and significant chapter in the history of the Meghalayan people, more particularly the Khasis, and a depiction of the Khasi canvas remains incomplete without an elaborate coverage of the important developments of the Seventies as well as of the preceding decade. It was in the 70's that Assam's capital was shifted from Shillong, followed by the shifting of some important offices of the Government of Arunachal Pradesh and the Central Government as well, which must have had some impact on the economy of the Khasi Hills. But there is no reference to all these in book. Very recently Shillong and some other parts of the Khasi Hills witnessed serious violence. But why did this happen? The book fails to provide an understanding of the background of these happenings which must surely be there.

Indian publishing strikes gold

By NARENDRA KUMAR

ENGLISH language publishing in India has come of age during the last decade. From being attached to the apron-strings of foreign publishing houses through their subsidiaries, it has come to have a personality of its own. While foreign subsidiaries contented themselves with reprinting programmes to feed the Indian market, to the extent that the nursery rhymes taught in public schools are in an idiom alien to Indian ears, indigenous publishing has taken qualitative jumps during this brief period. Previously Indian publishing was like the proverbial coy Indian bride, wholly dependent on the "Lord of the House". As a matter of fact, the growth of Indian publishing during the sixties was centred around the reprint programme under the wheat loan agreement with the US Government.

The programme, an indirect form of cultural imperialism, worked to the satisfaction of all except the long-range interest of publishing in India. It operated in the following manner. Plenty of rupee funds were available under the wheat loan agreement between the Governments of India and the United States. Part of the funds was made available to Indian publishers for reprinting outdated textbooks. The American publisher was happy because he could get huge royalties. The Indian publisher made a huge profit because his risk was entirely underwritten. The U. S. Government was more than satisfied because it could conveniently extend its ideological battles across the seas. The sufferers were the Indian students who were made to read books not written for their needs. From a subsidiary role during the days of British hegemony, Indian publishing was in danger of reaching the nadir by following in the steps of American publishing by accepting the wheat loan subsidies.

The upturn in Indian publishing took place only in the seventies, for which ground was prepared during the previous decade. The change came about as a result of an upswing in several walks of life in India. The Indian elite now had sufficient confidence in its potentialities by the sixties to take the initiative at home and abroad. In other words, propitious conditions were prevalent on account of favourable objective factors. Once this had been achieved, subjective situations acted as catalystic agents to bring about major changes.

There is no doubt that Asia Publishing House of Bombay showed the way like a prairie fire spread wide and far by a single spark. At one time, the premier publishing house came to have a virtual monopoly of quality book-publishing in India, although subsequently it came to a sad end. That is another story. What Asia Publishing House and its live-wire promoter Peter Jaysinghe came to establish was the fact that, with sustained effort, Indian publishing had the potential of being world class. The other event of note was a book that made publishing history in India. It was Lieutenant-General B. M. Kaul's Untold Story published by Allied Publishers in 1967. The late general, notorious for his poor leadership during the Sino-Indian war, was as pompous as any human being could be. In this book of over 500 pages, he almost tried to establish that he would have won the war single-handed but for his frequent breakdowns and the cowardly aides that surrounded him. From the fact that 1,000 copies was the outer limit for the most books published in India at that time, the book broke all records. It proved the point that the potential market for books in India was like virgin soil awaiting to be tapped. From then onwards, there was no looking back for Indian publishers. Thus the sixties provided the backdrop for what was to come about during the seventies— opening of the floodgates of the Aswan for everybody to watch in a state of perpetual wonderment.

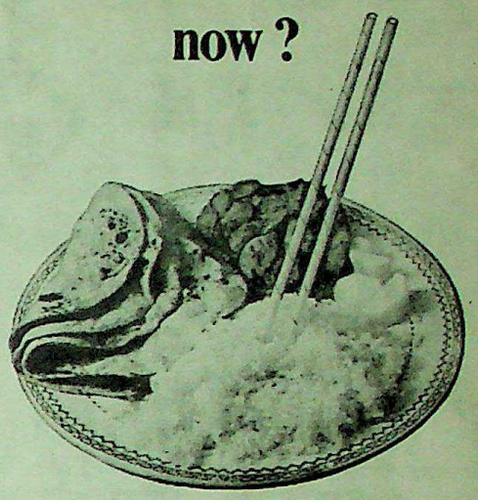
Paradoxically enough, the seventies have also seen the widening tentacles of the public sector over publishing in India. It has cornered a big chunk of the textbook market. Witness the example of the National Council of Education and Research Training (NCERT) publishing a large variety of textbooks, an agency blissfully unaware of the latest trends in the marketing of books. Similar is the situation with other Governmental agencies like the National Book Trust and Sahitya Akademi, with huge stocks lying unsold because of inefficient management. The public sector, timid to the extreme in expressing bold ideas in print, has entered a sphere which does not legitimately belong to it. With all the advantages, it is unable to compete with private sector.

Seventies was the decade in which Indian publishing came to maturity and is now entitled to be called an industry in its own right. It is now reaching a stage where it can challenge the primacy of Anglo-American publishing in several Afro-Asian countries and match their efforts in these areas. Indian publishing has placed the foreign subsidiaries in a defensive position in general publishing and is attempting to secure a niche in textbook publishing as well. While it has not been roses all the way, Indian publishing has expanded by the ideal combination of improved publishing methods, distribution techniques, and scientific management. There has also been a careful assessment of market potentialities. The crop of Emergency books have established that proper promotion and an accurate assessment of the market can open entirely new areas and attract a wide range of readers who earlier did not buy books. These books have done more for publishing during the seventies than any other category of books.

Besides the Emergency literature, there is nothing to beat as bestseller Freedom at Midnight

Would you rather drink your dinner than think about your toothpaste — now ?



Have you ever wondered whether your toothpaste is giving your teeth the protection they need ? Maybe it isn't. That's why you should look at Macleans. Because Macleans actually gives your teeth a two-way protection, which is necessary for their health.

Macleans fights destructive acids harder

Leftover food particles in your mouth produce acids that destroy tooth enamel. Is your toothpaste alkaline enough to neutralise these acid attacks ? Macleans is. Because Macleans is specially formulated with an alkaline base. Laboratory tests demonstrate that the acid-neutralising action of Macleans protects teeth better and longer.

Macleans fortifies tooth enamel simultaneously

Clinical tests prove that Macleans helps protect teeth from caries. The Fluoride in Macleans combines with tooth enamel to strengthen it and increase its resistance to decay.

Only Macleans with its two-way action fights acids while it fortifies tooth enamel.

by Larry Collins and Dominique Lapierre. The book, written in the form of true fiction about the events leading to the independence of India, has set the publishing world practically on fire. Ordinarily, general books sell no more than 1,000 to 2,000 copies. What made so many, who normally do not touch books with a pair of tongs, buy it? This book and the plethora of Emergency books have established once and for all that there is a potential market in the country ready to be tapped. It is to be remembered that prestigious publishers all over the world depend for profits on one or two bestsellers, and the future of Indian publishing also lies in creating a similar situation.

The success of Indian publishing in the eighties is visualised on the assumption that a formula can be successfully devised to admix the bestsellers with books commanding more modest sales. Bestsellers can also be quality books. The success or failure of Indian publishing equally depends upon the academic community which, unfortunately, has not kept pace with the technological and managerial potentialities of publishing in India. High production standards cannot help a book if its contents are mediocre. The fact is that, academically, Indian books leave much to be desired. Where is a Cambridge History of India series or a stirring history of the freedom movement? There is not one good economic history of India produced during the last 30 years. Similarly, there is not a single good work on India's foreign policy, in spite of the fact that Jawaharlal Nehru has left rich legacy. In fact, many major fields of activity in the social sciences are totally neglected. The greatest single handicap of publishing breaking through its Lakshman Rekha rests on the shoulders of the academics. It devolves upon academic institutions like the Indian Council of Historical Research and the Indian Council of Social Science Research to help rectify the situation.

THE quality of books published in India during the seventies can be gauged by taking a sample of 20 books. These books can be divided into two convenient categories. The first list of ten books consists of those that can be singled out for quality the other of books that could "have been great" It may be worthwhile to make an assessment of each of the books included in our two lists. This assessment can probably be taken as a barometer of the quality of books published in the country.

My favourite book remains Freedom at Midnight. This is a book that has been variously described. It has also been called a book of fiction. However, the fictional representation has a more life-like quality than the truth itself. What distinguishes this work is the vindication of Gandhi.

The other two of my favourites are books by women authors. Reason Wounded is a story of a woman who dared to organize agricultural workers, appropriately described by her as "impoverished, immigrant purbias". She landed herself in detention under MISA during the Emergency. Mrs Lewis presents a most authentic image of what might be called the "suburban countryside". The other book by a woman author, My Years in an Indian Prison, is by a young English school teacher who was arrested in 1970 for her alleged Naxalite connections. She was held for five years without trial in a Bihar prison. She presents the most moving picture of day-to-day life in a Bihar prison cell.

Two more books on my list are works of fiction. Indian English has become respectable as a result of Mulk Raj Anand's writings. I have enjoyed reading his latest novel, Confessions of a Lover. The book is almost an autobiography. It vividly portrays middle class life in pre-partition Punjab. Mr Anand, like any other good Punjabi, is a romantic at heart and this is amply proved in his novel. My other favourite is a novel translated from Bengali, It Does not Die. It is also autobiographical. It Does not Die by Maitreyi Devi is about Indian womanhood with its typical Mirabai complex. Her story of self love is very moving, in spite of the fact that it contains a lot of sentimental hogwash.

My Days with Gandhi by Professor N. K. Bose has been hardly noticed. But it is, perhaps, one of the best assessments of Gandhi. The book has a curious history. Navajivan Publishing House, which had originally sponsored the publication in the fifties, refused to publish it and the reasons for refusal are best stated in the letter that Professor Bose received from the Managing Trustees of the Publishing House: "I am of the opinion that you better be advised to leave out of the book Bapu's experiment in sex or Brahmacharya and reconstitute the book to say about Bapu's great work in Noakhali."

CC-0. In Public Domain. HP Sta... Hazratganj, Lucknow

The remaining four titles are academic, with the exception of Ancient India by Professor R. S. Sharma of Delhi University. The book, intended to be a school-level textbook, has become the subject of a raging public controversy. Professor Sharma has been savagely attacked and the textbook withdrawn by the Ministry of Education. For that reason alone, apart from the readability, this book is also my favourite.

I shall include the Indian Political System by Professor B. B. Misra for its solidity. It is not an easy book to read but is an excellent case study of how books should come to be written. Professor Misra is a model scholar who puts his life into works. Similarly, The History and Culture of the Indian People in 11 volumes, edited by Professor R. C. Majumdar, is not an easy work to go through. It has a definite point of view about Indian history and states it without ambiguity. Several hundred scholars have contributed towards the completion of the series.

The best work in my view is The Remembered Village by Professor M. N. Srinivas who has based his monography on intensive field work done by him over a period of 18 years in a village called Rampura. The village has now been placed on the ethnographic map of the world. The records Professor Srinivas studiously compiled were destroyed in a fire, and the present monograph is based purely on memory. In a way, the accident was a blessing because the result is a book that is most readable.

THE ten books in the second list are in the category of the "may have been" greats. Some of those fall short of being outstanding and others are simply mediocre. Of these, seven are autobiographies, memoirs and diaries, two are about the Emergency and the last is a piece of fiction based on a film script. Of these, Jawaharlal Nehru — A Biography by Professor S. Gopal is the most meticulous work on the late Prime Minister. Sponsored by the Jawaharlal Nehru Memorial Fund with almost full access to private papers, the biography, however, is not definitive. Professor Gopal has so much as confessed in the preface that "Jawaharlal was the hero of my youth." And the biography does not rise above the level of adulation.

Contrasted with this work The Story of My Life by Morarji Desai is a mere catalogue of events. The third volume, written under detention during the Emergency, is more pre-occupied with Mrs Gandhi's style of functioning than with his own life. While the sincerity of the man is apparent, this does not compensate for what is normally defined as an autobiography.

The next is Portrait of a President by Gyanwati Darbar. This is diary based on daily jottings by the late President Dr Rajendra Prasad. There are more than 500 letters written during six years, i.e., 1956 to 1962 by the President of India, oddly enough, to his personal secretary. The volumes are a fit subject for the psychological analysis of the great man. Apart from revealing some minor facts about Dr Rajendra Prasad, the letters are not very forthcoming.

In a separate category is Living an Era by D. P. Mishra, now in two volumes. Mr Mishra was in the thick of major political controversies in the Congress Party. He has done a meticulous job of writing his autobiography but there are no fireworks in it. However, it is excellent as a book of record. It is hoped that in his final volume of memoirs dealing with Mrs Indira Gandhi era, he may come out with some interesting facts.

The next work is an autobiography by the great diplomat K. M. Panikkar. It has been translated from Malayalam and seems to be based on pieces contributed to a periodical publication. This is established by the fact that each chapter is more or less of uneven length. I felt very much disappointed by this work because he seems to be less than frank in stating the facts.

A Dangerous Place by the former American Ambassador to India got undue local publicity because of its brief reference to the activities of CIA in this country. The book is based on his jottings as the American representative to the UN, and it certainly does not deserve the publicity it has received.

There is also the other category of three books relating to Emergency. First of all, mention must be made of Prison Diary of Jayaprakash Narayan. The first few words — "my world lies in a shambles around me. I am afraid I shall not see it put together again in my life-time" — are very evocative. Otherwise, the diary does not measure up to the standards expected of the grand old man of Sarvodaya. Similarly, Kuldip Nayar's The Judgement, which proved to be a runaway success, could still have been a more outstanding work but for the time available to the author to write the book. However, it has done more for anti-authoritarianism than many other books on the same subject. Nihal Singh's book Indira's India: A Political Notebook which was late in coming, contains several perceptive remarks but otherwise there is not much in it.

Last but not least is a piece of fiction by the well-known novelist M. Malgonkar. Since it is based on a film-script Shalimar, Malgonkar had to work under creative restraints.

The above assessment of 20 books published during the last decade amply establishes that the breakthrough in Indian publishing is imminent, but for the fact that the academicians in India are not producing works of quality that can place India on the publishing map. Contemporary India is full of unlimited possibilities — only if the intellectual community will awake, arise, and accept the challenge posed before it.

Goa's drug rings flourish

Problem for the law

IT took a cartload of firewood, five litres of kerosene, half a dozen old truck tyres and two and a half hours to burn his body. He had died due to excessive drugs on a Goan beach. The police collected the ashes the next day and handed them over to his mother, a Canadian, who had come to Goa for this sole and painful purpose. Since her arrival, she had been moving, for four days, between the city morgue and her hotel.

Hippism is, at long last, dying,—even in Goa—a slow and inexorable death. Drug-running is not. Why? No one has an answer. How drug-running is expanding is partly known. The growth of tourism has also enhanced the availability of willing—and well-paid—carriers, now no more the scruffy, self-incriminating hippy of yesteryear, but a more elusive, ostensibly more affluent "visitor from abroad". It is also known, even if partly, who the men are behind the scenes. Enoch Powells the world over might be delighted to know that Indian migration to the West has become, due to a variety of reasons, a definite "faptor" in the everexpanding racket.

White danseuses in dishabille ("no photographs please" was the agreed condition to my entry) convolute in an ever-accelerating rhythm to a climactic frenzy, with several of them sprawled on the ground and hysterically gyrating their, by now, bared pubis. A while ago, they had been swinging slowly, and almost artistically, their arms while dancing. They held in the hollow of their palms little coconut shells with oilsoaked cotton wicks lit inside. And the little tongues of flickering fire made beautiful zigzag images in the dark, smokefilled room. This, I am told, is no choreographic tomfoolery; this is the latest and unabridged edition of the "Lord's prayer". At the end of it all, every one is given his daily bread and a fair share of "Shit", which is what they call hashish. Morphine and LSD have to be paid for. So must 'hash', if demanded in large quantities. The Nordic girl by my side, her wrinkled breasts hanging from her emaciated ribcage, can afford us more than the free community chillum which she shares with a midget-sized Negro, garishly dressed, wearing dark glasses, and huge silver rings which twinkle every time he appreciatively, and almost frequently, pendulates his head to the tune of the music booming from the sound system.

The day in this commune begins at dawn. The arch priest, a lame French Canadian, asks everyone to queue and makes them peel potatoes, chop cabbages and dice meat. The cauldron is then put to boil. It is a tasty chop-suey, sold at Rs 15 for "a bellyful". In the rooms hired out by the commune, freedom knows no bars. After the chop-suey, a massive and hirsute Indian repaired to his room with two white girls in tow. They had rapturously acknowledged they all had the "right vibes". They left in a hurry.

Here, in this commune, hashish, is chemically refined and a whole kilo converted into tiny pastilles, not much larger than shirt buttons. In fact, some pastilles are camouflaged to look like cloth buttons.

A leading partner of this particular ring is a London-based Indian. He has, rather ingeniously, used his position as a jailer to build up his gang of peddlers, pushers and carriers. All around the beach there are joints with suggestive names. There is one right on the main road which is "The Flower Scene Restaurant. Another, in the midst of a coconut grove, is the "Dog's Place". Nude men and women bathe at the two nearby wells.

In recent swoops, by police, local Excise and Central Excise—all much to the merriment of the dope rings acting disjointedly and, often, at cross purpose—Goa's Calangute-Baga-Anjuna beach belt has yielded, at least, 60 kgs of hashish and opium and morphine worth about Rs 1.5 to 2 lakhs. But this is "Chicken feed" admit the investigators. With the recent events in the Middle East leading to a virtual stoppage of overland tourism between Europe and India, presently the emphasis is on air transport and hallucinogenics are locally treated in order to reduce weight and bulk.

Francis Coralie Mullin, whose habeas corpus petition failed in the Supreme Court is one of the few of her kind held under COFEPOSA, for suspected linkages with major international drug gangs. Recently Goa police stumbled accidentally on "Adolph" a German wanted in his country for the last eight years in connection with a number of major criminal cases, two of which have already earned him a conviction to 12 years of hard labour. This particular German seems to be in league with an Indian who goes by the name of Byriani. Byriani's ambition is that of putting up the largest and most uptodate beauty parlour in Bombay. Reportedly, the CBI had the registers of the luxurious Fort Aguada Beach Resort photographed, after it was established that Byriani was a frequent guest at the hotel. Two years ago, on March 12, 1978, one of his lady friends—the wife of a rich Indian clothier established in Paris—died suddenly and mysteriously in a cottage at the Aguada resort rented by Byriani and where both had been living. According to the account given to the police, they were planning a luxury restaurant in Goa. The lady's death was due to "cardiac ischiemia" and her body was promptly claimed and cremated in Goa by someone who identified himself as her son.

The various enforcement authorities privately concede that they hardly feel encouraged to take to drugracket busting seriously. They have positive information that the gangs have considerable resources, both by way of contacts at the right places with loyal and ruthless liquidators on their payroll. Intelligence sources even suggest that some of the Indian associates of the foreign gangs have, in turn, "clean" business associations with the high and mighty.

Such as? I query

Such as Ruksana, is the answer.

Ruksana who? I insist.

You are asking too much now, I am told and lewd laughter rocks the investigator's tiny cubicle.

According to Central Excise sources, it is difficult to assess what is going on in Goa on the drug scene. "These are all flowing transactions", I am told. What does it mean? Apparently, not much more than that. for some obscure reason, there is a kind of inertia. But bureaucrats' inhibitions are understandable. Goa's State Excise Commissioner, young, petite, intelligent and charming Mrs Dhingra, an IAS, officer has been under pressure from none other than the Lt. Governor himself. The Lt. Governor wanted her to issue a permit of three tolas of opium for his opium-addicted elder brother, Mr. Bhagwan Singh. Mrs Dhingra refused. And a move is now on to have the law amended since an honest officer would neither bend nor break it!

Sugar prices zoom

Then it must be election time

The Union Agriculture Minister, Rao Birendra Singh, at the swearing-in ceremony

ONE clue that the dissolution of the Assemblies and the resultant elections were certainties was the price of sugar, unfailing indication of the intentions of politicians out on the prowl for election funds. That sugar has become the commodity for swindling the consumer and simultaneously swelling election coffers is perhaps nothing new, but what is new is the soaring height reached by such blatant swindling. Consumers remain helpless despite the so-called 'Consumers' Guidance' and the Essential Commodities Act.

What makes the sugar swindle so scandalous is the fact that politicians are directly involved here. With regard to other commodities, it is an accepted fact that the private sector indulges in profiteering and passes on slush money and election funds to politicians at election time on a quid pro quo basis. But in the case of sugar, since the sugar barons are either Ministers or political chieftans the judge and the accused are one. The Government makes the money and cries wolf at the same time.

In Bombay this is what happened in the period between the Congress (I) victory at the Lok Sabha polls and the first week of March. After Mrs Gandhi came to power, sugar, which was selling around Rs. 5 per kg, zoomed to Rs. 7 and above. In addition, it was not available in several places. Who pocketed this extra money? Till February 15, Maharashtra, which produces one-third of the country's sugar, produced eight lakh tonnes. The total sugar available therefore was eight lakh tonnes plus a further nine lakh tonnes which was the opening stock from the previous season. Of this, 12 lakh tonnes were still with the factories as on January 31, thereby creating an artificial shortage. One of the reasons given by the sugar barons was nonavailability of wagons.

The cost of production of sugar in Maharashtra is among the lowest in the country. Compared to Rs. 3.35 per kg in Bihar it is Rs. 2.20 in Maharashtra. Adding the excise cost plus transport charges it comes to around Rs. 2.90 per kg. But sugar was selling in the market at between Rs. 6 and Rs. 7 which means that the sugar barons made a clear Rs. 3 per kg or Rs. 300 per quintal or Rs. 3,000 per tonne. So assuming that they sold six lakh tonnes the sugar barons made a clear Rs. 18 crores.

The consumers have been swindled to the tune of Rs. 18 crores. One might argue that this money made is not black money and was made officially but then all money in the coffers of the sugar factories is the property of the sugar barons and the barons alone. And this means that the sugar barons have this much money to play around with in the Assembly elections. One has to watch their extravagant election campaigns to know how much they have to throw around. And who are these sugar barons? Today two-thirds of the sugar factories in Maharashtra are owned by the Congress (I) politicians and the rest Congress (U) politicians led by Vasantdada Patil and Mr Sharad Pawar respectively.

Another indication is the mysterious silence of the Union Agriculture Minister, Rao Birendra Singh. Shortly after he assumed the portfolio he promised to hold a departmental inquiry into the muddle which had resulted in the soaring of sugar prices. He promised that stringent measures would be taken against those found guilty. One waited in vain, however, for him to act but nothing happened, because he must have discovered his fellow Congressmen as the biggest beneficaries. Singh was enthusiastic initially perhaps because he thought that the muddle was the making of the previous Government. It is true that the Charan Singh Government had subtly gifted Rs. 3 crores to the sugar mills. As one paper wrote on December 31, 1979; "by raising the price of sugar by Rs. 30 the Charan Government made a subtle gift running into crores of rupees to industry and trade. The Government has imposed an excise duty of Rs. 30 per quintal on old stocks in order to prevent mills from taking advantage of the increased price. However mills (have) already transferred huge stocks from godowns and the amount of sugar in the pipeline is over ten lakh tonnes. It means that hoarders and traders will coolly make Rs. three crores at the cost of the consumers".

In Maharashtra the sugar barons have always manipulated the disposal of sugar for personal or Party gain and do not hesitate to create an artificial scarcity if necessary. During the period from October 1978 to June 1979 they sold only 16 lakh tonnes, averaging less than two lakh tonnes per month because prices were Rs. 2.40 per kg. In the period July-September 1979 when prices went up to Rs. 2.90 per kg they sold seven lakh tonnes or over 2 lakh tonnes per month.

They can keep stocks endlessly because of the liberal loans they get. They got Rs. 62 crores from the Maharashtra State Cooperative Bank, Rs. 14 crores from the Urban Cooperative Bank and Rs. 20 crores from the District Central Cooperative Banks to which they hypothecate sugar stocks. This is allegedly how they were able to carry stocks from April 1978 to July-September when prices rose.

NOTES

A FRIEND of mine has been living in Western Europe for about ten years now. He is a professional sitar player, travelling where the diminishing Indian music market will take him: not very far now that George Harrison has withdrawn his patronage to this exotic art form and the nirvana-seeking adolescent is under pressure to remain a football hooligan in West Ham. My friend divides the year between England, France, Germany and India with London as his base, and he remains an Indian passport holder.

A few months ago he received a printed letter from the Electoral Registration Officer asking him to enter the Register of Electors 1980 by filling up the enclosed form. Initially he thought this to be a mistake: after all as an Indian citizen how could he be "entitled to vote at Parliamentary, European Assembly' or local elections". But then he read the form and discovered that he was perfectly capable of voting for or against Missus Thatcher if he wanted to. The very first sentence in the form said : "You are required to enter—meaning all British subjects—(Commonwealth citizens are British subjects) and citizens of the Irish Republic who will be resident at your address on 10th October 1979 and who will be 18 or over by 15th February 1981" etcetera. I don't know what the citizens of the Irish Republic feel about this privilege, but the arrogance of that claim shocked me. "Commonwealth citizens are British Subjects." Her Majesty's Government may not be willing to admit it publicly, but we Indians stopped being subjects of Britain three decades ago. All "subject races" get limited franchise, I suppose: the right to vote but no right to full citizenship or elected office—that privilege is reserved for the correct mix of hormones. The horror scenario for a distant future: could British troops come to the aid of their Indian "subjects" in any "crisis"? Old colonisers never die; they simply stop getting into headlines.

IT probably sounds absurd, coming from a resident of Calcutta, but London must be one of the most depressing cities in the world—and believe me cities like Calcutta have a lot to be depressed about. But London must take the first place in the paranoia stakes. For the casual brown visitor the problem is more acute. Walk into a pub and you feel as if a film of hostility has been wrapped over your skin. Walk into a cinema to see The Canterbury Tales and people look at you as if they have come for the art and you have come for the tits. Worst of all, London must be the most expensive place to get depressed in.

Actually, I can quite understand the Londoner getting sick of a tourist's face; he sees it so often. Tourism is a very debilitating service industry, consisting largely of selling myths at the maximum rate the market can bear; it's a con game, and nobody is quite sure how long the sting will last. There is too much that is sleazy in this business; you need both insultingly expensive restaurants and cheap pornography to satiate the widely varied needs of the tourist so that he can go back to Prohibition City, Saudi Arabia, or Very Littleville, Utah and brag about the "fun" that was had in London. All this must be especially galling for a city like London : after all once upon a time the Dick Whittingtons came to look at the Queen and the streets were paved with gold — you came then to pay homage to the city that ruled the world, and partook of such crumbs as it deigned to throw your way. London did not have to sell itself; the world came to it bearing gifts. Even after losing its political power London retained its confidence till the Sixties. Then suddenly it changed from vivacious queen into an old whore. Having been stripped of its power, proud London had an Arab sitting on its bum. Enough to depress anybody.

THEATRE and wit seem the only British assets that have survived the many onslaughts on British existence in recent times. It's impossible to get into the theatre since the tourists have bought all the tickets. The peculiar and fascinating British wit is still audible at dinner parties. Indeed this dark wit must be one of the finest achievements of the British upper classes, the only people in today's world who spend time and intellect turning conversation into an art form. It now seems that the egalitarianism of the second half of this century has managed to carry this wit down to the lower levels. When a certain person, whose name I do not want to remember, won nearly a million pounds at the pools, the BBC sent a team to find out what the man in the street (I thought he had gone out of fashion, but he clearly isn't extinct) would have done if a million pounds suddenly dropped into his lap. One old man answered the TV reporter immediately : "I would get rid of my wife". An exclamation mark, not to mention a question mark, hung in the air. Until the old man explained : "She would spend it, wouldn't she?" I challenge anyone to come up with an equivalent story.

IN yet another marvellous episode in the long-continuing and God-knows-when-ending serial, Operation Bluff, the rich have managed to divert all the anger that should legitimately be addressed towards them. Once again the diversion has been in the direction of the working class : example, the massive hostility towards the steel strike. The industrialists of the diminishing competence, the financiers with friends in the Cabinet, the traders who get richer with every hiccough in the currency market and every deceit in international relations, the propertied who own vast stretches because of some lecherous or murderous ancestor : all these are respectable people, deferred to by the masses, pandered to by a mass media which has William Hickey instead of a heart and advertising instead of a brain. The working class is the big evil behind all Britain's problems. Every generation needs its whipping boy : the working class has become the target this time around. The hysteria with which the steel strike is being attacked, the passions that are being aroused, seem astonishing to a visitor. These are not the muted tones of democratic socialism or indeed social democracy; this is the harsh jingoism of war. Of course the working class has never made things easy for its defenders. In victory it is uncertain, in struggle it is fractious, and in defeat it is broken. It is lured into too many mistakes. At the moment the British working class seems headed for trouble. All the institutions are concentrating their heavy guns on it.

FOR us Playboy-hungry Indians, it is impossible to resist the temptation to pick up a copy upon arrival in the land of the free and the brave and the nude.

Particularly when Bo Derek is on the cover. Once again the American media has provided an international symbol of the wet dream, and once again I too have become a victim. What to do? But the most interesting thing I read in the March issue of Playboy had nothing to do with Bo Derek (the piece on her was awful even by the appalling standards set by tits and bum journalism). Playboy informed its readers that one place you can still buy chastity belts for the fornicating wife is in England. Apparently David Renwick of Sheffield hand forges them and sells them for 80 dollars each to those gentlemen inclined to keep a grip on their wives' morals in such a fashion.

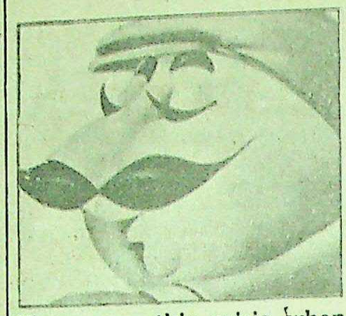
Pageantry and damp eyes

The Dalhousie Athletic Club, Calcutta, which turned 100 on March 8 this year, is the oldest football club in the country. There are no visible signs of age, however, and the lawns of the club are still as immaculately trimmed and green as they ever were. The tennis courts are still in excellent shape and the flower beds are still tended by loving hands. Like other clubs (which were founded later of course) on the Maidan, it is actually a tent-like construction but obviously very solid. There is thick green canvas wrapped around steel girders in order to provide a construction. The reason for this curious form of building is intriguing. When these Maidan clubs were founded, the Army authorities at nearby Fort William discovered that the buildings would obstruct their field of fire in case of an invasion. So the clubs had to resort to this form of tents which could be dismantled in a short while to give the Army an unrestricted field of fire.

The early history of the club is the history of the Indian Football Assiciation. Originally known as the Traders Club, it was founded by British residents working for Hamilton and Co, a jewellery concern in 1874. Six years later it assumed its present name although it is not known whether this had anything to do with Lord Dalhousie. When the Indian Football Association was founded in 1893, the Dalhousie Athletic donated a handsome trophy called the Trades Cup which later merged with the IFA Shield.

The club's president, the warm and popular Pearson Surita, spoke to Syed Nisar Mehdi Abdi on the last day of the centenary celebrations. "We may be 100 years old," he said, "but we are still a very happy family. That's what a club should be."

The Maharajah's puppeteers



There was this crisis when Air India were given a nine-hour ultimatum to remove one of their hoardings at Bombay's Nariman Point. The problem lay in the text of the copy, which ran "Sing, Charan, sing", a delightful spoof on that familiar sentence in every kindergarten reader, "Sing, mother, sing". This resulted in a discreet order to Hindustan Thomson Associates, the agency that handles Air India's advertisement campaign, to lay off politics. There had been other such capers before, like a hoarding which showed Acharya Kripalani and Krishna Menon dressed only in red underwear and competing against one another in a beauty contest. It even raised a major question in Parliament about the media's freedom to spoof our leaders. One recalls, however, that Krishna Menon laughed off the matter.

It is a sad end, according to Ashish Rajadhyaksha, if indeed it has really ended, to a fine age in Indian ad-advertising. Bobby Kooka's 25 by 10 hoardings outside the Air India building all had one thing in common—the stamp of excellence. Ivan Arthur, copy chief at HTA and the person presently behind the hoardings, says "It is one of the most subtle forms of PR that one can imagine. It attempts to give a social comment while simultaneously getting its message across. We are not a big airline, we aren't the best in the world, but we are nice people to travel with, fun people, who can laugh at ourselves. It is this subtlety that most of our imiators—people who have tried to reflect current topics in their hoardings—have failed to achieve". He held up a board to illustrate his point. The legend ran "Let's fly from this 'promise' land to 40 cities worldwide". A neat swipe at the election campaigns.

Martian garbage?

Skylab had fallen long ago, so what could this strange contraption be? One moment it was floating in the sky and the next it was in the nets of a group of fisherman off the Digha coast, in the Bay of Bengal. First there was mild consternation, followed by a flutter of excitement. Could it be a satellite? Whatever it was, there was sure to be a reward for its recovery, so fishing for the day was temporarily forgotten and everyone returned to terra firma, where the news spread faster than a forest fire. The village elders were summoned and the grey-beards were nonplussed as they looked at the strange object from one angle, then another. But none of them could fathom out what the strange object was. A consensus was taken and the UFO was delivered to the nearest police station. A few enquiries, a couple of telephone calls and the mystery was solved. It was nothing quite as exciting as a miniature spy satellite : only an errant piece of meteorological equipment. Newspaper reports described it as a brass pot mounted on a tripod and weighed down by an anchor. When the Calcutta Met Department was contacted, the Director told Tirthankar Ghosh that he had not been informed about the recovery. He did say, however, that weather balloons with scientific instruments were sent aloft to monitor the latest weather reports and conditions. We presume, then that this particular balloon came to grief. Or was the object part of a high-flying B-52?

Dry wit

Nikhil Bhattacharya

Geoff Boycott has a great reputation. Indeed he has two reputations, if we may be permitted to say so. Everyone knows he is a great batsman : that's the first. In cricketing circles he is looked on as a snob ; that's the second. But Haresh Munwani had a pleasant surprise when he met the English cricketer in Bombay when the team arrived for the Jubilee Test. He found Boycott very receptive and warm as the Yorkshireman seemed to be in a very friendly mood. He even referred to Gavaskar with such affection as if he was the boy next door, and referred to him in almost every second sentence. What was more conspicuous was that he did not want to say anything about his teammates. One of his more classic comments was "If anyone ever picked a team with just Sunny and me, he wouldn't have to worry about the other nine players. If Sunny and I made 30 runs each and remained not out, that would be half the battle won. You see, to do that would take us one whole day". Good Yorkshire humour, that.

Weird encounters of the stilted kind

It could have been a scene straight out of a science fiction fantasy. A "creature" about 12 feet high walked down one of the busiest thoroughfares of Madras. The consequences, of course, can be imagined. Everywhere, traffic came to a halt as drivers and passengers alike stared and rubbed their eyes to make sure they were not having visions. Pedestrians craned their necks to get a better look, while taking care at the same time to ensure that they were reasonably far away in case the monster should turn boisterous. Little children whimpered in fear, and one inveterate alcoholic swore he would never touch the stuff again.

Even while life in the vicinity was paralysed temporarily, the clear notes of a bugle rang out from the pinnacle of the Madras University clocktower. As if by way of echoes, more bugles joined in and within moments the area was crammed with curious people, wanting to know precisely what was going on. Then it turned out that the monsters were only humans on stilts. Unannounced, unheralded, Italian street theatre had come to Madras, by way of a street performance of Albatri, the dramatisation of a story written by French poet Baudelaire. A folk band kept everyone enthralled while the performers went through all their antics on the street. Like the Pied Piper of Hamlyn, the "creature" lured its audience—no longer apprehensive—along half a kilometre.

Actually, Tamil culture has its own variety of street theatre known as Tharu Koothu, which is very popular in rural areas. Yet, strangely enough, it took Remzo Vescovi's Teatro Tascabile di Bergamo to display the true potential of this unusual art form. Many citizens of Madras who missed the show, adds Ashok Kamath, have reason to rue it.

What could be 'better'?

Sunday, March 9 was the Big Day, Invitation Cup day. There were 26,000 people at the RCTC (Royal Calcutta Turf Club), half of them the scarred veterans of innumerable battles with their bookies; the regulars who do not mind whether it is a horse race, a donkey race or a zebra race just so long as they get the chance to lay their bets. The rest of the mammoth crowd, who probably wouldn't even be able to tell the difference between horses, donkeys or zebras, were at the racecourse simply because it was the biggest social event of the year. Certainly everyone got what they wanted. The socialites paraded and were admired, the punters betted and lost and the newcomers experienced the hysteria that is racing.

There were two other attractions as a bonus. First there was West Bengal Chief Minister Jyoti Basu. Second, adds S. Vijayraghavan, was a yogi tipster, a self styled sadhu giving money-back guarantees if his tips proved to be duds.

Charlie Bronson and all that jazz ...

Satyendranath Mahalanobis

The Jazzfest that was held in Calcutta in late February caused a great deal of excitement for music fans in this city. It was a very festive atmosphere at the grounds of St Paul's Cathedral; indeed it was a welcome change to see so much life and colour in the precincts of a church. The stars were celebrities of course, but not in the same category as cricketers, although there were autograph hunters by the dozen. On the first day, however, there was great excitement. Whisper had it that the famous barrel-chested actor Charles Bronson had arrived and was somewhere in the audience. Everywhere, everybody stared hard in the hope of finding the actor first. One timid young lass spotted someone who fitted the description and told her friend sitting alongside her. The friend told another friend who in turn told yet another friend. But no one wanted to go and see if the rumour was really a rumour or if it had its basis in truth. Eventually the friend of a friend of somebody else's friend decided to beard the lion in his den and clutching an autograph book, walked up to where the great man sat. He smiled at her and signed. She was ecstatic and went back to her friends giggling with glee. Together they examined the signature. It was not Charles Bronson. Nor was it Casimir Buchinsky (the actor's real name). The signature read "Manfred Schoof". Enquiries revealed that Bronson's double was actually a trumpeter with the group Globe Unity. But the friend of a friend of somebody else's friend was still not convinced. So she stood around till Bronson/Schoof left. Alas, though the features tallied exactly with, those of the actor, the man was not half as broad as the Hollywood he-man.

Everything was going according to schedule. The parents of the young girl had selected a suitably handsome young man and the date for the wedding had been finalised. There was the usual gaiety and last-minute excitement, but there were no portents of what was to happen. On the appointed day, when the car arrived for the bride, it was discovered that the house was surrounded by young men of the locality who had an earnest plea to make. The groom, they insisted, was a notorious character with whom marriage was a way of life. It appeared that he had been married several times before, the sole intention being the lure of a dowry. While these explanations were being made, the groom and his father managed to slip away, but they did not escape for long. The bride's family, accompanied by the young men, arrived on the trickster's doorstep and proved that their allegations were true.

The groom and his father were then looked up in a room, reports Biswaranjan Sarkar, while the local people appealed to the young men to replace the groom. Eventually, one young man, who was asleep in his house, was awoken and told the story. He agreed to marry the girl, but insisted on speaking to her first. His wish was granted and he explained to the girl that though he was educated, he was unemployed and in addition, had also served a term as a political prisoner. The girl, undaunted, agreed to the wedding.

That was not the end of the sort story. The trickster was made to part with his clothes for his replacement and the wedding went off smpothly. The next day, the rogue had his head shaved and was made to run seven rounds of the locality, interspersed with thrashing.

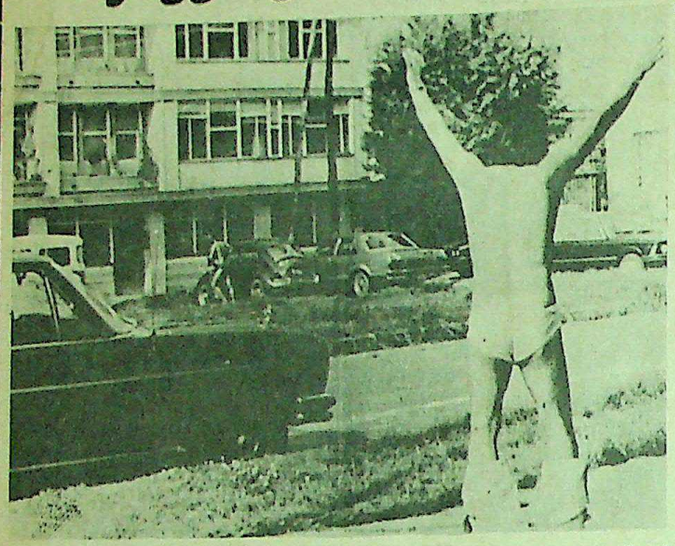
Jogging to ransom



February 27 was the Dominican Republic's Independence Day. Little did the 27 diplomats suspect that they would soon be imprisoned and kept hostage by a group of guerillas belonging to the April 19th Movement (M-19). All the guerillas wanted was the release of political prisoners of whom they named 311, 50 million dollars and admission by the Colombian Government that it had been holding show trials and torturing prisoners. There was no means of communication between the guerillas and those negotiating the release of the hostages till a reporter ventured forth to the Dominican Embassy with barely his underwear and a two-way radio. It is believed that the Colombian President, Julio Cesar Turbay is unwilling to bend down to the demands of the guerillas. He has a reason since the guerillas cannot be trusted at all. When they went to take over the Embassy they were in the guise of joggers and they carried weapons in their sports bags. They looked so innocent that no one bothered them. Military rulers, beware of joggers with sports bags on their shoulders.

The second sex arrives

Women might after all be allowed to make an entry into a hallowed male precinct—the French Academy. There is a vacant chair among the 40 caused by the death of Roger Caillois. Within the forbidden walls of the erudite institution on the Left bank of the Seine a bitter struggle has been going on since last December between those who have championed the cause of French authoress, Marguerite Yourcenar, and Jean Dorst, the director of the Paris Natural History Museum. The elections had been postponed after an exchange of insults among the intellectuals. Most young members of the Academy have sponsored me Marguerite Yourcenar. One such is Jean d'Ormesson, the former editor of Le Figaro. He is 56 years old and has had to be at the receiving end of the insults. He has been called a "leftist" and a "young hooligan". Mme Yourcenar is definitely a favourite of the young since she had her passport restored in record time by 54-year-old the French Justice Minister and author Alain Peyrefitte, also an Academy member. She had become a naturalised American citizen and has a home in New England for the last 30 years. She also has dramatist Eugene Ionesco and Felicien Marceau supporting her. Among her opponents are Andre Chamson who has named her a "Loch Ness monster". The other is Jean Dutourd, the famous columnist who said: "I am against a woman in the Academy". For him the greatest honour one could do to a woman was to admire her without electing her. But his words proved useless. The members of the Academy did elect after 345 years by 20-12 votes the Belgian-born 76-year-old Marguerite Yourcenar.

Shakespeare to provide relief

There were nine young "Elizabethans" rolling off "words, words, words" written by the illustrious Bard of Avon. They were trying to read the complete works of William Shakespeare — all 37 plays, 154 sonnets and 5, poems consisting of 107,098 lines—in an effort to break the world record of 37 hrs 22 mins. This speed reading performance took place on February 29 in England. The competitors were drama students from Bretton Hall College, Wakefield and the Royal Holloway College of London, the present record holders. Altogether ten students were chosen to exercise their vocal chords and tongues. However, one woman had to drop out as she had chicken pox. The readers looked after their voices and their stomachs with sausages and chips, throat tablets, peppermints, aspirin tablets and water. All this frenzy and speed were indeed for a good cause since the students were collecting aid for OXFAM relief.

Fourthcoming ?

This should be a lesson to all weight watchers and fans of that special American ambassador with only three credentials: a hefty physique, a big mouth and a beautiful wife. He was not successful in arranging the Olympic boycott of the African countries. Perhaps that spurred him on and he declared that he was going to make a comeback by winning the world heavyweight title for the fourth time in succession. And Muhammad Ali, preacher and boxing champ—in that order, since he prefers to do more preaching now — meant business. He went in to his Deer Lake training camp weighing 251 pounds and by March 4, after his rigorous workout he was down to 243 pounds only.

Olympian interpretations

Whether the Moscow Games eventually take place or not, the Soviet Union is going ahead with preparations. And for the Russians everything is centred around politics: even the students being trained as interpreters for the Olympics are being closely scrutinised under a political microscope. For a start, their political knowledge has to be as vast. In addition, of course, their knowledge of a second language has to be considerable. The Komsomol members of Moscow, therefore, have the best chances of being selected as interpreters since they are, the only ones who can demonstrate their dependability by their attendance at political meetings. Consequently, preparations are also afoot at the Moskovsky Komsomolets Institute for oral political examinations and for the assessment of socio-political awareness.

A street named home

Around 52,000 people needed houses in the Dutch capital of Amsterdam. So what did they do? On March 3, the homeless set up barricades on the streets and squatted. The authorities acted. More than 1,000 troops and policemen using tanks and armoured cars cleared the barricades. But they had nothing against the squatters so they let them stay on the streets. According to the Amsterdam city council the Dutch capital has not seen such violence since 1975. However, at that time the issue was different. The protest was against the demolition of houses to accomodate a new metro. The city fathers hope that the tempers of the protesters will cool down by April 30 when Princess Beatrix will become queen. Meanwhile, the city council is undaunted. It is planning to bring new legislation against protesting on streets and it will then be punishable by fines. Till then, for the Dutch, a street is a home away from home.

Not cricket

Football players in Italy are believed to be playing a different type of game. Recently, a fruit dealer and a restaurant owner filed a complaint on behalf of a gambling syndicate, which had suffered heavy losses, that 27 players of 12 teams including two national stars were guilty of taking bribes to change the outcome of the league games. This upset the gamblers who had lost a lot of money. The Italian state prosecutor's office has already started investigating although no proof has yet been offered. The two national players supposedly involved are Paolo Rossi of Perugia and Lazio's striker, Bruno Giordano. Rossi and other Italian footballers earn millions and are idolised by the fans. Meanwhile, those who filed the compiaint had fled Rome and are "in fear of their lives". Different type of ball game, what?

Second in line

Their prince was sure to win. After all, why wouldn't he? He was riding the best horse — Long Wharf — owned by the American millionaire-art collector, Paul Mellon. In fact, such was the confidence in both jockey and horse, that punters and gullible housewives put a lot of their money on them. They made him favourite at 13-8 to win the two-mile race. But Charles, Prince of Wales, and heir apparent to throne of England, betrayed their trust. At his first public race — the Mad Hatters' private sweepstake, at Plumpton on March 4. — he proved that he was content to remain number two. The one who beat the Prince was an amateur rider and an equestrian journalist from the BBC, Derek Thompson. Others who raced were Richard Meade and Vic Lowndes, controller of the Playboy empire. At the end of the race Prince Charles limped out and surveyed his domain of torn betting slips for his horse and told the 5,300 record crowd : "I would like to say how sorry I am to those who have put so much money on me ... next time I shall know better how to catch up on the man in front".

Marrying for the cause

The American hostages might not be pleased with what Imam Khomeini of Iran has done for their release and their future but there are two young Iranians who should be grateful to him. They are Miss Zahran Gholami Balouk, a nurse in the intensive care unit of the Mehoi Rezai hospital near Teheran where the Ayatollah was recovering. The other is Mr Ahmad Davudi Haghighatalab, a technician of the same hospital. The two lost their hearts to each other and what better proposition than being married by the great man himself? The Ayatollah did just that and added an autographed Koran.

Heart warming

Major Catastrophe had been given a new pacemaker some time ago. Although he has lived life to the full he has a weak heart : hence the pacemaker. When the operation had been performed at the Bristol University Veterinary Hospital, England, the Major had revived a shade earlier than expected and in trying to be his usual old energetic self had dislodged a wire in his "second heart". The doctors had no other option but to operate on him once again to connect the lead. Major Catastrophe is a close friend of Mr and Mrs Barry Harcombe of Somerset. He is a yellow labrador.

Whose Pakistan ?

Smart, fair, immaculately dressed Salmaan Taseer, free - thinking Pakistani journalist, is a Zia-hater with a difference. He is not afraid of speaking out, sometimes even a trifle too loudly. Expectedly, he's got into trouble, but doesn't seem to bother.

After a telephonic appointment, Mr Taseer strode into our Delhi office one day and sat down to tell us what he thought of Zia, the army and the Americans. Author of Bhutto : A political biography, Taseer is a wistful admirer of the dead leader, and thinks, as many others do, that his ghost haunts the junta. "Bhutto is still very much a symbol in Pakistan, and the People's Party is still very much intact with opportunist elements staying on," he holds. In Lahotri, for instance, which is Mr Bhutto's hometown, the People's Party still commands the allegiance of 80 to 90 per cent of the electorate. Popular feeling all over the country, even among the peasantry who form as much as 80 per cent of the population, is still very obviously against General Zia, and for the PPP, now being led by Bhutto's widow and indefatigable daughter.

As for the Army, most of the Generals around Zia know they "are riding on the back of a tiger". Nobody would like falling off now, but are waiting for the right moment. The Afghanistan flare-up has only given the strongarm dictator an ideal excuse to go on—just the kind he was waiting for.

Things have come to a sorry pass already. Prices are much higher than in India and people are tired of being ruled by Generals, Taseer says. Not many political prisoners remain in jail now, even the dissident journalist Salaamat Ali may be let off, because the junta is scared of widespread trouble. "They know protest would become uncontrollable," Taseer remarks. Zia has enough trouble already: Pakistan lacks an industrial base, the oil bill, now a massive burden, has shot up to a billion dollars, and the trade deficit is about Rs two billion.

If the people do not support Zia, who does? "The mullahs and the Jamaat," Taseer replies. "But Islamic fervour is confined only to the urban petty bourgeoisie. The Jamaat-e-Islami won only three seats in 1972. Its only strength lies in a well-knit organisation: it can muster 20,000 people at the drop of a hat." But such is his bankruptcy of support, he has taken to entertaining mullahs from abroad: "A delegation of mullahs from China had visited Pakistan, as if there aren't enough in Pakistan," the journalist remarks, smiling.

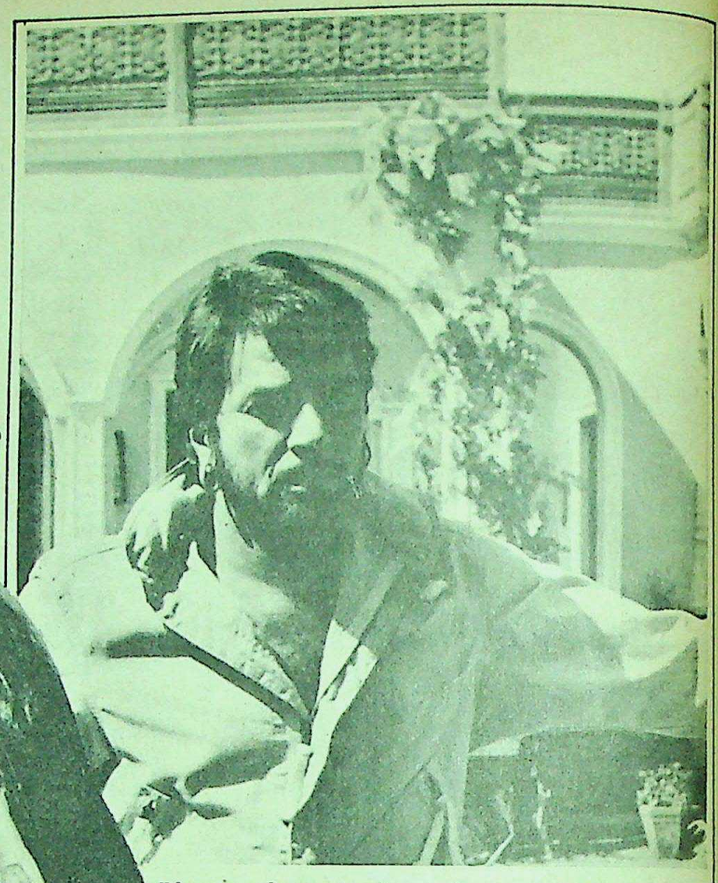
WHILE talking of female stars, and Mumtaz's attempts to come back to films, it is Dimple Khanna, who looks a real knockout, with her milk-and-roses skin, her svelte, smart appearance in spite of two kids. She is still capable of bagging roles by the dozen. But given a choice between family life with Rajesh Khanna and a career, she says the choice she has made is giving her lasting happiness—how long would a career have lasted?

IN contrast, one thinks of Neetu Singh the sweet little girl who never gave herself airs—the higher she got in films, the humbler she seemed to be.

While other girls declare that they want a husband and a home to settle down, it is only this girl who truly loved setting up a home with Chtniu Kapoor. So, while she loved him she quietly completed all her films, refused more offers at the very peak of her career, and had a date fixed for marriage which was comfortably ahead of her last shooting-day. There are girls who follow the dictates of the heart, proved Neetu, but not at the cost of giving others heart-attacks.

Dimple : still vivacious young mom



Dharmendra, sturdy and evergreen

Dinesh Nagar

AND age is no factor when you meet Dharmendra who still looks like the big top male hero that he is—not a washout. When be walked in along with a young 20-year-old boy at a muhurat, they looked like brothers—but the boy was his son, who has been in London training for an academic course. Whether his films become a hit or flop, he is still the same, loyal as ever, both to his family and to Hema. He is finally planning to direct a film, based on an idea which has been shaping in his mind over the past year or so—it is a comedy and he is the hero of the film. He expects to start on it by the yearend.

AN established actress remarked that the problem with today's stars is that they won stardom all too quickly. That's why they behave as irresponsibly as they do (Parveen, Yogita, Sachin, etc). She advocates a good, sound knocking around the doors of fame as a recipe for steady, reliable performances ■

A COUPLE of years ago actor Vijayakumar would have pledged his "loyalty" to MGR in his own blood. The young actor who's married to Manjula, one of MGR's celluloid favourites, not only joined MGR's party, but also propagated the ideology of his "annan" on screen. In more than a dozen films, Vijayakumar was seen wearing MGR medals. He also reformed incorrigible alcoholics by showing them pictures of MGR and he sang songs extolling the virtues of his guru.

But such films didn't click. And Vijayakumar who certainly nurtured ambitions of turning into a minor MGR slowly began to train his eyes on new pastures, and even thought of leaving of the Party. But then he took this decision only after the recent election results. And even then, he didn't walk out of the Party. He slowly let the impression go around that he was planning to leave MGR's fold. His presence at Sivaji Ganesan's son's wedding, and his anxiety to pose for pictures along with Karunanidhi and Sivaji provided enough clues as to how his mind was working. The diehard MGR fans and also the troublemakers didn't stomach Vijayakumar's "betrayal". On March 2, the day the AIADMK organised a huge rally to protest against the dissolution of the state assembly, posters and hoardings of Vijayakumar's forthcoming films were torn, and some abusive phone calls were made to his wife. This might have made Vijayakumar rather happy. For quite some time now, he has been in tthe "dog-house", and now since he's in the "limelight", he hopes that some producers will realise that he's alive—and is being kicked around by unruly movie fans.

A YEAR after his maiden venture was released, M. G. C. Sukumar, nephew of MGR (whom he tries to imitate) released another film, Karadi. But the emphasis seemed to be on the bear, and Sukumar who carries a beer-barrel in place of his stomach, seemed totally lost in the film. Well, inspite of the bear's presence, the film hasn't made much of an impact: not even on children.

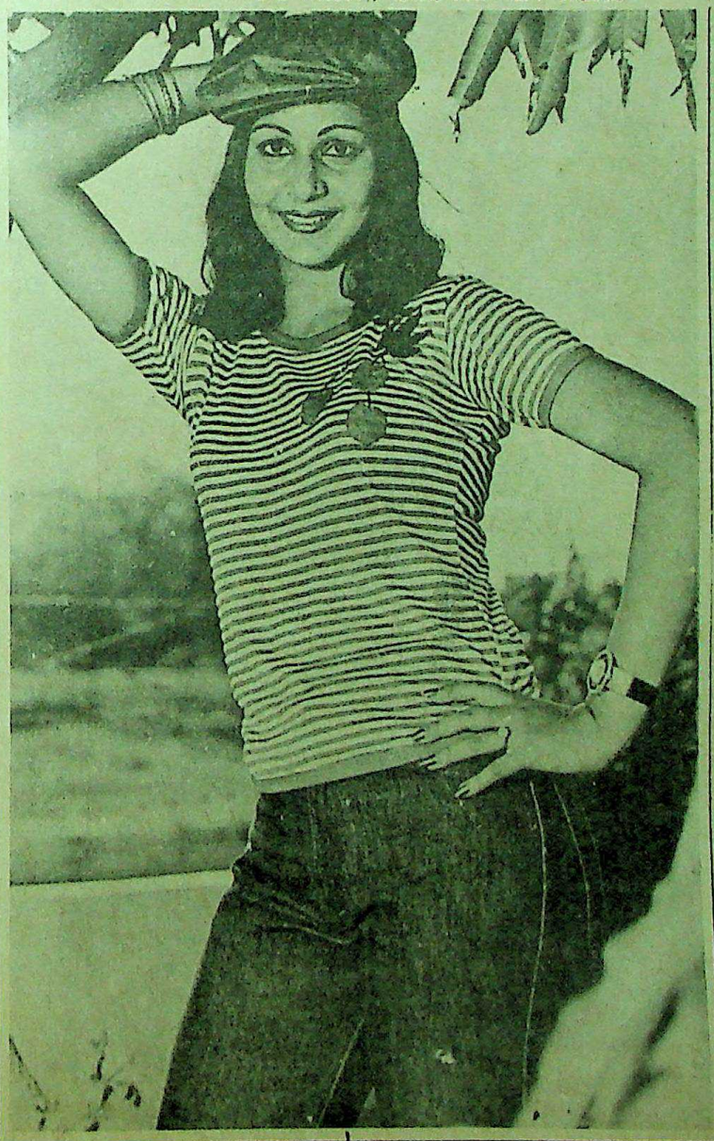
WHAT if Sivaji Ganesan has decided to leave Manmohan Desai's Desh Preeme? After all, his ambition to act in a Hindi film was fulfilled years ago when he was given a meaty role in Sridhar's Dharti. The film flopped badly, and Sivaji must have thought that Desh Premee would make him famous all over the country. And now that he has quit the film after some misunderstandings cropped up, he gives the impression that he was least interested in the venture.

Frankly speaking every South Indian hero or heroine has the strong urge to succeed in Hindi films. Even MGR had a couple of his films dubbed in Hindi. One of them was even entitled Love in Kashmir but these films didn't do well.

THE dusky actress sponsored by an editor cum producer just couldn't make it but her "godfather" used to keep her happy by his generous gifts: never mind, the highly puritanical and moralistic stories he penned. But then the man got too ambitious, and produced a lavish Hindi film which proved an utter failure. Now he's making a quickie in Tamil with new faces but his favourite mare isn't in it. Won't she be worried by his cold attitude? I bet she's going bonkers.

RATHI AGNIHOTRI is excited about two of her new films. Ullasa Paravaigal pairs her with Kamalahasan, and the film has had an excellent opening. The second film's her maiden Kannada venture Kalinga in which she's paired with Vishnuvardhan. And of course the prized film is Aur Ek Itihas, a remake of an all-time Telugu hit Maro Charitra.

Rathi: all set to create history with "Aur Ek Itihas"



Subha

RAJNI SHARMA (of Balika Bodhu) is yet another Bombay star who's looking around for a break in Tamil and Telugu films. Apart from Kashmir Kadali in Tamil in which she's paired with up-coming hero Rajkumar, she has a couple of Telugu films on hand.

MALATHI, the small-time Kannada starlet who was seen in Kanneshwara Rama and Kaadu Kudure isn't exactly busy these days. And she would have gladly accepted a role in M. S. Sathyu's much discussed, up-coming Kannada film Bara. But she claims some jealous people gave the impression to Sathyu that she was busy with a couple of other units and hence she couldn't give suitable dates.

IS it a hit or a flop? This is a regular question that's asked about Kallukkul Iram, a film sponsored by director Bharatiraja, whose last four films have been hits. Directed by his cameraman P. S. Nivas, the new film has also featured Bharatiraja in a pivotal role. The first week's collections were truly impressive and the black market was cheerful. But many among the audience yawned and a few even walked out. But then such things did happen in the case of his previous film Niram Maratha Pookal: pronounced a immediate flop, it slowly warmed up and continued doing reasonably good business for 20 weeks at a stretch.

GIRISH KASARAVALLI'S second venture Akramana in Kannada was a slick affair compared to his first, Ghatashraddha. But the film couldn't do very well, even though it was exempted from taxes.

Controlled aggression

ENGLISH PLAYERS rarely have the opportunity to compete in the Soviet Union. Part of the reason is that, despite the great chess activity in that part of the world, comparatively few international competitions are held there. Most Soviet tournaments are played within the framework of regional or national championship systems and so do not entail the invitation of overseas players.

However, in 1975, with the aid of the Robert Silk Chess Fellowship, I had the good fortune to obtain an invitation to the Alekhine Memorial Tournament. This was quite a coup as the only other English player ever to take part in this event was Harry Golombek in 1956. More recently, also with the aid of the Robert Silk Fellowship, Bill Hartston took part in this year's Keres Memorial Tournament in Tallinn. As always with Soviet tournaments the event was very strong but Bill emerged with a highly creditable 50 per cent score with only Petrosyan 12 (from 16); Tal, Vaganyan 11½; Bronstein 10; Sax and Veingold 9½ ahead of him.

Bill Hartston will probably be most familiar to readers as the highly entertaining co-presenter of BBC2's 'The Master Game'. Just a few years ago he was undoubtedly the strongest player in the country and, although he may since have dropped one or two places in the English rankings, his play is nevertheless probably stronger now than then. I give a good illustration of his controlled aggression taken from Tallinn.

THOUGH bridge writers seldom comment on the fact, the most difficult part of the game is to discard well on an opponent's long suit. You have to gauge the declarer's distribution and you have to tell partner what is happening. The defenders on both sides failed when both Norway and France reached Seven Spades on these cards:

Dealer, South. Love all.

	♠ K J 9 8 7 ♥ A ♦ A 8 ♣ 8 7 5 4 2
♠ 5 3 2 ♥ J 8 5 3 ♦ Q 7 4 ♣ 10 9 6	N W E S	♠ 6 ♥ 10 9 6 4 ♦ J 10 9 6 5 2 ♣ Q J
	♠ A Q 10 4 ♥ K Q 7 2 ♦ K 3 ♣ A K 3

When France played in Seven Spades from the South position, West led a trump. To ruff a heart in the long trump hand obviously gains nothing, so Lebel played off five rounds of trumps, discarding ♣ 3. East let go a heart, subjecting his partner to a criss-cross squeeze.

	♠ — ♥ A ♦ 8 ♣ 8 7 5 4 2
♠ — ♥ J 8 5 3 ♦ — ♣ 10 9 6	N W E S	♠ — ♥ 10 9 6 ♦ J 10 ♣ Q J
	♠ — ♥ K Q 7 2 ♦ K ♣ A K

The next diamond destroys West.

At the other table the declarer had things easier. West, not seeing the value of his ♣ 10 9 6, let go a club on the fifth spade. Using ♥ A for entry, the declarer made five spades, five clubs, two diamonds and one heart.

No doubt East, at both tables, should have let go his two clubs. These could hardly win a trick and the situation becomes immediately clear to partner. But West, at the second table, where North was the declarer, could have drawn an inference from the play of the five trumps. The loser in the North hand could only be a club, because obviously a losing diamond could have been ruffed.

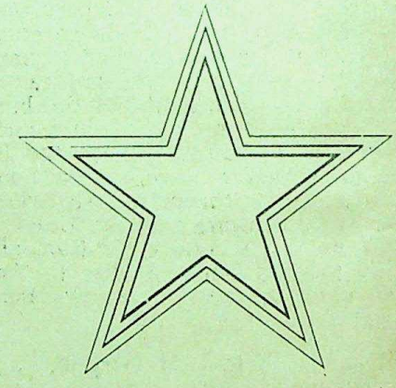
BY ITS NATURE, philately is one of the cultural pursuits that blind people cannot enjoy. But an interesting and thought-provoking collection can be formed of stamps which have been issued in tribute to blind celebrities, among them John Milton, Leonhard Euler, the Swiss mathematician, and Homer, who is traditionally supposed to have become blind. Louis Braille, who has already been honoured by French and Russian stamps, is portrayed on a new Luxemburg stamp which marks the 125th anniversary of his death. A companion stamp honours Marguerite de Busbach, a seventeenth century pioneer of girls' education in Luxemburg.



A NEW series of definitive stamps being issued in the Falkland Islands features some of the ships which have carried mail and cargo for the islanders during the 145 years of British administration. The 4p stamp (above) shows the Fitzroy, which was built at Leith in 1931 and sailed between Port Stanley, in the Falklands, and Montevideo, in Uruguay, until 1957, when it was brought home to Grays, Essex, to be broken up. One of the smallest ships featured in the series is the Foam, on the 20p stamp. A Portsmouth-built schooner of 88 tons, it averaged six return voyages every year between Port Stanley and Montevideo during the 1860s. The new stamps replace a series featuring wild flowers of the Falklands, which has been in use for 10 years.

BANGALORE : Ignorance of the fact that the buses of the State Road Transport Corporation have no brakes is as inexcusable as the ignorance of law. This was the lesson that a former minister of state was taught by a driver of the KSRTC recently. An incident which had imparted him this lesson was narrated in the state assembly by M. C. Nanaiah during a discussion on a bus accident near Nelamangala. According to Mr Nanaiah, he had signalled to a bus coming from the opposite direction to allow him pass the narrow bridge he had already entered in his car. But, he was shocked to find that the bus did not stop, but came towards the car. The driver of the bus after a while approached him and questioned if he had any sense and if he did not care for his life. The next question posed by the driver was whether he was not aware that the KSRTC buses do not have brakes. Mr Nanaiah could do nothing but apologise to the driver—Indian Express' (J. He said that will remind him that his son took birth at the time of the eclipse— Deccan Herald (R. Mulathy, Bangalore)

BELLARY: A new mode of punishment has been evolved by the Sholapur police to curb the sale of cinema tickets in the black market. A slate with the names of the blackmarketeer and the film written in bold letters on it, is hung to the neck of the person and he is paraded through the main streets of the city. The new method started by Messers A. S. Inamdar, SP, and Sagar, Sub-Inspector, has rid the city of black marketing in cinema tickets. Theatre owners cooperated with the police department and college students were among those found selling tickets in the black market. A similar mode of punishment is being adopted to curb gambling, preparation of illicit liquor and pick pockets—Deccan Herald (K. P. Raju, Bangalore)

SRINAGAR: The people of Kashmir had a heart-easing experience when an old Hindu woman was carried to the burning ghat by Muslims. They also requisitioned the services of a Hindu priest who performed the last rites of the old woman. The woman who belonged to Zaindar Mohalla in Srinagar had reportedly none to look after her. Her own son had also left her to the mercy of God. But Muslim neighbours came forward to dispose of the dead woman's body. They also defrayed all the expenses at the burning ghat—Indian Express (D. BANGALORE : Complaints that official machinery moves at snail's pace is no news these days. But its operation at agonisingly slow speed afflicts both layman and legislator became evident in the Assembly today (February 27) when a member's question came up for hearing after three years. The member himself wondered whether there was any relevance for him to seek an answer after such a long period. Speaker, P. Venkataramana advised the member to take it in the stride since "such delays" do occur. The question tabled by Mr V. M. Ghadi (Congress I) in 1977 had sought the Government reply on difficulties caused to farmers due to the Marketing Society stopping collection of levy paddy in Huliyal taluk of North Kanara. The question hour in fact ended within half an hour since very few questions were listed on the agenda. When Mr B. B. Sayanak (MES) complained against this, Mr Venkataramana said he would pull up the departments concerned and see that the replies were furnished promptly—Deccan Herald (Sivaram G., Bangalore)

HONEST TIMES

THE daily newspapers in the capital did an unprecedented thing by declaring a holiday on the occasion of Holi, so readers had to go without newspapers on March 3. The National Herald was the only paper which was published on the day after Holi. While most of the papers announced on their front pages that there would be no edition on March 3 because of a holiday on Holi (March 2), one paper was honest enough to admit the reason for the unusual decision. Only the Times of India announced that the decision to skip an edition was due to an "acute newsprint shortage". The dailies in the capital are reportedly considering the possibilities of adopting the European system of a six-day week in view of the newsprint supply position. While it is too early to say whether the new scheme will materialise at all, the attempt on the part of one of the dailies to cash in on the inability of others to come out on March 3 backfired and that paper too was closed for Holi. This newspaper suffered a prolonged strike last year, when it reportedly helped other groups tide over their newsprint crisis by supplying them newsprint from its quota at no premium. This management now went to all those managements seeking a "return" for the favour done last year. The smaller newspapers wriggled out by pleading that the amount of newsprint needed by this large group for one day's printing was perhaps equivalent to a small paper's weekly requirement. Two large groups were blunt in their refusal. One of them said that newsprint was available, but at a premium. When it was pointed out that the strike-bound management had not sought any premium while supplying newsprint last year, the Marwari owner of the other group is supposed to have said, "If you were foolish in business, that does not mean I should follow suit". Another group was more candid. Newsprint was available in exchange for the favour shown last year, but only after March 3, they said, pointing out that they could not allow one of the competitors to cash in on their inability to bring out an edition.

DISAPPOINTMENTS

COLD WATER was thrown on the hopes of many Ministerial aspirants twice within a week in early March when C. M. Stephen and Veerendra Patil were inducted into the Union Cabinet along with four junior Ministers. Apart from bigwigs like H. N. Bahuguna, who had cause to feel that they were being kept out of the Cabinet in order to belittle them, there were many young MPs who were hoping to make it to the Ashoka Hall of Rashtrapati Bhavan before the commencement of the Budget Session on March 11. C. M. Stephen was inducted because he had been promised a berth in the Cabinet as soon as he was elected to the Lok Sabha. Although he was expected to get an important portfolio, he instead relieved Bhishma Narayan Singh, the Minister for Parliamentary Affairs, of the additional Communications portfolio. Apparently Mrs. Gandhi did not want a debacle of the sort when the Rajya Sabha amended the vote of thanks to the President in the last session. Therefore, apart from ensuring that B. N. Singh devotes all his attention to the Parliamentary Affairs portfolio, she has made Sitaram Kesari as his junior Minister. Pranab Mukherjee also being in charge of the crucial Civil Supplies portfolio urgently needed an experienced junior Minister like Z. R. Ansari, who was earlier a junior Minister in the Commerce Ministry as well. But the most significant appointment was that of Patil as Petroleum Minister. The Works and Housing Minister, P. C. Sethi, had been holding temporary charge of this important portfolio and being a former Petroleum Minister, was devoting most of his time to his additional charge. He has also expressed the desire to quit the Housing portfolio in favour of Petroleum. But his public actions and statements in the recent past must have embarrassed the PM, who did not perhaps went Sethi to be given a portfolio like Petroleum, on which many questions are bound to be asked in the coming session due to the diesel and kerosene shortages.

EFFICIENCY AT PREMIUM

THE AICC (I) headquarters at New Delhi's 24 Akbar Road has been placed under efficient management. B. Dutta, Mrs. Gandhi's former security officer, has been appointed the administrative officer of the office. Dutta, a former Deputy Superintendent of police attached to Mrs. Gandhi prior to 1977, was retained as her security man even after her defeat. He retired from service a year ago and Mrs. Gandhi's confidence in him was such that she immediately offered him a job in her personal secretariat. Dutta's efficiency was evident during the days when the Lok Sabha results started pouring in early January. Even before the police authorities realised the possible outcome of the initial trends broadcast by All India Radio, Dutta had streamlined the security arrangements at the "likely PM's" house by putting up rope barricades to control crowds and deputing personal staff of the house to guard the barriers. Now that he has been posted at the AICC (I) headquarters, it is evident that Mrs. Gandhi wants to ensure that the Party office functions efficiently. His presence has also scared many; after all, he is a former security policeman.

Just a little something. To show you care.

Remember, precious things come in small parcels. With a small name. HMT.

You'd hate to admit it . . . even to yourself.

But you do take your wife just a little bit for granted.

You're not exactly the tyrant about the house. But you do know that your way is the way it's going to be!

And it's not that you don't appreciate all that your wife does for you. It's just that somehow you forget to tell her.

Perhaps the time has come to do it.

Now, you're not going to embarrass yourself with a long speech on the subject.

No, no.

Just a little HMT will say it all. Beautifully.

All the care we put into it talks. For you.

So give her an HMT today.

She'll treasure it for all the years to come.

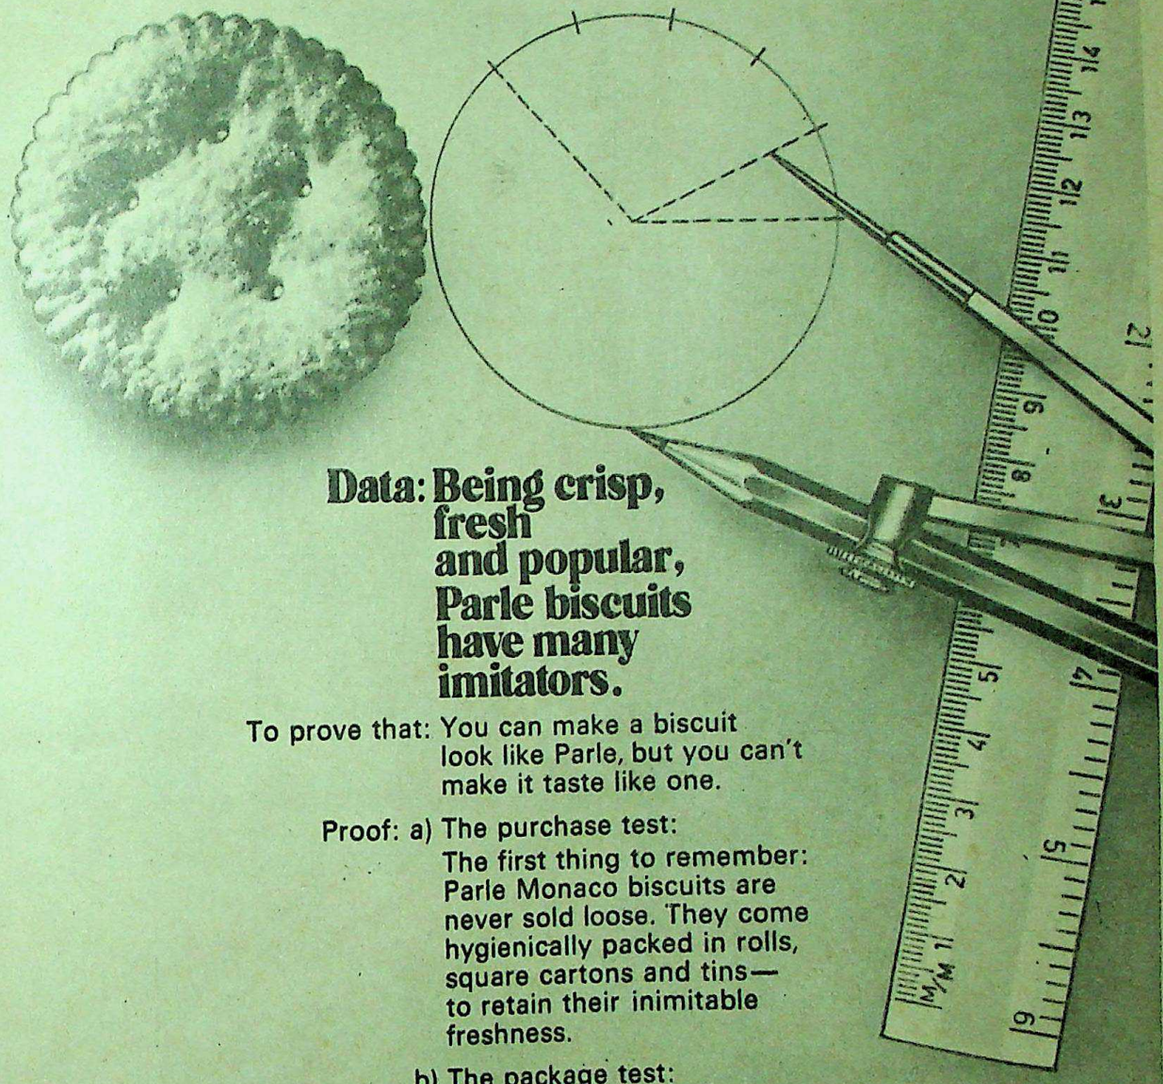
Theorem:

You needn't go round in circles to get a genuine Parle Monaco biscuit.



Data: Being crisp, fresh and popular, Parle biscuits have many imitators.

To prove that: You can make a biscuit look like Parle, but you can't make it taste like one.

Proof: a) The purchase test:
The first thing to remember: Parle Monaco biscuits are never sold loose. They come hygienically packed in rolls, square cartons and tins— to retain their inimitable freshness.

b) The package test:
It's easy to recognise the attractive Parle Monaco pack on any shelf. To make doubly sure, check out the name P-A-R-L-E on the pack.

c) The taste test:
Take a bite of the biscuit. If it's crisp and flaky you can be sure it's a genuine Parle Monaco.

We don't care which brands are in the third, fourth, fifth and other places.

Would you?

The only reason one Bush two-in-one has sold more than the other Bush two-in-one is that it was introduced in the market earlier.

And both Bush two-in-ones together are outselling all the other brands put together.

In fact, the only choice you may need to make will be which Bush two-in-one to buy.

Because we believe that it's always great to have a choice . . . even between the best.

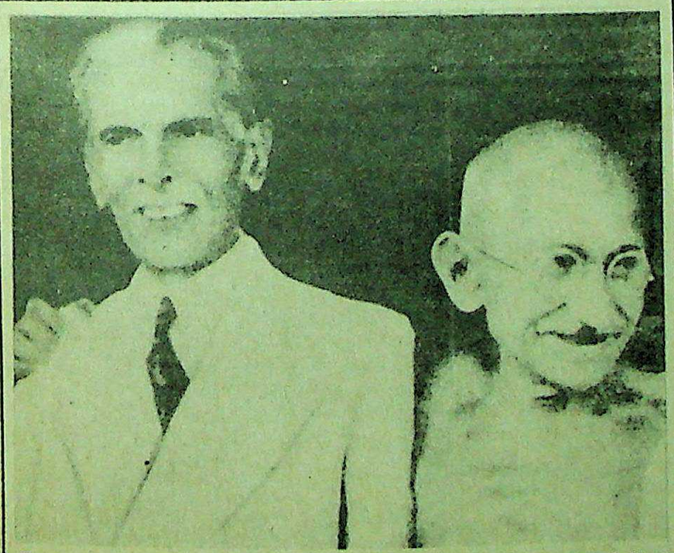
March 23, 1980

Our armed forces have come a long way since the debacle of 1962 and today there is a quiet confidence in Delhi over the country's security; this notwithstanding the new tensions in the region after the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. What is the substance of our defence preparedness vis-a-vis China and Pakistan?

Robert Mugabe's massive victory in the Zimbabwe polls astounded everybody. The whites, whose shock bordered on trauma. The blacks, whose elation knew no bounds. And even the British whose hopes for a broad-based multi-Party coalition evaporated.



Forty years ago the Muslim League passed a resolution that laid the foundation stone for the ultimate creation of Pakistan. But Pakistan, though a viable state, did not solve the 'Muslim problem' in the subcontinent. Today Indian Muslims are settling down to a long hard struggle for a better deal for themselves within India.

Freud to fantasy

PRITISH NANDY'S article "Sex and the sizzling sanyasi" (February 24) eloquently explained Rajneesh's philosophy that at a certain point, both experiences, the sexual and divine, mingle and become one, which is then samadhi. The Bhagwan has most intelligently understood Freud's interpretation of human psychology and sexual theses, which considerably influenced modern society. Where Freud ended, the Bhagwan took up the thread to develop a novel theory of salvation. Now, in pursuit of a fuller life and samadhi, frustrated men and women from East and West, even their children, are flocking around the Bhagwan to realise the divine by spontaneous sexual action, and dancing naked according to free will.
Vipin Viplawi, Mongyhr

NO LOVE or samadhi can ever happen without the will of god. May I ask what the mind is? Who gives us inspiration? Nothing can happen without someone behind it, and behind all these occurrences is god. The man who realises the existence of god may explain what samadhi is. Sexual intercourse is nothing but a biological urge for satisfaction. Besides love comes into play in a variety of experiences, not sex alone.
N. R. Das Gupta, Kharagpur

MR NANDY's article was a lot of well-written mush. The impression one gets after reading it is that Bhagwan Rajneesh is a rational man with a misdirected sense of divine mission. Why doesn't he have the honesty to advertise himself as a sex-therapist, rather than a godman? Religion, one hopes, is a way to god rather than a way to achieving prolonged orgasm. God help us the day we equate the two!
S. Sanyal, Calcutta

RAJNEESH's conjecture that man "had his first luminous glimpse of Samadhi during the experience of intercourse" is far from the truth. How can one concentrate on two things at a time? His argument that during sexual intercourse there comes a moment of climax when the mind is devoid of thought is unconvincing: one does not experience such a moment at all. What concerns the Acharya is not the problem of achieving "Nirvana" but controlling the duration of intercourse. To my mind, the only remedy to this problem is circumcision, as practised by the Jews and Muslims. However, this has nothing to do with religion, and is only a sexual necessity.

Men like Rajneesh are only misleading innocent people. He is one of a vast network of so-called avatars like the Sai Baba, Bal Yogeshwar, Mehar Baba, Mahesh Yogi and and others who have flourished in the post-Independence era, and are exploiting religious sentiments. Rajneesh is a political agent who is discouraging socialism. It is painful to equate him with Jesus or the Buddha.
Sreeniwas Sharma, Calcutta

THIS is the finest expose you have published in a long time, even better than the author's article on the Sai Baba you published a few months back. What is amusing is to see one cult figure take on another. SUNDAY doesn't need a 'demolition squad' anymore. Now you should ask Satyajit Ray to review M. F. Husain's work and Ravi Shankar to write on M. S. Subbalakshmi!
S. K. Bhadury, Bangalore

I HAVE great sympathy for Pritish Nandy's intelligence, wide knowledge and good vocabulary, but what he has produced is all humbug. Anyway, thanks to him for showing the way from roadside sex, to Rajneesh's Sex Knowledge. Nandy is on a path that leads man to insanity. Let the author experience emptiness for "a while", and he would start realising the ultimate truth.
Swami Ram Vedant, Tatanagar

All bull

PRITISH NANDY is a glorious addition to your contributing team. A few pages of his book review appear to be more rewarding than the platitudes of the popular godman, Rajneesh himself. But while the idea of encouraging this kind of "intangible export" may augur well for the nation's balance of payments, the notion that the Crotch is a gateway to the Paradise of Heaven needs to be guarded against. I would even dare to draw a parallel between these neo-tantrics —for tantra is what the bhagwan practises, though disguisedly — and Satanists. Again, it is darned funny that one can cohabit at all with "attention betwixt the eyeballs". This, to twist the idiom, is surely no cock and all bull (I mean, the eye).
T. R. Ramalingam, Calcutta

I THOUGHT Mr Nandy was open-minded and liberal. Instead of commenting on the present activities in the Rajneesh Ashram, he has chosen to write about a book "From Sex to Superconsciousness", published as long back as 1969. The author seems to have read very little of the Bhagwan's literature, and even so, misinterpreted it. He is typically conservative, and bases his ideas on just one book. All the same, he has done well to bring out a few good traits of the Bhagwan.
Nidhi Bhargava, Allahabad

MR NANDY has tried to publicise Sree Rajneesh at the cost of the harmony of young minds. He has described Rajneesh as the sexiest baba and supported his views about reaching god through free sex. Both these notions are incorrect. Rajneesh is neither handsome nor sexy. And the free sex he preaches will lead people to ruination. I am surprised to learn that Sree Rajneesh preaches ways to copulate for three hours at a stretch.
K. Mishra, Patna

RAJNEESH is convinced that prostitutes and perverts exist in direct proportion to a society's civilisation. Assuming civilisation to be an advanced stage of social development, the change from barbarism to refined, enlightened living, what refinement or enlightenment did Sodom and Gomorrah experience that saw their total destruction? All socialistic revolutions, be they Christian or proletarian, preach civilisation and enlightenment. To what extent do condemned prostitution and sodomy exist in these societies? Alternately, if we renounce civilisation, will according to the sanyasi, prostitutes and perverts diminish in the same proportion?
Violet Mac Gibbon, Calcutta

MOST people, as I see it, are sexually repressed hypocrites and that is why they see the Bhagwan as a symbol of sex. But we do not bother for them. I can only say that the time is fast approaching when human history shall be divided into periods "Before Rajneesh" and "After Rajneesh". Only those who recognise the significance of Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh are wise.

Truth about a lie

CONGRATULATIONS to T. N. Kaul for his candid, rational and well-written article "Will the real Kissinger please stand up?" (February 24), wherein he revealed how Henry Kissinger, shrewd as he was, distorted facts about the 1971 Indo-Pak war, and Indo-American relations. It is deplorable that a diplomat of his calibre should manufacture such blatant lies. Even the candid American Press commented about his book ("The Kissinger Years"): "Kissinger ... revives an eight-year-old lie". Mr Kaul at one point stated commendably: "Modern diplomacy must have some basis of honesty and sincerity". But when politics creeps into diplomacy, credibility automatically suffers. Also diplomacy void of credibility is like political debauchery. Mr Kissinger underplayed the stances India adopted to persuade Yahya Khan to find an amicable settlement to the problem of East Pakistan to ease tension in the subcontinent. Mrs Gandhi's missions to other neighbouring countries was a commendable step hailed by all right-thinking men. One wonders how the Americans shut their eyes to the repeated provocations of the Pakistan junta to drag India into war with them. Mr Kissinger was the architect of Nixon's policy of friendship with China, and by creating hostility in the Indian subcontinent, thought he could achieve this better. Needless to say, the attempt finally failed.

Mr Kaul rightly points out that "Relations between countries like America and India must not depend on the personal likes and dislikes of individuals who happen to occupy positions of power in either country." It is a fact that the people of America have an entirely different opinion of the US policy towards India.

Jasvinder Singh, New Delhi

Roots of revenge

I WAS shocked to read the report "Moonlight murders" (February 17) by Milap Chand Dandiya. The incidents clearly show the extent to which our country, especially the North, is obsessed with feelings of caste and revenge. The South is relatively free from such atrocities. Also, revenge appears to be common among the illiterate. I think it is not the fault of the criminals, but the fault of the government that such incidents should continue to occur: little effort has been made to spread literacy.

S. Sankaranarayanan, Coimbatore

Just great

IT WAS highly imaginative of you to have started new columns and sections just when your readers needed them. The new sections are not only useful and interesting but also provocative. The fortnightly column "Civil liberties" by A. G. Noorani promises to be useful to all readers, especially students of law like myself. Congratulations to all those behind the new columns.

Medical mistake

APROPOS of the "This India" item on a "Fake vasectomy operation" in Gorakhpur (February 17, 1980). The case may not be a fake vasectomy but actually a failed vasectomy. The presence or otherwise of a scar on the scrotum indicates whether the person has been operated on or not. What could have then gone wrong? Firstly, the doctor might not have cut the vas deference, the tube carrying the male spermatozoa from the testes to the urethra, at the base of the penis through the spermatic cord. This is quite likely since the spermatic cord looks like a bag of worms, especially if the veins and lymphatics are dilated for any reason. One of these strands might quite likely be mistaken for the vas and cut. For this reason, a doctor, after cutting the vas, should inject a fluid through one end of the cut portion and confirm the presence of a lumen by observing whether it jets out through the other end or not. To be doubly sure the cut portion should be sent to a pathologist for histo-pathological confirmation. Even when the cut portion is found to be the vas deference, there is still the possibility of an anomalous double vas existing congenitally, in the same spermatic cord. This will continue to carry the sperms (vasectomy has to be done on both right and left sides).

Similar failure to cut the right tube can also occur in a female undergoing tubectomy. In fact, my own aunt had given birth to a baby girl—her sixth child—after tubectomy. In such cases the husband must surely be medically knowledgeable. An ordinary person would have suspected his wife's fidelity.

Officers, not dummies

UDAYAN SHARMA's special report on "What happened to N. K. Singh" (February 10, 1980) was thought-provoking. The affair is a shame on the Central Government. Mrs Gandhi and her cohorts are known for their clandestine operations. Mr N. K. Singh was obviously victimised for his role in the Kissa Kursi Ka case. The Government should understand that civil servants are mere cogs in the wheel of the administration. Politicians should not interfere in it.

Bad and worse

I READ with interest Ajoy Bose's report "Behind the dissolution" (February 25). Once the British statesman Benjamin Disraeli, a well-known 19th century British personality, was asked to distinguish between "misfortune" and "catastrophe". Disraeli replied that if his political rival, W. Gladstone was drowned in the Thames it would be a misfortune. And if somebody happened to rescue Gladstone, it would be a catastrophe. This witty illustration reflects the trauma of the long, bitter duel between the two Parliamentary giants that went on to make the British Parliamentary process stable and strong. Similarly, one can say that the recent toppling of nine State Governments is unfortunate, but their continuance might have been disastrous in the changed political climate.

Bijay Kumar Jaiswal, Katihar

UPTO the end of the Sixties, elections to State Assemblies were always held simultaneously with those to the Lok Sabha. Then elections to the Assemblies were delinked from those to the Lok Sabha; it was argued that the issues involved in the Lok Sabha elections were different from those in the State elections, which are generally more localised, like setting up of schools or tubewells. The questions posed to the electorate in the 1977 and 1980 Parliamentary polls were stability at the Centre and the issue of dynastic versus democratic rule. Never from any platform were the merits of one-Party rule mooted, nor were either the 1977 or 1980 elections won on this slogan.

Yet, immediately on winning massive poll victories, the victors forgot the slogans on which they won, and started ousting State Governments elected on issues of regional importance, in the control of Parties other than their own. Suppose in the ensuing elections to the nine State Assemblies the electorate once again demonstrates its political maturity and, in the light of the local issues involved, gives the limited Opposition a massive poll victory, will Mrs Gandhi, computing it with the situation in West Bengal, Kerala and Tripura, advise the dissolution of Parliament and seek a fresh mandate? Again, supposing in a simultaneous election to Parliament and State Assemblies, the electorate puts one Party to power in the Centre and another in majority in the States, will the Parliament or State Assemblies be dissolved?

Our Armed Forces
A QUIET CONFIDENCE

By SAUMITRA BANERJEE

Raghu Rai

PARADOXICALLY, New Delhi is one of the most relaxed capitals in the world today as far as national security considerations are concerned. One hundred thousand Soviet troops are in Afghanistan. The second traditional buffer in the region after Tibet has disappeared. American Marines have taken up positions in the Gulf for the first time since 1958. A huge US armada is now stationed in the Indian Ocean region that directly impinges on India's security. Pakistan can still become an advance base in the US strategy of containing Soviet power in the Gulf region. China has been given an undetermined role in this containment policy. Thus the benign security environment which India enjoyed since 1962 has begun to change, taking on aspects on malevolence. But Mrs Gandhi has a Defence Minister and there is no evidence that any new thinking on national security has occurred either at the Cabinet level or at the level of service chiefs and senior defence officials. The mood in Delhi is one of quiet confidence. And this is reflected in the interim budget presented to the Lok Sabha on March 1. In 1980-81 India will be spending on defence 15 paise out of every rupee spent by the Government. This is one paisa per rupee less than what was spent in 1979-80.

Of course, the Indian armed forces of 1980 are not what they were even a decade ago. The Indian Army has come a long way. The 7.62 SLR has replaced the .303 used in the war with China in 1962. The Jaguars are here. With 1,096,000 men in uniform India sports the world's fourth largest standing armed force. As a matter of fact the programmes of modernisation got a major boost during 1977-78. Replacement of outdated World War II weapons which started with the first defence plan of 1964-69 took place at an increased pace during this period.

The strength of the armed forces comes from the 28 infantry divisions including 10 mountain divisions, 186 heavy/medium tanks, 1,000 combat aircraft, one aircraft carrier, eight submarines and 32 major surface vessels. For this considerable set up the budget allocation for 1980-81 is Rs 3,300 crores. The revised military expenditure for the year just passed is Rs 3,273 crores, an increase of Rs 223 crores over what was budgeted for. Nearly two-thirds of the budget is claimed by the Army and one third is shared between the Air Force and the Navy. It is significant that 23 per cent of the budget for the Army or, Rs 705 crores, is spent on pay and allowances of officers and men.

The overall importance of the Army notwithstanding, the Navy and Air Force have received special attention in recent times. Naval development for instance, had a low priority in the sixties. The policy changed along with the geo-strategic changes and an almost instant growth in the importance of the seas. The super power rivalries have highlighted the need for India to enlarge its naval presence Besides India's stakes in the off-shore areas have vastly increased with the discovery of oil. The Government has approved the indigenous construction of several warships which will partly fill the gaps in the security of the Andamans and Nicobar group of islands. The acquisition of a submarine is in a very advanced stage of decision making and the Vikrant, India's aircraft carrier, may soon have Harrier aircraft. Besides, a country like India with reasonable backing from the Air Force may not be easy to invade by sea. Although the USA succeeded in ensuring a stalemate in Korea by an amphibious landing at Inchon, no such action was taken in Vietnam. The risks have greatly increased. For the Air Force, besides the decision to induct the Jaguar there is also a proposal to acquire a new medium range transport aircraft along with licences for its manufacture in India. MI-8 helicopters are being acquired to replace the ageing MI-4s.

India's defence capabilities have been acquiring teeth over a period of 30 years without permitting military expenditure to consume a disproportionately large slice of the limited national resources. Only once during this period, that is in the sixties after the trauma of the border war with China, did defence expenditure take a big leap forward. Soon, however, the level of defence expenditure was stabilised at one of the lowest percentages to national income in the world. At least 16 Asian and African nations spend on defence a greater percentage of their national income than India. With military expenditure at less than five per cent of the GNP, India is bracketed with Thailand, Indonesia and South Korea in Asia and West Germany, France and Sweden in Europe. As Emile Benoit has shown in his work on the relation between defence and defence expenditure in the third world, India's defence expenditure has contributed to overall economic growth, more than compensating for the diversion of foreign exchange.

THE worth of this military capability, impressive in physical and absolute terms, can be judged qualitatively only vis-a-vis the two main potential security threats facing India—Pakistan and China. To take Pakistan first, the difference in the degree of dependence on external military support between the two countries is a major factor. India has the capacity to replenish much of its own arms inventories even with lessening external assistance. Besides, there are limits to Chinese capabilities as a supplier of arms to Pakistan, and the equipment that has been supplied is not very advanced or reliable. Even strategically, Pakistan is more vulnerable, since several of its major cities like Lahore and important road and rail links are within fairly easy access of the Indian border. Again, modern armoured forces require a substantial amount of space for manoeuvre, and Pakistan has felt the lack of this. This has led Pakistan into a strategy of defending its own territory by attacking Indian soil. This was evident in 1964 (Runn of Kutch), 1965 and 1971 (western sector). It was the Pakistani forces which struck first in armour-air assault designed to slow down or deter any thrust into Pakistan. Now, however, Pakistan's preemptive thrust may not be penetrative as India's superiority in air power (the ratio is 4:1,) and constituting generally a more modern force, means that any future armoured thrust by Pakistan will lack any meaningful air support.

Pakistan has, however, strengthened her defence services, is engaged in a rapid arms buildup, has made good her losses in the 1971 conflict and replaced obsolete equipment. Her defence expenditure, a very high percentage of her budget, had doubled since 1971. And according to the International Institute for Strategic Studies, Pakistan has been able to expand her Army by 70 per cent and now has parity with deployable Indian forces on the India-Pakistan border. Therefore, if Pakistan were to launch a zero warning attack, the danger to India is very acute. But it should also be noted that the Afghanistan crisis has, to a certain extent, lessened the tension between India and Pakistan. Following the crisis Pakistan, anticipating danger, has moved some of her troops to the Afghan border and her buildup along the Indian border has thus been lessened.

As far as the India-China military balance is concerned, the Chinese have their 18th Regular Army in Tibet with three divisions, plus four divisions of border troops. There are some other formations which are useful for defence. We have on our north-eastern border with China around ten mountain divisions. Ten against their seven might sound reasonable, especially since it is possible to reinforce them even now. Besides, our forces can seize the initiative and attack where they want along the long border. If we are to consider the Chinese equivalent of a division, then the Indian strength is much more. And the Indian border divisions include some very fine infantry battalions: Scouts, Indo-Tibetan Border Police, Assam Rifles and the BSF. Backing these are many battalions capable of defending but not attacking like the CRP and armed police. So even if the Chinese bring their total to ten divisions, the Indian Army would still outnumber the attacked 2:1 and still have a margin. India has a reinforcement capability too. Around 50 infantry battalions would have at any time completed a three year stint in the mountains within the previous 12 months. Reintroducing these battalions into the mountains is fairly simple.

But China's modernisation drive of the armed forces, which is one of the four modernisations called for, could have important implications for India's defence. If Peking were to acquire the Harrier vertical take-off and landing(VTOL) aircraft, which Britain has agreed to sell to China, it would certainly enhance Peking's capabilities, both on the Indian and Soviet borders. The deployment of Chinese Spey fitted F-12, which is reportedly an all-weather aircraft, will also have to be watched closely. In the northern borders, helicopter gunships would be of great help to the Chinese. Moreover, air-to-air, surface-to-air, and surface-to-surface missiles could also be used by Peking to great advantage in a border conflict. Equally significant is the probability of Peking acquiring and manufacturing anti-radar missiles which could be capable of attacking the Indian radar network in the northern frontier. These would mean that India should think of acquiring a counter weapons system. But as P. S. Chari, director of the Institute for Defence Studies and Analysis, said: "China's modernisation drive is not getting off the ground. They don't have sufficient money and besides there is no ideological consensus on this. And in any case, if China attacks the Indian mountain divisons are better off."

But China has improved its logistic capabilities in Tibet. A pipeline now supplies oil to Lhasa and added to this are a number of airfields, which can deploy aircraft all the year round. The Sining-Golmo-Lhasa railway has already altered the supply equation in Tibet. New railway lines are under construction, including some in Sinkiang, which would bring Ladakh within 100 air miles of the railhead. Apart from this the Chinese are also improving the Karakoram highway, which will step up their supplies to Pakistan at times of need. To counter this, India would perhaps need some more divisions.

Bangladesh, too, cannot be ignored while assessing India's defence strategy. Over the past three years the Bangladesh Army's strength has moved up from a couple of brigades in 1972 to about five divisions, including an armoured brigade. This, in view of the disturbances in the north-eastern states of India, assumes significance. While the insurgency in Nagaland and Mizoram is not as acute as it was before, the turmoil in Assam has gained ascendency. And in this region, anti-nationals are taking over. Freely circulated literature from the north-eastern states call for "the federation of states in the region, completely independent of India." This problem, with the active assistance of foreign countries around the region, especially China, may soon become a problem for India's defence also.

Since the basic strategic divide in this sub-continent is between India and Pakistan and in South Asia between India and China, an important part of India's defence preparedness is her friendship with the Soviet Union. The Soviet connection made a difference in international diplomacy since the Russian intervention in Afghanistan. Even Henry Kissinger, a strong advocate of rearming Pakistan, admitted in January this year that, "a real threat will develop if the Soviet Union and India co-operate. We must, of course, prevent this from occurring." America realised that a combination of Soviet and Indian power would be far superior to anything that the USA could assemble in this distant region to defend US and western interests.

Apparently anticipating such a contingent security problem of a US-China-Pakistan axis taking shape in South Asia and threatening India's position as a leading regional power, Mrs Gandhi has asked Moscow for $2.6-billion worth of military hardware. And according to western sources the Soviets have agreed. There is no deal yet, and there may be none if Pakistan is not substantially re-armed. But the point is that much of the strength that Indian diplomacy has been able to show has been derived as much from India's own military capability as from its strategic ties with the Soviet Union. Under article nine of the Indo-Soviet Friendship Treaty, the Soviet Union is obliged not to assist a third party with whom India is locked in conflict. Similarly, the treaty bars Indian military cooperation with a third party with whom the USSR is locked in armed conflict. Besides, in case either side is attacked or threatened with attack, "the two countries would immediately enter into mutual consultation in order to eliminate this threat and take appropriate effective measures to ensure the peace and security to their countries."

An urgent need to build up India's forces was first felt after the 1962 war with China which resulted in a new awareness of the threat along the northern borders of the country. India, initially, looked to the west for military equipment. Y. B. Chavan led a purchase mission seeking naval vessels and jet aircraft. But the USA gave a negative reply and Britain was equally unsympathetic. It was in these circumstances that India turned to the Soviet Union for military hardware. As a result, from 1964 until recently, India's main external source for weapons has been the Soviet Union. And this has covered equipment for all services — tanks, naval vessels and combat aircraft. Dependence on the Soviet Union thus extends to spares and ancillaries also. Recently, India has had deals for the supply of weapons with other countries. For example, India has decided to obtain Harrier aircraft from the UK and a recent agreement with Britain provides for the outright purchase of 40 Jaguar aircraft. Recent acquisition of equipment from the Soviet Union has been mostly for the Navy and the Air Force. Nanchuka class missile corvettes and Kashin class missile destroyers are on order from the Soviet Union. It has also been reported that India is evaluating offers for getting submarines from western nations.

But dependence on external sources for equipment could also mean that the supplying nation could exercise political leverage within the country. It was precisely for this reason that in the defence policy framework after the 1962 war it was made clear that reliance on external supplies was to be minimised as much as possible and restricted to advanced types of weaponry only. As a matter of fact now there are 32 ordnance factories and defence public sector undertakings producing a large variety of items for the defence and military sectors. Besides, there are 32 defence research establishments in the country which support the defence production effort. The highest in value is made by Hindustan Aeronautics Limited, Bharat Electronics Limited and three shipyards. HAL is manufacturing the MIG and Ajeet aircraft, the Avro (HS-748-M) transport aircraft and the Alouette (Chetak) and the SA-315 (Cheetah) helicopters for the Air Force. BEL is producing sophisticated electronic communication equipment and radar for the three defence services. And while the Mazagon Dock is building Leander class frigates for the Navy, Garden Reach Workshops is producing seaward defence boats, survey vessels and ocean going tugs. The value of production in ordnance factories has risen from Rs. 178 crores to Rs. 414 crores and in the defence public sector undertakings from Rs. 714 crores to Rs. 1454 crores between the years 1971-72 and 1978-79.

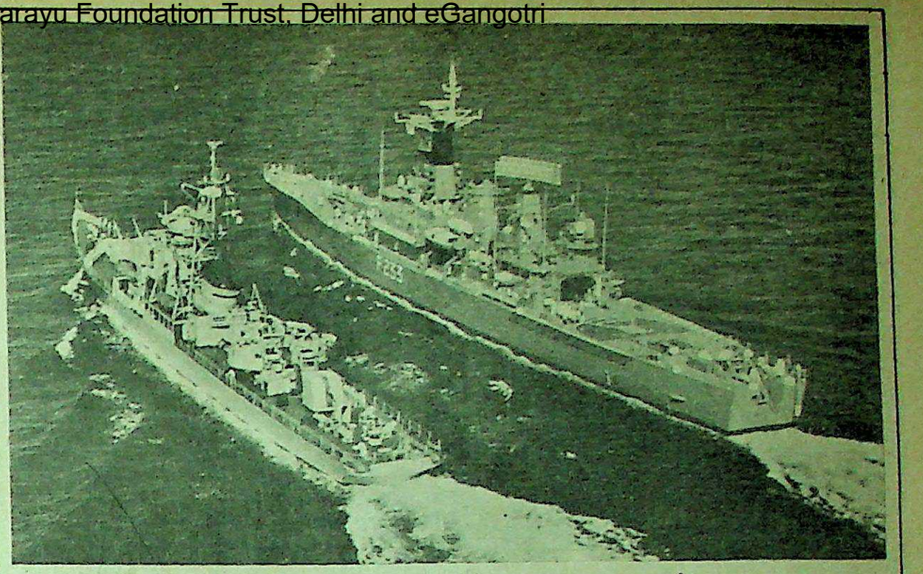
UNFORTUNATELY, most of the defence equipment produced in this country at present is under manufacturing licence from foreign countries granted that we have on our own designed a number of electronic communication systems, a field gun, a self-propelled gun, a frigate and a number of smaller vessels.

But building up competence in R and D is of utmost importance and our investment here has been very modest. A weapons' system of today needs fairly large numbers of electronic sub-systems and very high quality sophisticated alloys. Much of this is not made in this country because the quantities required are not economical for production here. Again, what is needed is a sophisticated electronic component industry. But our industrial sector is only equal to that of an advanced industrial nation with a market for 50-60 million people. Barring France, no industrial economy of that size is able to afford a self-reliant defence production base. In effect it means that a self-reliant defence production base can be achieved only in the context of an overall industrialisation of the country and a large scale industrial market within it. "Sophisticated defence production cannot function successfully as an island in a limited industrial economy restricted to a market of 50 to 60 million people and that too largely based on licenced production. A country that relies largely on licences for its civil industrial product, which does not achieve optimum indigenisaton in respect of its civil industrial products and does not invest heavily in R and D is not going to find it easy to achieve self reliant defence production in a short period", says T. Subramaniam. This has been largely due to the compartmentalised approach to defence and development. And for the defence industry to grow it is essential that industrialisation, as a whole, takes place in the country. Said P. R. Chari, "as far as the super powers are concerned, 15 per cent of their military budget goes into R and D. In India of course this is not possible. But there should be more emphasis on this aspect. If you are talking of military preparedness of a country, then R and D is a very vital factor."



A question which is being raised in view of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and the US response to it is whether the relaxed mood in Delhi is justified. Even before the Afghan crisis, but in the context of the collapse of the Shah of Iran, Mr C. Subramaniam, during his brief tenure as Defence Minister in the Charan Singh Cabinet, had raised the question whether India should not opt for a planned upgrading of the force levels of the armed services so that it could cope with the threats building up to its security and interests. In a lecture to the officer students of the National Defence Academy in October, 1979, Mr Subramaniam drew the worst possible scenario of the region's security environment and called for India's readiness to meet the bleakest possible contingencies. He suggested that the measure of adequacy for India's defence should be China, and not Pakistan, better still, China and Pakistan combined. He perceived China embarking on a massive military modernisation programme with substantial US and western aid, a China that intended to "punish" Vietnam and was supporting insurgencies in Southeast Asia. He said, "China is definitely attempting to gain a foothold in the Bay of Bengal and the Indian Ocean". He added that India could hardly rely on China's verbal assurances that it will not be the first to use nuclear weapons against any country. India, he said, already had an assymetrical defence position vis-a-vis China. India's position will be worse if Pakistan too developed a nuclear capability.

To this Dr. Bhabani Sengupta, member of the International Institute for Strategic Studies, said: "The main problem with the Subramaniam thesis is that it does not pause to calculate the cost of India's optimum defence preparedness. Optimum against whom? It is always possible to overreact to the strength of China and to Pakistan's ability to get help from others. But the Americans seem to be very disappointed with the big gaps in China's military and economic capability. In any case, China punished itself more than it punished Vietnam in the war of February 1979. Pakistan does not seem to be exactly itching for another war with India. If the military junta of Pakistan knows one thing for sure, it is that in a war with India, very little will remain of Pakistan."

Dr. Sengupta said India's defence forces have developed in a rather haphazard manner in response to demands and needs of the three services and the necessity to match, and surpass, the armour of Pakistan. On the other hand, India has been able to avoid a choice between guns and butter. "What we need now is a system of integrated defence. This means far greater reliance on our own R and D, our own industrial capability and trained manpower. It is not necessary to match the air-power of Pakistan or the manpower of China. Nor it is necessary to seek weapons parity. And it is always wise to keep a low military profile. An integrated defence system, relying overwhelmingly on indigenous skills and resources, and tuned to the objective security needs of the country, taking sober account of who are, and can be, our friends and adversaries, will give us the strength we need and will not, hopefully, frighten our smaller and weaker neighbours."

Whate er apprehensions there might have been soon after the peaceful nuclear explosion (PNE) at Pokharan in 1974, it is now generally accepted that India has no nuclear arsenal. But the question which arises is: would India going the nuclear way add to her military preparedness? This, of course, would depend on a number of factors like whether Pakistan goes nuclear, whether the superpowers continue with their nuclear proliferation, whether clandestine proliferation continues to take place in countries like South Africa and Taiwan and whether nuclear weapons get increasingly legitimised or not. There is little doubt that nuclear arsenals are important for a country to increase its bargaining power vis-a-vis other countries. And, as Mr C. Subramaniam mentioned in his speech in October: "Under conditions of assymetry (vis-a-vis nations in possession of nuclear weapons) there is no guarantee that nuclear nations will not use nuclear weapons against non-nuclear nations. In India we have a situation of assymetry vis-a-vis China. No doubt China has given a pledge of no first use, but the question is how far can we rely on these pledges?" Again as P. R. Chari said: "India should be prepared for this contingency. We should not be caught with our pants down."

But at the moment, the mood is neither militarist nor jingoistic. And though the Prime Minister has been stressing the possible threats to India's security, she attributes this to the super power cold war in the region. rather than to regional adversaries like China and Pakistan. Sometime soon Mrs Gandhi will have a Defence Minister. The Cabinet will have its defence sub-committee and a good hard look will be taken at our defence needs during the coming years. ■

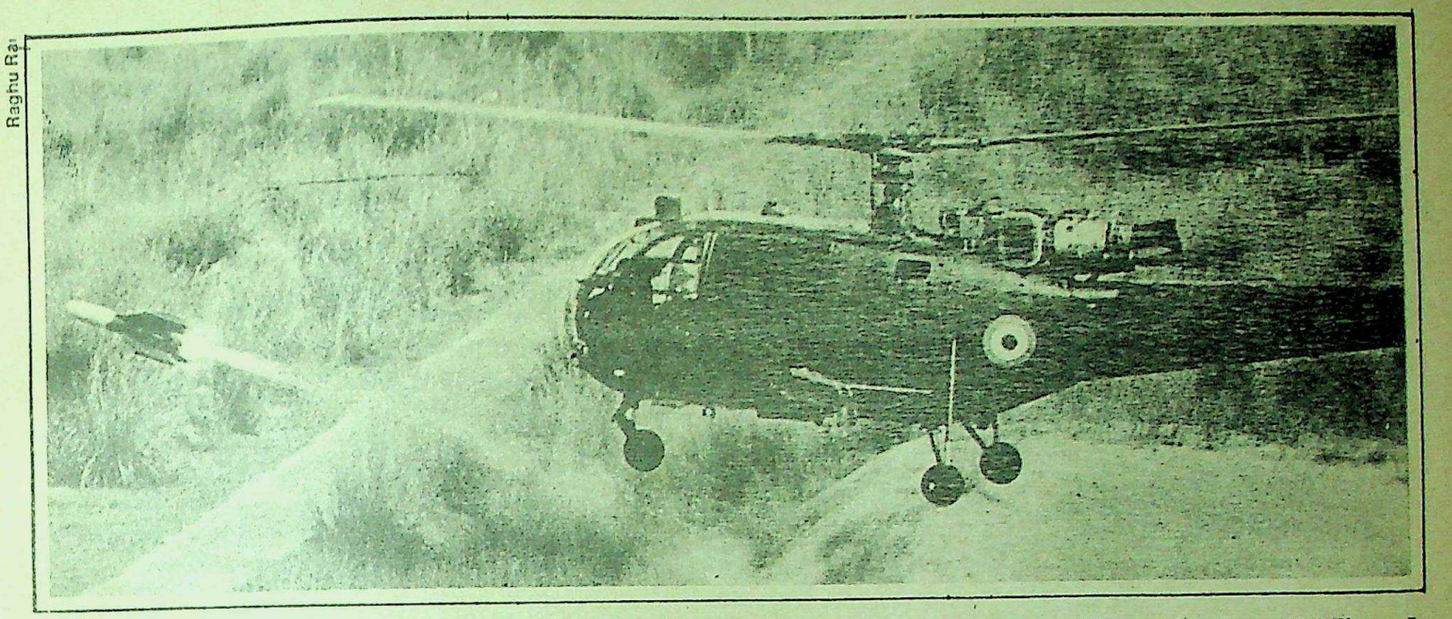
Is the South exposed?

By Air Commodore S. Nair (Retd.)



WITH the emergence of India as the most dominant nation in the area after 1971, a new power configuration has come into being. The presence of the US fleet and air force with a base at Diego Garcia and the Russian fleet to match, have caused protest tremors across the littoral states including India. Indonesia, which is closer to the Andamans and Carnicobar group of islands, had never made secret of its hostile intentions whenever there was a conflict with Pakistan, and has now armed itself very well, in the wake of the oil boom. There are a few Arab countries, who are equipped with the most sophisticated array of arms, who were similarly disposed, whenever we had confrontations with Pakistan. The peninsular nature of our country with the far flung islands has inbuilt chasms, wherein unseen forces could lurk for advantage at the most crucial time. This threat is now more real. To top it all there is an unprecedented arms build-up in the whole region.

On the assumption of twin threats from Pakistan and China, we have four operational commands for the Army—Northern, Western, Central and Eastern. All the fighting formations including the artillery and armour are deployed in those commands. In the peninsular portion including the islands, there is only the Southern command; already an over-sized formation with a number of training, static units and a few fighting units on peace-time locations in turn. There is hardly any artillery or armour worth reckoning anywhere in the region. Except an odd unit, perhaps, the islands are also devoid of any effective punch.

So far as the Air Force is concerned the three operational Commands —Western, Central, Eastern and the group—are all poised against already acknowledged threats. In the peninsula below the 18th parallel, there are only Training and Maintenance commands, responsible for the functions their names signify. So far as is known there are no operational wings located below the Bombay sector. Thus the two main arms of the defence mechanism, Army and Air Force, are facing north-west and north-east.

Our Naval forces form the only real operational vanguard of the defence for the peninsula and the islands. The Western and Eastern commands of the Navy control their respective fleets and the Southern command has also a few ships. The Western fleet has the aircraft carrier Vikrant, a few cruisers, frigates, missile boats, reconnaissance aircraft, some helicopters and supporting vessels. The Eastern fleet is armed to a lesser degree; there are a few fighting ships, but it is doubtful whether there are any modern frigates. The Submarine force is too small and its deployment is governed mostly by tactical considerations. The fleets have a long list of tasks ranging from protection of our commerce, Bombay High oil complex,. defence of ports like Calcutta, Haldia, Paradeep, Vishakpatnam, Madras, Tuticorin in the east and Cochin, Mangalore, Goa, Bombay and Kandla in the west. Though, for its size the naval forces have adequate fire power, this is in no way compatible with the onerous tasks assigned to it. Judging from any standard there is no doubt that at least double the amount of naval forces are required to assure reasonable defence reliability. In short it is more than apparent that the under-belly of the Indian defence system is really soft and highly vulnerable.

As the peninsula and the islands are skirted by the vast expanse of the Indian Ocean, it is only logical to expect a threat from the naval forces and sea-based or land-based aircraft. The Indian Ocean has the most powerful naval forces of the USA with nuclear capability, sailing in the international waters. Only eight years ago, when India was engaged in a conflict with Pakistan, a US task force of the Seventh Fleet led by aircraft carrier Enterprise and a host of attack ships headed towards Bangladesh, to extricate the Pakistani forces. If an engagement did not take place, it was due more to the speed of the Indian offensive in that area, which culminated in the fall of Dacca, before any damage could be done. Our defence preparedness should take, due cognisance of the physical presence of the US Navy and Air Force, so close by. Indonesia, a staunch ally of Pakistan, with its revitalised armed forces, who had embarked on attacks on some of the neighbouring islands could without any qualms, take advantage of proximity and pose a direct threat to Andaman/Carnicobar island groups.,

Due to the great expanse of the, Indian Ocean and the superhuman efforts required to mount a major naval offensive by an enemy, the possibility of a diversionary move is more than a main attack. If a main or diversionary move to the peninsula or any one of the islands materialises, as things are at present, the entire weight would have to be borne by the naval forces. Against this the fact that the fleet is too small stands out as a hard reality. As our Navy's power is bound to be diluted by the varied tasks entrusted to it, a determined enemy bent on diffusing the northern defences, would be able to find his way to the place he may choose.

The Army and Air Force, with their orders of battle to the north would have to make a 180 degrees turn and even if it only means partial deployment, both the services are likely to be in a spin. In a similar situation in Kutch in 1965, when Pakistan struck at a place of choice below the western defence belt, the hasty retreats we had to make, the insurmountable logistic problems that arose in rushing troops can all be recapitulated vividly. The international community awarded Pakistan The Kutch round. With the present airlift capability of the IAF. even if supported by Civil Aviation, it is doubtful where one division with supporting armour and artillery can be airlifted. Surface transportation, rail or road over long distances would provide the answer, which of course would be the main target of enemy air action, resulting in delay and consequent losses. Here it is very relevant to cite, the utterly disjoined and chaotic move of No. 1 Armoured Division, the pride of the Army, from base to concentration during the most crucial days of 1965 conflict, which was mainly the outcome of lack of forethought on the part of planners in not moving the division at least after commencement of our offensives in the Hajipir pass in August and not after our forces had crossed the border on September 6, 1965. Also in 1971, the tremendous array of problems experienced in transporting some forces from east to west after the fall of Dacca, must have been recorded in the operational lessons of both the Army and the Air Force.

The Army should raise and locate a minimum of one corps, with an adequate number of divisions, armour and artillery in the South. On account of the more integrated type of fighting involving the three services in the arena, formation of task forces of a highly mobile nature to strike with rapidity may provide one of the answers. Likewise, the Air Force should establish an operational group, in the peninsula with at least a couple of wings and some squadrons to afford ground and ocean air assaults without having to make risky movements from north during a critical phase of the operation. It may become essential either to renovate or establish new military airfields, some of which could be manned on skeleton basis, and exercised to test operational worthiness. The many oil, port and industrial complexes could be defended by surface-to-air missiles employed on a permanent basis.

The existing naval offensive capability would have to be virtually doubled to assure reasonable defence safety. The Naval expansion should be towards acquisition of attack submarines, missile cruisers, missile boats and similar fire power packed naval weapon systems. The aircraft carrier Vikrant may have its due place in the scheme but fresh procurement of such monolithic platforms with a highly volatile cargo and a huge compliment of personnel, which always requires a large number of ships as escorts for each move, may not be a practical proposition. Unlike the super powers, who are involved in global armed strategy wherein carriers could play a pivotal role, our need is for a physical presence of a very large number of highly destructive naval task forces over a vast area. Moreover the land based aircraft could easily provide the ocean strikes if required.

The creation of an amphibious force and a huge airlift capability are two essential pre-requisites of the defence of the islands. It would only be wise not to rely too much on static type of defences on the lines of Singapore in World War II, but the islands should be so manned by a force as to absorb the initial shock, a certain amount of damage and destruction. The amphibious forces, kept in readiness could move in to support the defences of the islands so affected by enemy action at the opportune time.

In the civil defence sector, at present, there is a complete lack of awareness in the deep south. There may be a few officials already trained on the subject but the very concept is non-existent so far as the general public is concerned. Experience has shown that it takes a lot of time and effort to build up a civil defence organisation. As the cities of the south have a variety of industrial complexes the southern states should give civil defence urgent attention.

The violence, ferocity and swiftness with which the next round is likely to be fought, need not have to be reiterated. There may never be a repetition of the frontal blows but mostly a passing of strongholds through indirect approaches. Even the vacuum of the arid desert may become the most likely main scene of deep thrusts into each other's heartland or the vulnerable passes in the Himalayan sector may become jumping boards. In the midst of such a conflagration, a purposeful enemy or his allies may find it most ideal and convenient to intervene in a limited manner which would cause sufficient confusion and partial paralysis of our defences. Any hotch-potch device to induct forces so deep below the 18th parallel, can only spread apoplexy in the defence spectrum. Therefore there is a great need to restructure the defence set up of the southern region and islands with the permanent presence of operational formations of the Army and the Air Force and a vastly enhanced naval offensive power with clear-cut operational plans. Only then can the soft under-belly be considered as reasonably safe. ■

Mrs Gandhi

Power and Politics

By KEWAL VARMA

EVIDENCE is gathering that Mrs Indira Gandhi's Government is lurching towards the right. She, indeed, has never been even a mild socialist by conviction. When she first became Prime Minister in 1966, she gave a sharp right turn to policies with the aid of Ashoka Mehta and C. Subramaniam. She was so under the spell of the World Bank that she devalued the rupee at its behest. But she was rebuffed in the 1967 elections. This was followed by a serious challenge to her leadership from within her Party from the Syndicate. By that time P. N. Haksar had taken command of her think-tank. She was made to understand that, if not by conviction, she should become a socialist by convenience. The 1969-71 story is well-known. She gave radical slogans, took some radical steps and encouraged the radicals within her Party. She also entered into an alliance with the CPI. This really created a socialist euphoria. Many were misled. But even in her heyday of socialism, a Delhi-based perceptive foreign correspondent in a private communication to his editor, summed up Mrs Gandhi's ideology thus: "Slightly left-of-centre in her self-interest".

The radical hangover persisted for some time after the 1971 elections. But she felt most uncomfortable, particularly because of the prominence which radicals acquired in her Party. The Socialist Forum became a strong lobby within the Congress. She prepared a plan to immobilise it. First, she encouraged and created a rift between Congressmen with socialist and communist backgrounds, giving encouragement to the latter. An idea of how she used to operate in those days could be had from one incident. She got K. R. Ganesh included in the Congress Working Committee after the split. Then she told Chandra Shekhar: "What sort of person's Subramaniam? He has packed the Working Committee with ex-communists". The dissension weakened the Socialist

Forum, bad blood was created between ex-socialists and ex-communists in the Congress. Then she asked Uma Shankar Dixit and Yashpal Kapoor to launch a Nehru Forum as a counter to the Socialist Forum. An unseemly controversy was encouraged. At that time Mrs Gandhi came down with a heavy hand and by a resolution of the parliamentary board got the Socialist Forum dissolved. This freed her from any radical pressure from within.

When Mrs Gandhi faced difficulties, she remembered her socialism and radical followers again. The outcome was the 20-point programme. But soon Sanjay Gandhi's five-point programme relegated the 20-point programme to the background. On the third day of the Emergency she went on the air to assure industry that there would be no more nationalisation. Radicals also became unwanted. It is a fact that for none of the radical policies, initiated between 1969 an 1977, had the initiative come from her. She agreed to bank nationalisation when she was made to understand that there was a link between bank nationalisation and her political survival. She agreed to the abolition of privy purses as a part of election gimmicks. After the 1971 elections, she agreed to radical policies most reluctantly. She agreed to a constitutional amendment taking the amount of compensation outside judicial review most grudgingly. She admonished Mohan Kumaramangalam for his speech in Parliament on the subject. Kumaramangalam, in fact, died a demoralised person. Earlier when he brought forward the proposal to nationalise the coal industry, she egged on D. P. Dhar to oppose it in the Cabinet. Later, when Dhar wanted to push through the take-over of the wholesale trade in wheat, she encouraged Kumaramangalam and Haksar to oppose it. The collapse of wheat take-over marks the closure of the radical chapter in Mrs Gandhi's Government.

Unlike 1971, when she won on the "garibi hatao" mandate, she does not carry any radical "deadweight" in 1980. She raised no such slogan. She won on the slogan "Indira lao, desh bachao". It is being impressed on her that the 1980 mandate has demonstrated that elections can be won without radicalism. Second, the radical pressure from within the Party has been considerably weakened. Most of the radicals went over to the Congress (U). Some who are still left in the Congress (I) like Bahuguna and K. R. Ganesh, are treated as untouchables. Some like V. P. Sathe have been more interested in colour TV than in more mundane matters. There are no Mohan Kumaramangalams, no D. P. Dhars, and no Chandrajit Yadavs in the Cabinet. Third, the CPI is also no more an ally and as such no radicalism is transmitted through it. Fourth, and this is most important, Sanjay's influence has tremendously increased over the policy-making apparatus in the Government and the Party. He is unofficially monitoring the Government's policies. Sanjay makes no secret of his distaste of radicalism. He is against nationalisation of the public sector, against Communists, current or former. Within a few days of the imposition of the Emergency, Sanjay gave an interview to Uma Vasudeva of The Two Faces of Indira Gandhi fame and attacked communists, the public sector and nationalisation of coal.

Let's gather together all the straws in the wind which indicate some direction. The Home Ministry has asked the intelligence agencies to start keeping a close watch on pro-Russian elements in the country. It has circulated a list of these elements. The list includes a large number of those who were once used by Mrs Gandhi as her "unofficial ambassadors" to Communist countries. Such a close watch ceased to exist 15 years back. Even the Janata Government did not start it. It is significant that the Home Ministry has not yet started keeping close intelligence watch over the RSS, a practice which was stopped by the Janata. This is, perhaps, Sanjay's response to Balasaheb Deoras' offer of cooperation to Mrs Gandhi. In foreign affairs, it is for the first time that the Soviet Foreign Minister came and went back without signing a joint communique.

The clearest indications of a shift are in the field of economic policies. A. B. A. Ghani Khan Chaudhury is the most bold in giving these indications, of course in his private durbars. He has threatened the DVC authorities that if power generation did not improve, he would hand over the management to the private sector. One often hears in the corridors of power the suggestion to denationalise coal mines. J. B. Patnaik said in Parliament that he would consider the suggestion of allowing the private sector into the airline business to foster "healthy competition" with the public sector. When a junior Minister, Makwana, talked of nationalisation of the sugar industry, he was pulled up. Nationalisation is taboo with this Government. The hands of those who talk of denationalisation are strengthened by the fact that the performance of the public sector has slumped. In a similar situation in 1971-72 there were then committed Ministers like Mohan Kumaramangalam, C. Subramaniam and D. P. Dhar who saw in the public sector an instrument of social change. They showed perseverance and doggedness to improve the public sector. But the present Ministers are looking for some good excuse to hand over the public sector to the private sector.

Another area where pressure is being mounted to dilute existing policies is in regard to multinationls and monopoly houses. Vice President Hidayatuallah is virtually campaigning publicly to allow multinational companies to enter India "lock, stock and barrel". Such a blatant advocacy of multinationals by a person occupying a high public office has never been done in the past. Surely, he cannot be speaking of his own accord. The Government has so far not contradicted Hidayatullah. It is also a fact that a former Coca Cola king, Charanjit Singh, a Congress (I) MP from Delhi, is among the loyal followers of Sanjay. Those who used to make easy money from Coca Cola have not reconciled to the exit of Coca Cola ordered by George Fernandes. Similarly, there is talk to remove all restrictions on the expansion of large houses in the name of increasing production. Even the will of those who have been opposing the growth of monopolies is weakening as a result of the continuing poor performance of the public sector. The forcefulness with which Vasant Sathe is advocating the introduction of colour TV sounds like the funeral oration of the "Garibi hatao" phase. We should now be prepared for a new era of laissez faire where profit and riches will be given social respectability and production will increase to meet the increasing demand of the elite. It is well known that industrialists supported Mrs Gandhi to the hilt in the elections in the name of getting a Stable Government. This time their investment may not go to waste.

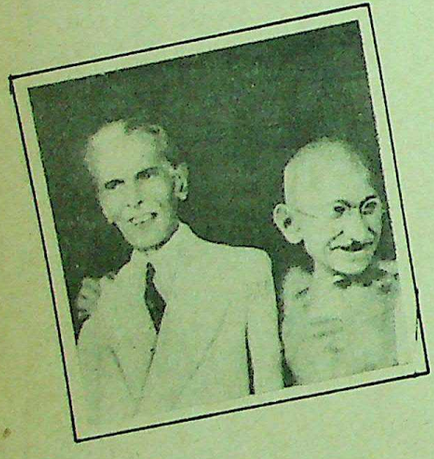
Lahore Resolution

Resolved that it is the considered view of this Session of the All-India Muslim League that no constitutional plan would be workable in this country or acceptable to the Muslims unless it is designed on the following basic principles, viz, that geographically contiguous units are demarcated into regions which should be so constituted with such territorial readjustments as may be necessary, that the areas in which the Muslims are numerically in majority, as in the North-Western and Eastern zones of India, should be grouped to constitute Independent States in which the constituent units shall be autonomous and sovereign.

That adequate, effective and mandatory safeguards should be specifically provided in the constitution for minorities in these units and in the regions for the protection of their religious, cultural, economic, political administrative and other rights and interests in consultation with them and in other parts of India where the Musalmans are in minority; adequate, effective and mandatory safeguards shall be specifically provided in the constitution for them and other minorities for the protection of their religious, cultural, economic, political, administrative and other rights and interests in consultation with them.

This Session further authorises the Working Committee to frame a scheme of constitution in accordance with these basic principles, providing for the assumption finally by the respective regions of all powers such as defence, external affairs, communication customs and such other matters as may be necessary—March 23, 1940.



Pakistan: Paradise lost

RAJENDRA SAREEN covers in his sweep 40 years of the subcontinent's history to demonstrate how the Muslim problem' was not solved and how Indian Muslims are now fighting for a place in the sun here.

FORTY years ago on March 23 the All India Muslim League session at Lahore adopted a resolution which at that time was described as the charter of the political aspirations of the Indian Muslims. Later it was hailed as the proclamation of Pakistan. Today it enjoys the status of a sacrament and constitutes the ideological sheet-anchor of the state of Pakistan. However, the word Pakistan does not occur in the text at all.

Pakistan was brought into being ostensibly as a solution of the Muslim problem in India. It was conceived as the homeland of the subcontinent's Muslims. It was the fruition of the two-nation theory defining the Hindus and Muslims as two separate nations straddling the length and breadth of India. The logic of this was highly dubious even at that point of time. Since then, however, the absurdities of the two-nation theory have become ever so patently manifest.

The strength of the Pakistan movement stemmed from the failure of the Congress leadership to understand and appreciate that the primary motivation of the Muslim upsurge was not separatist but a search for economic emancipation on par with the more advanced sections of Indian society. Had the situation been tackled at that level and appropriate correctives devised, the story would have taken a different turn. The Muslim strivings were basically modern and a clear repudiation of orthodoxy. Quaid-e-Azam Jinnah's intransigence found sustenance from the Congress proclivity to seek cosmetic remedies by drafting in the mullahs as a counterpoise to what it considered as the bogus Muslim League claim to speak on behalf of the Muslims. Since religious orthodoxy was not the real motivation, the Ulema became the object of Muslim ridicule and the Congress lost its credibility. All its arguments fell on deaf ears. The Muslim mind was not receptive to anything coming from the Congress. In retrospect it can be seen that Maulana Azad had the vision and the foresight to see the problem in all its dimensions but such was the blind fury driving the Muslim community that he was denounced as a show-boy, insulted and humiliated.

Thirty-three years after Pakistan became a reality, it is none of the things it was supposed to be. Through the partition of India in 1947, the Muslim community split itself in a manner that brought about a marked diminution in its collective strength, prestige and influence that it had come to possess as part of a historical process. The fallout from the impulse generated at the time of partition was that ethnic, cultural and linguistic facets of the human existence came to be considered antagonistic to and incompatible with Islamic identity. This attitude culminated in the split of Pakistan and the emergence of Bangladesh. Far from a solution of his problem, it has been instrumental in a sharp deterioration in the position and status of the Indian Muslim. As for being a Muslim homeland in the subcontinent, one need not go beyond recalling the inability of Pakistan to accept the people still in Bangladesh who claim to be its citizens. Equally irrelevant is the claptrap about Pakistan being the citadel of Islam. Islam has been there for 1,400 years while Pakistan is no more than 33 years old. The industrial and economic infrastructure of Pakistan is barely adequate to sustain it as a national entity. The oil-rich countries have not shut themselves away from the non-Muslim world and there is no indication that they propose to tie themselves up with Pakistan to the exclusion of everybody else. Pakistan can play the pan-Islamic angle only to the extent it serves the geo-political objectives of the oil-rich nations. So far none of them have ever agreed to invest Pakistan with a veto on their relations with India.

Then, does it mean that Pakistan stands doomed, having lost its raison d'etre? The answer is an emphatic no. Its ideological origin is no longer relevant. Regardless of that, Pakistan is a political reality. It is a nation state enjoying the consent and acceptance of its people and constituent territories. If Pakistan lets go the temptation of playing games that are inconsistent with its geo-political and economic imperatives it is perfectly viable and feasible. Those who talk of disintegration of Pakistan as a result of regional controversies display their ignorance. No, there is no secessionist situation in Pakistan.

Soon after the Lahore resolution, Mr K. M. Munshi came out with an equally illogical, much more irrelevant, but emotionally evocative concept of Akhand Bharat. Earlier, Veer Savarkar had spoken of the inviolability of the 'Hindu Bhoomi' from Kashmir to Kanya Kumari and Indus to Brahmaputra. Right from the word go, Akhand Bharat has been music to the Hindu chauvinist's ear. It makes every Hindu chauvinist chest expand an inch or two. Correspondingly, Akhand Bharat has been the proverbial red rag to the Muslim bull. It turns the taste in a Muslim mouth bitter. This single word has been the source of such colossal emotional upheaval! It has over the period attained a connotation which evokes extreme abhorrence, apprehension and anxiety in Pakistan and undisguised disgust among the Indian Muslims.

And yet it is essentially a non-issue, a bogey. Its emotional and psychological overtones notwithstanding, as a political factor it is pure fiction, shorn of reality. In any event it is altogether irrelevant to any of the policy objectives which India as a nation has been pursuing since Independence.

The Indian subcontinent's unity as a political concept has in fact an entirely non-Hindu origin. The cultural unity of the subcontinent and the religious bonds welding the Hindu society have been a reality for quite a few thousand years going back into the pre-historic times but Hinduism as a political factor has never been instrumental in promoting consolidation of the various centres of state power and binding them together as a step towards expanding the frontiers of a unified Hindu state.

Even before the advent of Islam in the Bharatvarsha, this huge land mass had never known a unified central political authority extending from north to south and east to west. There is thus no evidence of a unified political structure transcending the length and breadth of the subcontinent. There have at best been periods of regional consolidation, seldom lasting more than a generation or two.

What Jinnah said

Excerpts from Quaid-e-Azam Jinnah's speech before the Constitutent Assembly of Pakistan.

"I KNOW there are people who do not quite agree with the division of India and the partition of the Punjab and Bengal...Any idea of united India could never have worked and in my judgement it would have led us to terriffic disaster. Maybe that view is correct; maybe it is not; that remains to be seen. All the same, in this division it was impossible to avoid the question of minorities being in one Dominion or the other. Now that was unavoidable. There is no other solution. Now what shall we do? Now, if we want to make this great state of Pakistan happy and prosperous we should wholly and solely concentrate on the well-being of the people, and especially of the masses and the poor. If you will work in cooperation, forgetting the past, burying the hatchet, you are bound to succeed. If you change your past and work together in a spirit that every one of you, no matter to what community he belongs, no matter what relations he had with you in the past, no matter what is his colour, caste or creed, is first, second and last citizen of this state with equal rights, privilege and obligations, there will be no end to the progress you will make.

"I cannot emphasise it too much. We should begin to work in that spirit and in course of time all these angularities of the majority and minority communities the Hindu community and the Muslim community — because even as regards Muslims you have Pathans, Punjabis, Shias, Sunnis and so on and among the Hindus you have Brahmins, Vaishnavas, Khatris also Bengalees, Madrasis and so on -- will vanish. Indeed if you ask me this has been the biggest hindrance in the way of India to attain freedom and independence and but for this we would have been free people long long ago. No power can hold another nation, and specially a nation of 400 million souls in subject, nobody could have conquered you, and even if it had happened, nobody could have continued its hold on you for any length of time but for this. Therefore, we must learn a lesson from this. You are free, you are free to go to your temple, you are free to go to your mosques or to any other place of worship in this State of Pakistan. You may belong to any religion or caste or creed — that has nothing to do with the business of the state. As you know, history shows that in England conditions sometime ago were much worse than those prevailing in India today. The Roman Catholics and the Protestants persecuted each other. Even now there are some states in existence where there are discriminations made and bars imposed against a particular class. Thank God, we are not starting in those days. We are starting in the days when there is no discrimination between one caste or creed and another. We are starting with this fundamental principle that we are all citizens and equal citizens of one state. The people of England in course of time had to face the realities of the situation and had to discharge the responsibilities and burdens placed upon them by the government of their country and they went through the fire step by step. Today, you might say with justice that Roman Catholics and Protestants do not exist; what exists now is that every man is a citizen, an equal citizen of Great Britain and they are all members of the nation.

"Now I think we should keep that in front of us as our ideal and you will find that in course of time Hindus would cease to be Hindus and Muslims would cease to be Muslims, not in the religious sense, because that is the personal faith of each individual, but in the political sense as citizens of the state." ... IT was that controversial Moghul monarch, Aurangzeb, who initiated the first effective moves for the political consolidation of the subcontinent. Simultaneously his excessive commitment to Muslim orthodoxy and religious intolerance generated impulses which were destructive of the thrust of his political achievement. But the fact remains that he was the pioneer of India's political unity, setting in motion a process which survived through the uncertain and unsettled times that followed his reign and was to become the principal objective of the British policy in the subcontinent.

What was started by Aurangzeb was consolidated by the British and those who talk glibly of Indian nationalism as a historical phenomenon would do well to remember that in the political sense it was the British rule and the English language which provided the flesh and bones to a concept which throughout had been no more than a religio-cultural ethos that never got translated into a political reality until Gandhiji emerged on the scene.

The vivisection of India was strongly resented and opposed by the Hindus, but, when the event did finally come about, it was the Muslims who got divided. Today the Muslims of the subcontinent stand split into three bits between Pakistan, India and Bangladesh. They are incapable of acting in concert. The political dispensation is not conducive to that. On the contrary the distinct Hindu orientation of the Indian polity that has taken place during the last 32 years would have been inconceivable if the Muslim influence in the political, social and cultural terms had not got dissipated in the wake of the partition in 1947 and all that followed.

India has moved a long way off from the days when some of the most ticklish, sensitive and explosive issues capable of blowing up a society were obliged to take a back seat in front of the searing controversies around the Hindu-Muslim question. It has been a long haul, but India today is a better consolidated polity than it ever was before. The regional and linguistic aspirations of the people in the east and the west and the south asserted themselves and secured satisfaction of their legitimate aspirations. The Indian polity today has developed a system of adjustment which is something to be truly proud of and must be the envy of not only nations such as Pakistan but many another polyglot society.

The Muslim problem in India, alas, is still crying out for a solution. The trauma of 1947 is long past but the Indian Muslim has yet to attain his full stature as an equal partner in the country's affairs. National commitment to secularism, duly enshrined in the Constitution, did create the framework for that attainment. Nevertheless realities on the ground leave much to be desired. The Indians Muslim has passed through three distinct phases since 1947. Immediately after the partition he faced the problem of physical survival. It took quite some time for things to settle down to an extent that survival was not in jeopardy. But, there were clear symptoms of withdrawal. A sort of guilt complex for having divided the country gripped the Muslim mind. Economic and employment opportunities were neither sought nor offered and such were the times that no grievance was made of the denial of even the most elementary rights. A major part of the political elite moved over to Pakistan and in the process not only denuded the hapless Muslim community of leadership but also subjected it to the added burden of suspicion from the rest of the nation. On completion of educational and professional courses of training, young Muslims found it easier to get jobs in Pakistan and by and large went in for that.

By the turn of the decade in 1960 the opportunities in Pakistan had begun to dry up. The domination of the mohajirs in the administrative, political and economic fields in Pakistan during the first decade had by then begun to be subjected to serious challenge by the local elites. But even so the process did not quite come to a dead-end until a few years later.

The second phase started around 1965. Pakistan had ceased to be the land of opportunity for the Indian Muslim, but the lure survived. Many an Indian Muslim did some odd job, saved money and went over to Pakistan to try his luck. He came back disappointed but the attraction abided. This was the darkest period of the last 33 years when the Muslim mind was torn between the myth that was Pakistan and the reality of their being Indian nationals. Thus ran the process that virtually shattered whatever illusions remained among the Indian Muslims about Pakistan.

The complete breakdown of communication between the two countries after 1971, though heart-rending and emotionally cruel, was instrumental in putting the Indian Muslim back on the road to recovery. The lure of easy options disappeared and he began to look for the solution of his problems and economic opportunities within the Indian polity. Pakistan ceased to loom large on his consciousness. The next few years witnessed him seeking his rights and opportunities and getting them in an ever increasing measure. The process is by no means fully what it must ultimately be, but it is only a matter of time before the matters are set right.

Excerpts from Jawaharlal Nehru's speecch at the AICC meeting on June 15, 1947:-

THE most urgent task at present is to arrest the swift drift towards anarchy and chaos. Disruptive forces are at work and the most important disruptive force is that of the Muslim League. Their first task should be the establishment of a strong central government to rule the country firmly and to ensure individual's liberty of life; all other questions were of secondary importance.

A responsible body must not think in terms of today only, but there was a tomorrow and the day after that. It would be ridiculous to suggest that the British should be everything before they quit. The June 3 statement could not have come about, had there been no agreement. It was not an imposed award. Circumstances were such that the Congress agreed to it. It was not like one of those old decisions of the British Government which they could accept or reject. The acceptance for which, I am wholly responsible does not mean that I agree to every word in that statement. But I agree with the fundamental principle therein.

It was sufficient to compare what happened in Noakhali and Calcutta and again what happened in Bihar. By supreme efforts the Congress was able to control the situation in Bihar, but they could do nothing in the Punjab. Why did such things happen in the Punjab and why was the Khizar ministry broken and how was it? No one seemed to be capable of controlling the Punjab disturbances. The answer was patent. The Congress Working Committee passed a resolution in favour of the partition of the Punjab into two administrative provinces. Partition is better than murder of innocent citizens. — Hindustan Times, June 16, 1947.

IN the fourth decade of their freedom, what are the prospects of India and Pakistan evolving a co-operative relationship such as exists between the USA and Canada? The process of normalisation since 1972 which provides the framework of mutual relations under the Simla Agreement is all right as far as it goes. But, it is clearly not enough to subsist as peaceful neighbours without any measure of warmth, if we are to meet the challenges that have recently emerged. The important thing is to dispel the fears and anxieties that inhibit the two countries from coming together to share each other's joys and sorrows.

Pakistan's understanding of Indian objectives in relation to her is largely conditioned by a belief that, having opposed the Muslim demand for the partition in 1947, the Hindus continue to nurse a grievance over the existence of Pakistan so that they would like to restore the status quo ante and in the meanwhile make things as difficult for Pakistan as possible. The Indian role in the emergence of Bangladesh continues to loom large over the Pakistani consciousness.

In this respect, fact and fiction are so inextricably mixed up that an article such as this cannot even attempt to unscramble the two. It is a pity that this aspect has not been researched to the extent it should have been because an objective analysis of the events since partition may help light up many of the dark corners of the web of make-believe that has come to determine the view of each other by India and Pakistan.

However, even a preliminary examination of the records would show that in the penultimate stages of the political talks which preceded the withdrawal of the British from India, acrimony between the Congress and the Muslim League had assumed such a dimension that the former had decidedly veered round to the view that partition, indeed, was the only viable solution. What is more, the sections of the Congress leadership who articulated the Hindu view of things were more forthright in demanding partition. Maulana Azad remained the lone opponent of partition as a political solution. Mahatma Gandhi, too, had acquiesced. Mr G. D. Birla, who exercised no mean influence in the counsels of national leadership recalls with obvious satisfaction that he "not only believed in the inevitability of partition but always considered this as a good way out of our difficulties" (In the Shadow of The Mahatma—p. 316).

Mr Allen Campbell Johnson records in his book Mission With Mountbatten at page 98 that "Nehru and Vallabhbhai Patel accept partition on the understanding that by conceding Pakistan to Jinnah they will hear no more of him and eliminate his nuisance value, or, as Nehru put it privately, that by 'cutting off the head we will get rid of the headache'...Gandhi refuses to align himself with this concept, and is putting up a fierce rear-guard action against it. How far he will carry this opposition is one of the big imponderables."

Maulana Azad records that Sardar Patel was the first man to agree to partition. According to the Maulana, he "found Sardar Patel so much in favour of partition that he was hardly prepared even to listen to any other point of view...I was surprised and pained when Patel said that whether we liked it or not, there were two nations in India. He was now convinced that Muslims and Hindus could not be united into one nation. There was no alternative except to recognize this. In this way alone could we end the quarrel between Hindus and Muslims... Jawaharlal spoke to me in sorrow but left no doubt in my mind as to how his mind was working..... (He) asked me to give up my opposition to partition. He said it was inevitable and it would be wisdom not to oppose what was bound to happen... I saw clearly that we were taking one wrong decision after another. Instead of retracing our steps we were now going deeper into the morass..." (India Wins Freedom pp 184 to 186).

When Maulana Azad took up the matter with Mahatma Gandhi on March 31, 1947 the Mahatma said, "if the Congress wishes to accept partition, it will be over my dead body". Later that day Gandhiji met Lord Mountbatten after which Sardar Patel spent two hours with him. Subsequently, Mahatma had two further meetings with Lord Mountbatten on April 1 and 2. When Maulana Azad met the Mahatma again he found the latter too had changed. The Mahatma "was still not openly in favour of partition but he no longer spoke so vehemently against it...In despondency I said at last, 'if even you have now adopted these views, I see no hope of saving India from catastrophe'. Gandhiji did not reply to my comments." (India Wins Freedom p 187).

At this stage Gandhiji put forward the suggestion that the Congress should let Mr Jinnah form the Government and choose the members of the Cabinet. Lord Mountbatten is quoted by Maulana Azad to have expressed the view that if the Congress accepted Gandhiji's suggestion, partition could still be avoided because such an offer would convince the Muslim League and perhaps win the confidence of Mr Jinnah. This move, however, could make no progress as both Pandit Jawaharlal and Sardar Patel opposed it vehemently and forced Gandhiji to withdraw the suggestion.

AND that brings us to the question whether the thrust of Indian policy in respect of Pakistan has been towards the latter's destruction. War, it is said, is an instrument of policy. Policy, in turn, is determined by the objectives pursued by a country.

The concept of Akhand Bharat, which according to most Pakistanis determines Indian policy towards their country, is altogether illusory. In terms of contemporary political realities it is positively detrimental to the Hindu economic and political interests. There is no Hindu political factor worth the name in Pakistan. There is a barely 10 per cent non-Muslim population in Bangladesh but it counts for very little in terms of effective political strength. The Muslim factor in India, on the other hand, has the capacity to determine the course of events in the country and to that extent is a material factor to be reckoned with. No political Party seriously contending for power in India can be unmindful of the Muslim factor. From this point of view Akhand Bharat cannot but undermine the Hindu position by consolidating the Muslim factor at present conveniently dispersed amid three nation states. No, unification of the subcontinent through military conquest or otherwise is not worth the candle so far as the Hindus are concerned.

Dr Henry Kissinger only shows his ignorance of the objective realities of the subcontinent's politics when he talks of the possibility of an Indian attack on West Pakistan after the fall of Dacca, It appears the myth of Hindu frustration over creation of Pakistan has distorted the understanding and perception of quite a few even among those who ought to know better.

In this regard it is well to recall that having successfully destroyed the Pakistani military strength in East Pakistan, Mrs Indira Gandhi lost no time in pulling back the Indian troops from Bangladesh. If Akhand Bharat had, indeed, been an Indian objective the military occupation of East Bengal was half the job done. Bonafide long-term national objectives are not surrendered after military victory for cosmetic reasons.

Then, why did India participate in the break-up of Pakistan? The answer lies in the policy of hostility pursued by Pakistan which had actively connived at, promoted and sustained secessionist insurgency in the eastern areas of India. East Bengal had become the sanctuary and jumping board for the insurgents of various hues. Even so, India could not do a thing until the Pakistani ruling military junta itself created a situation in which the continuance of East Bengal as a constituent province of Pakistan had anyhow become impossible. The option before India was to act or look on as a passive spectator while the consequences of the wanton brutalities unleashed by the Pakistani army were overflowing into our territory. Failure to act then would have increased Pakistani belligerence towards India to unmanageable proportions.

It is not my case that India has been oozing with goodwill towards Pakistan, while all the wrong things have been done by the latter. The decision to hold back Rs 55 crores, which constituted Pakistan's share of the Reserve Bank balances, was devoid of legal and moral justification. So was the refusal to deliver Pakistan's share of ordnance supplies. There have been numerous other instances when India has acted petulantly rather than generously. But, no single action by itself or all combined together have been calculated to obliterate Pakistan as a nation state. Even the wars beween the two countries have not been fought on the basis of non-acceptance of Pakistan by India.

Be that as it may, the long story of unsatisfactory relations between Pakistan and India needs to take a turn for the better. Hostility with India has hurt Pakistan far beyond the lost wars. Nor for that matter has India escaped the evil consequences of the unhappy situation. The failure of Pakistan to evolve a viable political culture or build a sound economic base can be directly traced to the distortions arising out of the obsessive fear of and preoccupation with India.

The new situation that has developed in the neighbourhood of the subcontinent has imparted a new dimension and urgency to the task of improving relations between the two countries. There is no basis for the assumption that co-operation and good relations must inevitably be in derogation of the national sovereignty of one or the other. On the other hand improved relations cannot but contribute to their collective security.

The clouds of fear and suspicion that have so far plagued Indo-Pak relations are traceable to the myths surrounding their emergence as free nations. Since then the two countries have drifted apart to an extent that even people, whose business it is to know, are ignorant of, rather than well-informed about, the realities in the other country. The situation in respect of Bangladesh, too, is not exactly what it should be. The result is that public opinion is a negative factor in improvement of relations.

There is thus need for a more concerted effort to promote a systematic study of the entire gamut of factors affecting the relations between the countries of the subcontinent. I would strongly urge institutions like the Gandhi Peace Foundation and the Aligarh Muslim University in India, the Quaid-e-Azam Academy and the Quaid-e-Azam Foundation in Pakistan and some such body as the Carnegie Endowment For International Peace to act in this direction. ■

I HAVE considered from every possible point of view the scheme of Pakistan as formulated by the Muslim League. As an Indian, I have examined its implications for the future of India as a whole. As a Muslim, I have examined its likely effects upon the fortunes of Muslims of India.

Considering the scheme in all its aspects I have come to the conclusion that it is harmful not only for India as a whole but for Muslims in particular. And, in fact, it creates more problems than it solves.

I must confess that the very term Pakistan goes against my grain. It suggests that some portions of the world are pure while others are impure. Such a division of territories into pure and impure is un-Islamic and a repudiation of the very spirit of Islam. Islam recognises no such division and the Prophet says, 'God has made the whole world a mosque for me.'

Further, it seems that the scheme of Pakistan is a symbol of defeatism and has been built up on the analogy of the Jewish demand for a national home. It is a confession that Indian Muslims cannot hold their own in India as a whole and would be content to withdraw to a corner specially reserved for them.

One can sympathise with the aspirations of the Jews for such a national home, as they are scattered all over the world and cannot in any region have any effective voice in the administration. The condition of Indian Muslims is quite otherwise. Over 90 million in number they are in quantity and quality sufficiently important element in Indian life to influence decisively all questions of administration and policy. Nature has further helped them by concentrating them in certain areas.

In such context, the demand for Pakistan loses all force. As a Muslim, I for one am not prepared for a moment to give up my right to treat the whole of India as my domain and to share in the shaping of its political and economic life. To me it seems a sure sign of cowardice to give up what is my patrimony and content myself with a mere fragment of it.

As is well-known Mr Jinnah's Pakistan scheme is based on his two-nation theory. His thesis is that India contains many nationalities based on religious differences. Of them the two major nations, the Hindus and Muslims, must as separate nations have separate states. When Dr. Edward Thompson once pointed out to Mr. Jinnah that Hindus and Muslims live side by side in thousands of Indian towns, villages and hamlets, Mr. Jinnah replied that this in no way affected their separate nationality. Two nations according to Mr Jinnah confront one another in every hamlet, village and town, and he, therefore, desires that they should be separated into two states.

I am prepared to overlook all other aspects of the problem and judge it from the point of view of Muslim interests alone. I shall go still further and say that if it can be shown that the scheme of Pakistan can in any way benefit Muslims I would be prepared to accept it myself and also to work for its acceptance by others. But the truth is that even if I examine the scheme from the point of view of the communal interests of the Muslims themselves, I am forced to the conclusion that it can in no way benefit them or allay their legitimate fears.

Let us consider dispassionately the consequences which will follow if we give effect to the Pakistan scheme. India will be divided into two states, one with a majority of Muslims and the other of Hindus. In the Hindustan State there will remain 3½ crores of Muslims scattered in small minorities all over the land. With 17 per cent in U.P., 12 per cent in Bihar and 9 per cent in Madras, they will be weaker than they are today in the Hindu majority provinces. They have had their homelands in these regions for almost a thousand years and built up well-known centres of Muslim culture and civilization there.

They will awaken overnight and discover that they have become aliens and foreigners. Backward industrially, educationally and economically, they will be left to the mercies to what would then become an unadulterated Hindu raj.

On the other hand, their position within the Pakistan State will be vulnerable and weak. Nowhere in Pakistan will their majority be comparable to the Hindu majority in the Hindustan State.

In fact, their majority will be so slight that it will be offset by the economical, educational and political lead enjoyed by non Muslims in these areas. Even if this were not so and Pakistan were overwhelmingly Muslim in population, it still could hardly solve the problem of Muslims in Hindustan.

Two States confronting one another offer no solution of the problem of one another's minorities, but only lead to retribution and reprisals by introducing a system of mutual hostages. The scheme of Pakistan therefore solves no problem for the Muslims. It cannot safeguard their rights where they are in a minority nor as citizens of Pakistan secure them a position in Indian or world affairs which they would enjoy as citizens of a major state like the Indian Union.

It may be argued that if Pakistan is so much against the interest of the Muslims themselves, why should such a large section of Muslims be swept away by its lure? The answer is to be found in the attitude of certain communal extremists among the Hindus. When the Muslim League began to speak of Pakistan, they read into the scheme a sinister Pan-Islamic conspiracy and began to oppose it out of fear that it foreshadowed a combination of Indian Muslims with trans-Indian Muslim States.

The opposition acted as an incentive to the adherents of the League. With simple though untenable logic they argued that if Hindus were so opposed to Pakistan, surely it must be of benefit to Muslims. An atmosphere of emotional frenzy was created which made reasonable appraisement impossible and swept away especially the younger and more impressionable among the Muslims. I have, however, no doubt that when the present frenzy has died down and the question can be considered dispassionately, those who now support Pakistan will themselves repudiate it as harmful for Muslim interests.

The formula which I have succeeded in making the Congress accept secures whatever merit the Pakistan scheme contains while all its defects and drawbacks are avoided. The basis of Pakistan is the fear of interference by the Centre in Muslim majority areas as the Hindus will be in a majority in the Centre. The Congress meets this fear by granting full autonomy to the provincial units and vesting all residuary power in the provinces. It has also provided for two lists of Central subjects, one compulsory and one optional, so that if any provincial unit so wants, it can administer all subjects itself except a minimum delegated to the Centre. The Congress scheme therefore ensures that Muslim majority provinces are internally free to develop as they will, but can at the same time influence the Centre on all issues which affect India as a whole.

The situation in India is such that all attempts to establish a centralised and unitary government are bound to fail. Equally doomed to failure is the attempt to divide India into two States. After considering all aspects of the question, I have come to the conclusion that the only solution can be on the lines embodied in the Congress formula which allows room for development both to the provinces and to India as a whole. The Congress formula meets the fear of the Muslim majority areas to allay which the scheme of Pakistan was formed. On the other hand, it avoids the defects of the Pakistan scheme which would bring the Muslims where they are in a minority under a purely Hindu government.

I am one of those who consider the present chapter of communal bitterness and differences as a transient phase in Indian life. I firmly hold that they will disappear when India assumes the responsibility of her own destiny. I am reminded of a saying of Gladstone that the best cure for a man's fear of the water is to throw him into it. Similarly India must assume responsibility and administer her own affairs before fears and suspicions can be fully allayed.

When India attains her destiny, she will forget the present chapter of communal suspicion and conflict and face the problems of modern life from a modern point of view. Differences will no doubt persist, but they will be economic, not communal. Opposition among political Parties will continue, but they will be based, not on religion but on economic and political issues. Class and not community will be the basis of future alignments and policies will be shaped accordingly. If it be argued that this is only a faith which events may not justify I would say that in any case the nine crores of Muslims constitute a factor which nobody can ignore and whatever the circumstances, they are strong enough to safeguard their own destiny.—April 15, 1946.

"In a place like Africa, your 'V.I.P.' is always a rrr-roaring success!"

"People like me are wild. Just wild about your 'V.I.P.'," said Alake Uwaleke*, in fluent, cultured English. She sat there, looking tall, dark and stunning.

We had no difficulty in returning a compliment. "Black" we said, "is beautiful."

"I agree" she said serenely, "but I also like brown. I just love your 'V.I.P.' colours. All twelve of them. You have everything except white. Now, that's unusual!"

We promptly assured her that there was nothing either racial or discriminatory about this. Why, our business associates would vouch for the fact that we like everything in black and white!

We congratulated her on her English. "In India" we complained, "we have 14 major languages. Not including English."

"I understand" she said sympathetically, "back home in Nigeria, we have 200!"

After that, we decided not to trade problems!

"We're trading know-how" we said, "a joint 'V.I.P.' venture will be set up shortly in Nigeria."

"I'd be tempted to invest. Only my family's interest is in oil. Not travelware."

"Black gold!" we said, triumphantly.

"What do Africans like specially about our 'V.I.P.'?" we asked.

"Everything!" was the understated reply. "The style of your Classic range. The beautiful brocade lining. Especially your combination locks. They work like magic!"

"But" she carried on "your Travelite range is great too. Of course, nobody could travel as light as my grandfather. He was the tribal Chief for 50 years. Sometimes he wore a smile. Most often he wore a scowl. And, I can assure you he didn't need any luggage to carry either around!"

Well, Africa has changed a lot lately. Thankfully!

"We believe" she said, "that 'V.I.P.' is the luggage of today. And this attitude is coloured. Coloured by the fact that in Africa we are now slaves to progress!

"Everywhere I go, they ask about my 'V.I.P.'s. I tell them all. We Nigerians, never lose an opportunity to drum a message home!

"I'm off now" she said, "to Timbuktoo."

Was she pulling our leg? "No, no" she said, "Timbuktoo is almost next door. You people are so much in the dark about Africa. That's probably why it was called the Dark Continent!"

We saw her into a sleek limousine. And, as she stepped in, it was evident that blood would always tell. She would undoubtedly be like her grandfather, the Chief attraction!

'Bugging' by law?

Civil Liberties

By A. G. NOORANI

EVERY so often and especially at times when a political crisis occurs or political infighting intensifies, one hears complaints from politicians that their telephones are being tapped. Such complaints have been heard from many in recent days as well. As it happens, Opposition leaders can freely air their resentment but those of the ruling Party must keep their suspicions to themselves for they know that the tapping is done to check on their loyalty and complaints can make matters worse.

The last time the subject was considered in Parliament in any detail was on December 20, 1977 in the Lok Sabha. Mr Vyalar Ravi had given notice of a motion of breach of privilege of Parliament by the Home Minister which the Speaker referred to the Minister for his comments. There were complaints by Opposition leaders as well as by members of the Janata Party. Mr Samar Mukherjee (CPM) added that besides tapping their telephones, members of his Party were also being shadowed.

The then Prime Minister, Mr Morarji Desai's reply was as comprehensive as it was unsatisfactory. Telephones of anti-national or anti-social elements or those who indulged in violent activities were being tapped, he said. Mr Desai claimed that Government was entitled to do so and whatever was done was "within my knowledge." He, however, denied that any tapping was done to keep a track of political activities.

Mr Desai made an interesting disclosure. Within a week of assuming office he instructed the officers concerned to show him the list of names of persons whose telephones were being tapped. "I have seen the list", he said and claimed that it did not include MPs. No names would be added to the list without his permission, either.

Successive Governments of India have relied on an absurd provision in an archaic statute—Section 5 of the Indian Telegraph Act, 1885. It reads thus "(1) On the occurrence of any public emergency, or in the interest of the public safety, the Central Government, or a State Government, or any officer specially authorised in this behalf by the Central or a State Government may . . .

"(b) Order that any message or class of messages to or from any persons or class of persons or relating to any particular subject brought for transmission by, or transmitted or received by, any telegraph shall not be transmitted, or shall be intercepted or detained, or shall be disclosed to the Government making the order or an officer thereof mentioned in the order.

(2) If any doubt arises as to the existence of a public emergency, or whether any act done under sub-section (1) was in the interest of the public safety, a certificate of the Central or, as the case may be, the State Government, shall be conclusive proof on the point."

Section 26 of the Indian Post Office Act, 1898 is similar: "(1) On the occurrence of any public emergency, or in the interest of the public safety or tranquillity, the Central Government, or a State Government, or any officer specially authorised in this behalf by the Central or the State Government, may, by order in writing, direct that any postal article or class or description of postal articles in course of transmission by post shall be intercepted or detained or shall be disposed of in such manner as the authority issuing the order may direct.

"(2) If any doubt arises as to the existence of a public emergency or as to whether any act done under sub-section (1) was in the interest of the public safety or tranquility, a certificate of the Central Government or, as the case may be, of the State Government shall be conclusive proof on the point."

Thus, both the statutes leave it to the exclusive and subjective decision of the executive. The matter is placed beyond the scrutiny of courts of law. Whether these sections are compatible with the fundamental rights is doubtful.

There is another aspect. The scope of judicial review of administrative action has increased considerably thanks to the recent case law and it would be necessary for the Government to establish objectively that there was a real threat to "public safety" or that "public emergency" had in fact occured to warrant the exercise of these powers. But how is a citizen to prove in a court of law that his phone is being tapped?

However, the march of science has made telephone-tapping archaic and the statutes irrelevant, in a sense. As Prof. Harry Street points out in his study Freedom, the Individual and the Law a superb Pelican, "Electronic devices such as laser beams, closed-circuit television and micro-miniaturised radio transmitters have rendered wire-tapping an old-fashioned method of overhearing conversations. Little is known about the extent to which police eavesdrop by these new methods; for example, by the use of portable radio equipment which can be hidden in a briefcase or even on a person's premises. One thing is clear: such evidence will not be rendered inadmissible merely because the police have to break into private premises in order to conceal the equipment there."

The legal position in India is the same. Evidence is not inadmissible because it has been obtained improperly by bugging or wire-tapping. In the United States it would be inadmissible.

Fifty years ago the legendary Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes characterised phone-tapping as "dirty business". Since then the U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that telephones can be tapped only if a court warrant has first been obtained. Mr Justice Powell's remarks are very apt. "The price of lawful public dissent must not be a dread of subjection to an unchecked surveillance power. Nor must the fear of unauthorized official eavesdropping deter vigorous citizen dissent and discussion of Government action in private conversation. For private dissent, no less than open public discourse, is essential to our free society."

The Indian statutes are sorely in need of a comprehensive review. At the very least, the exercise of the Government's power must be made conditional strictly on a judicial warrant.

SPECIAL REPORT

Zimbabwe is bor

An eyewitness report by DAVID CAUTE

BRITISH hopes of a "broad-based" multi-Party, national coalition, in which Mugabe's influence would be stifled, are dead. Speaking after the Governor had invited him to form a Government, Robert Mugabe once again emphasised the extreme moderation and gradualism of his short term plans—on this showing he could well be expelled from the Fabian Society. Private property is not at risk; Rhodesia is a capitalist state "on which it is necessary to build"; one must "start with existing institutions" and in any case Rhodesia already boasts some "socialist" economic organisms such as the Grain Marketing Board. Understandably reluctant to provoke security forces into a coup which now seems increasingly unlikely, Mugabe refuses to be drawn on his future plans for General Walls and the Combined Operations Command, once the General has completed the job the new Prime Minister has given him of integrating the countries' three armies.

The reaction of whites to the election result has been one of shock bordering on trauma. Busloads of cheering militants are driving through the centre of Salisbury while ecstatic crowds parade the streets with a sense of final deliverance from war and oppression. One white lady told me that Mugabe had promised to abolish Christmas and Easter; another doubted that she could now put her mother into an old people's home since such institutions are abolished under communism. "Who will maintain law and order?" demanded a businessman, "Standards will go to pot." A gunsmith snarled "No comment". A schoolgirl in a green uniform asked: "How can they vote for terrorists who burnt down their own schools and houses?" "This country has gone." An insurance clerk wanted to know why "couldn't they have done all this junketing in 1972 and saved us a war?" A good question for Ian Smith.

In Kambazuma township a circle of young men closes ten-deep round your correspondent. They speak of land, liberation and land again. Two officers of the BSAP scatter the circle with the command "break it up" but almost immediately it reforms. The young men complain bitterly of constant police harassment. A shell-shocked official of the UANC pushes through the crowd and urges me to inform the world that he is now switching allegiance to Mugabe. The small knots of supporters dancing and chanting their affection for the Bishop are mainly women. Clearly, emissaries from the movement have not yet reached these sisters.

The security machine responds with a pantomime display of tanks, armoured vehicles and heavy guns at street intersections and shopping precincts. A middle-aged woman stops me in the street: "I take my hat off to these fellows." Housewives and secretaries bring cups of tea to the men of the Rhodesian Light Infantry. "I'm prepared to give these people one chance, but only one", a trooper remarks. "We gave them schools and we gave them medicine. We built up this country and I'm not prepared to hand it over to a bunch of gooks."

Day after day the police empty ZANU PF's headquarters in Manica Road on the pretext of a bomb scare. The police then head for the most obvious place to conceal a bomb, the Party's files. Nathan Shamuyirira of the Central Committee is arrested at two in the morning on the flimsiest of charges. The better to protect Mugabe, the army rumbles an armada past his house, machine guns trained over the wall— in the face of all this ZANU PF has developed an almost oriental patience. Mugabe claims that some 10,000 party workers, officials, agents and candidates have been arrested in the course of the campaign. At Chiredzi, in the South-East, journalists witnessed the arrest of two ZANU PF polling agents, David Mashingidze and Amos Vandirai. A dead cock (the cock is ZANU PF's symbol) had been nailed to a tree outside the polling station, together with a notice, "Jongwe (cock) is dead". When they noted this down in writing they were arrested—Superintendent Felix Kuttner later explained—under the Miscellaneous Offences Act. Questioned about this, the British Election Commissioner, Sir John Boynton, confirmed that it is not an electoral offence to use pen and paper within 100 metres of a polling station. Next day he reported, with the weary shrug characteristic of British officials here, that the two ZANU PF agents would stay in jail anyway. Such incidents have been the rule rather than the exception.

In the European (now called "commercial"), farming area of Wedza the farmers bring their labour force to the mobile polling station on tractor-drawn trailers. Such is their hostility to the foreign Press that one feels like a Yankee carpetbagger among Southern plantation owners as the Confederacy falls. How will their farm workers vote—for the Bishop, surely? "No idea, they're keeping it to themselves." But surely they must know that your farms will be collectivised next Tuesday morning if Mugabe wins? Glowering looks. "If you really want to know the position, what we're afraid of is a minimum wage of $100 a month." (At present farm workers are lucky to get $20 a month.) Later an apprehensive farmer just in from police reserve patrol duty in Wedza TTL confides that ZANU PF agitators have been emerging from the reserve at night and poisoning the minds of "Our Africans here."

The farmer leans the barrel of his rifle on his boot. "I believe we've got to forget the past, we can make a great nation here if we all pull together. But if Mugabe stops all the state credit which keeps these farms here afloat, then he's destroying private enterprise. I've been in this war for six years, we didn't start it, I can tell you, I mean I've seen my friends shot and I'm not prepared to take any nonsense, no way. I mean, next time if these external terrorists try anything we won't be so polite about it. We'll sort those gooks out. You've got to keep on top of these guys. I mean, I believe we have a very special type of black man here in Rhodesia, a very decent bloke, but he wants to be left alone to grow his maize and to sleep and have his wives—we should never have imposed our Western ideas on him. I mean, it's the same story in Northern Ireland, isn't it? These people have no excuses at all if we continue to look after them, but they think they can just walk into these farms and take them over."

Bishop Abel Muzorewa in a Salisbury street

SOUTH of Salisbury, in the Seki Tribal Trust Land four pleasant members of the police anti-terrorist unit, two of them accountants, one a town planner and the other a trainee jeweller, confess how sick and weary they are of serving 140 days a year in the sticks, living off tinned food. "Yes, we're certainly afraid now. If Mugabe gets in we don't know what will happen. We've been distributing these anti-Marxist pamphlets but we're not allowed to meddle in politics. These simple people have no idea what communism is. I can tell you, if there's any trouble in Salisbury we'll be out of here and back with our families, orders or no orders." Would they support a white military coup? A long, rudderless silence follows: they don't know.

The 270 kilometre drive from Salisbury to the ZANLA assembly point at Delta, close to the Mozambique border, takes one through Mrewa and Mtoko, where the war has been most savage. The blue ribbon of tarmac, kept in perfect repair by the war machine, winds through wild countryside dotted with huge rock kopjies under the vast cloud-flecked African sky. In Delta, a remote camp covering two square kilometres, 2,700 ZANLA guerrillas run up a dirt track in phalanxes of 60 towards the mobile polling station, chanting war cries in unison—Pamberi Namugabe—with the aid of phrases learnt not only in Mozambique (Viva, Imperialismo) but even in Swahili territory. Their wolf-pack howls and grunts would, one suspects, bring little joy to the white suburbs of Gwelo and Umtali.

A most astonishing metamorphosis then occcurs. Obediently they halt before the commanding hand of a black sergeant of the BSAP—the very man whom, a few weeks ago, they would have shut down as a "sell-out". Dressed in every imaginable garment out of the Portobello Road, and carrying—by law—no weapons to the polling station, they stand silent under the indifferent, neutral scrutiny of white officials: it's as if Peter Pan had appeared with Captain Hook's pirates in Wendy's bedroom. Weeded out as possibly under age by election officials (unlike all other male voters the guerrillas carry no identity papers) the kids sit in a meek knot, as humbly accepting of authority as the young Africans turfed out of buses at police road blocks. For a moment, then, the guerrilla is submerged in the world he rose against.

But not for long. Back in the bandits' camp, with its tattered tents and strips of canvas suspended on rough-hewn poles, every man and woman carries an AK rifle (600 of Delta's contingent are female) and

Would you rather wear dentures than think about your toothpaste— now?

Have you ever wondered whether your toothpaste is giving your teeth the protection they need? Maybe it isn't. That's why you should look at Macleans. Because Macleans actually gives your teeth a two-way protection, which is necessary for their health.

Macleans fights destructive acids harder

Leftover food particles in your mouth produce acids that destroy tooth enamel. Is your toothpaste alkaline enough to neutralise these acid attacks? Macleans is. Because Macleans is specially formulated with an alkaline base. Laboratory tests demonstrate that the acid-neutralising action of Macleans protects teeth better and longer.

Macleans fortifies tooth enamel simultaneously

Clinical tests prove that Macleans helps protect teeth from caries. The Fluoride in Macleans combines with tooth enamel to strengthen it and increase its resistance to decay.

Only Macleans with its two-way action fights acids while it fortifies tooth enamel.

outsiders may enter only with the written authority of ZANLA's high command in Salisbury. The atmosphere is tense — they are all aware that the security forces have ringed Delta at a distance of five kilometres and on one occasion attempted to refurbish a minefield only 1,500 metres away. Do they intend to break out of their camp into the impenetrable countryside they know so well? "We are soldiers," explains comrade Chris. "Political soldiers. We follow the orders of the Party." What does he feel about the more than 10,000 guerrillas killed during the past three years? He laughs : "War is war. In war you are my enemy. I am your enemy. War is war." Asked any mildly taxing question, regarding, for example, the murder of sell-outs and the closing of schools and dip tanks, comrade Chris responds with a disarming guffaw and the words, "we are not Russia."

The fate of these corralled guerrillas could yet be death. As K. N. Maliudi, foreign minister in the interim government and a member of Sithole's rump 'ZANU', remarked in Wedza township : "After next week I expect all the foreigners will have gone and probably we will do a little bit of a bloodbath in this country." Ominous for ZANLA is the lead taken by Nkomo in integrating ZIPRA units with the security forces — indeed the PF leader joined the Rhodesian army commander, General Macintyre in inspecting a guard of honour composed not only of ZIPRA but also of the mounted Grey's Scouts who hunted them down on South African horses across the open plains of Matabeleland. Once again the whites are making the smart moves, shrewdly playing on Nkomo's ambitions in order to neutralise Mugabe's vision of a new national army built round the nucleus of ZANLA and ZIPRA.

As British, Rhodesians and South Africans well understand, ZANU PF represents the closest approximation to a revolutionary Party in Zimbabwe. Despite its Fabian manifesto, the Marxist undercurrent runs strong and deep. Having put the war into cold storage, Mugabe, like Kwame Nkrumah before him, will seek first the political kingdom, hoping in the process to avoid the fate of Patrice Lumumba. But if his followers are denied their inheritance there will be violence. More than once I have heard in the streets and countryside : "ZANU is the people, opposition to ZANU will be treason against the people." This is not a Party dedicated in the long term to electoral democracy, and the constant invocations to the Comrade President, the Central Committee and the High Command sound ominous.

Yet Mugabe himself is a man of exceptional calibre and integrity who may succeed in checking the more intolerant elements within his ranks. It is symptomatic of the imbecility prevailing within the white mental laager that every other white dreams of shooting the man most likely to fashion an African society in which Europeans with badly needed skills can work in peace and prosperity.

Death rite for a departed spy

By VIMAL BALASUBRAHMANYAM

GEORGE Smiley, one-time British Intelligence chief, is back from retirement in pursuit of his Black Grail—Karla—code name for his formidable Russian adversary, the man who engineered the treason of agent Bill Haydon and incidentally also spirited him into Ann Smiley's bed. (Carre's earlier Tinker Tailor Soldier Spy). If you are not a Carre regular, get these facts clear and read on—plot and narrative in the impeccable Carre style; and reflecting the vicious real-life goings-on in the unethical world of agents and double-agents.

Smiley's return begins as a death rite for a departed spy, develops into a relentless chase, to end in a sort of modern-day Holmes-Moriarty climax minus the melodrama. All the Carre elements are there including the peculiar spy jargon, familiarity with which gives the regular thriller reader what can only be described as a sense of 'belonging'—though I'm not sure if that entirely expresses it. It's much the same feeling an Edgar Wallace fan has towards the finer nuances of the London thief's argot of which Wallace was a master.

For the thriller addict, Smiley's People is un-put-down-able, in much the same degree as, say a Len Deighton, an Alistair Maclean or a Victor Canning in the sense that it has all the ingredients of a first-class spy story—and one that unfolds so graphically that you can simultaneously visualize each frame of the film it will eventually end up as. The meticulous attention to detail is reminiscent of Brian Garfield's Hop Scotch. And one can imagine the copious notes and drafts that must have gone into the writing of Smiley's People which is, by thriller standards, on the lengthy side.

If you are looking out for surprises, twists and heroics you'll be disappointed. No special who-dun-it formula here, nor any dramatic denouement. The end is low-key and played down, which is as it would be in real life. The Russians are of course painted black, and if the author is fair enough not to paint the British white, he does colour them a rather light shade of grey.

For the Carre addict I would say that the latest offering, though gripping, will not arouse the brooding horror that The Spy who Came in from the Cold must have. The double-dealing, buck-passing and coldblooded opportunism that abound in Smiley's world are all old hat to the inured thriller reader. One is no longer all that sensitive even to sensational real-life revelations about Philby, Blunt and the lot, and more recently the Christina Onassis rigmarole. If fiction is distastefully similar to fact, and sometimes even portends events, it largely leaves the blase reader cold.

I say this not in disparagement of Carre's realism. But the truth is that when a spy story breaks new ground and then is followed by a host of similar equally well-written and suspenseful stories, then it is the first one or the first one which a particular reader reads, that alone remains truly memorable. The others merely belong to the genre. But that is not Carre's fault and does not make Smiley's People less readable.

Two things strike me about Carre in this as well as other books. One is that his writing clearly if unselfconsciously reveals his public school upbringing. And while his rejection of the values ingrained by such a tradition also comes across, it does not emerge as irrevocably and forcefully as one can distinctly feel it come through from Len Deighton's nameless hero who belongs to the same professional breed as George Smiley.

The other point that strikes me every time I read Carre is the strong literary quality of his style. And while a highbrow would undoubtedly disagree with me, I rather feel that a thriller which is racily written without any frills is a better thriller than one whose literary overtones slow down the pace and dilute the suspense.

John le Carre

If form must be wholly functional for optimum results I think a thriller that has the essentials of its category, and little else, is more satisfying than a thriller that has too many subtle details of characterization that blend more comfortably into a class of fiction where psychological insight of much greater depth is called for. This is not to imply that Carre's handling of his subject is clumsy. There is no denying his masterly story-telling style but the absence of a more earthy approach, I feel, waters down the impact of the thriller element.

I have a theory, which I am convinced is shared by other lowbrow thriller addicts, that a thriller should be a thriller first and last and preferably nothing else. It can't be a good thriller unless it's well-written and that's literary enough. Even realism is not an absolute must. There is nothing realistic about the James Bond stories or many of the Alistair Macleans and Victor Cannings. I don't think this detracts from their merit as thrillers. Of course, while the constant depiction of the hero-spy as a susperman reads well enough in print, it inevitably comes across on the screen as a spoof. All the James Bond films have this spoof quality. On the other hand, the realism of Carre and Deighton lends itself very effectively to cinema.

One can appreciate the literary quality of Carre only if one has the leisure to savour it. On that score Carre certainly reached a peak with The Honourable School-boy. While Smiley's People was engrossing it did make me impatient at times. A sort of why-don't-you-get-on-with-the-story feeling tempts one to infulge in a bit of judicious skipping especially if one is the type who simply can't resist peeping into the last page. For every one allusion I may have understood, and only just at that. (Tonlouse-Lantrec faces, for example) there must be umpteen that went over my head. And while that is admittedly no credit to me, it doesn't make Smiley's People a better thriller than it could be.

I do not for a minute question Carre's prerogative to apply a thicker literary polish than others of his ilk. But there is a cult by which the thriller writer who appeals to the highbrow receives better critical appreciation than the pure entertainer. This I think is not quite fair. I expect a thriller to have a strong, slick plot and the dialogue preferably witty. If there are other elements that do not bolster this crucial elements of the spy story, then however commendable they may be in themselves they only detract from its value.

IN big budget Hindi films like Lok Parlok, she provided the glamour. In Malayalam films bordering on porno, she was made to strip. She even played a lesbian once. And then director K. Viswanath who made Jayapradha a big star in his musical hit Siri Siri Muva decided to transform Manju Bhargavi from a sex bomb into an actress of merit. And his success has become a topic of discussion in the film industry in the South. Viswanath's new film Sankarabharanam is doing really well at the box office and may be shortly remade in Tamil. From the financial angle, the new venture appears to be an improvement on Siri Siri Muva.

Balu Mahendran has handled the camera very well and it disproves the subtle campaign against Balu that he only does good work when his favourite Shoba is acting.

RAMESHWARI appeared in an arty-arty Kannada film Kankana before she made it big in Hindi films. Her elder sister, a doctor by profession, is also obsessed with acting and has a couple of assignments lined up in Tamil. Unlike Rameshwari she didn't do a stint in Pune but decided to try her luck on her own.

Sridevi in "Kaksha", a Telgu film

WHEN journalists representing English magazines go to studios, some film-makers strain themselves to explain some sequences in English though they aren't really conversant in the language. And they have evolved their own lingo. "Just hold on", a veteran director told me. "You look up there. My heroine is hiding behind the door. And suddenly the villain will try to 'spoil' her." 'Spoil' is the euphemism for rape. The next day the same director told me gleefully: "Today I am shooting a scene showing a housewife being polluted..." Polluted? The director explained: "You see she's married and her husband's best friend pollutes her". Well, if it's the villain, he 'spoils' and if it's the hero, he 'pollutes'.

UP-COMING Sumalatha is a bit worried that too much is being made about her (rather her mother's) demand for fabulous remunerations. It's a fact that she's in terrific demand and her mother says that only by raising the price was she was able to keep away some producers. But then, why not be honest and explain that your chubby daughter has enough assignments? As a matter of fact, Sumalatha isn't getting half of what Rathi Agnihotri and other top heroines are getting. But she does have couple of big films including Ravi Chandra opposite Rajkumar. Lakshmi too is acting in the film but probably Sumalatha will be much more exciting on the screen.

ACTOR Muthuraman's venture Panam Penn Pasam isn't doing badly when you compare its profits to some of his recent films but then when he has a co-hero like Vijayan most of the credit for the modest run of the film (directed by M. A. Kaja) is hogged by you know whom.

THE alleged secret marriage of Vinod Mehra with Bindiya Goswami first sounded incredible. Not a nice, steady, respectable boy like our Vinod, everybody said—why he even plays the boy-next-door, gentle in his looks and behaviour! And he got married to that nice, sweet girl last year at a well-publicised ceremony. His mother had selected the girl, and the choice was commendable. Whenever there were rumours about his familiarity with Bindiya, he would fume and flare out his nostrils in a rage. He refused to discuss Bindiya with filmi journalists. But he certainly did nothing to arrest these rumours. It is alleged that he was deeply involved with Bindiya before he married that nice gharelu Meena. He didn't want to have an actress for a wife, as all heroes believe, and so married the girl his Ma chose. But his so-called involvement with Bindiya grew right after the marriage, and they are doing a lot of films together. Finally they decided they couldn't live without each other and the bungalow he had bought, to move in to after his marriage and which had been left unoccupied for some mysterious reason, now houses him and Bindiya. He denies that they got married according to the tenets of Sufi religion to which they are rumoured to have converted themselves. He insists that she goes home every night! And yet, his wife stays with her mother-in-law in the old flat! If this is true, are secret marriages a habit with Vinod? Long ago, he was "married" to Rekha and now this! In the wake of the Zeenat-Sanjay secret alliance, was it a bid to prove that he was the "original"? Of late, Bindiya has been exercising a growing influence on his life. The two love-birds are now in a fix because Meena doesn't agree with the idea of divorce.

AGREED Shatru is a real clown and can draw laughter each minute of the day. But is it really necessary to have these comic scenes wherever he goes? There is this fellow who follows on Shatru's heels like a puppy, with an enormous aluminium chair held in front of him for his lord and master. If Shatru happens to be standng, I guess it would be nice to have a valet and a chair handy, but when the valet takes things a bit too far, like bringing the chair on the steps, if Shatru happens to stand there or turning the chair this way and that, trying to keep up with his master's hip-movements, etc it makes you split with laughter! And Shatru himself is very good at telling very funny stories. These go together to make Shatru the funniest man in Bombay's filmdom.

WHEN the Pakistanis visited Bombay, it was rumoured that Shabana Azmi became very interested in all Zaheer Abbas had to say. In fact she was so interested that she kept listening to him wherever he went—with no eyes for anyone else.

LIKE we said before in SUNDAY, the comeback of Parveen Babi didn't create too easy a pace: there was this feeling that once she's done it, she can get up and go away again, leaving producers in the lurch. There was an air of uncertainty about her present plans and her immediate future. When she did report for work on Sippy's prestigious project Shaan and when one met her, she seemed okay, but not her cheerful, smiling self. The uncertainty about Parveen's return had lent an air of patience and film-producers are a very patient lot generally. Bang in the middle of her shooting-schedules which she had been honouring since she returned, Parveen just left, once more! And she isn't coming back again—it is as final as that! By the time news spread that she had left, some alarmed people tried to contact her at her place. Before that, she is alleged to have cleaned up traces of her whereabouts—like selling off her flat, car and other assets! To the producers who were clever enough to have dropped her from their half-made films, this has come as a relief—at least she isn't around to give them guilt pangs. ■

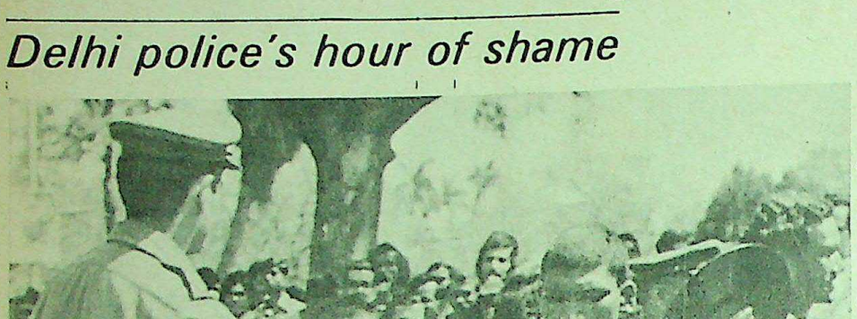
Blind lathi-charge

Delhi police's hour of shame



Courtesy : Hindustan Times

THE first glimpse of the new muscle that the police has acquired after the change of Government was seen on March 16, the World Day of the Disabled. While the Union Education Minister was giving a long speech at a function a few miles away, on the need to help the handicapped, the men of the Delhi Police force were busy lathi-charging a group of blind people whose only fault was that they wanted to meet the Prime Minister, Mrs Indira Gandhi.

The National Federation of the Blind had organized a march from their office at Paharganj to Mrs Gandhi's Safdarjung Road residence on the occasion of Disabled Day to present her with a memorandum of demands. The Federation had taken permission from the police beforehand and the straggly procession of 225 blind men who groped their way to the Prime Minister's residence had little idea of what was to follow.

The procession which was escorted by ten policemen of the Paharganj police station and two traffic policemen, made their way slowly towards Mrs Gandhi's house without much trouble—till they reached Parliament Street. At his point they were told that they could not proceed any further since Section 144 CRPC was in force there which did not allow an assembly of more than four persons. They were also told that Mrs. Gandhi did not meet anybody on Sunday, and the blind men could meet her on another day.

This was a bitter disappointment to the blind. They protested that they had taken permission well in advance and even if Section 144 had been suddenly declared, why had they not been informed earlier by the policemen who were escorting them? "We have come so far and we will not go away so easily," the Federation secretary Santosh Rungta told the police.

By this time about a hundred policemen had converged on the spot and under the supervision of the Parliament Street Station House Officer, R. L. Behl, started pushing back the procession. This further set the back up of the blind who squatted on the road, refusing to move. They said that the police would have to arrest them if they wanted to remove them. Tension rapidly mounted as the police grew increasingly exasperated at the blind protestors' adamant attitude.

Suddenly, the police men decided it was time to act and pounced upon Santosh Rungta and arrested him. Immediately, the other blind people converged on the spot and the melee that followed soon turned into a grappling match between the police and the blind in which the former used their lathis freely.

Compete chaos prevailed among the blind demonstrators who ran helter skelter, trying to escape the searing lathi blows. At this point some passers-by intervened, pleading with the police not to use their lathis on the helpless blind people. By the time the police relented, three blind persons had already been seriously injured and a number of them bore bruises on their faces and bodies. Not satisfied at this, the police arrested more than a 100 blind persons on charges of rioting.

The arrested men were herded into police vans and taken to the Parliament Street police station, where another strange drama started. According to the blind, one of them, Laxman Das, who was protesting very loudly at the police treatment was taken to another room and beaten up and abused in filthy language. When the other blind men realised that Laxman Das was missing, they created an uproar, asking for him to be produced. Frightened, the police brought him back.

The blind men were made to wait in the Parliament Street police station for about three hours from 1 to 4 pm, when they were again packed into police vans and taken to the Patiala House Courts. Here they were left inside the vans for more than three hours. Throughout this time they were refused water or food. When they asked the constables standing guard oustide to let them out, or at least open the vans' doors so that they could breathe some fresh air, the constables told them "Only our officers have keys for the vans. You have to wait".

Finally, the police took the Federation secretary Rungta to the Patiala House Court Magistrate, Mr K. C. Lohiya. According to Rungta, the magistrate asked him whether he and his colleagues would behave in future. When Rungta said they would again try to reach the Prime Minister's residence if released, the magistrate reportedly told him that the blind men would then have to spend the night in Tihar Jail.

After this brief interview Rungta was brought back and locked up with his companions in the van. Around 8 pm, the van's doors were opened and the blind prisoners were told that they could now get down and drink water. The men breathed sighs of relief. Most of them were without food and water for nearly the whole day. As if this were not enough, a cruel trick was played on them again. As they were lining up for water, the police took off in the vans, leaving them to fend for themselves. To add to their misery, the police men had also taken away their sticks with which they normally felt their way about on the streets.

Meanwhile the three injured persons were first taken to police hospital. Two of them were discharged but one of thm, Ramesh Chandra Soni, who suffered multiple bruises on his back and waist, was admitted to Lady Irwin Hospital. According to Soni, he was not given any food or water the whole day and night in spite of repeated requests.

The incident figured prominently in the next day's newspapers and when the blind went to the Prime Minister's residence the next morning, the police who seemed vastly sobered, did not prevent them from meeting her. Mrs Gandhi herself expressed deep regret at the previous day's incident and announced that a judicial enquiry would be started into it. The Parliament Street SHO has been suspended pending the inquiry's findings.

This announcement failed to mollify irate Opposition members in Parliament. The very same day, they rose unitedy in the Lok Sabha and staged an angry walkout after the speaker refused to permit a discussion on the incident. Later both Mrs Gandhi and the Home Minister Zail Singh expressed their regret but the latter insisted on describing the lathicharge as a "minor scuffle".

While the blind as well as eyewitnesses to the incident say that the police had unnecessarily used brute force on the helpless people the police stoically maintain that it was the blind and not they who were at fault. The New Delhi District Commissioner of Police P. R. S. Brar, said, it's an attempt by the Press to sensationalise a minor incident. "We were trying to help the blind and there was just a minor scuffle." He also said that the police had received intelligence reports on March 15 that the blind demonstrators were planning to "court arrest" and "might turn violent".

AJOY BOSE, New Delhi

Another churchman murdered

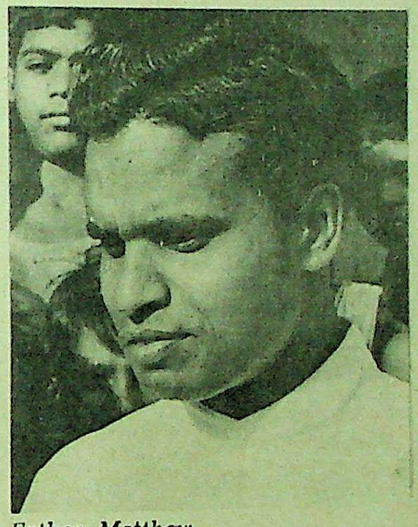
But justice remains elusive

ST. ANNE'S Catholic Church at Sasaram in Bihar nestles among the gently sloping foothills of the region. It is an area of peace and tranquillity, a sylvan setting not far from the tomb of the great Sher Shah. The normal church service was held on the evening of March 7, as it was the first Friday of the month. There was the usual knot of parishoners gathered for the mass which was conducted by Father Matthew, the spiritual head of the mission. The final benediction over, Father Matthew rose and sat on a bench behind the catechists and the village teachers who had participated in the evening service.

Without any warning, the calm was shattered. Four armed men clad in rustic garments burst into the churchyard and as they approached the priest, one of them called out "Here is the man". Immediately another priest, Brother D'Souza, known in the area as Swamy Shilanand, intervened to try and reason with the intruders. The words of the Catholic "Swamy" appeared to have some sort of an effect on the armed men. One of them shouted "Don't touch him," and the others backed away from the bearded monk who was clad in his customary saffron robe.

But there was no mercy for Father Matthew. One of the marauders held a knife at his ribs, while another covered him at gunpoint and dragged him away to his residence which was barely ten yards away. Inside the house was Father Joseph Mann, an American who had founded the church in the Sixties for the spiritual uplift of the local people. But there was nothing he could do to help Father Matthew. The aged American was disabled and too feeble to try and help.

Father Matthew was dragged into his own room by the two men, who



K. M. Kishan

Father Matthew

snatched the keys of the locker from him and went on the rampage. Everything in the room was rummaged through; they pocketed all the cash they found and in addition took away everything else they could lay their eyes on.

The suspense mounted outside till the sound of a single gunshot rent the deadly silence of the night. There were about thirty people, mostly villagers, present inside the church, all of whom had participated in the evening service. Along with two other priests they tried to get out and raise the alarm but in vain. They were kept at bay by one of the remaining gunmen. Outside, the driver of the mission jeep tried to drive out and race to the police station but the odds were against him. The sound of the engine being started brought the fourth gunman in his path and the valiant attempt proved fruitless.

Miraculously, one of the staff members managed to sneak out and break through the boundary of the mission to inform the police. But luck that night was not on the side of the innocent. A police posse had already left to investigate a murder that had taken place earlier that evening.

By the time the police did arrive, it was all over. The intruders had left and the single gunshot had claimed the life of Father Matthew. There were deep injuries on his forehead and left temple, while the right temple was no longer recognisable with the bullet wound. To all intents and purposes, Father Matthew had been shot at point-blank range.

MONNAPARAMBIL Matthew would have been 42 on June 14 this year. The jovial warmhearted priest came from a traditional Catholic family of Arakulam, in Kerala. After completing his early education first at Chemperi district and later at Calicut he joined the Society of Jesus in Patna in 1960. He then studied philosophy and theology in Pune and Kurseong before he was finally ordained as a priest in 1972. After a stint with the Catholic Church, Shahpur, in Bhojpur district, he finally moved to St. Anne's Church at Sasaram in 1975. It was there that he took over the task of looking after the Catholic population of the area—about 200 of them—in addition to organising philanthropic work for the poor.

It is difficult to find a possible reason for the murder, although there had been a certain amount of friction between the dead priest and the local people. On one occasion Father Matthew had taken strong action against some teachers of the area. On another he had requested the parents of students at the local school to donate foodgrain to help the poor, a gesture that had been resented by the students, who had observed a two-day strike. In addition, Father Matthew had been pursuing a case against culprits who had attacked the nearby convent last year, which may have antagonised several people. Even in view of all these theories, it is difficult to pin down personal vendetta as the cause of the murder.

THE Sasaram case cannot be taken in isolation. The Vicar General of the Patna diocese, Father B. J. Osta relates several gory incidents that have taken place in Bihar in the recent past, leaving those connected with the Church "under constant fear of repression and persecution". He can instantly call to mind ten cases relating to harassment, torture, threats, injuries and murder.

On March 29, 1979, the sisters of the convent school adjacent to the mission where Father Matthew was murdered were sitting down to their dinner when seven gunmen entered the premises through the kitchen. The sisters were made to line up and were beaten up by the gunmen who then seized their keys and decamped with all the money on the premises.

In addition they also took with them a tape recorder, a radio, wristwatches and whatever else they could carry. In the melee, four of the young hostel girls were injured.

There have been other instances as well. Father Goveas was hacked to death in the most brutal manner in January 1966. Father Welzmiller was attacked by thieves in May the same year. The Nazer mission in Monghyr district was attacked by a mob in April 1967 and the house in which Father Francis and some others were sheltering was set on fire. When the occupants stumbled out, Father Francies was manhandled by the mob. The late Father Farrell was attacked in Chanpatia, West Champaran; he was trussed with ropes and relieved of all his valuables. Even Father Mann, the founder of the Sasaram mission, had been shot at on three occasions, the first of which was in 1965. In fact, even today, the ailing priest still has fragments of pellets embedded in his body, an all-too-real reminder of the attacks.

There are endless other cases. The mission church of Basauni in Monghyr district is having its own problems with a sadhu of the locality. The sadhu, who is alleged to have encroached on the mission's land, has involved the priests in endless litigation, one of his accusations being that a priest from the church stole an idol from a temple. In Nawadah district, on October 23, 1979 Father Sequire was handcuffed and paraded in public at the local bazar because an FIR (First Information Report) lodged with the police charges the priest with the attempted murder of a villager. Church authorities, however, point out that the priest had served local harijans for 14 years, and that the claim is sheer nonsense. It is nothing short of "humiliation to a Catholic priest", they insist. Others recall a similar incident when Father Matthew himself was beaten up severely by a mob while conducting a prayer service.

Yet another incident that shook the Catholic world was the murder of Father Martinsek at the Mokameh mission, on February 20 last year. Yet, Church authorities point out, the culprits in most cases have not been brought to book. In only one case has the law taken its course. The culprits behind an attack on priests at Mupra village in Sitamarhi were given life sentences, but such incidents continue to occur and the culprits remain at large.

The Vicar General says "We were very insecure during the Janata rule. Fanaticism was right on top after the Freedom of Religion Bill was mooted". Even though the Bill has only been passed in three states of the country, repression continues. Sometimes, according to the Vicar General, there is general hostility from the religious groups and sometimes from local caste leaders who take umbrage at the Christian work among the harijans. In some areas the air remains charged with tension and all christian teaching about non-violence are in danger of being ignored.

What has the Patna diocese done for the people of Bihar? It furnishes a quick list. It runs 113 primary schools and secondary schools, 17 high schools, one college—the premier women's college in Patna—three training and teaching institutions in addition to three nurses' and midwives' institutions. That is not all. There are also 32 dispensaries, 12 orphanages, three homes for the old and disabled, besides several leper centres.

The state of Bihar has a total Catholic population of 6.5 lakhs, so it is no surprise that Christians feel that they have as much right as any others to preach their religion. On March 4, 1979, a year and three days before the murder of Father Matthew, a local Hindi daily had carried an editorial to which a rejoinder was sent by the general secretary of the Christian Welfare Association, Bihar. The matter seemed to be forgotten till the secretary received an anonymous letter which claimed that Jesus Christ had in fact come to India to learn yoga from the Buddhists. The letter added that all religions in the world originated from Hinduism and suggested that the secretary himself convert to Hinduism. The secretary had no knowledge about Indian religions and culture, it emphasised. The most virulent part of the letter is supposed to have said something to the effect that if Christians do not convert to Hinduism, there will be no alternative but to gun them down. Copies of this letter were also sent to the Governor of Bihar and the police.

As if by coincidence, 40 bishops had assmebled at a conference in Patna on the day that Father Matthew was murdered. "We view with anguish and concern all these affronts to human dignity and gross violations of human rights," they said in a joint statement. They went on to voice their concern at the recurrence of atrocities against harijans, minorities and other weaker sections. They feel it is something much worse than the mere breakdown of law and order, and have asked for a CBI probe into the incident. "The time has come," the statement said, to "take a united stand against all such cases of flagrant injustice". Six persons have since been arrested.

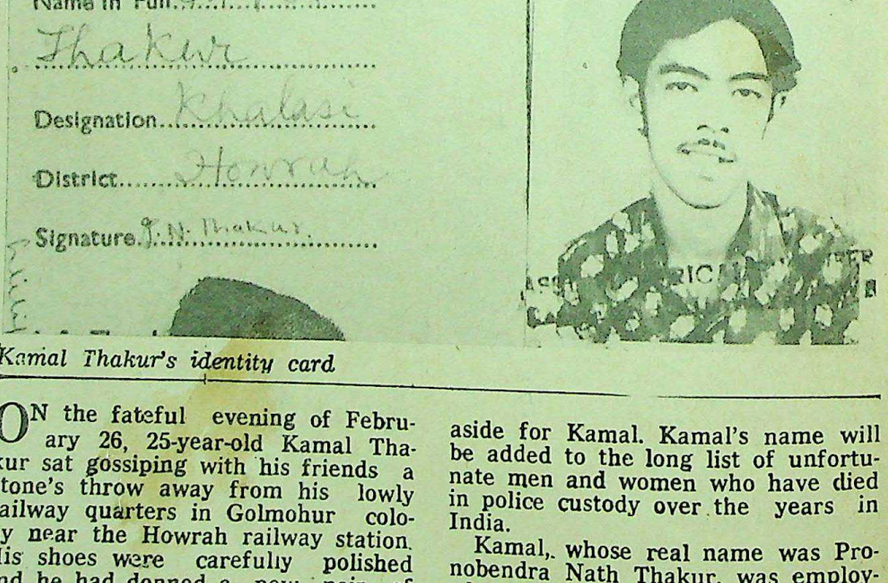
Death in police custody

Neither the first nor last



Kamal Thakur's identity card

ON the fateful evening of February 26, 25-year-old Kamal Thakur sat gossiping with his friends a stone's throw away from his lowly railway quarters in Golmohur colony near the Howrah railway station. His shoes were carefully polished and he had donned a new pair of trousers. Kamal was all set to go to a colleague's wedding that night. His colleague waited in vain. At about 7.30 pm, a posse of policemen from the adjoining Golabari police station took Kamal away and put him in the thana lock-up room for the night. The next morning while still in police custody, Kamal Thakur died and his friend who had in the mean time become a married man threw away the wedding sweets he had kept aside for Kamal. Kamal's name will be added to the long list of unfortunate men and women who have died in police custody over the years in India.

Kamal, whose real name was Pronobendra Nath Thakur, was employed as a khalasi with Eastern Railways in Howrah. Third among five brothers, Kamal's retired father was also with the railways. According to the statement prepared by the police after Kamal's death, he was arrested in connection with case number 15 dated 4.2.80 under sections 326 and 307 of the Indian Penal Code and sections 6 (3) of the Indian Explosives Act. The police case alleged that Kamal, along with a "local rowdy", Nemai Roy, and a few others had attacked Manik Chand Singh's hotel located in the vicinity. The "miscreants" allegedly used bombs and Singh had to be hospitalised with grave injuries. Soon after the incident, Nemai Roy surrendered in the court of the subdivisional judicial magistrate, Howrah and eventually on February 26, Kamal was arrested in the railway colony. Police spokesmen alleged that Kamal Thakur was a local rough with a criminal background and, between 1974 and 1980, he was involved in six cases for offences under various sections of the Indian Penal Code, the Explosive Substances Act and the Maintenance of Public Order Act. Of these, three cases were for attempted murder.

After his arrest on the evening of February 26, Kamal spent the night in the police lock-up along with other detainees. Next morning, the police decided to take him to the emergency ward of the Howrah General Hospital. At 11.30 am, the hospital informed the Howrah police station that Kamal had been brought to the hospital in "dead condition". The autopsy later revealed that Kamal's death was caused by injuries which were ante mortem and homicidal in nature. A high-ranking police officer who met me, said : "Obviously, Kamal was alive when he was arrested. He may have died in the police lock-up, on the way to the hospital or after reaching the hospital. But one thing is very clear: he died in police custody".

It was thus an "unnatural death case" and because the death took place while Kamal was in police custody, according to the statutory rules, a magisterial enquiry was conducted by the executive magistrate, Howrah. On the basis of his findings, a murder case (number 63/80) under 302 of the IPC was registered at Golabari police station on February 28 and the investigation into Kamal's death has been handed over to the CID. Kamal's father has also filed a criminal suit against the inspector-in-charge, Golabari thana, and other officers attached to the police station. Since there were apprehensions that the Golabari policemen may obstruct the process of investigation into Kamal's death, the inspector-in-charge, a sub-inspector and two constables of the thana who had arrested Kamal on February 26, were transferred. Mr Swarup Mukherjee, SP, Howrah was given special instructions to leave no stone unturned in bringing the culprits to book.

SOON after Kamal's death, the inevitable occurred. Congress (I) MLAs raised a hue and cry in the State Assembly. The Party's spokesmen described Kamal as a Congress (I) worker who was killed by the police at the behest of the State's ruling coalition, the Left Front. Various speakers from the opposition benches said that Kamal's death in police custody reflected the deteriorationg law and order situation in West Bengal and demanded the Government's resignation on this issue. When this correspondent visited Golmohur colony, some people said that Kamal was a Congress (I) worker while a large number of people thought otherwise.

A Bihari shopkeeper who owns a shop near the railway colony said: "The poor youth died in police custody. For their own selfish reasons some people are now saying that he was a Congress (I) worker. I don't know whether he was one during his life or he has been made one posthumously. But Saheb, the police's zoolum is well known. They should have thought about Kamal's old parents before doing what they did when he was in their custody". In the State Assembly, Jyoti Basu declared that "Kamal was not known to have affiliation to any political Party. No political Party except in the present instance claimed him as a supporter on earlier occasions". He also promised that the Government "is firm in its resolve to take appropriate action against persons whose complicity in the tragic and regrettable affair may come to light in the course of the investigation".

Eventually, it's for the courts to decide whether Kamal was killed by the policemen or he succumbed to the injuries which the police claim Kamal had on his person at the time of arrest. Kamal's case has not set any precedents because the practice of torture by the police are both widespread and have been investigagated by several commissions of inquiry. Thana officials confess in private conversation that beating up an accused is the most common thing at police stations. Sometimes the thrashing is meted out with the sole intention of extracting a statement and on other occasions to teach the accused a lesson. The police baton is the instrument normally used for punishment and applied freely on the accused's palms or soles. Such punishment, apart from causing searing pain does not leave behind any evidence of torture for the courts to detect. Often, a blanket is wrapped around the person before the beating so that no external injuries are inflicted. A police officer who is now engaged in writing a thesis on police behaviour said that in many thanas there are sub-inspectors who love beating people in the lock-up, sometimes for sadistic pleasure alone. And once in a while, someone is beaten up more than others and may sustain injuries which may prove fatal. A policeman usually takes a detainee to an adjoining room in the thana and uses the lathi.

Police brutality does not end within the confines of a thana though it is here that teenage girls have been raped and detainees done to death. Several commissions have been instituted in the past to look into "police encounters" and "jail firings" too. Wrongful detention and misuse of power entrusted in the hands of policemen has been proved on umpteen occasions. And police brutality and inefficiency has generally no direct connection with ruling Parties; the practice is too deep rooted to be erased within the short period of any Party's regime. The Left Front, after it came to power in mid-77, made an attempt to reorganise the police force and weed out corruption and high-handed methods which had become as good as Police Manual regulations. Chief Minister Jyoti Basu was not however over-optimistic. He said : "The mentality of the police cannot be changed overnight. It will take some time".

Hard times

THE tempestuous daughter of the late Pakistani President Bhutto, is in trouble with her Partymen according to George Fernandes. Benazir, 26, who donned the mantle of her father as Party leader, after he was hanged, is committed to anti-imperialism, socialism and secularism. She talks about this to her Partymen in the way her father did. But with one difference—she is genuine while Bhutto was what is called "pragmatic". "This," says Fernandes, "is not liked by bigwigs of the Pakistan People's Party, who have used anti-imperialist and pro-socialist slogans only to rally round the poor. Bhutto's commitment to the poor was qualitatively the same as Mrs Gandhi's commitment to Garibi Hatao. It was a convenient, unfailing vote-gathering exercise". As for the General Secretary of the People's Party, General Tikka Khan, says Fernandes, he is as paralysed as our Chandra Shekhar was on the night of January 6 when the Parliamentary election results were coming in and he said dazedly, "What will happen now? What are we going to do?" This in short is the opposition in Pakistan to the dictatorship of Zia-ul Haq, under whose inhuman martial law a person gets seven years' imprisonment and lashes if he or she dares to make a political statement even to the foreign Press.

A village in turmoil

Caste friction thwarts a relief scheme

THE fate of the food-for-work (FFW) programme at Dhanana, a dusty, sprawling, Jat-dominated village 17 km from Bhiwani, hangs precariously in the balance. An ugly Jat-Harijan caste war threatens to stop all work, deprive hundreds of innocent villagers of their daily quotas of wheat, and destroy the whole foundation of the scheme — a sense of community. Working together now seems almost impossible for the Jat and the Harijan: both see themselves divided by caste and fate, born to live and work apart.

The caste conflict, though still subdued, is an outcome of the FFW scheme itself. The Jats, grudging the manner in which Harijans were toiling on the sites in large numbers and being handsomely paid for it, felt cheated and manoeuvred to push them out. The Harijans protested and complained, but to no avail. The Jats meanwhile got more bitter. Their jealousy grew into hatred. The result was a cruel social boycott: the landless Harijans were ordered to stay away, not only from the FFW sites but also other agricultural plots. Most Harijans now remain confined to their own quarters, left with no other means of livelihood.

Dhanana, a rough, bumpy, 20-minute bus ride from Bhiwani, is a rugged, scattered hamlet with remarkably city-like collections of houses in some parts. The buildings, which rise amidst crowds of thatched roofs stand as symbols of the Harijans' growing prosperity. Many of them belong to men who have found jobs in sundry Government departments, from the state transport service to the Army, thanks to the preference they get in recruitment procedures. Economic independence was followed by a new consciousness of their rights. Some of the employed Harijans are active trade unionists who have introduced their village brethren to unfamiliar ideas of revolt. Soon, the Harijans saw themselves at par with the Jats, who, in turn, found their feudal relationship with landless Harijans threatened. Even as the Jats owned most of the land, the Harijans do not look to them, but to cities and towns for work. Of course, a large number of Harijans who survive on odd chores like cleaning houses and streets, still lead a hand-to-mouth existence. The ban on Harijan labour has deprived them of a vital means of livelihood—agricultural wages.

The caste war is a sequel to the FFW scheme's slow but sure progress over the previous year. Work on the scheme started on March 27, 1979, between which date and the end of January a total of 4,800 man-days of employment was generated. A number of impressive projects were completed. Several roads and lanes were paved with mud, wells dug in Harijan localities, walls erected around a girls' primary school and public lavatories for men and women built. The total number of beneficiaries for the period is estimated at 600, about half of whom are women. Six kg of wheat was given everyday for digging a trench ten feet by ten feet, to a lead of eight feet. For those owning camels and bullocks, the work allotted was much more, for 18 kg of wheat per day.

All work on the projects is planned and conducted by the ten-member village panchayat. Only two of the members are Harijans, Krishan Chand, a valmiki, and Gopi Ram, a chamar. There are two brahmins in the body, another person named Krishan Chand and Munni Ram, while the rest, Chandan Singh, Gandi, Daleep, Dop Singh, the wife of Megh Raj and the headman, Rameshwar, are Jats.

Work had been going on for some time on a large water tank in the village. On January 8, the headman Rameshwar declared that only those who owned animals should turn up at the site. The work was too heavy for men, and since the digging was making slow progress, he said it would be done faster with camels and bullocks. The fiat eliminated Harijans, most of whom do not own camels or bullocks. Frustrated and angry, the Harijans went in a delegation to Bhiwani and reported the matter to the Deputy Commissioner, Mr Chander Singh. Mr Singh assured them of all help and referred the matter to the sub-divisional magistrate, Mr Prahlad Singh. The SDM in turn contacted the village headman, Rameshwar. But the worst was yet to come. Instead of redressing the Harijans' grievances, the headman issued another fiat, forbidding any encroachment on agricultural plots. Anyone found guilty of doing so would be fined Rs 25, he warned. The Harijans saw in this an act of vengeance. Though outwardly meant to prevent unauthorised encroachment on land, the order was actually aimed against Harijans, since most of them depend solely on agricultural wages from work on others' — especially the Jats' — plots.

The effect of the order was to keep the Harijans confined to their own localities. Tiara Panna, Kalan and Milan. It was forcible internment. There was no way they could go to, or even find work. Many of them were forced to depend on each others' charity. The few who had animals gave them away to relatives far and near, because fodder could not be brought from the fields. Even at the time of writing, most of them were living in intense fear. "Hamare koi nahi sundi," (No one listens to us) groaned an old Harijan. "They do not let us go to the fields, even go out of the village. We cannot do anything. We are weak, and poor", he went on pitiably.

Many Harijans, the poorest among them, could hardly even have a square meal a day. Unable to bear the hardship, a few of them, Nihala, Arbaroo, Balla and Sher Singh, sold off their belongings and fled the village to find work elsewhere. Work on the FFW projects had completely stopped for about a month. News of unrest in the village spread, and the "bandh" created a stir. But surprisingly, none of the authorities seemed concerned. All along, the police in the village remained silent spectators to the intimidation of Harijans.

The "bandh" was still on when this reporter visited the village. In spite of its fairly large population of about 3,000 the whole landscape seemed deserted, and most of the worksites were abandoned. Harijan women walked in groups on their way to collect dung cakes and fill water pots. Children played quietly outside their homes. Only the adults stayed indoors. A tacit understanding between the Jats and Harijans ensured that women and children would not be touched in the caste war. There was, however, an exception: Harijan children were not being allowed to enter one of the village's primary schools.

On February 24, a team of valmikis led by their representative in the panchayat went to the headman and "apologised". They assured him of their cooperation and requested to be allowed to work. The headman agreed, but laid down three conditions: one, they would be given wages of Rs 8 per day for the work (as against Rs 10 given earlier), they should bring the animals to the plots at ten in the morning and leave at five in the evening and thirdly, all disputes or complaints should be taken to the headman, and not any district official. Following the assurance, a few valmikis were allowed to join work on the FFW sites.

The tension in the village is obvious. The Harijans complain that the Jats pass unfriendly remarks about their caste when they walk past them on a street. The hostility is sharpening with the attitude of a few wealthy Jats in the village who seem intent on hurting the Harijans. One of them, Arnani, who owns 300 bighas, is planning to start a college exclusively for the Jats, that will not admit Harijans, or so the latter say. "The danger is that we don't have weapons, or strength. We have no choice but to submit to the Jats. We do what the sarpanch tells us. We are 500 against their 1,500", said an angry youth, when this reporter met a group of Harijan leaders in the upper storey room of a dingy mud house. "They have all the land" another said. "They can do what they like with it. But we survive on their land, what happens to us?" he asked.

Most of the Harijans were ready to work with the Jats and others on the FFW programme, purely out of self-interest, but were being prevented from doing so. The Harijans have another explanation for Jat hostility. Since most of them voted for the Janata candidate Balwant Rai Tayal in the recent midterm poll, and the Jats supported the Lok Dal candidate Chandrawati, and both lost, the Jats are taking it out on the Harijans for not having supported their candidate. Bansi Lal was elected, they think, on Harijan support.

According to a "Quick evaluation study of the Food for Work Programme" (August — October, 1979) by the Programme Evaluation Organisation of the Planning Commission, "it is found that only in five districts (in the country) namely Guntur (Andhra Pradesh), Bhojpur (Bihar), Bhandara and Nasik (Maharashtra) and Burdwan (West Bengal), there is some system of registration of labourers. In the rest of the districts, it is learnt that those who offer work are employed on the various programmes. It was also reported that the Panchayat Samitis at the village level do not find any significant difficulty in getting labourers. There is also no system under which any preference is given to the poorer sections like the landless labourers, small farmers, marginal farmers, scheduled castes and scheduled tribes." The report itself pinpoints Bhiwani district for difficulties in implementing the project, though it does not mention the precise nature of these difficulties. The fact is, they are essentially social, not administrative.

Figures on the FFW scheme relating to the whole of Bhiwani indicate that it is benefiting the wrong people. Of 40 beneficiaries interviewed in the district, six persons were cultivators, six agricultural labourers (the neediest section) and 24 non-agricultural labourers.

Asked to comment on the report's findings about his district, the DC, Bhiwani, Mr Chander Singh took the PEO report in his hands and read it closely. "They have not specified what exactly the difficulties are," he said slowly. "As far as my district is concerned. I think the major problem is that we have less overseers, that is section officers or junior engineers. We have already requested the State Government to help us in this regard. More section officers and engineers are now to be recruited through the PCS examination, the Government has assured us. Since this is a drought affected district the demand for the FFW programme is high—about 6,500 metric tonnes of wheat. The programme has had a good effect on prices. The issue price of wheat has stabilised at Rs 137 per quintal, whereas it used to be as high as 140 to 150 before." Asked about the caste friction, he said: "As soon as we heard about it, we took action. I do not think there is any trouble now. The camels and bullocks have been withdrawn, and so has the fine of Rs 25."

When told that the situation in the village continued to be tense, and could only improve if a senior officer were posted there for some time, Mr Singh disagreed. "That will not help. If caste feelings exist, they cannot be removed by posting officers. In any case, the trouble is over." The fact is, most Harijans were still not working because they were being threatened, overtly and covertly.

Even when the Harijans worked under the scheme, their daily needs were hardly met, they complain. They would be employed only for five or six days in a month, and spend the rest of the time working on the Jats' plots. The quantity of wheat they obtained from a day's work—six kg—was never enough to stock them for the whole month: a Harijan family of four needs roughly four maunds of wheat per month. Even with this, a Harijan family survives on two meals of onion, rotis and pickle every day.

"None of us knows how much wheat is brought from Bawani Khera, the block headquarters. It comes to the sarpanch, and he keeps it where he wants. Now only the Jats are working on the sites. They get all the wheat, while we starve," said an angry Harijan. "Even the moneylenders do not give us any money," he added loudly. The resentment continues, but few of them expect the district officials to take any action. Most of the Harijans have given up the FFW programme for a Jat showpiece and resigned themselves to what they call "our fate".

The seven-day solution

Going abroad? If you're not too sure about where the Sun Temple is, or who Sher Shah was, or when the Carnatic Wars were fought, don't lose any sleep over it. All is not yet lost. If you feel that you will not be able to answer queries on India from your foreign hosts, just take a walk down to the Indian Council of Cultural Research and enrol yourself in the week-long courses it runs for people intending to take a trip across India's borders. "Indians going abroad are quite ignorant about their own culture," Jamail Ahmed Khan told Saumitra Banerjee in Delhi. Khan, who is the programme officer in charge of the course for Indians going abroad, added, "You'd be surprised, but even technocrats, Government servants and academicians are included".

The idea behind the course originated from complaints from various Indian embassies abroad that Indians who travelled outside the country had a remarkably scant knowledge about their own culture. The embassy officials added that this was a constant source of embarrassment in view of the number of queries made by foreigners wanting to know about India. The course being run by the ICCR is expected to give Indians going abroad a basic idea of the fundamentals of Indian culture. The course will touch on classical music, dance and even India's foreign policy, to clear away all the cobwebs. "Some people know that Kathakali is a dance form, but you ask them to elaborate on that and they are lost," said Khan. The course will be conducted by experts in various fields and will include demonstrations, especially of dance forms. In addition, the course will be free of cost. Any takers?

(Private Eye For Social Justice & Security) Date 22nd FEB.80

Vijay Raj is perhaps the only "private eye for social justice" in Bombay. You wouldn't think so, though. His chamber consists of a tiny room in a chawl outside Bombay's KEM Hospital and two-thirds of the room is cordoned off as his living quarters.

Raj began his career as a self-appointed protector of people's rights with Acharya Atre's "anti-goonda squad". At the time he shared the number two spot with none less than Datta Samant. "We struck terror in the hearts of every goonda in Bombay. You know, all we had to do was put an advertisement in Atre's Maratha, saying that we were protecting a certain festival and there would not even be even a breath of goondaism".

All injustice is grist to his mill. "I have a simple modus operandi. I write letters to the Press and get as much coverage in the local Press as I can. Then I send every letter published to the authorities concerned. It has worked, believe me," He has operated outside the Maharashtra border only once, when he cracked a large textiles racket in Bihar. When he eventually cornered the kingpin and took him to the police, he says, "They offered him a chair while I kept standing : they were so scared of him. But I didn't let them release him, and insisted that they report his arrest in writing. That's the secret of getting these people". One sure indication that his influence is growing steadily is the number of people who come to seek his help.

The dead leopard tumbles from the tree

He had grown weary of the forest, so on Sunday, March 2 he decided to go and inspect the world around him. He was a fully-grown leopard whose wandering brought him to the city of Calicut, where he climbed a tall coconut tree to get a better view of his new surroundings. Even while he sat atop the tree a knot of armed policemen and curious bystanders formed below. Forest officials appeared as well, and tried to bring him down to trap him, but gave up after ten hours of trying in vain. The police then took over and shot down the big cat. T. Narayanan, the chief photographer of the Malayalam Manorama captured the moment as the leopard tumbled out of the tree, dead below.

Gill's will be done

Russian schools do not boast of cricket fields like those at Eton and the English believe, for some strange reason, that all Marxist "failings" spring from this alone. Well, cricket is a game for gentlemen and recently in picturesque Goa, the Press and the Administration agreed to play a friendly cricket match to sort out a mutual problem. Goan newsmen asserted that they had a right to information and could approach anybody connected with the Government, be it a clerk or a gazetted officer. The Lt. Governor, Pratap Singh Gill disagreed; he said that only the Chief Secretary could be approached for official information. A minor misunderstanding thus cropped up and Gill hit upon the idea of playing a cricket match to sort out the issue. So the two teams, the reporters' eleven and the Lt. Governor's eleven met on the cricket green. The journalists lost but sportingly accepted the Lt. Governor's stand on access to official information. Though they lost the match, the newsmen, we presume, must have gathered sufficient "prohibited" information.

Gold shoulder

It was an ordinary run-of-the-mill day at the construction site. Labourers went about their excavation in the Chiengmeirong Hills, Imphal, as they normally did. Suddenly the pickaxe of one of them struck something hard with a clang and some of the others looked curiously in his direction. The pick swung again and the sound was repeated. Convinced that there was something under the earth, the labourers started digging for whatever it was with their hands lest they damage it. Slowly it became visible. There was no glint of precious stones; it was no ordinary metal image of a god. The labourers looked a little disappointed, but there was more in store for them. In addition to some more metal images there appeared a beautiful golden image weighing about a kilogram. The news spread rapidly and the site was instantly surrounded by crowds from the villages nearby, who claimed collective ownership of the statuette. It was their old village deity, they insisted, which had somehow been misplaced.

Cooking Captain Cook's goose

Was Captain Cook really the first man to wade through the surf that washed the shores of Australia? According to Captain U. Shankar Rao, it is quite likely that he was not. Though it is generally accepted that Cook's men discovered the land that we know today as Down Under, Captain Rao feels that he might really have been beaten to it. The Captain, who is the honorary curator of the National Maritime museum in Bombay, has a theory that Australia was discovered by Tamilians long before 1770, the year when Cook and his men planted the Union Jack on the soil of the new land. The reason? An Indian wreck was discovered off the coast of New Zealand in 1836. The vessel was the Mahadinbaksh, while the ship's bell had Tamil inscriptions on it. This bell is currently on display at the Dominican Museum in New Zealand, and a photograph of the bell was displayed at an exhibition which opened in Bombay on March 14. Captain Rao feels that in view of the early maritime activities of the Tamils, it is on the cards that Cook, in fact, was second in line.

Time of his Life

What does Dom Moraes feel about the furore over his book Bombay, produced by Time-Life Publications? "I'm frankly surprised at the amount of publicity this book seems to be getting. It's really quite out of proportion to the sort of book it is and the kind of function it is supposed to fulfil." The first copies of the book, the latest in the Time-Life series on great cities, had hardly landed on Indian shores when they were impounded by Indian Customs. The reasons were threefold: firstly there was a photograph of a corpse being taken to a Parsee Tower of Silence; secondly, there was a nude photograph of the deity Parvati; thirdly, Kamalipura—Bombay's largest red light area—had been written about.

To the charge that, these days it seems to have become traditional for Indians to turn into self-styled expatriates and deliver hysterical tirades against their homeland, Moraes has a very matter-of-fact answer. "You can hardly call many of us Indians in the true sense. Nirad Chaudhry is thoroughly Edwardian in both his writing style and thoughts. Vidya (Naipaul) and I are something like historical accidents."

What does he feel about his book? "Bombay is easily the most unsatisfying book I have ever written. There were two editors, who were nice people. But behind them there were ten other editors and ten probe researchers, out of whom only two had ever been to India. They have rewritten almost half the book; this is the first time I have experienced having written a book that wasn't mine. But that is their house style, so one cannot complain." No wonder the title page carries the legend "Bombay—by Dom Moraes and the editors of Time-Life books".

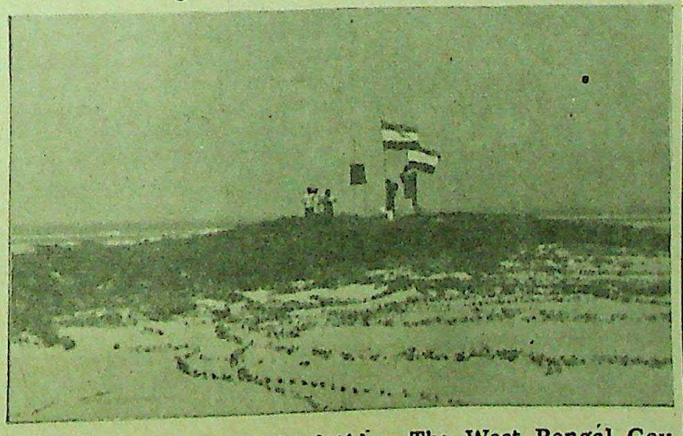
The anopheles lives

For those who cannot sleep at night because of the irritating hum of an errant mosquito, there is hope yet. Provided you live in Calcutta, though. The Health Ministry has purchased a Rs 5 lakh "fogging" machine in order to eradicate the mosquito menace in the city. But don't start celebrating yet. That's only the good news. The bad news is that the machine is diesel-powered. And you know what that means: no diesel, no eradication. And plenty of mosquitoes.

Island in the bay—but whose?

There were no eurekas for this island, but there should have been. There was quite a flutter in West Bengal when the Anandabazar Patrika published a photograph of the island with the Indian tricolour waving in the breeze. The island, called Purbasha, was first noticed by the Naval Hydrographic Survey in 1975 and the Central Government promptly requested the West Bengal Government to claim it, which was done on September 16, 1975. The island, which is situated off the Sunderbans in the Bay of Bengal, is a 17-hour launch journey from Canning.

Border Security Force personnel visited the island in 1977 and erected a plaque on which there was an Indian flag and a map of India showing the island. And there, apparently, lies the rub, since Bangladesh has also claimed the island as its own. Purbasha, which has a total area of 264 square kilometres is mostly submerged and only about 2 square kilometres are visible. The West Bengal Government, however, has already gone about planting casuarina trees. As a matter of fact, when State Government officials visited the island recently, the only inhabitant they saw was a crocodile basking in the sun.



Everything in a name

One moment no one had even heard of them, the next they were signing autographs. A new generation of Tamil film directors and stars had arisen, as if overnight. And it seems as if they have it in them, reports Arthur Pais, to make the bigtime. Notwithstanding some of their names, that is. One of them, the son of the late Bhim Singh, is called Lenin. Despite the fact that his maiden film flopped, he wants to continue as a director. There's even someone else called—believe it or not—Socrates, and as if that's not enough, we also have someone who answers to the name of Sai Baba. How long is it going to be before we have a Jesus and a Muhammad Ali?

Cruel sea

Who would dream of killing a dolphin, the friendliest of sea animals? Not man, surely when history is replete with instances of how dolphins have saved human lives. The dolphin also is an unusual animal in that it has a very large brain and is very intelligent. Science has not found out all it can about this creature whose playful somersaults breaking the sun-kissed expanses of seas around ships bring happiness to the hearts of lonely seamen. A British scientist has given up his job and along with his wife, is tracing a particular dolphin around the world. They easily recognise each other on chance meetings after hundreds of miles. But fishermen in Japan's Iki Island view the dolphins differently. They say that dolphins eat the fish and deprive them of their livelihood. An American naturalist, Dexter Cate, has fallen foul of Japanese law by releasing 300 dolphins trapped for killing. The World Wildlife Fund has protested. The dolphin is not an endangered species but it is so unusual. And Japan isn't poor India. Its Government surely can do something for the fishermen instead of looking the other way.

Hell-pad

Big businessmen in Dallas, USA are fighting each other, not over big business but a fancy helipad. A millionaire electronics magnate, Mr H. Ross Perot of the Electronic Data Systems Incorporated wants to build a helipad outside his palatial Dallas mansion. His desire : to be flown to office everyday by helicopter. The reasons are purely for personal security, a matter of grave concern.

The trouble about his personal safety started about a year ago. Mr Perot, an ex-Marine had sent his own private commando to rescue two of his senior executives from Iran. After the successful rescue the Governor of Texas, inspired by his resourcefulness, appointed him head of a citizens' task force on drug abuse. The job is dangerous and Mr Perot's friends believe his life is in danger. The narcotics underworld would surely avenge any action by Perot's task force. Perhaps in deference to his friends' wishes, the millionaire applied to the City Plan Commission for permission to build a helipad outside his house. His neighbours, also rich and influential, fear that a single bullet from a gunman might bring Perot and his helicopter down on their beautiful and expensive gardens. So that protested. Perot continues to travel to work by car everyday. The most the millionaire's neighbours can do is offer a word of advice : Travel by an armoured car.

Windfall

On January 24, 1978 Cosmos 954, a Russian nuclear-powered satellite used for maritime surveillance, burnt its way through the earth's atmosphere over Canada's North West Territories. The Canadian authorities started searching for the debris over an area 500 miles by 35 miles and found six beryllium cylinders, 41 beryllium rods and more than 4,000 radioactive particles. Now the Canadian authorities have claimed an astronomical $ 6,026,083.56 from the Russians to cover the cost incurred by Government departments. Though Canadian officials were pleased with the progress of their talks with the Russians, it is not known if they will pay up. Discussions will resume in June failing which the Canadians still have nothing to worry about. Under a 1972 convention there is a provision to take the claim to the United Nations arbitration commission.

Balance of trade

Yelena Bonner

Russian dissident Nobel laureate, Andrei Sakharov, languishes in exile. His wife, Yelena Bonner, continues to raise her voice against continuing oppression by the Soviet Government. And the Western States, who uphold human rights, keep on playing their games. The non-aligned nations wanted Western States in the UN Human Rights body drop a resolution expressing official concern at the treatment of the Soviet scientist. The Russians in turn withdrew a draft resolution which accused Britain of violating human rights by the "killing of peaceful citizens by British soldiers" in Northern Ireland. When the delegate from Peru said that the goings-on in the UNHRC headquarters in Geneva were "a trade-off between the two super powers" the chief US delegate, Jerome Shestack said : "There was no such trade-off. That is just nonsense. We did not trade-off an Irish resolution for the Sakharov resolution".

Booze won't lose

Prohibition in Scotland ? Impossible, yet true. The Scottish village of Findochty had closed down its last pub sometime in the 1920s. The fishermen's wives protested against their husbands imbibing liquor. David Mackenzie, a grocer, revived the controversy when he applied for permission to open a liquor shop. The district council decided to end the controversy and conducted a postal referendum in which over 85 per cent of the electorate voted. The result 463 people wanted their village to be wet, 283—most of them furious housewives — did not

Q.E.D.

The Chinese firmly believe in catching'em young. As soon as a child starts going to school, when he is six-and-a-half years old, arithmetic is one of the subjects taught to them with utmost care. Sums like (720 × 22) plus (720 x 34) are Q. E. D. Children are not made into prodigies in primary schools but the teachers put in a lot of hard work, following old-fashioned teaching methods : "chalk, talk and chanting of tables" are pupils' way of learning. It is not surprising, therefore, to find that a large number of kids easily answer complex arithmetical problems in China.

Dying to win

Seen the film Coma? If you have, don't be surprised that a hospital in the American gambling city Las Vegas has a nurse who faces charges of actually subtly murdering patients. The reason, aptly enough in Las Vegas, is an astonishing racket in betting over when the patients would die. A nurse alleged to have been involved was being questioned on suspicion that she may have hastened the patients' deaths to win her bets. Several members of the staff of the private Sunrise Hospital have been suspended following the allegations, the hospital's administrator David Brandness said. The inquiry is being jointly conducted by the hospital authorities, police and members of the local prosecutor's staff. The Las Vegas Review in a copyrighted story quoted reliable sources to say that six people had died in the process, including a nursing supervisor in the hospital's Intensive Care Unit. The allegations are that life-supporting equipment in the unit which has ten beds were tampered with. The money for the bets was contained in an envelope kept for the winner.

Mishing Misha

Stanford Blum and Misha

Stanford Blum was a great friend of Misha, the mascot for the 1980 Moscow Games. He was a happy man till only a few days ago when his Image Factories Sports Incorporated, Los Angeles, USA owned the production and selling rights on all products including Misha to promote the Games. Now Misha is in limbo following the Olympic dispute. Prior to the "boycott or not to boycott" crisis, Misha was one of the hottest selling items. Now the boom is over. Thanks to President Jimmy Carter who asked American companies on March 13 to stop exporting items for the Games which include souvenirs, drinks, etc. US companies will thereby lose 15 to 20 million dollars. Prior to this, the ban on the export of goods was voluntary. Now Mr. Carter has asked his Commerce Department secretary, Philip Kultznick, to encourage American companies to honour the voluntary product ban.

This chess grandmaster story reeks of hate. Tigran Petrosian and Victor Korchnoi grew up hating each other and they still cannot hide it. On March 7, a day before the candidates tournament opened in Velden, Austria, Korchnoi, who defected from the Soviet Union, said he was meeting Petrosia "with great displeasure". He confessed he liked to play chess "but not against Petrosian". And the organisers have been adding fuel to the fire. Said organiser Franz Hoelzl: "We have done everything to avoid problems". In their overenthusiasm a wooden board was put under the chess table so that the toes of the two Grandmasters did not touch. Identical rooms were also built to avoid discrimination.

Loophole in the law

Hijacking trains is a favourite sport in Yugoslavia. The men behind it are, of all people, shepherds. In the northern parts of the country there are no pastures for sheep to graze on. Every winter sheep are driven down from the mountains to the plains The shepherds carry rifles Recently, a group of shepherds held up a goods train and forced the engine driver at gunpoint to take their sheep to some place near Zagreb. Such nomadic pasturing is against Yugoslavian law. A Government officer stopped a group of errant shepherds to explain the law against such pasturing. And lo! The shepherds took the paper they were shown, stuck it on a tree trunk, fired a bullet through it, and told the officer: "Your law is hollow. There is a hole right through it". This should dispel myths that shepherds are harmless.

Striking lessons

"How to disrupt your school in six easy lessons" was the name of a course which nearly 100 students aged between 12 and 18 underwent. The two-day course started on March 8 in a Polytechnic in central London. It imparted the rudiments of revolution, socialism and the efficacy of terrorism. The course was organised by the youth body of the left-wing Socialist Workers Party, Red Rebel, as part of a programme of the National Union of School Students. (NUSU). NUSU chairman, Hardy Desai is advising students on how to organise strikes and undermine teachers' authority.

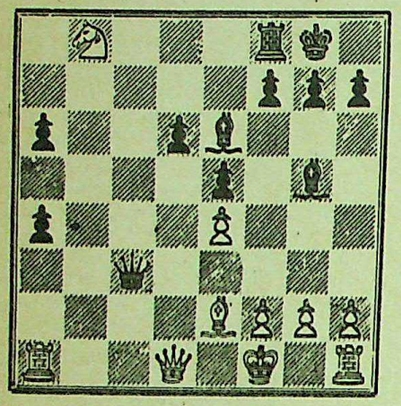
Borik (Black)



Nunn (White) to move

Position after Black's 19th move

Accurate calculation

THE INTERNATIONAL TOURNAMENT held in Dortmund last spring proved to be yet another success for our most recent grandmaster John Nunn. John took third place with a score of 7½ out of 11, a point behind Georgadze (Soviet Union), the tournament winner, but one and a half points clear of the rest of the field which included Tony Miles. Admittedly, Dortmund was not one of Tony's better tournaments, but this can in no way detract from the merit of John's performance which, in conjunction with his consistently good play throughout the past year, must firmly establish him among the top three players in the country.

John's strength lies undoubtedly in his ability to calculate concrete variations with both depth and accuracy, and this makes him a very dangerous opponent when on the attack. But, as the following game shows, his accurate calculation can also be of great help to him in defence. Faced with a speculative but very dangerous rook sacrifice, John finds the right move at every turn and finally consolidates with his extra material.

White: Nunn. Black: Borik (W. Germany). Dortmund 1979. Sicilian Defence, Sveshnikov Variation.

1. P—K4, P—QB4; 2. N—KB3, N—QB3; 3. P—Q4, P x P; 4. N x P, N—B3; 5. N—QB3, P—K4; 6. N(4)—N5, P—Q3; 7. B—N5, P—QR3; 8. N—R3, P—N4; 9. N—Q5. John has been playing the piece sacrifice. 9. B x N, P x B; 10. N—Q5, P—B4; 11. B x P!?, P x B; 12. N x P with success recently, but no doubt his opponent knew this and was well prepared to meet it.

9. . . B—K2; 10. B x N, B x B; 11. P—QB3, B—N4; 12. N—B2, R—QN1; Anticipating the thrust P—QR4, but still I prefer the simple 12. . . O—O.

13. P—QR4, P x P; 14. N(2)—N4! An important finesse. Now White has prospects of winning back both QRP's.

14. . . N x N; 15. N x N, O—O!? Black is virtually committed to this sacrifice, as he would otherwise lose his queenside pawns without compensation, eg, 15. . . Q—N3; 16. Q x RP+ B—Q2; 17. Q x P.

16. N—B6, Q—N3; 17. N x R, Q x NP! The only consistent follow-up. Now White must be careful.

18. . . Q x P+ 19. K—B1, B—K3; (DIAGRAM)

20. P—KR4! A winning move. On 20. . N x P Black still has excellent counterplay with 20. . . B—N6; 21. Q—N1, B—B7; 22. Q—R2, B—N6; and if 23. Q—R3, R—QB1; threatening . . B—B8!

20. . . B—R3; Now 20. . . B—N6 would be met by 21. R—KR3!

21. N x RP, P—R6; Still 21. . . B—N6 is met by 22. R—KR3!

22. P—N3, P—R7; 23. K—N2 With his king now secure White can easily exploit his extra rook.

23. . . B—Q7; 24. Q—R4, Q—N7; 25. N—B7, B—N6; 26. Q—N5, B—B6; 27. B—B4! B—Q5; 28. KR—KB1; Resigns. Black has run out of ammunition. If 28. . . B x B; 29. Q x B, B x BP then simply 30. R x RP.

THIS DEAL from the match between Israel and France in Lausanne was a worthy candidate for the Bois Brilliancy Prize.

Dealer, West. Game all.

	♠ Q J 5 ♥ A K 2 ♦ A 8 5 ♣ A K 10 5
♠ K 8 7 6 4 ♥ 9 5 4 3 ♦ 10 9 ♣ Q 6	N W E S	♠ 10 9 3 2 ♥ J 8 7 6 ♦ K J ♣ 9 8 7
	♠ A ♥ Q 10 ♦ Q 7 6 4 3 2 ♣ J 4 3 2

The French played in 3NT, but the Israeli pair bid to Six Diamonds as follows:

SOUTH	NORTH
	Fryd-
Shofel	rich
—	2NT
3♦	3NT
4NT	5♣
5♦	5NT
6♦	No

So far as I know, 4NT was Blackwood and the response indicated three Aces. West led ♦ 10.

The obvious play is to let the opponents win their trump trick, then try to drop the Queen of clubs in two rounds, with the ruffing finesse in spades as a second chance. If this comes off, one club can be discarded on the third heart and one on ♠ 2.

Shofel followed a stronger line. He went up with ♦ A, cashed ♠ A and took three rounds of hearts, discarding a club. He ruffed a spade, crossed to ♣ A, and ruffed dummy's last spade. Then he led a low diamond from hand, trusting the trumps to be 2-2. When East won the trick with ♦ K he had no good return.

The inference concerning the trump suit was reasonably safe, because West was unlikely to have led a bare 10 of diamonds. Such a lead is too likely to solve a problem for a declarer who may hold, for example, K J x x x x opposite A x x.

The declarer was unlucky, I feel, in the sense that any straightforward line of play – even the simple finesse in clubs – also wins the contract. Had the cards been differently divided, East holding ♣ Q x x, South's play might have made a bigger impression on the jury.

THE ATTRACTIVE portrait of the Baoulé girl on this 10-centimes stamp from the Ivory Coast is typical of the designs chosen for French colonial issues during the 1930s. There were well over a thousand different stamps for the 24 colonies and because their face value was so low (a French centime was then worth only about one-fiftieth of a penny), the stamps could easily be included in cheap packets, so that they must have tempted many youngsters into becoming philatelists. The Ivory Coast series comprised 41 stamps, ranging from 1-centime to 20-francs, in four designs.

A PIECE of drill-weave tapestry similar to British sampler-work is featured on 4-kronor stamps recently added to the Swedish definitive series. Popular during the 18th and early 19th centuries, particularly as wall-hangings in Swedish farmhouses, the tapestries were large and elaborate, so that they were often included in the trousseaux of well-to-do farmers' daughters. The example on the stamp is from a tapestry woven in the southern province of Scania about 1860 and measuring about 9 metres by 2. Like most modern Swedish issues, the new stamps are intended for sale from rolls, not sheets, and so are perforate only on two edges.

MORADABAD: A Rampur citizen applied for two litres of kerosene to set his house ablaze and got the permit to do so. Mr Gian Singh narrated his story while talking to reporters on the malfunctioning of District Supply office, Rampur. He said he applied for the permit and the DSO, without reading the application, sanctioned it and the clerk prepared the permit. He said he had done so when the DSO had told him that he could get the kerosene not as fuel but for setting his house ablaze — Northern India Patrika (Ajai Mehrotra, Allahabad)

DELHI: The moderation committee of the department of commerce of Delhi university "moderated" the marks of candidates with the result that the daughter of a member of the committee became the topper. This case generated much heat when it was discussed for over two hours at a meeting of the academic council. What surprised and angered the council members was the fact that the topper in the M.Phil course of the commerce department, daughter of a reader of the department and member of the moderation committee, ended with more than 100 per cent marks. Apparently the marks were given in terms of points and the highest number which could be given was seven, but the moderation committee in its over-zealousness gave her more than seven points — The Sunday Statesman (A. Balaram, New Delhi)

HALEM: A man named Sasanka Sekhar Chakravarty, a vendor without licence of Biswanath Charali, was found selling so-called "Oxygen tablets" in a local market here at Rs 1.50 each prior to the day of solar eclipse. This was detected by Dr R. Das of Kauripathar state dispensary. He was handed over to the local police. The man was arrested and sent for trial according to police — Assam Tribune (Bubul Kumar Mahanta, Jorhat)

JAIPUR: A 62-year-old Rajput woman, Mrs Sona Kanwar, performed "Sati" on the funeral pyre of her husband on February 29 last at village Neemdi Kotharia in Nagpur district, according to a report. Mother of seven, the woman sat on the pyre taking the dead body of her husband Sugan Singh on her lap and lit the fire herself, repeating the age old Rajput tradition of "Sati" in presence of hundreds of villagers. Police got the information only after everything was over. According to the report, people from distant villages are pouring in at the place, where she performed "Sati"—Amrita Bazar Patrika (Kajal Kumar Chakrabarty, Calcutta)

BANGALORE: A 15-year-old boy has been arrested by the city police for allegedly attempting to rape a 29-year-old housewife, his next door neighbour. Police said the boy, a high school drop-out entered the woman's house on March 5 disguising himself with a false beard, goggles and hand gloves. When the woman opened the door the boy allegedly told her that her husband had been admitted to a city hospital following an accident and he had gone there to escort her to the hospital. When the suspecting housewife closely questioned him the boy asked for a glass of water and then followed her to the kitchen and attempted to rape her, police added. Her scream brought in a neighbour who overpowered the boy. The boy had allegedly threatened the man with a kitchen knife. During the scuffle the false beard gave away and the woman was shocked to find he was none other than the next door boy, police said — Indian Express (Chandra Manoharan, Ootacamund)

NEW DELHI: Soviet troops have brought their drinking habits to Afghanistan but found that the Muslim country has few liquor shops and fewer bars. Six burly Russian soldiers found a solution by knocking on the door of an Indian businessman's Kabul apartment and demanding refreshment with the help of their weapons, reported a foreign resident on his arrival at Delhi airport on February 29. Mr A. C. Rikhie, local finance manager of a West German drug firm, was so shaken he had no choice but to invite them in. The soldiers put down their assault rifles and quaffed beer, whiskey and cheese until 6.30 the next morning. A senior Indian diplomat, Mr H. K. Malhotra, was informed of Mr Rikhie's predicament during the night. Mr Malhotra called the Afghan police for help but was told no one was available to deal with the Russians—The Times of India

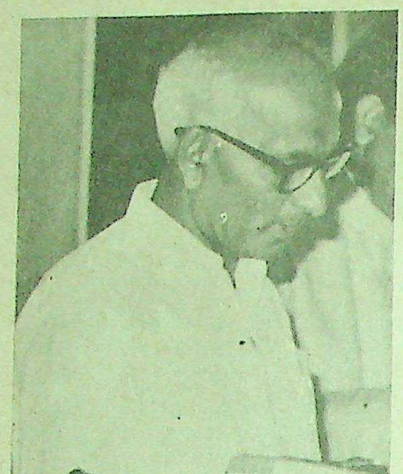
WHEREVER CAN BABUJI GO?

BABU Jagjivan Ram has kept everyone guessing ever since he quit the Janata Party. Will he join the Congress (I)? Or will he work for a broad-based forum of Congressmen opposed to Mrs Gandhi? It is learnt that Mrs Gandhi, without giving any positive commitments to Babuji, has indicated by certain actions that there is room for reconciliation between the two leaders. The Prime Minister's stand on the Jaguar deal (she said in the Lok Sabha that there was no question of an enquiry) is being taken by many as a concession to Babuji in a bid to win him over. After all, one of the most scathing attacks on the Jagur deal was mounted by Maneka Gandhi's Surya, apart from, of course, the irrepressible and highly innovative Mr Raj Narain.

But sources close to Babuji doubt whether he would join the ruling Party. Differences between him and Mrs Gandhi may be sorted out, but younger elements in the Party are unlikely to forget the past, they point out. According to some sources, Babuji may not at all join the Congress (I). He may instead try to bring his former CFD followers closer to the Congress (U) and wait for possible dissensions in the ruling Party to strengthen his forum of Congressmen. But such a plan appears impractical. Observers in Delhi however feel that when there is smoke, the possibilities of a fire cannot be immediately ruled out. For all we know, the ruling Party may be toying with the idea of offering the deputy-chairmanship of the Planning Commission to Babuji. This post is of Cabinet-rank. And the added advantage, from Mrs Gandhi's point of view, could be that Babuji would have to resign his Parliamentary seat. But there is a snag; it is said that Babuji may not be happy with deputy-chairmanship and may like to hold the post of chairman, which is normally held by the PM. Observers recall that before the elections Babuji had missed the Congress(I) bus by demanding much more than what the Party could offer.

Babuji had reportedly wanted the Party to ensure that he would be made the PM and that Mrs Gandhi would not contest the polls. Now too, observers feel, he is aiming too high.



Madhu Dandavate

UNPERSONED

HAS the Railway Board forgotten its Janata Minister? It seems so. Pressmen were astonished to find during a meeting with the Railway Minister, Kamalapati Tripathi, that while portraits of all Railway Ministers since 1947 were displayed on the wals of the conference room, Madhu Dandavate's portrait was conspicuously missing. When this was pointed out to the officials, they promised to make amends. But the question is whether it was a mistake or a deliberate omission.

SCOOT!

HOW should the Union Ministers set an example before the nation on saving petrol? By travelling in buses and scooters of course. This suggestion was made by one Cabinet Minister, who is known for his passion for police escorts, at the pre-budget meeting of the Union Cabinet. Needless to say, this suggestion was greeted by frowns rather than amusement.

SOMETIME IN DELHI

HOW has the Congress (U) leadership reacted to the reported move of bringing Babuji into the Party, in case he does not join th Congress (I)? The reaction is mixed. There is a big question mark about the possibility of Babuji carrying on his anti-Mrs Gandhi line for too long. One move is to make him the president of AICC(U) in place of Devaraj Urs. Another is to create a post of chairman of the Congress (U) Parliamentary Party, thereby ensuring that Urs's presidentship and Y. B. Chavan's post as the leader of the CPP (U) are not affected. But the move to make him the Party president has irked some leaders. Karan Singh was heard telling some leaders of the Congress (U) at the Congress (U) Party headquarters at 3, Raisina Road the other day: "Why should we keep on borrowing presidents? Are there no dynamic leaders within the Party?" The reference was obviously to Devaraj Urs having become the Party chief after he crossed over from the Congress (I). Meanwhile, the functioning of the AICC(U) office has become such that a lot of Partymen are in agreement with Dr Karan Singh's letter to Urs that either the AICC(U) office be shifted to Bangalore or the president should shift his moorings to Delhi.

PRESS IGNORED

A TYPICAL example of the couldn't care-less attitude of the Government towards the Press was witnessed recently. The budgets of 10 state Governments were presented to Parliament but no copies were made available to the Press. The Press Information Bureau which usually distributes such documents to reporters jocularly remarked that journalists could go to each "embassy or high commission" of the state Governments in Delhi and collect the copies themselves. The problem could have been easily resolved by giving the reporters a bunch of only 10 sheets of paper. The budget division of the Union Finance Ministry had beautifully summed up the main features of each state's budget on one sheet. But then nobody wanted to do this simple job.

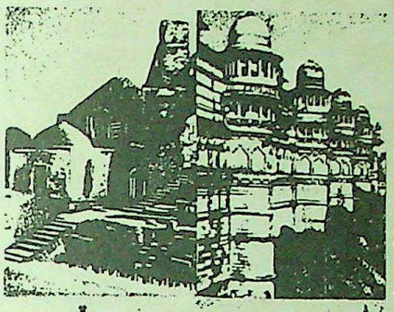
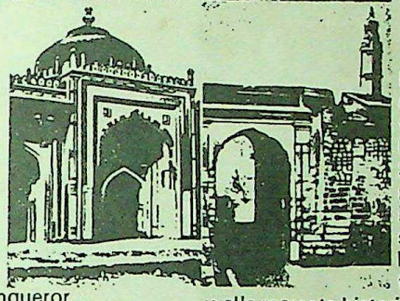
The crumbled walls sing ballads of glory.

The past is rich with legends of chivalry. The loves and lives of a colourful page of history beckon from a multitude of monuments. The pomp and pageantry of a bygone era comes alive.





An echo in the mountains

Kangra Fort. Surrounded on three sides by steep cliffs, overlooking two rivers. A stronghold of the Katoch Rajas from prehistoric times, this fort lured many a conqueror. From Mahmud Gazni, Hindu Rajas, Jehangir, the British and finally the Sikhs. From Kangra, Pathankot and the Kashmir Valley are easily accessible.

Citadels of valour

Chittorgarh. The citadel of Rajput valour resounds with legends of bravery and sacrifice. Tales of Suttee and Jwahar. The palace of heroic Padmini. The shrine of the poetess Mirabai.

Lohagarh. North-west of Bharatpur stands this impregnable fortress with unique defences.

Seventy-six bastions of victory

Golconda. Built by the Raja of Warangal, it passed on to the Bahmani kings and on to the Qutab Sahi regime. It finally fell to Aurangzeb after a 10 year siege. The fort is on the outskirts of the city of Hyderabad.

A sultan's pride

Srirangapatna. Built in the 13th century, this fort was scene for the last battle of Tipu Sultan. Built on a river island, the fort is washed on both sides, by the river Kaveri. Colourful frescoes on battered walls, recreate historic battle scenes.

In the time of Buddha

Rajgir. This fort built by Ajatasatru, a contemporary of Buddha, is the country's oldest extant fort. The ruined fortifications of the ancient capital of Magadh can be seen here.

Heir to the sun

Rohtasgarh. Built by the son of the legendary Raja Harish Chandra, who is reputed to have descended from the sun. In 1857, it was a rallying base for freedom fighters.

Silent songs of splendour

Mandu. Stronghold of the 10th century Raja Bhoj. Scene for the eternal love story of Baz Bahadur and the Hindu singer Roopmati.

Pratapgarh. Shivaji's stronghold for many years, it was the scene of his fateful encounter with the Bijapur general Afzal Khan.

Sue Daley of New York sipped Maaza Mango...

Her spontaneous response: "Thums Up"

That's right! Your favourite Limca; Maaza Mango and soon, Thums Up, are hot export items. These brands are produced and marketed by franchises in Kuwait, the U.A.E., Tanzania, Mauritius, Nigeria, Singapore and New York. Ten more plants are at the final stages of negotiations.

Thums Up makes India another country to export soft drink franchises – after the U.S.A.

If New York said 'Thums Up' to Maaza, what will it say to Thums Up?

The Vice-President of India, Shri M. Hidayatullah, confers an Award for Excellence in Export on the makers of Thums Up.

Dyanora TV. It shows how far you've progressed...

Programmed to your lifestyle with unmatched sophisticated features—the result of Dyanora's advanced research.

Take a look at a Dyanora TV. It is indeed a picture of sophistication that's reflected in its impeccable performance.

You'll see a picture that is demonstrably superior: clearer, sharper, more precise.

You'll also hear sound that far exceeds your expectation. Pure sound that's reproduced through true hi-fi speakers and amplifiers.

Research that has led to sophistication

This heavenly marriage of picture and sound has resulted from Dyanora's rich experience in solid state TV technology.

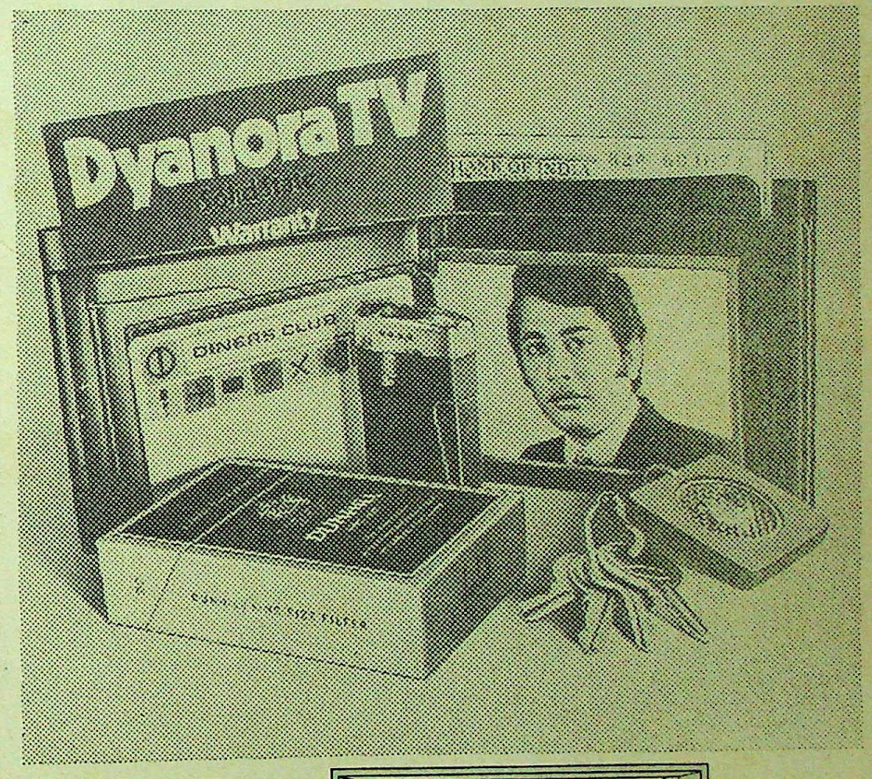
Dyanora today possesses India's most advanced TV research laboratory—where you'll find some of the top talents of the country at work.

This combination is what has made Dyanora so successful in bringing forth virtually every single significant TV innovation in the country in recent years.

Like India's first solid state TV with ICs. The first multi-channel solid state TV. The first TV with a true hi-fi sound. The first TV with facilities for playing a tape-recorder or a record player through it. The first TV-cum-stereo system. The list goes on.

Today in the Dyanora range, you'll find such advanced features as push button input selection, separate Bass and Treble tone controls, lockable shutters, neon light indicator, 90 mm dual cone speakers, moulded plastic rear cover, to mention only a few. What's more, all the models have 12-channel tuners.

That's Dyanora for you, matched to your progress, tuned to your lifestyle...Dyanora, the other name for your progress.



Dyanora TV

Yes, it's got everything you're looking for.

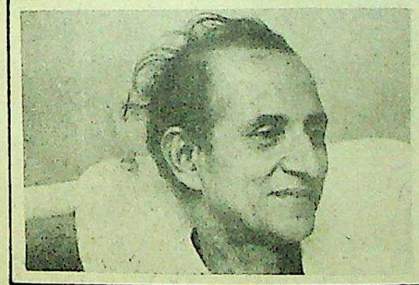
Why did the former Israeli Defence Minister Moshe Dayan come on a secret visit to India and meet Morarji Desai? Was he on a mysterious Mossad mission? If so, what role is the Israeli intelligence agency playing in international affairs?

With the talks between student leaders and the Centre on the issue of 'foreigners' having failed again, Assam entered a phase of widespread protests and disturbances. Although curfew was enforced and the state declared a "disturbed area", authority seemed to be non-existent; both the army and police seemed helpless in dealing with the picketers and demonstrators. Work in government offices came to a complete standstill. On-the-spot report on the developments.



Nepal's first-ever referendum will decide a vital and relevant political issue — the choice between multi-Party democracy and the present Partyless panchayat system. An exclusive analysis of the country's political options.

On April 7, three villages were brutally destroyed as a result of police violence in the subdivisional town of Islampur in West Dinajpur. Two people died, several were injured, and property worth an estimated Rs two million was damaged. Now, only charred huts remain along with the rubble and ashes while the people live on whatever they can salvage.

Gambling with fate

THE report on "The gambling boom" (March 30) was excellent. Even some political leaders are known to be matka-lovers. The game flourishes in and around Ranchi, where it is the cause of starvation in many families. The government should forthwith stop all games of fortune, including state lotteries.
Kameshwar Prasad Singh, Ranchi.

IT IS a pity that gambling has become the pet profession all over the country. Surprisingly, even games and sports have been converted into a form of gambling.
B. B. Chhetri, Siliguri.

YOUR correspondents have reported only on unlicensed gambling. There is another form of gambling which is licensed, namely, horse racing which attracts a large number of people. Races are held in a few centres throughout the year. "Intervenue betting", makes it possible to register out-station bets.
B. V. Jayaram, Madras.

Laying men bare

I WAS disappointed to find an Indian magazine mimicking the more barbarous ways of American magazines by featuring photographs of nude women (February 17). It is the great emphasis placed on women as sex objects which is partially responsible for their treatment as second-class citizens and lack of development in many spheres of human endeavour. If you insist on treating women as objects, please do the same for men.
Harriet Orcutt, Washington D. C., USA.

Criticising 'weakly'

KHUSHWANT SINGH has given his version of what he did to The Illustrated Weekly of India during his stewardship ("How the Illustrated became a weekly habit", March 30), not realising that he hurts others very badly while praising himself. I would have ignored his self-flattery, if he had not made mean, malicious and malodorous allegations against me. Before I reply in detail to his criticisms, I wish to remind him that a great 100-year-old national institution such as the Weekly does not depend on any individual for its prestige, popularity and even profitability. It has immense resources, inexhaustible goodwill throughout the country and solid infrastructure which can keep it going. Any number of Khushwant Singhs can't demolish it. In fact, his departure has made no difference at all to its increasing influence and circulation. If anything, it has regained its lost relevance and respectability.

Khushwant Singh is known to be allergic to facts and figures. Naturally he tells lies clumsily. Also he has never enjoyed a reputation for restraint, mellowness and sweet reasonableness. Like his political mentors he seems to believe that one is either for or against him. No wonder that often his statements are as inelegant and intemperate as his assessments are immature and ungenerous.

He says that J. C. Jain wanted him to succeed C. R. Mandy as editor and he was gracious enough to let me continue as assistant editor. I don't know. But I do know that Mandy had earlier rejected him as assistant editor. Perhaps Khushwant Singh tried to grab the editorship by the back-door. Anyway, even if Jain had okayed Khushwant's appointment, Mandy would have vetoed it. Mandy never had a high opinion of Khushwant Singh's ability or integrity.

Khushwant says that I "was young and totally inexperienced", the implication being that I didn't deserve to be elevated to editorship. On April 16, 1969. I received a letter from him bearing the Swarthmore (USA) postmark, in which he says: "I have always thought and said you did a damn good job Indianising the Weekly. I wish I had the confidence to match your ability. I will try—and seek your guidance all the time." No comment.

He refers to the bad shape in which I left the Weekly. Actually it was in my time that the magazine first crossed the 100,000 mark early in 1964. Again in October-November 1964 it reached the peak figure of 130,000. Even Khushwant can't challenge these figures which form part of the Weekly record.

I had to eschew politics because it had been the policy of the management to let the Weekly remain strictly non-political. I don't know why Khushwant indecently refers to my art collection which is no collection at all! Just four paintings and two drawings, purchased at various exhibitions though at reduced prices. By the way marked prices in nine out of 10 cases, being highly inflated, are negotiable. Anyway, as Khushwant did, I didn't receive crates of Scotch whiskey from diplomats, hoteliers, filmstars and affluent contributors. One evening he kept his guests waiting till a West German diplomat arrived with a few bottles of Scotch! Khushwant also projected painters, sculptors, musicians, dancers and godmen. Only his assessments were all wrong: That's why, most of his proteges, unlike mine, have faded out.

Khushwant refers to the photographs of myself and my family. Here also he has slipped. The pictures in question were published with my article on the Sankaracharya of Kanchi Kamakotipeetham—and and not on Sai Baba. These pictures were relevant because they related to my various personal discussions with His Holiness. After all I photograph better than the Sardarji!

He refers to the circumstances of my relinquishment of the editorship of the Weekly. I didn't go as he did and having gone I didn't resort to the sort of sob stuff in the bazar he did just to evoke public sympathy. Khushwant Singh's hostility to me dates from his Delhi Letter days. When his copy became exasperatingly substandard I decided to sack him. Amita Malik took over from him. Later Chanchal Sarkar replaced her. The trouble with Khushwant is that he fancies himself to be a journalist. He is not: He can't tell 8 pt from 10 pt. He is not even a writer. In my opinion he is just a hack, but a very noisy one.
A. S. Raman, Madras.

Advertising images

I READ with increasing distaste the article "Do our ads tell lies?" (March 9). I say 'distaste' not because Mr Ashish Rajadhyaksha has given free rein to such patently irresponsible criticism of Indian advertising but distaste at the manner in which his superficial sock-it-to-the-gallery piece has tried to assume the pretentions of an investigative feature on the advertising business. It is fairly obvious that the writer had a very definite intention to project a deleterious image of advertising and with the well-known mixture of innuendoes, quotes out of context and blatant half-truths (lies?) he has succeeded in putting out a story which is not only irritating but also very, very mischievous.

However, even if we ignore the saucy and the banal, it beats me why a magazine from the well-known Ananda Bazar group should be party to such a grossly lopsided assessment.

For example, is Indian advertising restricted to the mere promotion of textiles, cosmetics and other personality products? Look at a newspaper today and even the most addleheaded or myopic among us would not fail to see the enormous shift in advertising emphasis from commodity and personality products to consumer durables, industrial and intermediate products, assorted services and corporate image promotions. These have not even received passing mention even though they probably account for at least 40 to 50 per cent of Indian advertising appropriations today.

You will concede that it is impossible to answer the issues raised in your article unless each one is taken up chapter and verse and I think you owe it to your readers and to the advertising profession to publish a rejoinder from someone who has a fuller understanding of the business and is less obsessed with the propagation of a sensational and much too superficial point of view.

Neville Gomes, Adroit Advertising & Marketing Pvt Ltd, Bombay

OF COURSE, our advertising tells lies, some of it. A lot of advertising is badly conceived; it is dishonest, it is unproductive, it is in bad taste. A lot is also artistically excellent, well crafted, productive, socially aware. But when a person picks out a few bad ads and builds a thesis round them, I really must protest.

The Regent price reduction ad and Csango deserve condemnation and have received it. But to pick on the Simplex and Piramal textile ads, and the Poise deodorant illustration and the reference to pure virgin wool to suggest that Indian advertisers are obsessed with sexual innuendo really begs the question.

Totally laughable is the citation of Britannia's 'Delite' and 'Snax' advertisements as sexually overt (Promotion, the advertising journal, had blandly and without comment reproduced the article from Manushi. It was clear to the reader that the two young women who authored the article had gone into desperate postures in their search for the sexist element in the ads they surveyed.)

In fact, one could extend Mr Rajadhyaksha's arguments to their ridiculous logical conclusion and state that Indian journalists lie. And as a corollary, our journalists are sex maniacs because they smoke cigarettes.

Manohar Benegal, Bombay.

Indian Anglo Indians

THE articles "Anglo-Indians: The forgotten community" and "Torn between two Worlds" (March 16) are not only misleading and irrevelant but also factually incorrect.

I have been making an in-depth study for the past ten years of the origin, habits and movements of my community to complete a short history of the Anglo-Indians since Indian independence. I find that the community is very much alive and about, having entered with its customary vigour into the mainstream of Indian life.

Essentially a city-bred and urban-oriented minority, it is now not unusual to see us spread right out, trying our capable hands at anything and living happily alongside other communities. In the course of my travels I met an Anglo-Indian family settled in a village called Bluff near Mysore. Typical of the community's penchant for innovation, they had built a huge ranch-type house themselves surrounded by fields of lush sugarcane. In another village called Aripalayam in Kerala I was but recently the guest of an old doctor friend, who, besides his practice in the nearby town, spends his weekends as a gentleman farmer on sprawling acres of paddy and coconut groves. Along with him about half a dozen Anglo-Indian families have also settled down to a life of agricultural affluence and contentment.

Why then this sudden pessimism, characteristic of the so-called Domiciled European fringe of the community whom we were certain had withered away in the first decade of independence unable to survive as Anglo-Indians because of its racial schizophrenia? Why then was the better soldier, General Noronha, not mentioned or the Fernandezs in the Indian Olympic teams? Was it not significant and clear that even after the 1935 G.O.I. Act defining the community and giving it its first official name, the Association of the community called itself 'Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European...' as though keeping two separate identities, one of European (which the Act stated) and the other of British descent? We are grateful to Frank Anthony who stopped this utter nonsense so far as the All India Association was concerned.

That Bengal does consider itself to be India is a well-known fallacy. But I just cannot imagine that the Anglo-Indians of Calcutta could mistake themselves for India. Not long ago the community crossed the two-lakh mark. (Let me assure your readers this excludes the Feringhees of Kerala.) In Tamil Nadu alone over 6 000 Anglo-Indian boys and girls are studying in nearly 45 Anglo-Indian schools. The Constitutional guarantees of nominations to the Lok Sabha and the State Assemblies continue for another ten years till 1990 (not 1981 as reported).

Sigbert Rozario, Madras.

A shame

THE article "Women against rape" (March 30) by Olga Tellis and Saumitra Banerjee is an eye-opener. It is a shame that even after 33 years of freedom, Indian women do not enjoy proper security. Daily incidents of rape at metropolitan centres like Delhi and Bombay are evidence of this. The very fact that the incidence of rape should provoke a mass movement is shocking. The I.P.C. should be amended to make rape punishable by death.

Bidyut Kumar Chatterjee, Howrah.

Staged before

I WENT through the article "Advocate of a poor theatre" (March 30) by Paranjoy Guha Thakurta, on the celebrated Polish theatre figure, Jerzy Grotowski. I would like to add that poor theatre is not new to India, and that a student of Grotowski Mallek Douk had two years ago staged a play at Madras. The play, which was held at the museum theatre featured local actors, except for the female artiste, Denise Jeanmonad, who is a Swiss. Mallek Douk is teaching yoga in Switzerland, and is due to arrive in India sometime in June this year.

Plane trouble

MISS Arati Mukherjee's "Ordeal by Aeroflot" (March 30) narrated by Tooshar Pandit made sorry reading. I have a similar story to narrate. Back in January 1978 my newlywed daughter was flying by Aeroflot to London to join her husband there. Her plane stopped at Moscow and left her stranded there on the pretext that there was no seat available on the flight to London. It was a very cold night, and the temperature plummeted to freezing point. Yet my daughter was herded into a waiting plane, parked on the runway.

J. Bhattacharjee, Gauhati.

Save Christianity

THANK you for highlighting the injustice and cruelty perpetrated on the Church ("Another Churchman murdered", March 23). Christianity, which came to India nearly 2,000 years ago is as intrinsic a part of our society as Hinduism, Islam and Buddhism are. Christianity has also played a useful role in the uplift of the downtrodden and social integration. The killing of anyone not willing to be converted to Hinduism is communal fanaticism, precisely what Gandhiji sacrificed his life to eradicate.

COVER STORY

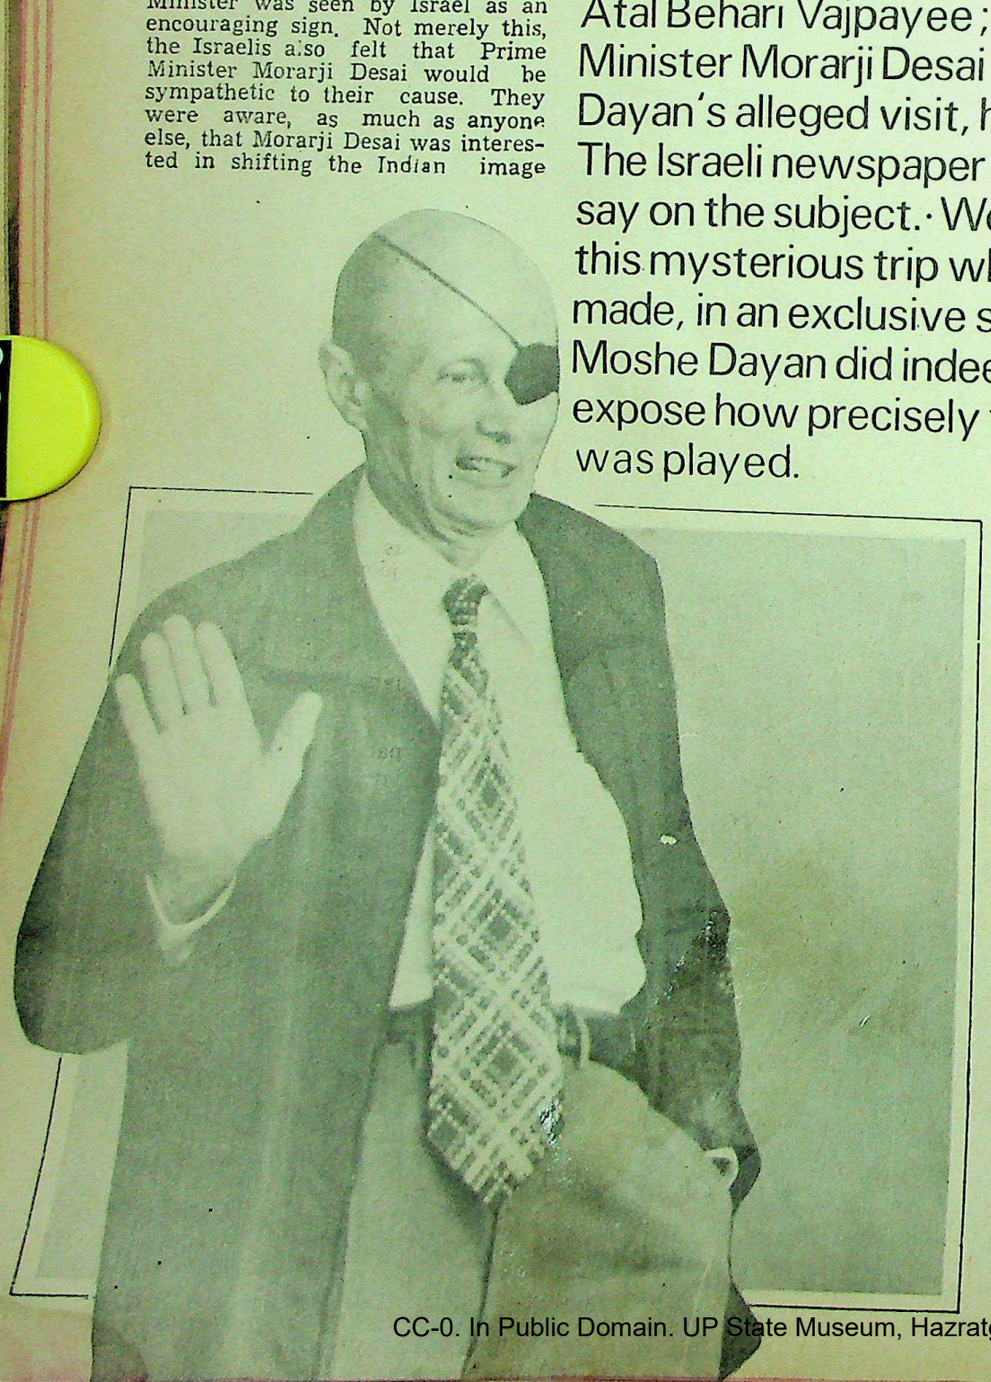
THE FULL STORY OF MOSHE DAYAN'S SECRET TRIP TO INDIA

By M. J. AKBAR

An Israeli newspaper first published the news that Moshe Dayan had visited India secretly during the Janata rule. This was denied in India by the ex-Foreign Minister Atal Behari Vajpayee; when former Prime Minister Morarji Desai was asked about Dayan's alleged visit, he refused to comment. The Israeli newspaper had nothing more to say on the subject. We publish details about this mysterious trip which Moshe Dayan made, in an exclusive story. We confirm that Moshe Dayan did indeed make the trip, and we expose how precisely the whole game was played.

THE coming of the Janata Party to power in 1977 meant many things to many people. Israel saw it as an opportunity to fulfil a long-awaited dream : full recognition by India. This would be an important and dramatic diplomatic coup by Israel if it was ever achieved. India had been in the forefront, in various international bodies, of promoting the Arab, and particularly the Palestinian, cause. And India's voice, despite the efforts to muffle it, still carried weight at the United Nations, and more so in the non-aligned movement.

The appointment of Mr Atal Behari Vajpayee as the Foreign Minister was seen by Israel as an encouraging sign. Not merely this, the Israelis also felt that Prime Minister Morarji Desai would be sympathetic to their cause. They were aware, as much as anyone else, that Morarji Desai was interested in shifting the Indian image away from the strong pro-Russian colour it had acquired after 1971. The fact that the former Jana Sangh formed such an important power group in the new framework also pleased the Israelis. The Jana Sangh's active championship of Israel against the Arabs had been music to Israeli ears all through these years when Israel has been an outcast in India.



Though we do not have full diplomatic relations with Israel, Israel has been allowed by the Government of India to maintain a presence in our country, mainly to facilitate the transfer of such Jews as may want to migrate to Israel. The Israelis maintain a consulate in Bombay. The Israeli consul general began active lobbying to obtain full recognition for his country, and in this he was helped a great deal by the Americans, who, quite expectedly, showed special interest in this Israeli effort. Anything which took India away from the non-aligned bloc, and brought the nation closer to the American sphere of influence, naturally would find favour with Washington.

The Israeli consul general actually met both Morarji Desai and Foreign Minister Vajpayee to persuade them to give Israel full recognition. But both told him that this was not possible, for both practical and policy reasons. To begin with, the Government of India could not change its Arab policy overnight. And the risk of alienating the oil-producing Arab nations was simply not yet worth taking. But the Israeli consul general did not give up. He then played a high card. He sent word that General Moshe Dayan, then Israel's Foreign Minister, would like to pay a visit to India.

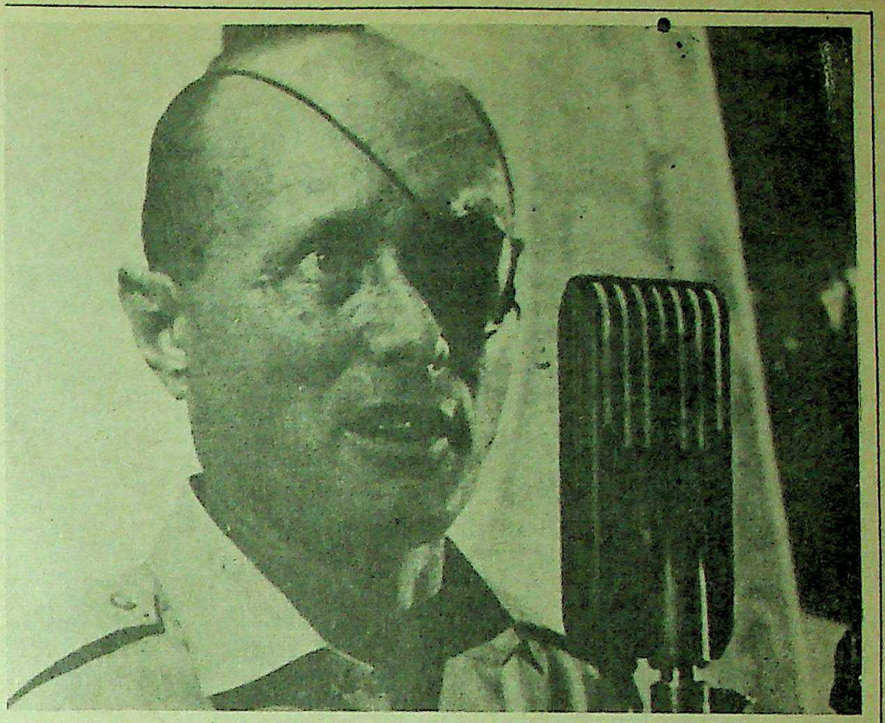
The initial reaction of both Prime Minister Desai and Foreign Minister Vajpayee was negative. They said this was impossible. But the Israelis went on making this request, through their friends and directly. At last, Morarji Desai and Atal Behari Vajpayee gave in. The formula worked out was this : Moshe Dayan would come as a private citizen, using a different name, and he should be disguised well enough to avoid being recognised. The Israeli consulate in Bombay and two top Indian security officials made all the arrangements for Moshe Dayan's secret and dramatic trip to India.

AND so Moshe Dayan came to India. He arrived by a regular carrier, with a false passport. He was wearing some make-up and he had taken off his famous and identifiable eye-patch; instead, to hide his blind eye, he was wearing dark glasses. He was accompanied by two Israeli security personnel. They landed in Bombay and were put up in a hotel. An air force plane came from Delhi to pick them up; the air force people had no idea who their distinguished looking passengers going to Delhi were.

They stayed for four days in Delhi at a private residence. Prime Minister Morarji Desai and Foreign Minister Vajpayee both went to see him, but separately. They went without fuss, as if they were dropping in to visit the person at whose house Dayan was staying. Desai went twice to see Dayan; Vajpayee also went twice. Other than Desai, Vajpayee and the two Indians from security, no other Indian was aware of Dayan's secret visit. Normal security personnel had, of course, been posted around the house in which Moshe Dayan was staying, but they had no idea whom they were guarding. Not even Vajpayee's deputy, Samarendra Kundu, who was the Minister of State for External Affairs, nor the Foreign Secretary Jagat Mehta, were aware of the visit.

Both Desai and Vajpayee made India's position vis a vis Israel clear. They said that their Government had some sympathy for Israel's position, but it had greater sympathy for the Palestinians and the Arabs. They told Dayan that durable peace in West Asia could only come about if a peaceful and amicable settlement of the Palestinian question could be reached between the Arabs and the Israelis. They assured Dayan that India would try and impress upon the nations of West Asia that if Israel agreed to settle the Palestinian question through talks, they should give up their slogans of war and allow Israel to coexist peacefully. India would welcome any effort at a peaceful settlement of the complicated problem. Desai and Vajpayee disappointed Dayan by saying that India could not allow an Israeli embassy to start functioning in Delhi at the moment.



Moshe Dayan on the west bank of the Suez Canal, with Major General Ariel Sharon who has his head bandaged.

General Moshe Dayan did not use all his time in Delhi only in discussions. He went out sightseeing and shopping too. He shopped in Connaught Place, and saw some of the historic landmarks of old and new Delhi. He even took a trip to some villages in Haryana and Uttar Pradesh. And then, after four days in Delhi under the Prime Ministership of Morarji Desai and the Foreign Ministership of Atal Behari Vajpayee, General Moshe Dayan went away, as quietly as he came. Leaving behind another chapter in the kind of secret diplomacy which Henry Kissinger made so famous. And leaving behind many questions in the minds of India's traditional friends. ■

ASSAM DEFIES THE ARMY

By SUBIR ROY

WHEN at 3.30 p.m. on April 18, the Gauhati High Court partially lifted its earlier stay order on the Assam Government notification declaring the state a disturbed area, a new and more dramatic phase of the nine-month-old movement in the state against "foreign nationals" began. Almost immediately at the state's administrative headquarters in Dishpur near Gauhati, the Governor, the chief secretary and army and police officials went into a huddle which lasted several hours. What they were putting the finishing touches to would become known the next day, but what they were hoping for was a conciliatory move on the part of the Gana Sangram Parishad which was leading the agitation. The Parishad leaders were simultaneously meeting in Gauhati to determine its future course of action after Mrs Gandhi's futile visit to Assam on April 12 in search of a solution. The news from the meeting was bad: No, the oil blockade would not be lifted. Instead, a new phase of the agitation would begin on April 22. The die was cast.

At midnight, April 18-19, the Governor, Mr L. P. Singh, issued the Assam Preventive Detention Ordinance under which 48 leaders of the Movement were immediately arrested, prominent among them being Mr Bhrigu Phukan, General Secretary of the All-Assam Students' Union (AASU), Mr Nibaran Bora of the Purbanchaliya Lok Parishad and Mr Atul Bora, Convenor of the Gana Sangram Parishad. An equally prominent leader who evaded arrest and went underground was Mr Prafulla Mahanta, President of AASU.

Even as the arrests were proceeding from door to door, another crucial drama unfolded at the pipeline headquarters of Oil India Limited in Narengi near Gauhati. Narengi had become a symbol of Assam's protest. Round-the-clock pickets from December 27 last year had stopped the flow of crude from Narengi to the Barauni refinery. The 2,000-odd picketers who had almost completed that night's vigil there suddenly found that the crunch had finally come. The Deputy Commissioner of Kamrup arrived with a formidable force and asked them to disperse. They saw that this time the Government meant business and the fact that most of the picketers that night were from outlying villages clinched the issue for the Sangram Parishad volunteers. The picketers gave themselves up, Narengi was "cleared" and the army posted at the township.

The first indication that residents of Gauhati got of the impending curfew was when at around 4 a.m. vehicles with loudspeakers went round parts of the city announcing the imposition of an indefinite curfew in the city from 5 a.m. It was not as if everyone was in the dark. The people taking part in the movement knew all about it and so did junior magistrates who were preparing themselves for all manner of curfew duty. Even the more knowledgeable shopkeepers told some of their important patrons the previous evening: "Buy up today, tomorrow we will be closed." As the day broke on the city, cooled and washed by overnight monsoon rain, some areas witnessed a flag-march by the army. As for the police posses posted at important intersections, there was not much evidence of patrolling or Shops were closed in most areas, except Sillpukhuri, Chandmari and Ujanbazar. The police would ask a shopkeeper to pull down his shutters and immediately after they left the boys would ask them to pull them up. People began to come out of their houses and form little clusters. Those first few trickles would finally become a torrent.

The nine o'clock news over AIR announced that the blockade at Narengi was over. So symbolic and emotive had the blockade become that soon the mood began to grow sullen. People could be heard saying: "If the curfew could be broken (earlier in December) in Nowgong and Nalbari then why can't we do same here?" In less than an hour a veritable groundswell had developed. The cry was, "Let us go to Narengi" —which was where all roads led to, eventually. The processions started in little groups and, on approaching their destination, became massive. Everyone was being exhorted to come out of his house.

By 11.30 a.m. two lakh people had poured into the Bamuni Maidan area and were proceeding towards the industrial estate. In the industrial estate there was a police picket of about 30, midway between the two gates. Processions poured in through both and soon the logistics of the situation became clear. The police picket was beseiged. And what was more significant was that with the police were the DC, Additional DC and SP of Kamrup. Only the personal car of the Additional District Commissioner was in sight, not even a wireless van. Thirty scared policemen and the top brass of the city administration were surrounded by a sea of humanity. It would have been impossible to rescue them. Slogans rent the air and soon a verbal battle began between the Sangram Parishad leaders deputed to control the crowds and the officers. They demanded the lifting of the curfew and the withdrawal of the "black" ordinance. "Arrest all of us", the leaders said, pointing to the masses. The DC, Mr Kamaleswar Bora, a benign, balding, middle-aged man, was at his wit's end. Withdrawing the Preventive Detention Ordinance was beyond his powers. But he would lift the curfew if the people behaved in a disciplined manner and did not try to break the cordon and go on to Narengi. At 12.30 p.m. with the aid of a public address system, the DC told the crowds around him that the curfew had been lifted. The movement leaders present with the DC went along to his office where the formal order lifting the curfew was passed.

The news was greeted with resounding cheers in the streets. Gana Sangram Parishad volunteers commandeered an auto-rickshaw and went around announcing over a loudspeaker that the curfew had been lifted and, more important, no crude was flowing out of Narengi. Shops slowly reopened. As evening descended, groups at street corners discussed the day's happenings exactly as they do after a soccer match. Even after clearing the pumping station at Narengi, crude could not be sent out because right up the line to the wellhead Oil India employees refused to work. A combination of incredible administrative ineptitude, a spontaneous resentment and the ability to keep the movement peaceful gave the indigenous Assamese a victory and boosted their morale. The administration's nose was bloodied and someone would have to pay a price.

That very night the Sangram Parishad announced a fresh agitation from April 22 which was wider in its scope than previous phases. After oil it was now the turn of bamboos, jute, timber and plywood. These would not be allowed to leave Assam. Other than the routine picketing of state and Central Government offices, there would be a "cycle march" in the villages on April 29 to popularise the movement. A "martial sound" would be given on April 30 by rickshaws, cars and anything that came in handy. May 1st would be "peace and harmony" day when everyone would wear white badges and hoist white flags. A call was also given to surrender all government awards by the recipients in Assam. A beginning has already been made in this with the return of a tamrapatra.

After the previous day's victory, April 20, Sunday saw Gauhati city in a relaxed mood. The mood in the state secretariat, Janata Bhavan's control room was different. There was intense preparation which found expression in a massive police mobilisation at the Chandmari crossing on the way to Narengi. The day's agitation programme set the pace for the next few days' activity. From around 10 am groups would begin to emerge from neighbourhoods and slowly coalesce into a procession as the Chandmari crossing approached. At the crossing the procession would be stopped by a strong police cordon. There the people would squat on the road about 200 yards from the cordon and shout slogans intermittently. A good kilometre before the crossing, the road would be lined every few yards by little tables with jugs of water and plastic glasses for the thirsty. Crowds would gather on the roads. The atmosphere would vary between one of festivity and confusion, with an undercurrent of tension.

On Sunday about 30,000 joined the procession. At around 2.30 pm people in small groups went right up to the police cordon and squatted before it. Since this constituted a violation of section 144 Cr PC, which was in force, they courted arrest. The voluntary arrests were conducted in a manner characteristic of the agitation: Walk in through a notional barrier, put your name down to record your arrest and walk out the other way. It was all very peaceful, and organised.

But the peace and the calm was not in evidence the next day, April 21. For some reason people that day refused to end the squatting or court arrest. The tension grew. People, mostly young men and women, sat on the road and shouted slogans, refusing to budge. The Deputy Commissioner pleaded with them for over an hour, but to no effect. The battle lines were clearly drawn. There were three cordons of policemen at distances of a few yards from each other. Most of them were CRP and junior Assam Police officials. Between the second and the last cordons a big thick coil of barbed wire lay stretched out. The helmeted policemen, with cane shields, lathis and leg guards were backed up by teargas squads.

First came the arrest of those sitting right in front, mostly women, but many more remained in the first few rows. Those arrested were put in buses which were parked behind the police cordons. From the bus windows the agitators flayed arms and shouted slogans, creating the false impression that the police had their tormenters right behind them. A harassed DC went up and down the cordons trying to argue but was met with a volley of slogans and abuses. A young man who had been arrested while talking to two of us and had managed to sneak behind the police lines, literally broke down with emotion and cried. His friends took him away.

The police finally went on the offensive at 2.45 pm. First there were the teargas shells. People had come well prepared with gunny-bags and drums of water. They tried to grab the flying shells with their gunny-bags and throw them in the water. In a scene reminiscent of the disturbances on Calcutta's College Street in 1966-67, some students threw a couple of shells back at the police, breaking the ranks of one of the cordons. The policemen ran to the streetside houses for water to splash on their eyes. The lathi charge was quite severe. People stumbled over each other and ran for cover. Some tripped and fell.

Those who got the worst of the blows were women. Stones were pelted back at the police. Some ran into the wayside AIR compound with the police hot on their heels. Later a home guard at the AIR gate said that the lathis fell on him also. In minutes the area was turned into a battlefield with the police making forays into side streets from which small groups tried to creep up behind them. It was almost over in 15 minutes. Chappals and crumpled durees on which people had squatted lay in the dust on the road. A thorny bush by the roadside had acquired the look of an unique collage. Little bits of women's shawls of different weave and design, had stuck to it. Then came the wail of ambulances to carry the wounded away. Two boys who were badly injured and unable to get up from the road were carried back to a police jeep and administered first aid by policemen. A sub-inspector of the Assam Police showed me a hand bruised by a brick-bat and said: "We took the lead in chasing the boys to save them from the CRP lathis and they abused us". The day's tally was 150 injured, 27 hospitalised, and three seriously injured. Many of the injured were women. No police official could say how many teargas shells were fired.

As we made a detour and emerged on the other side we saw a remarkable phalanx of lawyers in immaculate black and white, proceed stiffly in a row to join the demonstration. We came back at 8.30 pm to find people walking up in single file, "courting arrest", turning back and some rejoining the queue in an endless roundabout. A weary additional DC whom I had seen there in the afternoon, kept mumbling, "Let's stop it here", as government officials took down names of those arrested by candlelight at a table in the middle of the road.

April 22 was the first day of the renewed agitation with picketing before Government and public sector offices. The monsoon was in full swing. At the Chandmari crossing people squatted peacefully on both sides of the road. And in the afternoon they quietly courted arrest. The Government headquarters at Dishpur were deserted and in the rain they wore a sepulchral look. At 10.30 the office of the Press Information Bureau (PIB) had a lock hanging from it. Only the top brass had arrived. There were no pickets before these offices. A dry wit said there was no need for the picketing here, "for it was going on right in the homes": The women wouldn't let the men go to work.

In fact, a notable feature of the Assam agitation has been the active role women are playing in it. The percentage of women in demonstrations ranges between 60 and 30. Middle-aged householders in private conversation appear perplexed while they agree with the basic aims of the movement. They are nevertheless mystined by the zeall with which their womenfolk have plunged into a public agitation as never before. Various explanations are offered. In any peaceful agitation a large number of women reduces the chances of violence on either side. Another theory is that in a very strongly male-dominated society, women have seized a chance to come into their own and work shoulder to shoulder with men.

While the public agitation has been peaceful after the Nalbari riots, there is always an undercurrent of tension. A state Congress (I) leader and MLA, Mr Hiteswar Saikia, was allegedly the target of a grenade attack in which a man died. One version says that the grenade exploded in his hand, another that he died of a bullet wound. The car in which he was travelling to his hometown Nazira, in Sibsagar district has been seized for forensic examination. In another incident a CPI (M) MLA was attacked with lathis in Goalpara district. He had been organising resistance to the movement. Minority leaders have a hounded look about them. The threatening phone calls keep coming, they say.

The hardening of stands on both sides and the intensification of the agitation has its real genesis in the unsuccessful meeting Mrs Gandhi had with the Gana Sangram Parishad and AASU leaders in Gauhati on April 12. Her meeting with them was very short and lasted not more than 20 minutes. Not much of negotiation could have gone on, anyway. At the Press conference in Gauhati she gave the impression of being very firm on 1971. In a subsequent clarification she said that she did not discuss any cut-off year. A possible fall-out of the fiasco of April 19 may be the quick arrival of Mr H. C. Sarin as the principal adviser to the Governor. Will he repeat in Assam what he achieved in Telengana? ■

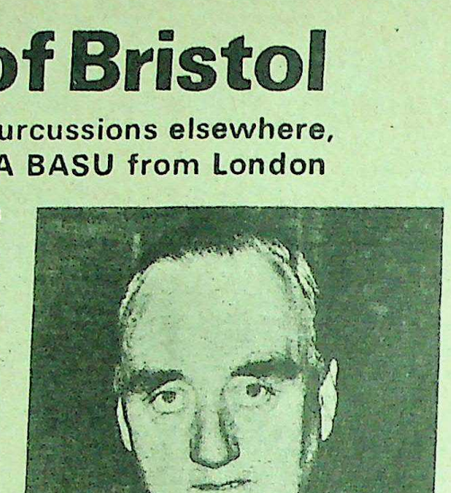
Battle of Bristol

There could be repurcussions elsewhere, reports TARAPADA BASU from London

THE battle of Bristol was fought on April 2, three weeks before the first anniversary of Blair Peach's death, allegedly caused by police brutality at Southall during an anti-racial demonstration on April 23 last year. The flare-up occurred after a police raid on the Black and White cafe located on Bristol's Grosvenor Road at 3.20 pm. The violent reaction of youngsters, mostly born in Britain of West Indian or mixed parentage, to the raiding policemen ignited the battle and within minutes the situation was out of control. The police abandoned the scene at 7 pm. An orgy of rioting and looting in the area followed : 19 policemen and policewomen were injured, police patrol cars were overturned and burned and buildings including a bank set on fire. It was not until 11 p.m. the first policeman entered the area and reinforcements could reach only at about midnight. Twenty-one people, including whites, were arrested and accused of looting. Home Secretary William Whitelaw immediately demanded a report from the police chief. In his emergency statement in the House of Commons on April 3 before MPs left for the Easter break, he said "all the evidence suggests that this was not in any sense a race-riot.

In the orgy of violence, a mob of about 200 pelted policemen with stones, bricks and bottles. Then the looters moved in. Twenty-one people were arrested for offences involving stolen property and public disorder. Losses are estimated at more than one million pounds. Eyewitness reports confirmed what the chief constable or chief of Bristol Police, Brian Weigh, has said: the majority of those arrested were whites. These reports also confirmed that police provocation was apparent. At the cafe 14 policemen entered to question only four persons. Soon after, hundreds of blacks gathered outside the cafe. By then the police force had swelled to 80 men with police dogs and another 400 policemen were on standby call. The proprietor of the cafe had not been charged with any offence and had been remanded on bail. Yet the police force went in to deal with alleged offences under the Drugs Act and Licensing Act, according to police chief Weigh. He added : "We do these operations from time to time. They are routine. There were not too many policemen in the raid but local people objected to the presence of police there."

Rightwing Conservative MPs including members of the Home Affairs committee have urged the Home Secretary to sack Weigh as they believe he was "seriously at fault in allowing the creation in effect of a temporary 'no-go area' at the height of the disturbances". Polls conducted for a television programme revealed on April 10 that a deep distrust of the police exists among the people in some parts of the country, particularly south London. Hostility towards the police was clearly reflected from replies to questions put to 220 people of West Indian origin in Brixton of Greater London after the Bristol episode. In its coverpage picture captioned "Bristol—latest" London's satirical weekly Private Eye dated April 11 published a picture of a line of policemen with one of them purportedly saying "Eeny Meeny," the second, "Mino Mo", the third "Catch a nigger by his toe" and the fourth "If he hollers, run like hell !" Labour MP Arthur Palmer who went to Bristol to see the extent of damage in the area within his constituency said, "I have always been aware of the tension under the surface in this area. This was a confrontation between black youths and the authority rather than a fight between black and whites. I think the police are in a cleft stick. They may be criticised for raiding this cafe but if they had ignored it, they would have come under attack from the white population. Much of the rundown character of the area is due to the policies of local authorities. Council flats house a large number of black families who find themselves next door to other black families who pay less for their accommodation in the old terraces."



William Whitelaw, Home Secretary

BUT the area has no race problems. The violence on April 2 was directed against the police," said one old resident of the area who has been here since the Thirties. Reverend Keith Kinler, an Anglican priest in the area said : "It was clear the needs of a significant minority in the community had been too long neglected". He added "there is acute unemployment and poverty. People here feel the pressure of frustration, despair, anger and hassles". Mr Weigh defended his decision to pull his men out for four hours because : "The situation could have caused serious injury to police and innocent bystanders after it became so ugly and violent". He further added : "If the local people think we let them down, well, I understand their feelings. But we had to take this decision in the best interests of everyone."

In the absence of the police the area was virtually turned into "no-go area" and the looters from within the area and outside did their devastating jobs thoroughly for four hours. But the police claimed that it was not made into "a no-go area" as a policy. Racial Equality Commission chairman David Lane who visited the area said : "We are extremely sad this has happened. An inquiry might be helpful. I want to get more action. There has been too much apathy on the part of the nation. What happened in Bristol could happen elsewhere in the country".

In London, police, social workers, and community relations specialists believe that widespread disorder could occur. Person or persons responsible for the death of Blair Peach in Southall have not yet been brought to book though the incident occurred over a year ago. A walk is being organised on April 27 to help the cause of anti-racialism for which Blair Peach gave his life in Southall. The report of the unofficial committee of enquiry established by the National Council for Civil Liberties to investigate Peach's death on April 23, 1979 was published on April 22.

A community liaison police officer said: "We are keeping our fingers crossed that the Bristol riots won't be repeated in London. We know from past experience that one incident can trigger off fairly major trouble". Since April 5, there is reported to be a growing rift between the Conservative Government and some leading members of the Asian and black communities over the Home Secretary's decision to drop five members of the Commission for Racial Equality. Four of them are coloured and the fifth is Miss Gwen Rickus, who has not been as critical of the Government's immigration policies as her four nonwhite colleagues. Some of the immigrant leaders have openly declared, "We have decided no other Asian or black will sit on the Commission. Anyone who does so will be treated like a leper in our community".

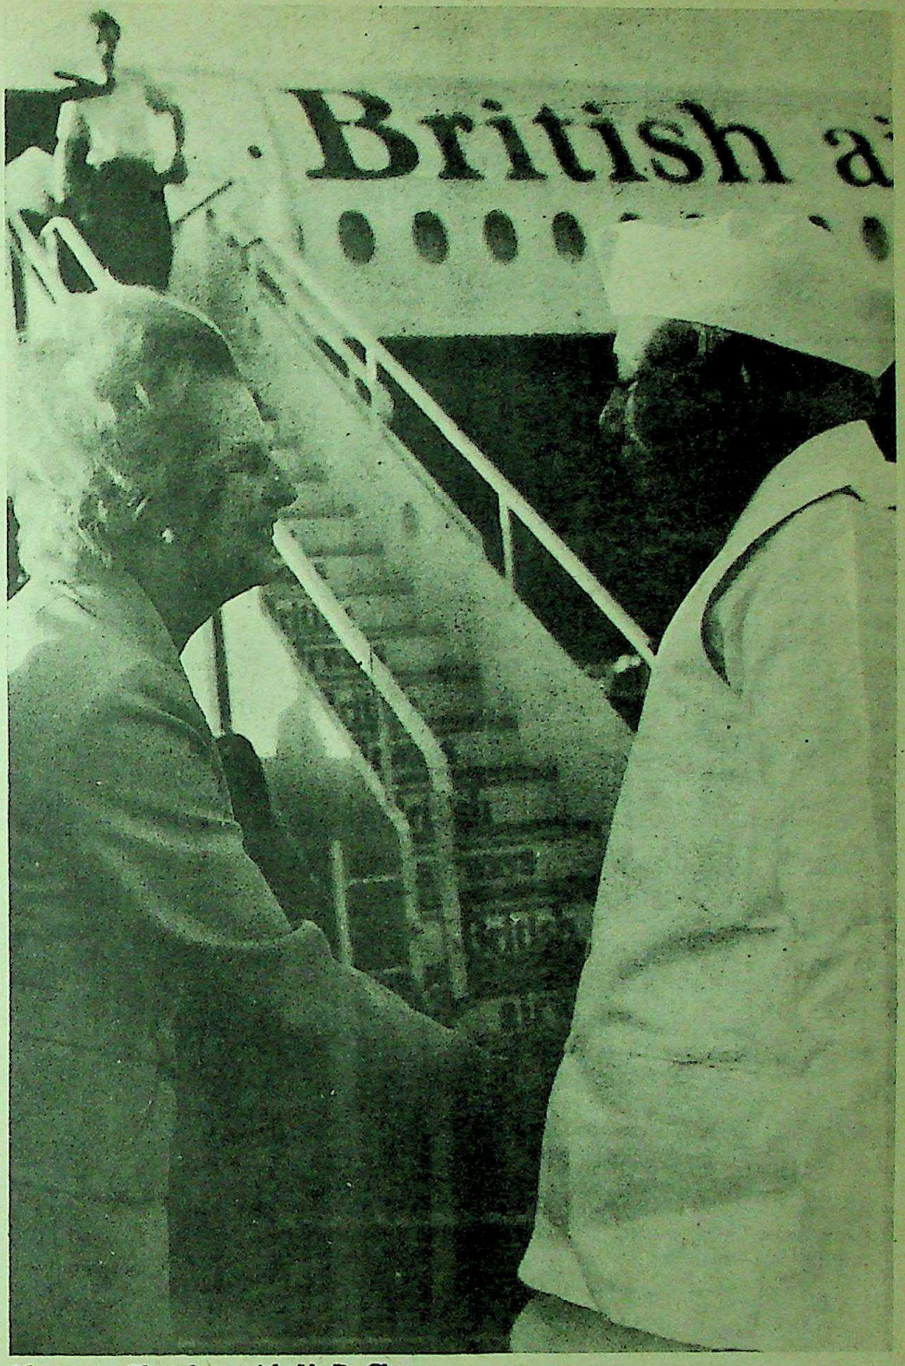
But there are others who are hoping to be nominated by the Home Secretary, Commission's chairman David Lane thought some of the reactions of the immigrant leaders were premature and overplayed. He hoped that Home Secretary Whitelaw would appoint "an equivalent number of black and Asian commissioners who will be just as committed to the cause of racial justice as my five retiring colleagues to whose work I wish to pay tribute." Mr Lane, a former Conservative MP from Cambridge who was appointed chairman of the Commission by a past Labour Government has been as critical of Conservative policies on some issues as his dropped colleagues have been. Those dropped did not ask for their 'retirement'. Mr Lane is therefore having difficulties in explaining the action of the Home Secretary and to justify his own position as he was appointed before them.

On April 8 Pakistan-born barrister Kadri accused a High Court judge of racial bias and asked him to step down as chairman of a tribunal hearing charges against another coloured barrister. But after conferring in private with other tribunal members. Mr Justice Parker said he would continue and denied that he was racially prejudiced. The disciplinary tribunal was held by the senate of the Inns of court and the bar against 42-year-old Mr Rahasya Rudra Narayan who practises in Birmingham. He denied four charges of conduct unbecoming of a barrister and two of professional misconduct. Guyana-born Narayan had insisted on a public hearing and this is believed to be the first open trial of a barrister in 200 years. The hearing was frequently interrupted by about 100 demonstrators in the Grays Inn quadrangle who shouted "We object to Parker" and "Racist Parker out, out", Mr Kadri who is Narayan's counsel, said the charges arose out of a letter he wrote to the president of the Birmingham Law Society. This alleged that black prisoners were being denied their right to select barristers of their choice and that the attitude of some Birmingham solicitors sprang from "a racist philosophy."

The Easter holidays — from Friday April 4 to Monday April 7—ended with scores of arrests at seaside resorts and football matches. All police leave was cancelled and reinforcements were brought from nearby areas to seaside areas. Those who created disturbances and smashed shop windows and public property were described by the police as "traditional holiday mob" mostly from London. In one seaside resort alone, damage to shop windows and other properties totalled thousands of pounds and fines of about ten thousand pounds were imposed by a special court set up to deal with those arrested. Shopkeepers blamed the gangs who blamed the police who blamed the Civil Rights supporters. All these, however, did not get even a remotely racial interpretation, but Bristol stood out as an example of racial confrontation even though the Home Secretary and others maintained that it was not really "race riots."



Margaret Thatcher with Y. B. Chavan

Some Conservatives and Labourites may argue that a section of West Indian youth — estranged from their families—rejected approaches by the police in Bristol where it had been authoritatively claimed that good relations existed between the blacks and the police because these youths have "subculture with a substantial criminal fringe". So the police were not dealing with the black immigrants but "the irreconcilable worst group of those immigrants".

But the racist fringe of the British people and the police—several of them returned from Britain's former colonies—do not treat the coloured humanly or as equal to the white. But all these elements are a fair minority in contrast with the large majority of law-abiding fair-minded and liberal Britons. This contrasting picture of race relations in Britain is before the authorities, but those in vantage positions who hold differing attitudes should change notes and get together if they do not want to see a repetition of the battle of Bristol elsewhere. ■

SAUMITRA BANERJEE reports from Delhi on the colour TV controversy

FOUR years ago, V. C. Shukla's proposal for the introduction of colour TV was turned down by Mrs Gandhi's Government. But the controversy started anew when in the beginning of March, the Minister for Information and Broadcasting, Mr Vasant Sathe, declared while releasing a colour TV set developed by Weston, that : "Colour television is no luxury". Though people in the electronics industry argue in favour of the introduction of colour TV, its role in the overall development of the electronics industry, as it exists in India today, has to be assessed.

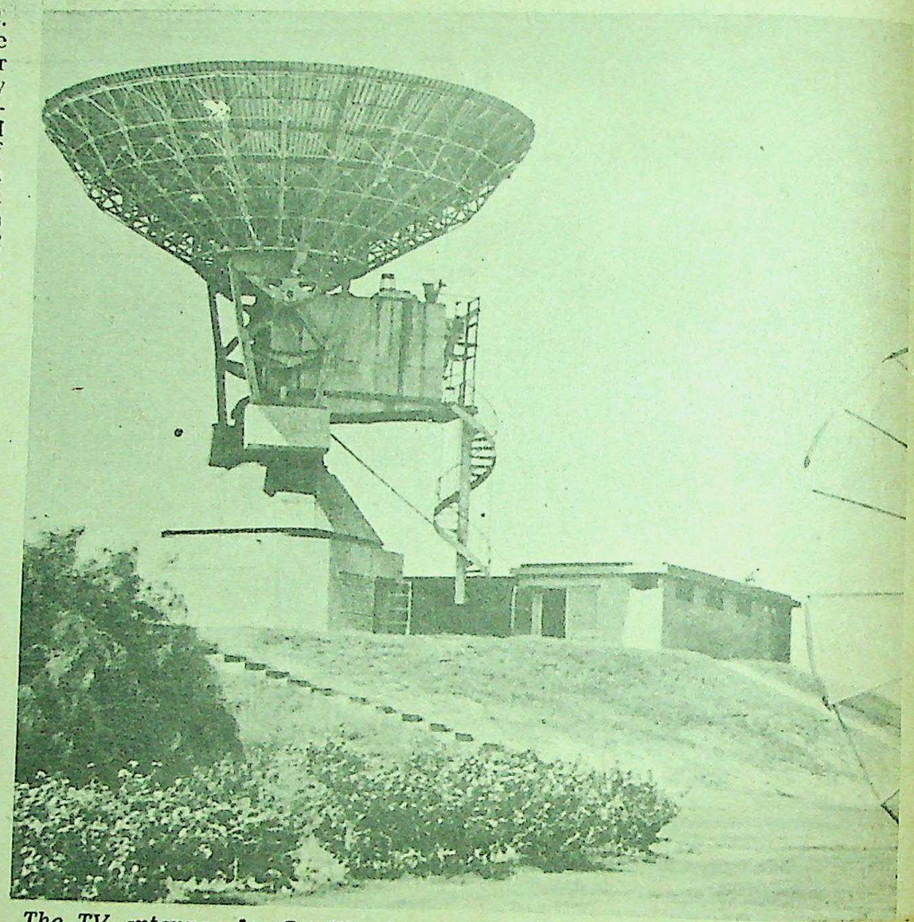
According to the recommendations of a Planning Commission sub group, "As a further advancement of television technology, colour television has been playing a prominent part in recent years. As is well known, adding colour has a great impact; it reproduces nature as it exists. Psychologically, when colour is added to a visual scene, it adds a new dimension to perception. This has been recognised in almost all countries of the world where television has already established itself in a big way. Even in developing countries where television is being introduced, the emphasis is going straight on colour television. This technological marvel has to be taken note of for gradual introduction of colour television in our national TV system.....Colour television is one significant segment of consumer electronics area which is experiencing exponential growth in the world market. Also in view of the prospect of obsolescence of black and white technology and the inherent impact of colour TV over black and white, the sub-committee recommends that at least an experimental programme on colour TV transmission and reception may be envisaged."

At present, the cheapest black and white television set which costs about Rs 2,500 has about Rs 200 worth of imported components. Roughly, one out of every three TV sets has imported picture tubes. Those who are arguing in favour of colour TV say that with the increase in the production of colour TV all over the world, the demand for black and white components has shrunk. Its production has gone down and its price up. Besides, most countries have stopped manufacturing black and white components. And since the demand for television in India is not much, it would become uneconomical for India to manufacture these components. Besides, some of the components we have to buy for the black and white television, like video tape recorders (VTR), are colour compatible. Again, India has agreements with at least 25 countries for the exchange of TV programmes. But since India cannot offer any colour programmes in exchange, it has not been able to avail of this opportunity. Therefore the argument put forward is that India should advance technologically, and this could possibly be achieved with the introduction of colour TV. The export markets would widen—the market for black and white TV is virtually non-existent now with the proliferation of colour TV. And India could compete in the world market. Said S. T. Vachani, Managing Director of Weston Electronics, the manufacturers of Weston TV : "Television is basically a labour-oriented product. In India labour is very cheap. Nearly one-twentieth of a country like Japan.

"There is therefore a lot of potential for the manufacture and growth of colour TV in India. And if we turn to colour TV, then we can go in for large-scale exports. Colour television can also serve educational purposes more competently than black and white. It is more appealing and therefore more retentive, and for science and medicine it is much more helpful when you can see the colour of the chemical."

But this is only one side of the picture. It is essential to assess the costs involved in the production of a colour TV set. A colour TV set when produced would cost about Rs 10,000 and initially at least, all specific colour components would have to be imported. Even when colour components are manufactured in India, it is estimated that a colour TV set would cost no less than Rs. 7,000. Again, in India a black and white TV set costs thrice as much as a television set sold in other south-east Asian countries.

The chances, therefore, of selling colour TV sets at relatively low prices to capture the export market are



The TV antennae for Satellite Instructional Television Experiment (SITE), which introduced television to rural areas, for agricultural education. A Planning Commission sub-group said in a report : "...adding colour has a great impact; it reproduces nature as it exists..."

dim. Besides, a question which arises is : When other Indian electronic products like cassette recorders, radios and transistors cannot compete in the international market and there is a need to improve the quality of the products, what guarantee is there that colour television receivers would have an international market?

As far as the domestic market is concerned, no survey so far has been conducted on the number of people who would go in for colour television. The number, in any case, would not be substantial. In a country like India, where the vast majority of the people cannot afford a black and white television set, colour television would hardly have a widespread impact. This is more so in the rural areas where there is no electricity even to operate the set. Unless, of course, as Mr Vachani suggested: "If you don't have electricity, use batteries". This unfortunately is rather unlikely.

Besides, little can be done to reduce the cost of a colour television set. Even though the Information and Broadcasting Minister has said that "colour TV is no luxury" yet black and white television sets, radios, and cassette recorders are regarded as luxury items and fall under the luxury tax bracket. There is little justification and no reason why colour television should be exempted from this tax. Even Mrs Gandhi's Emergency Government recognised the exorbitant cost of a colour television set. In September, 1976, under V. C. Shukla, the then Minister for Information and Broadcasting, a committee had been set up to explore the possibilities of introducing colour television in India. The committee had recommended experimental colour transmission of one-hour duration and advised that programmes like Krishi Darshan and educational and children's programmes be given priority. But one reason why the idea was shelved was the cost of the colour television set. It was then estimated that a colour television set would cost about Rs 15,000. and would therefore be beyond the buying capacity of most television viewers.

The initial investment will be huge. The studios for example consist of cameras, telecine equipment and VTR. The VTR has to be imported and 70 per cent of the rest is manufactured in India. With the introduction of colour TV, more new equipment will have to be imported. The black and white camera, which costs about Rs seven lakhs would have to be replaced by the colour camera which would cost around Rs 10 lakhs. And the colour telecine equipment costs twice as much as the black and white equipment. To set up a black and white television studio it costs about Rs five crores, whereas to instal a new colour television studio it would cost an additional crore. Besides, new wardrobes and sets will have to be set up and the lighting facilities improved. The programme production cost would rise from Rs 3,000 an hour to about Rs 15,000. Maintenance too has to be taken into account. For example, in the Delhi station, the maintenance cost would move up from about Rs 1 crore a year to about Rs 2 crores. Besides, Bharat Electronics Limited (BEL) is producing most of the equipment necessary for the transmission of "black and white" programmes. With the introduction of colour TV, all colour equipment would have to be imported.

The amount invested in colour television could very well be invested in other spheres of the electronics industry. Telephone lines could be improved. The entire telephone system in India consists of outdated equipment. And improvement in this sphere is more important as it affects a larger section of society. The emphasis should be more on improving the state of existing electronics goods, rather than go in for colour television immediately. After all, is it not more necessary to have better black and white television sets before going in for colour television ? In rural India, there are no facilities even for the repair of transistors and radios.

The electronics revolution, the most important technological breakthrough since world war II, has bypassed India. The output of India's electronics industry is only 44 per cent of the global output and a fraction of the output of Third World countries like Brazil, South Korea and Taiwan. The annual rate of growth of the value of output over the past ten years has been less than half the rate in the rest of the world. People in the industry feel that the blame for this should go to the Electronics Commission (EC) and the Department of Electronics (DOE). They say that the policies of these organisations have led to stagnation in the electronics industry. Especially, since they are based on the assumption that a high technology industry which has witnessed major technological breakthroughs every few years, can reach a competitive level in complete isolation from the rest of the world and within the domestic market. This, in the case of India is extremely limited. The structure of duties, the critics feel, imposed by the EC and the DOE, is irrational as the import of raw materials and components is discouraged while assemblies and finished goods encouraged since they are subject to lower rates of duty. This has led to a lack of incentives to develop indigenously and a consequent crippling of the industry.

However, the Sondhi Committee, which was set up to review the entire electronics policy and organisational set-up and recommend changes has prepared a report which envisages the scrapping of the EC as it considers the EC to be very restrictive. The committee has recommended lowering of duties, liberal and duty-free import of second-hand machines and simplification of import procedures. Says the report: "Unfortunately, the Indian scene in electronics, even after two decades, is marked by a slow rate of growth. Production in 1978-79 was an insignificant share of the global production. This is unfortunate as the most important of all resources in this field is possessed by this country; namely an abundance of skilled and employable manpower and a high degree of technological competence." On the licensing policy for the electronics industry it says: "A critical analysis of the present status of the electronics industry in the country shows that the investment, production and employment generation have not been as high as expected partly because of the elaborate structure for screening and rigid control on all matters connected with the licensing or expansion of new capabilities and approval of projects in this sector. In other sectors of the industry, the regime of industrial control has kept pace, at least to some extent, with changing needs and has been progressively relaxed. In electronics, on the other hand, the emphasis so far seems to have been more on regulatory rather than on developmental and promotional aspects. For example, the General Industrial Policy provisions regarding automatic growth diversification and liberalisation of investment procedures and maximum utilisation of installed capacity for units coming within the ambit of licensing do not seem to have applied to the electronics sector as vigorously as in other areas".

The Sondhi Committee report, however, neither identifies the basic strategy of electronics development in India nor the fields where the industry could maximise its advantages and make a thrust into the world market. And as one insider commented, "The Sondhi Committee report provides just the bare minimums. Even if the report is implemented, India will not be having advanced technology."

In view of this it is clear that the Government is not likely to take a hasty decision. As the Information and Broadcasting Minister recently said in Parliament while replying to a question on colour television, "No decision has yet been taken to introduce colour television nor has any project been prepared for this purpose. However, keeping in view the fact that colour TV technology has replaced black and white technology in most parts of the world, it is proposed to examine the potentialities, keeping in view the cost, manufacturing capabilities and the technical requirements of both transmission and reception".

But the question is : If we are to move towards new technological frontiers, would the introduction of colour television help substantially ? What is important is not the introduction of colour television which in the Indian context would be an isolated phenomenon, but an overall, balanced growth of the electronics industry and a thorough review of the Government's policy on electronics. ■

Happy trouble-shooting

By ASHA BHANJDEO

SOME people may be aware that The Sea Wolves, which recently completed an 11-week shooting schedule in Delhi and Goa, is the first major international film to be shot almost entirely in India during the past decade and a half. The antipathy of the Indian government to foreign filmmakers since the overblown encounters with the ill-fated Nine Hours to Rama and Louis Malle's television series on India, is a matter of common knowledge.

What magical charisma, therefore, did the producers of The Sea Wolves need to successfully manoeuvre their way through the labyrinthine corridors of power to be allowed to set up so outrageously ambitious a project in India?

"None", says Euan Llyod, the British producer of the film. "Absolutely none.

"Certainly", he adds, "some of your procedures are cumbersome, time-consuming and, to us, inexplicable. However, once we agreed to comply with all the rules—and there were many—we were allowed to bring in and take out all our equipment and personnel without any problem".

What exactly are the chronological procedures and logistics involved in making a foreign film in India with special reference to The Sea Wolves?

"The first step", says Harold Buck, associate producer of the film, "is to submit the script for approval to the Ministry of Information and Broadcasting together with a proposed schedule of dates, durations, locations, broad requirements, etc." However, approval of the script is—as the Americans say—merely a ticket to the ball game. It doesn't necessarily guarantee a seat at the show. Minutely detailed lists together with accurate valuations of every item of equipment the production company was likely to need through its 11-week schedule in India had to be submitted to the Finance Ministry many months in advance. No item, however small, would be allowed to pass through the fine toothcomb of the Customs authorities unless included in this preliminary list.

Furthermore, separate lists were required of 'Equipment' as opposed to 'Expendables' (i.e. stationery, light bulbs, camera tape, make-up, chalk, etc.) on which there is a punitive duty of 120 per cent. As a matter of incidental interest the eventual freight of the film sent to Delhi weighed in at ten and a half tons—of which two and a half kilograms accounted for the aforesaid list itself.

In order to escape paying an impossible amount of duty on equipment worth several hundred thousand dollars, the production company either had to secure an import licence — a process for which one lifetime has been known to be insufficient — or to obtain a mystical mantra known amongst the enlightened as a TBRE — Tourist Baggage for Re-Export certificate. Separate TBREs were required for each port of entry, in this case two, Bombay, Delhi. Goods brought in under a TBRE are exempt from import duty. All items brought into the country under a TBRE certificate must be entered on somebody's passport. The production company was therefore obliged to 'distribute' its massive consignment among the passports of a few of its unit members who were then in the somewhat odd position of being unable to leave the country—or, for that matter, their jobs—for any reason whatsoever before completion of the film, unless they took a large part of the equipment with them!

However, if script approval is a ticket to the ball game, a TBRE merely instructs the usher to direct you to your seat. The show is yet to begin. Customs officials at each port of entry now had to be persuaded that the precious TBREs obtained actually meant what the alphabetical permutations conveyed: a somewhat formidable task as most of us can feelingly testify. Once the Customs officials agreed to accept the TBREs —can this now be said to be the happy end of the line? "Not yet", says Harold Buck. "Actually, this is the point at which we really knelt down and prayed".

Lists of requirements had been prepared in faraway London many months back. Each department had been given strict instructions with regard to 'Equipment' and 'Expendables' which needed to be listed and packed separately as per Indian regulations. If one single 'Expendable' happened to have found its way by mistake into a crate marked 'Equipment' there could, literally, be hell to pay. And there were over 1,000 crates to contend with! "However," says Harold Buck, "by the grace of somebody up there, there were no mistakes and our ten and a half tons of freight were cleared by Delhi Customs in the record and gratifying time of only two days."

Special rules necessarily apply to the import of raw stock which is neither equipment nor an expendable. The producers were allowed to import their requirement free of duty provided every foot of film imported —used, unused, discarded or wasted including end bits — was accounted for and eventually taken out of the country. The film's 'rushes' flown to London every day for processing, therefore, left in sealed boxes pasted down with more vital statistics than those of a double line of chorus girls. The same procedure had to be followed for rolls of film for still photographs.

And now, with cast, crew, equipment, expendables and raw stock safely in the country, the producers prepared to face the trickiest problem of them all: the import of large quantities of arms, ammunition, explosives, squibs, etc. (albeit, dummies) needed for the film's action sequences. Since the hardware came from both the USA and the UK, permission had to be obtained from the civil aviation authorities of both countries to carry the consignment on commercial airliners of the two countries. Sanctions were then needed from this country to bring the hardware into Indian airports and to offload it on to Indian soil. Once in Bombay, the cargo had to be placed in the custody of the local police and was taken away by them under heavy escort for storage under police guard. Similar procedures had to be followed in order to transport the arsenal to Goa where it remained in police custody until required for use under daily police supervision. Since guns are listed as 'Equipment' but ammunition and explosives come under 'Expendables' and as such charged with heavy duty, much of the firearm-fodder was purchased in India.

It certainly says a great deal, not only for the meticulous planning and persistence of the film unit but also for the genuine cooperation of the many authorities in India that in spite of the horrifying mileage of red tape and the marathon paperchases involved, The Sea Wolves actually managed to start filming dead on schedule on November 23 last with David Niven and Trevor

After the two weeks in Delhi came another major headache — the massive logistical problem of packing and transporting ten and a half tons of valuable equipment and expendables, over 300 pieces of personal baggage and a cast and crew of over 100 half way across the country to Goa with minimum loss of time. The initial plan to transport all heavy equipment by road inside the trucks which housed it, was hastily abandoned when it was discovered that a straightforward journey of four or five days could take up to 30 due to the numerous — and often argumentative and expensive — check points and octroi posts along the road from Delhi to Goa. Furthermore, although transporting personnel by scheduled flights would certainly be cheaper, the time lost in an overnight stop in Bombay and in the temperamental uncertainties of Indian Airlines' schedules, were considered too hazardous in terms of possible delays.

Eventually, empty equipment trucks were despatched by road while the dismantled equipment itself was flown to Goa partly by scheduled Airbus and partly by chartered Viscount. The cast, crew, office personnel and personal baggage flew to Goa direct from Delhi by a chartered Indian Airlines Boeing

The last shot went in the can in Delhi at 5 pm on Friday, December

7. The first shot in Goa was taken at 10 am on Tuesday, December 11, less than four days later — a remarkable feat of organisation, discipline and professionalism in an industry which operates on the maxim that time is, indeed, money.

The move from Delhi to Goa put the production company back by almost Rs. four lakhs. The 737 charter alone is said to have cost in the region of Rs 90,000 an hour of flying time.

The Sea Wolves had a total of 61 days of filming and was completed exactly on schedule, almost to the hour, on February 5 in Goa. "Part of the credit", says producer Euan Lloyd, "must go to the magnificent Goa sun. I have never filmed anywhere else in the world where there is guaranteed sunshine for so many consecutive days with no interference from the weather".

What special undertakings, if any, did the film company have to give the government before permission to film in India was granted? The answer is, none. Certain things are, of course, taken for granted. It was understood that the unit would patronise Air India as much as possible. Employment of Indian personnel and expenditure of a large amount of foreign exchange are also inevitable. The total amount of money brought into the country is estimated in the region of two million dollars. Certainly, the unit's daily expenditure ran into around Rs. two lakhs per day.

In fact, contrary to what most people believe, the conditions the Indian government imposes on all filmmakers of foreign origin, are not only minimal but also reasonable and easily fulfilled. Film producers have to sign a bond with the Reserve Bank as to the total value of the goods brought in. The bond is cancelled once the unit leaves the country. The I & B Ministry appoints one of its officials as the governmental 'watchdog' on the set to ensure that the approved script is adhered to and that the film contains nothing that might be considered derogatory to the country. Finally, the completed film must be shown to an Indian diplomatic mission abroad.

Has it all been worth it—the red tape, the paperwork, the yearlong preparations, the delays, the uncertainties, the headaches and the hassles? "Most definitely", says Euan Lloyd. "India has proved easier to film in than many other countries. In fact, I hope that other foreign filmmakers will follow our example. Perhaps your procedures need to be simplified and the uncertainties need to be ironed out but if foreign film producers behave themselves and obey the laws of the land with strictness, I have no doubt they will receive the same warmth and cooperation that we did".

So, the next time you feel weighted down with the burdens of bureaucracy while waiting in a queue at a rationing office—don't complain. It could be much worse. ■

Soviets blundered in Afghanistan

By MADHU LIMAYE

THE situation in West Asia has been steadily deteriorating in the last two years. The process of detatching Sadat's Egypt from the Soviet orbit, which was initiated by the United States Secretary of State, Mr Henry Kissinger, was given a fresh impetus by President Carter. This led to the strengthening of the American position in the northern sector of West Asia. However, the bastion of US strategy—Shah's Iran—began to disintegrate even while fresh progress was made by the Americans in bringing about "rapprochement" between Egypt and Israel. The revolt of the Iranian people against the Shah regime assumed massive proportions in 1978 resulting finally in the overthrow of Shah's absolute monarchy. Iran has been in turmoil ever since. The foundation of the American strategic plan, based on the feverish arms build up in the Gulf region, collapsed overnight.

The Iranian revolution was fuelled by many ingredients, the dominant being the revival of Islamic fundamentalism of the Shia sect. The liberal and Marxist elements were also important as far as the industrial working class, rural poor and middle class were concerned. While the struggle for supremacy within the badly fragmented Iranian polity continues it is difficult to say what the final outcome would be. But it is clear that this crisis has had repercussions not only in Iran but in the neighbouring states also. The various nationalities in Iran like the Kurds, Azarbaijanis, Turks, Arabs and Baluchis belong to the Sunni sect and the Shia fundamentalist upsurge has not reconciled these recalcitrant minority groups to the Tehran authorities. In the southern oil bearing Khuzistan region the Sunni Arabs are in a majority and their agitation had paralysed Iran's oil production for a long time. Neighbouring Iraq—in which are located the main pilgrim centres of the Shias—has an overall Sunni majority. However, among the Arab speaking people in that country, Shias constitute a majority. Iraq is obviously suffering from the spillover effects of shattering events in Iran.

Under the Shah, Iran not only maintained relations with Israel, the monarchist regime generally pursued an anti-Arab policy. The smaller Sheikhs feared annexation by Iran. The Palestinian Liberation Organisation has now won an important ally in the new Iran. To that extent the American gains in the northern sector have been offset by the turmoil in the Gulf region.

This turmoil has other side effects also. In the oil-bearing states there is a vigorous drive against the immigrants and large scale expulsion of immigrants will have an adverse effect on the economies of the neighbouring states, including India and Pakistan. We are running a trade deficit, and decrease in remittances and further rise in crude oil prices will be a severe blow to our people.

Russian troops with Afghan

The Iranian crisis completely unsettled the Americans and they began to review their strategy in the Indian Ocean area. Several new proposals were made such as the creation of a credible Rapid Development Force and establishment of an independent Fifth Fleet on Diego Garcia in the Indian Ocean. Anyway, the American hostages crisis led to a massive naval build up by the United States with a counter build up by the Soviet Union. Instability and insurgency in Afghanistan have produced several Afghan regimes within a short space of time. Mr Daoud's republic regime was replaced by Mr Tarakki. Mr Tarakki was in turn overthrown by Mr Amin and, after the massive intervention by the Soviet troops, Mr Amin himself was liquidated and a new regime of Mr Babrak Karmal installed in his place. The social base of the successive Afghan governments has been progressively narrowing and the consequent uncertainty has aggravated.

While there is no need to overdraw the similarity between increasing American involvement in Vietnam in the Sixties with the deepening Soviet involvement in Afghanistan—after all Afghanistan has a common land frontier with the Soviet Union—it seems to me that the military intervention of the Soviet Union is a blunder of the first magnitude. However, one can easily perceive why the Soviets blundered into this situation. The events in Iran had caused deep anxiety in the Soviet ruling circles. They feared that their own Muslim republics would get infected by the religious revival in the Islamic world. The Soviet defence forces were afraid that Islamic fundamentalists as well as the American intelligence networks would not only create more trouble in Afghanistan but set up a hostile regime there.

While representatives of Pakistan have stoutly denied that the Afghan refugees in Pakistan are being trained by Pakistani authorities, the provocative speeches made by President Carter's National Adviser, Mr Brzezinski, in the presence of Pakistani authorities in the Afghan refugee camps show that the Americans are determined to use these refugees for mounting a guerilla warfare. While it is unthinkable that the Pakistani President would provoke a direct military clash with the Soviet Union, he is clever enough to see that the current Afghan crisis, while increasing tension and escalating military conflict in the area, has provided him with a golden opportunity to strengthen his own internal position. In the name of external danger he has already effectively silenced the opposition forces: the elections in Pakistan have been indefinitely postponed. The crisis has also opened up the Pakistani army receiving massive military and economic aid from the United States and its allies without Pakistan's having to modify its nuclear weapons programme. The Pakistani President is bound to exploit his new opportunities to the fullest extent possible.

All this has adversely affected the security environment of India. We in India have to take our stand primarily from the point of view of (a) preserving our national independence; (b) strengthening the integrity of the nation and (c) ensuring our national security. In the last 32 years the Americans have been pursuing a policy which has very little regard for the interests and susceptibilities of the Indian people. Whoever is the President and whichever Party he belongs to, there has been an amazing consistency in the American policy towards India.

WHILE trying to understand the possible Soviet motives in moving troops into Afghanistan and defending India's security interests we must take note of the following:

(a) that there has been a massive induction of the Soviet forces in Afghanistan; (b) that these troops have crossed the frontiers of an independent sovereign state; (c) that the argument about invitation is neither here nor there, the fact being that the Soviets were actuated by purely security considerations; (d) that unlike India's Bangladesh operations Soviet military intervention is not going to be of a short duration and that Soviet troops are likely to remain in Afghanistan for a very long time; (e) that Soviet intervention has provided a pretext for the Americans to step up their military and naval build up in the Gulf and Indian Ocean area; (f) that the American presence in the first instance had nothing to do with nor was it provoked by the Afghan crisis; it had been there for a long time and had been increased in response to the collapse of their military bastion in Iran; (g) that the American hostages crisis, the threat of a blocade of Iran, the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and the American response to this event have all revived the cold war and have increased the area of military conflict; (h) that the danger of an unstable Pakistan arming itself to the hilt constitutes a grave threat for India's security; (i) that the Americans are over-reacting deliberately because tough postures help President Carter secure re-election in the fall this year; and finally (j) that its West European allies, except Britain, are cool to the American efforts to overheat the situation.

It is against this background that India will have to formulate its policy. This policy, I think, should be based on hard-headed realism. There is no scope for emotional outbursts of any kind. To whip up an anti-Soviet hysteria would in no way advance India's security interests. To launch an emotional outburst against the United States will also not help much.

The second point I would like to make is that the approach to the Afghan developments, military build up in the Indian Ocean and the pouring of massive arms into Pakistan should not be made a political Party issue. India's internal economic problems are very grave. The political problems, especially in the north-east, are also very serious. There is enough ammunition for internal controversy in this. There is no need to extend this Party conflict to the field of national security. I would therefore like a national policy to be evolved in regard to the West Asian crisis. It is the duty of the Government to take the opposition into confidence. The opposition must also desist from the temptation of making Afghanistan an issue of Party strife; there is no mileage to be derived either for the Government or for the opposition.

The next point that I would like to make is that disapproving of the Soviet military build-up in Afghanistan and the American military build-up in the Gulf and the Indian Ocean area by themselves do not constitute a viable policy. The intensification of the cold war and the extension of the area of conflict will not increase India's security. On the contrary, the danger of Pakistan being sucked into the vortex of the conflict will increase our anxiety manifold and it will be impossible in that situation for India to stay out.

Priority must therefore be given to the reduction of tension in the area. A solution must be worked out whereby Soviets will be induced to pull out of Afghanistan without loss of face. A Dangerously Strategic Location

regime in Afghanistan or may not constitute a grave threat to the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union is the largest country in the world. Its productive capacities are vast, and it has now achieved military parity with the United States. It can look after itself very well. But a chain of fundamentalist reactionary states from Saudi Arabia right to the borders of India would certainly constitute a serious threat to India. The massive American build-up in the Indian Ocean area, far from providing additional security to India, will actually complete its encirclement. I would like to warn that in future, because of this build-up, our Indian policy will become subject to extraordinary outside pressure. Our energy must therefore be directed towards defusing the crisis. The help of every country which is interested in de-escalation should be mobilised towards this supreme objective. The EEC, especially West Germany and France, Austria, Yugoslavia, the Scandinavian countries all can help in their own way. Even Japanese cooperation can be sought. The regional South Asian approach can also be dovetailed in this concerted effort. The extremist American reaction to the current crisis is the result of the cynical election strategy of the Carter forces. There is reason to believe that a softening will come after November. But the intervening period is a difficult one.

After making a number of contradictory statements it appears that the Indian Government's approach is gradually approximating to the policy which patriotic people have advocated in the last two months. It is obvious that the pro-American elements in the country will not approve this policy. They would like to foment anti-Soviet hysteria, completely disregarding the fact that India's defence effort and India's security today depend to a great extent on good Indo-Soviet relations. They will also totally disregard the fact that the Americans have done everything in their power during the last 32 years to undermine India's position in the Indian Ocean area. It is useless to remind them of the American stand on Kashmir, on Goa and on Bangladesh. It is futile to ask them to read the Nixon Memoirs and Kissinger's latest book. They are serving their own interests.

Among the other world powers only China seems to be bent on a policy of fanning the conflict. China hopes to profit by increased Soviet-American confrontation. They would also like to use Pakistani territory as a base for guerilla operations in Afghanistan. But all this will not promote our national interests. Whatever may be the current difficulties of the Soviet Union in Afghanistan it is well to remember that Pakistan is extremely vulnerable because the Soviets too can exploit separatist tendencies in Pakistan.

We must warn Pakistan about these dangers. We should assure them again and again that we have no designs against them. We should also persuade the Soviet Union to reassure them. But at the same time the President of Pakistan must give up his rearmament plans, prevent the "refugees" being used as insurgents and agree to a real non-aligned Afghanistan which is not hostile to the USSR. It is laughable to maintain that the Americans have a vital stake in the Gulf ten thousand miles away from their homeland but the Soviets have no vital interest in Afghanistan!

The question is whether the Americans will accept a non-aligned Afghan regime with which the Soviets can live. A neutral state on the model of Switzerland or Austria or Sweden presupposes a high level of economic development and internal stability. These conditions do not exist in Afghanistan. Besides this status cannot be imposed on it by outside powers. Other powers have no right to deny to the Afghans their right to freedom. Guarantee against outside aid to insurgency, withdrawal of Soviet troops and a non-aligned Afghanistan alone can provide a solution.

While India will have to maintain state-to-state relations with all the West Asian countries, it is clearly in India's interest to have non-fundamentalist progressive regimes in West Asia. We must therefore strengthen further our relations with Iraq, Syria and the Palestinian Liberation Organisation. Meanwhile we should expand our economy, bring about improvement in our infrastructural facilities and strengthen our defence forces.

Islampur: Police go berserk

By TOOSHAR PANDIT

ON April 7, a cluster of hamlets scattered over a ten-square mile area on the north-eastern fringe of West Bengal was brutally destroyed, after twenty hours of police barbarism. What now remains of these villages — Balancha, Ringkua, Guabari, Phulbari, Borogochha, Gondolgochha — within five kilometres from the subdivisional town Islampur, in West Dinajpur, along a metal road, are the skeletons of charred huts, rubble and ashes. The inhabitants, victims of hate, live on charity, or scavenge the debris for anything they can salvage. Armed para-military Border Security Force and the Eastern Frontier Rifles man the Islampur police station and warily prowl the village roads substituting for the regular policemen, now confined to their barracks by a Government order. Huge shards of clay pots, litters of dimpled tin cans, mounds of charred paddy, chunks of baked mud, gaping chasms in the walls, sullen faces, the glint of sunlight on broken pieces of glass, the twisted tangle of corrugated tin and bamboo poles, heaps of burnt hay, polythene tents, revive memories of Bangladesh or a Mai Lai.

Only in the relative calm of late in the week could a real count be taken of the devastation. The toll stood at two dead and several injured. Property worth an estimated Rs 2 million was damaged, with 600 huts completely gutted rendering some 3,000 farmers and potters, mostly the lower caste migrants from the erstwhile East Pakistan, and Muslims, homeless. Wholesale looting by the police has turned them paupers. The statistics present only a partial picture. For, the damage is more psychological than physical. Even after seven days fear kept many villagers away from their homes and village.

The bizarre story of vengeance and violence begins with the arrival of a posse of six policemen led by the officer-in-charge of the Islampur police station at Phulbari village in a jeep on Sunday April 6 around 7 p.m. ostensibly to answer a tip from the adjoining Rajgunge police station, about a possible dacoity in a bandookwalla (literally, a house with a gun) residence. As the jeep left the metal road and pitched on to the village track, the officer ordered its headlights to be dimmed and the engine muffled, and drove to the two-storied stucco residence of Sarat Pal, one of the two affluent villagers owning guns. From there, the OC and two other policemen backtracked for about 500 yards to the residence of Suren Modak, the only other person owning a gun and a pucca house.

Suren's second son Sankar, 21, was standing in front of the house when the police walked up, and asked him to fetch his father. "Tell him, barababu is here," one of them growled. When, Suren came out, the officer wanted to know if had a licence for the gun. He had, then the officer asked, who might be near the gun then. "Possibly, my wife," Suren replied. "Then go and be with her and don't dare to come out," the officer cautioned. Suren went in. He recalls, "But even before we could serve some tea to the visitors, shots rang out from the direction of Pal's residence. It had to be the dacoits, we thought. I raced out to the porch 'Why don't you do something?' I begged the policemen. But, they scarcely moved."

Nobody in the village really knew what was happening at Pal's residence but everybody suspected the same thing: the dacoits had come. They cannot be faulted for this. Three of the five police stations—Islampur, Goalpokhar and Chopra—in the Islampur subdivision are located close to Nepal, Bangladesh and Bihar borders, and offer an ideal sanctuary for smugglers. The local people are not only bitter about the mounting incidence of crime and violence in the area but are also firmly convinced that the police was actively nursing the criminals. The feeling that the police cannot or will not protect them has led the villagers to rely increasingly on their own strength and stimulate in them a tendency to take the law into their hands. Thus, the sound of the first shot dragged many villagers out on the road with whatever weapons they could pick up—kitchen knives, daggers, swords, meat choppers, lances, sticks, bamboo poles, iron bars. The crowd swelled as Suren, bottled up in his room by the police, fired a couple of blanks in reflex response.

BUT what was really happening at the Pal residence? Khiramani Pal, 23, wife of Sarat Pal's nephew Rajen, 31, says that soon after the jeep stopped in a vacant lot about thirty yards from the house, some policemen came and kicked the front door splicing it into splinters. One policeman grabbed Sarat Pal's wife to know if her husband was at home. No, she said. Another asked where the gun was. She bluffed them by saying that she was only a maid-servant. The ruse worked. She ran away.

Rajen remembers that the first thing he thought of was the gun locked up in a first floor room. "As I climbed the stairs, the policemen pulled down yet another tin door at the entrance of the main building. But, I picked up the gun before they reached the top of the staircase. A shot rang out pretty close. Then another. I moved to the rear balcony. From there I saw four people—three in uniform and one in plai dress—fan out in different rooms. Then, the sound of the boxes and the trunks being broken open. When I heard them talking about the gun, I climbed higher on to the roof and, clutching the gun firmly, dived, landing on the thatched roof of the outhouse thirty feet below, and went on to the road where a crowd had already collected. Among them I spotted my uncle Sarat Pal and handed the gun over to him".

These testimonies clearly emphasise that the policemen went on a looting spree as soon as they moved into the Pal residence after scaring away the inmates with gunfire. The police, however, insists that the dacoits had actually raided the house engaging them in an encounter in which both sides exchanged fire, but the dacoits escaped. The villagers think that these explanations are afterthoughts. They argue that if the OC had been serious about catching the dacoits he would have had come better equipped and with a larger force, not with six men of which one was in plain dress. They also deride the police claims of laying an ambush for the dacoits by pointing out that what they really did was to bottle up the two people in the village who could have had offered most resistance to the dacoits. Neither was the help of the villagers sought. If the dacoits had raided the Pal residence, how was it that the inmates did not see them? If there was an encounter where have those empty shells of the bullets fired by the dacoits gone? No wonder, the villagers have dubbed the claims as "the fantasy of phantom dacoits".

And yet, it is hard to believe that an officer-in-charge of a police station was taking his men to a village to loot the people so brazenly. It is also possible that some of Pal's affluence may have come from deals that are not strictly legal. He always had good relations with the police till they soured in January. Why? A row over kickbacks? Nobody knows for sure. However, the presence of Nibaran Bal, a police constable assigned to another police station and long known as a conduit between the police and the underworld, in plain dress, appears to have encouraged such speculation. One assumption is that the police wanted to settle things with Sarat Pal and Nibaran was asked to negotiate the deal as the OC cooled off in Suren's place. But, the policemen apparently went beyond their brief.

THE villagers worked themselves up to a frenzy when the inmates of the Pal house told them that the policemen were looting. The mob swelled to over 500. They surrounded a ground floor corner room in Pal's house where five policemen, including the OC who had come to rescue his men, stood helplessly. The policemen threatened to shoot, but the mob was in such a fury that even artillery could not have had scared them away. They punched, and kicked and clubbed the cops. Some elderly residents feebly attempted to intervene but gave up when they themselves were threatened with violence. Outside, the police jeep was set ablaze. When the fury subsided, two policemen — Harish Sarkar and Nibaran Bal—were dead. The OC and two others, forcing an opening through the mob, escaped with wounds.

A LARGER contingent of policemen headed by the SDO and the SDPO and buttressed with the CPI-(M) anchal pradhan of Islampur, Adhir Biswas, arrived for the second time in the village at about 10 p.m. Strangely, the local anchal pradhan, Pal of the Forward Bloc was completely ignored as the police summoned Jiten Bhowmik, 67, CPI(M) member of the local panchayat for his assistance in persuading the inmates of the Pal house to vacate the building for the police to pick up the corpses. Bhowmik remembers: "I circled the house once and found all the doors and windows closed. A policeman who detected a small crack in one of the windows said, 'Guess it's open, and you can reach it by climbing on my back'. Immediately, he went down on all fours. I slipped through the window, reaching the room where the corpses lay spread-eagled in a pool of blood, their eyes pulled out of their sockets, the arms almost severed, and blood oozing out from the gaping wounds all over their bodies. The police entered, retrieved two rifles and a revolver (the police say the mob had snatched them away) lying by the side of the bodies, chased the

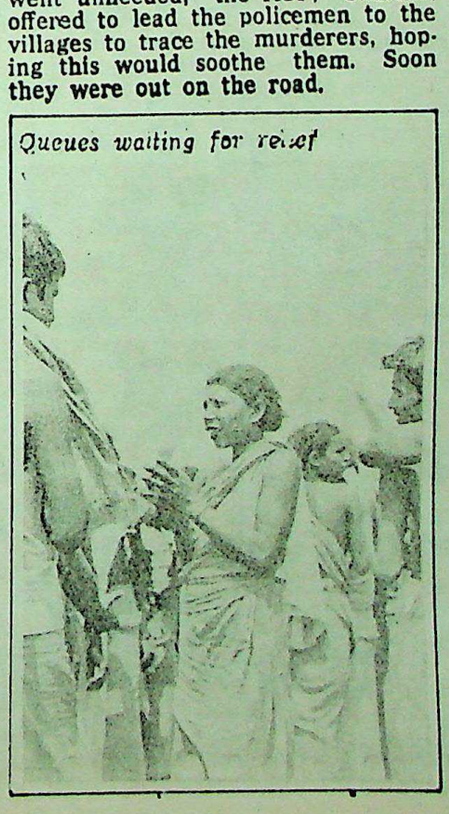
Meanwhile, the villagers had also been massing before the house. They would not allow either the charred jeep or the bodies to be removed until the policemen had been punished for the attack. After some hassles and promising action, the CPI(M) pradhan, Biswas, finally persuaded the villagers to let the police take the corpses. The jeep remained (it was towed away seven days later). In the meantime, the police however, arrested one person—Ramesh Modak, a BSF personnel posted in Assam who had come to the village on leave —from the crowd.

At the police station, the other policemen were throbbing with tension and anger. Some tore off their uniforms. Others stamped all over the place with hate in their face and murder on their lips. Seeing the bodies, they grew even more furious and demanded orders to raid the villages. In the confusion, a policeman fired in the direction where Bhowmik, Biswas, the SDO and the SDPO were talking, missing Bhowmik narrowly.

At dawn on Monday April 7, the SP Avasthi and the additional SP Vinode Sharma arrived at the police headquarters followed by a van load of armed police. The reinforcements brought by them soon joined the other policemen in demanding revenge. Thumping the desk, they repeatedly asked the officers to lead them to the villages. The situation was close to a mutiny. By then, a large crowd, mostly the residents of a nearby police colony where one of the dead policemen Nibaran lived, had filled the police station compound. The friends and the family members of Nibaran in the crowd demanded explanations from the SP for the death. "Why did the OC go with such a small force? Why did he take Nibaran with him although he did not belong to his police station?" they asked. "You have got my father killed," Nibaran's son screamed. By 7.30 a.m. the crowd had swelled to over 1,000 and included quite a few local leaders of different political Parties. Particularly vocal was Gautam Gupta, a Congress (I) activist, who, however, claims that he had gone there to diffuse the tension. Soon the crowd started pelting stones and smashing the window panes, and, finally surged into the police station pushing and punching both the SP and the ASP on their way to the lock up. They wanted the arrested persons, Bhantu, Indramohan and Ramesh to be handed over to them. "If you don't", they warned, "we will get them ourselves from the lock up", All this encouraged the policemen to become even more defiant. "Jai Ma Kali" shouted the policemen. The crowd shouted back : "Death to the easterners", As all the pleas for restraint went unheeded, the ASP, Sharma, offered to lead the policemen to the villages to trace the murderers, hoping this would soothe them. Soon they were out on the road.



Queues waiting for relief

RATAN Chandra Roy, 38, the headmaster of the Matikunda Primary School was returning home at Balancha village at about 10.30 a.m. when he spotted a police van parked on a bridge some 1,000 yards away. The policemen were chasing the pedestrians bound for the Monday market at Matikunda. They were also snatching cycles from those who were on wheels. After some time, nine or ten policemen strayed into his house and started beating him with the butt of the rifles. "I told them I was a schoolmaster but they went on beating me. As they dragged me towards the van, my 78-year-old mother, my wife, my son — all fell over me. They pushed my mother aside and she fell unconscious; they kicked my wife apart. My son barely escaped being shot."

Vandalism began as soon as the policemen left the limits of Islampur town. Their first act of carnage was setting a betel vine on fire at Balancha, one and half kilometers from the town. They followed it up with more arson and looting as they rolled on. Satish Sharma, the manager of a local co-operative shop at Ringkua village says that a group of policemen came to his shop and asked for water. "After they drank it, one of them pulled out a match box from his pocket, lit a bundle of sticks, and threw them on the thatched roof before leaving".

The police did as they wished. If they saw flames dying down at some place, they would pour more gasoline to revive the fire. The looting and plundering went on unabated. They threw Suren's youngest son Biswanath, 14, into a burning heap of hay with his hands tied behind his back. Another policeman, however, pulled him out, and cut him loose after he had sustained serious burns.

From one village to another it is the same sordid story. At Borogochha village Bholanath Pal mourns the death of his wife Kaileswari holding in his arms their five-day old daughter wrapped in a burnt rag. Kaileswari died on Wednesday April 9. The child was born just as the arson started on Monday. "They kicked her as she tried to run. I should have taken her to the hospital then, but did not, fearing further reprisals. Finally, when I took her, it was too late", Bholanath says. At Gondolgochha, 100-year old Jalaluddin saw the house where he was born crumble before his eyes. "All others fled. I was slow. I am an old man. They took me out under a tree and punched me till I went down," he said.

The language of force was direct, savage and mindless. There can be no excuse, political or personal, for the orgy of wanton destruction in which the police indulged for over three hours. What has really been lost in the village of Islampur are not just some huts and shops but the very substance of the civilised notion that the police protects. Faith is the casualty. ■

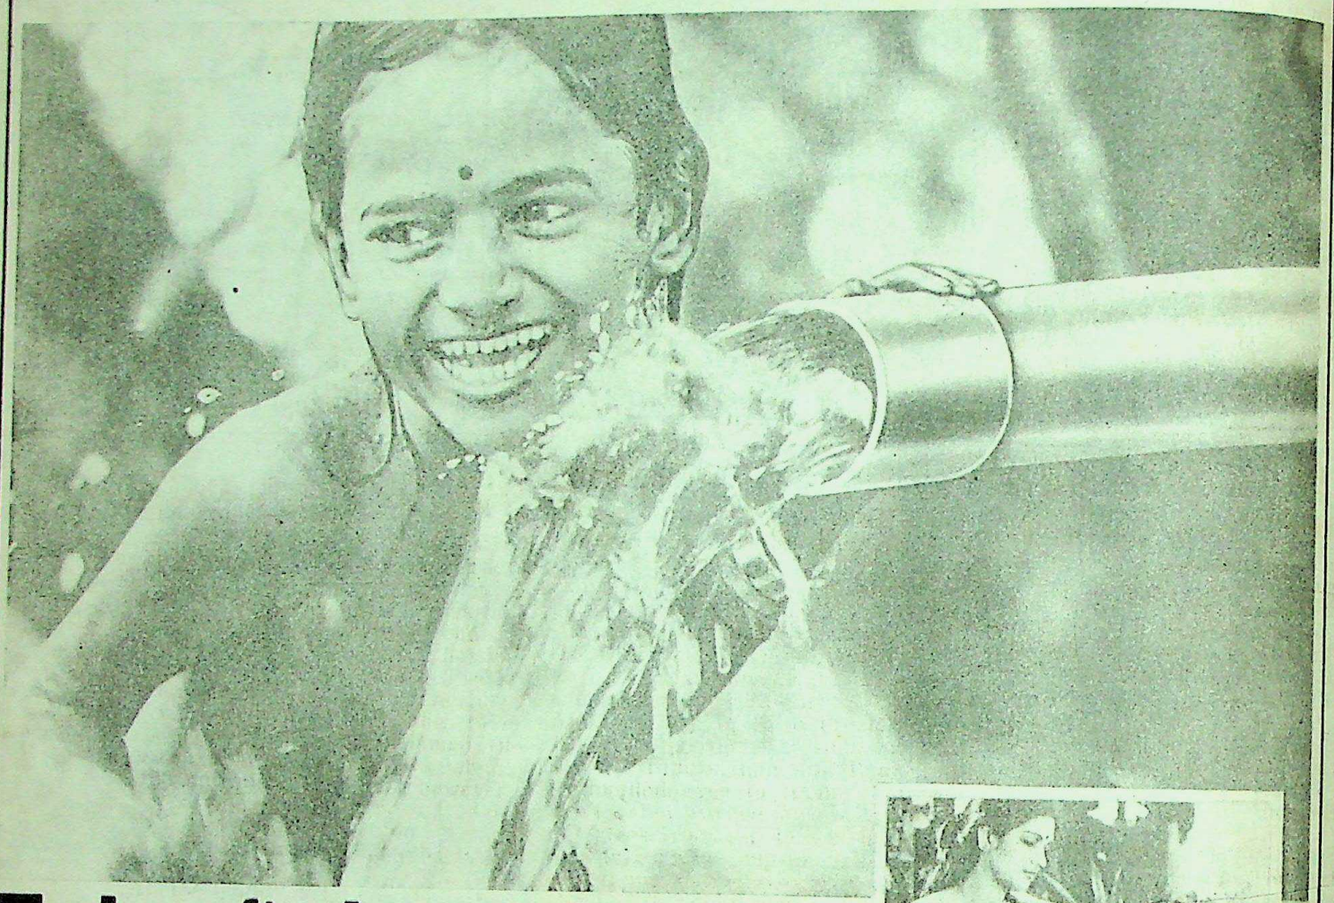
Prosperity flows through Zenith Steel Pipes.



To benefit the rural millions.

In our own colony at Khopoli, the quality of life is our main concern.

Where food grows, water flows through Zenith steel pipes.

This is our promise of plenty.

Take our steel pipes exports. We not only pioneered these in 1964 but are India's leading exporters today.

Earning precious foreign exchange from over fifty countries. Winning export awards.

As we've grown, we've diversified. Today, our rolls and shears cut paper, wood and shape metals. Our special steels keep buses, trucks, cars, trains, even bicycles on the move. Soon, our dye intermediates will colour the textile world.

No matter what we do or make, we are committed to the quality of our products and more—the quality of life.

Leading the blind

By RAJENDRA MATHUR

AFTER voting massively for Mrs Gandhi—and in a country as big and variegated as India, the support of 43 people out of 100 ought to be considered massive—the nation is looking over its shoulders and wondering if it has done the right thing. Prices are rising and Mrs Gandhi has been doing nothing. Populist leftism, which saw her through the seventies, has fallen by the wayside, and the 20-point programme is a dodoistic revival. To connoisseurs of Mrs Gandhi's career, her inaction is not strange; she rarely acts unless she is at bay. The people at large are aware of this, but they would rather not remember the inconvenient truth, for Mrs Gandhi is still India's best bet for action. It does not matter if her action is convulsive and sporadic, for it is convulsive action which has been pulling us out of tight spots ever since 1962. Steady action needs a steady philosophy of growth bringing in steady dividends, and none of the mainstream Parties of India is left with any such philosophy. In that sense, the election of Mrs Gandhi signifies the end of ideas and of ideology, and the beginning of an era of pan-Indian blindness. We all want Mrs Gandhi to act, but does any intellectual or economist or would-be prophet have the foggiest idea of how he would have acted if he had been entrusted with a mandate as massive as Mrs Gandhi's? If a bunch of blind men were to be asked to elect a leader who could deal most successfully with a tiger who had broken loose amongst them, they would of course elect a person with the surest convulsive instincts.

Would the picture be much rosier if the Janata Party had won, or more impossibly, the Lok Dal? Luckily, an answer to this question is not hypothetical; it can be deduced with a fair degree of accuracy on the basis of what has been happening to the opposition since its rout three months ago. Here are some of the scenarios of the road which we did not take.

If the Janata Party had won, Mr Jagjivan Ram would now be the Prime Minister of India, fulfilling—like Morarji Desai and Charan Singh before him—the intensest, unstated ambition of his life. (They all want to become Prime Ministers without knowing what they would do with it.) And in less than six months, the works would have begun.

Jagjivan Ram would not have liked to serve as the Harijan facade of the RSS; he would be crediting the Janata victory to his own personal stature rather than to the cadres of the Sangh. The Sangh would be boiling with inner rage, for Jagjivan Ram would be describing them as the proverbial dog beneath the bullock cart who thought he was hauling the whole load. Party elections would still be out of the question and committees would continue to be ad hoc. Jagjivan Ram would perhaps be trying to Congressise the Janata Party by engineering defections from the Congress (I) and Congress (U). They would have taken place even if he did not try. Chavan and Chandrashekhar would have fretted at the spectacle of Congressmen uniting under the banner of Jagjivan Ram, but mild-mannered Swaran Singh would be extending his fullest cooperation. Realignment would be the need of the hour, for Raj Narain, sore with Charan Singh, would need a new home, and Madhu Limaye would be seething with a new thesis. In the hierarchy of untouchability, the Congress (I), the RSS and the Lok Dal traitors would be placed differently by different factions.

If the Lok Dal had won, the works would have started immediately. Raj Narain would have instantly found his new mission: the demolition of Charan Singh. "The dictatorship of Charan Singh", he would have thundered, "is much worse than the dictatorships of Indira Gandhi and Morarji Desai put together."

If Jagjivan Ram had been the Prime Minister, we would be witnessing strange bedfellows uniting to dislodge him. Charan Singh would be making overtures to the RSS and the RSS might be joining hands with Mrs Gandhi to pass a motion of no-confidence against Jagjivan Ram. Or the Prime Minister might be making a deal with Mrs Gandhi, promising the abolition of the special courts and sundry other prosecutions.

Newpapers would be informing us of these mighty and tempestuous happenings day after day, while nothing really would be happening.

Jagjivan Ram would have been as devoid of ideas as Mrs Gandhi is; no man holds back his originality, until his seventy-second year, waiting to unleash it after he has become Prime Minister. Charan Singh, on the other hand, would have gleefully leapt into several abysses without looking. His Government would have come unstuck in no time, because drastic measures need prior preparation and the creation of a political base to sustain them, for which Charan Singh would have no aptitude. The measures would boomerang on him and finish him off, provided that he had not already been done in by his Hanuman. Inaction and whimsical action would have brought us to the same point: the point of non-government. Following a different route, Mrs Gandhi too compulsively arrives at this very point.

It should be obvious from the above that the alternative to Mrs Gandhi next time cannot be the spent forces of contemporary opposition. Having proved barren, mindless and factious once, they do not deserve another chance, for they are sure to repeat 1977-79. Qualitatively, they are bound to be poorer than Mrs Gandhi. And yet it is strange to see heptagenarian leaders posing themselves as the wave of the future.

The alternative is yet unborn. It shall be born when new political forces come up from below and assert themselves. When Harijans really mobilise as a political force, their authentic leader would surely not be Jagjivan Ram, who has been for 34 years a part of the establishment. When farmers cultivating 15 to 20 acres land together more effectively, would they still have a hare-brained Charan Singh as their leader? Would the opposition have no better tactician than factious Madhu Limaye? It is difficult to believe that the nation has become so frustratingly barren.

Ministers in the making

By BARUN SENGUPTA

THERE will be major changes in the Central Cabinet soon after the state elections. At least two or three Central Ministers are expected to go to their respective states after the state elections to assume new responsibilities, so there will be a few vacancies. Some important Ministries have also not been filled in as yet while some of the present Ministers are likely to be shifted to other Ministries according to the assessment of the Congress (I) High Command in the light of their performance during the last four months.

Among the Central Ministers who are expected to go to their own states J. B. Patnaik seems to be a certainty. The Congress (I) is almost sure to get an absolute majority in Orissa and Patnaik, as the "most trusted" politician from Orissa, will be selected as Chief Minister of the state. He remained with Mrs Gandhi and Sanjay during the days of their crisis and however hard Biju Patnaik and Nandini Satpathy may try, it will be impossible for them to weaken JB's position in the Delh. Durbar immediately.

Giani Zail Singh's name is also being mentioned for Chief Ministership. If he goes to Punjab, either Mr P. V. Narasimha Rao or Mr C. M. Stephen will take charge of the Union Home Ministry. Zail Singh is still considered to be very close to Mrs Gandhi and Sanjay — but they cannot be satisfied with his performance in Parliament. Some important persons close to the Party High Command feel that Zail Singh would be more at home in the Chandigarh Secretariat and Punjab Assembly than in the Union Home Ministry and Parliament.

Will P. C. Sethi be also sent back to his own state? There are suggestions that because of his ill health he would do b.tter in Bhopal than in Delhi. But nothing will depend on this suggestion and everything will be decided on the assessment of Mrs Gandhi and Sanjay. They would definitely not like to make V. C. Shukla the Chief Minister of Madhya Pradesh. But who wil then be the Chief Minister in Bhopal? Dr Sankar Dayal Sharma? That is also most unlikely. Then would not Sethi's name come up naturally?

Of all the Central Ministers, Narasimha Rao, Pranab Mukherjee and Vasant Sathe are reported to be considered "most successful" by the Party High Command. Their performances, both in the Secretariat and in Parliament, are being rated as "first class" and "high second class" respectively. With virtually no experience in international diplomacy what Mr Rao has done so far as Mrs Gandhi's Foreign Minister is considered to be "excellent". Pranab Mukherjee's performance as the leader of the Rajya Sabha, where the Congress (I) was in a minority till the other day, is being considered as "first class". It is being said that what he achieved in Paris during his short visit is a "miracle" — though facts of this "miraculous achievement" are not being disclosed immediately due to security reasons. Vasant Sathe was given the formidable task of building up a rapport with the Press, which, the High Command thinks he has been able to do with tact and intelligence to a large extent.

Vasant Sathe

Imagemakers

But all these "successful" Ministers hold very important portfolios. So, it will not be easy to shift them to other important Ministries. If Zail Singh goes to Punjab and Mr Rao is made the Home Minister, then Mrs Gandhi may personally take over the External Affairs Ministry. There is talk that Pranab Mukherjee will be given the Ministry of Revenue and Banking again, by bringing out these two important departments from the Finance Ministry altogether. But who will then be given the Ministry of Foreign Trade which has become an empire in itself and which is expected to be enlarged further in the near future? Sathe can be given some other additional Ministries, but in the midst of his first assignment the High Command is most unlikely to shift him to any other Ministry however important that may be. It should be remembered that none of these "successful Ministers" are known to be 100 per cent Sanjay-men as are A. B. A. Gani Khan Chowdhury, Zail Singh and A. P. Sharma.

Some new persons will also have to be taken into the Cabinet. This time, it is expected to be a "long term" arrangement (at least for two years) and as such no Minister is expected to be in temporary charge. More Ministers will naturally be needed to fill the vacancies. In circles close to the High Command the names of Sukhadia, Salve and Bahuguna are still being mentioned. Of course, if Bahuguna "tries to play any trick" during the Uttar Pradesh state election then his future in the Congress (I) will be completely sealed.

Mrs Gandhi and Sanjay will face more difficulties in selecting the Chief Ministers than in nominating the new Central Ministers. The Congress (I) has no accepted leader in any of the nine states and in all the states the prospective leaders are vying with each other to prove their loyalty to the High Command. But the High Command knows and during the last months has clearly realised that only loyalty will not do. The question of tact, efficiency and acceptability will also have to be considered. Recently, Sanjay is reported to have commented : 'Nobody is my man. Like any other organisation our Party would also like to select the right person for the right job'. The main question is : Who is the right person?

No doubt, efficiency will be considered. The Congress (I) will have to run the state governments and the country. The problems are vast and the situation is very complicated and tense. No single leader, however, efficient he or she may be, can tackle this situation alone. Efficient assistants and helping hands are needed. But, in spite of this, loyalty and reliability will also be important factors during the selection of Chief Ministers and Central Ministers in the month of May. The High Command would not definitely like to boost anyone (however efficient he may be) who may try to harm them in future or may change sides in the question of succession.

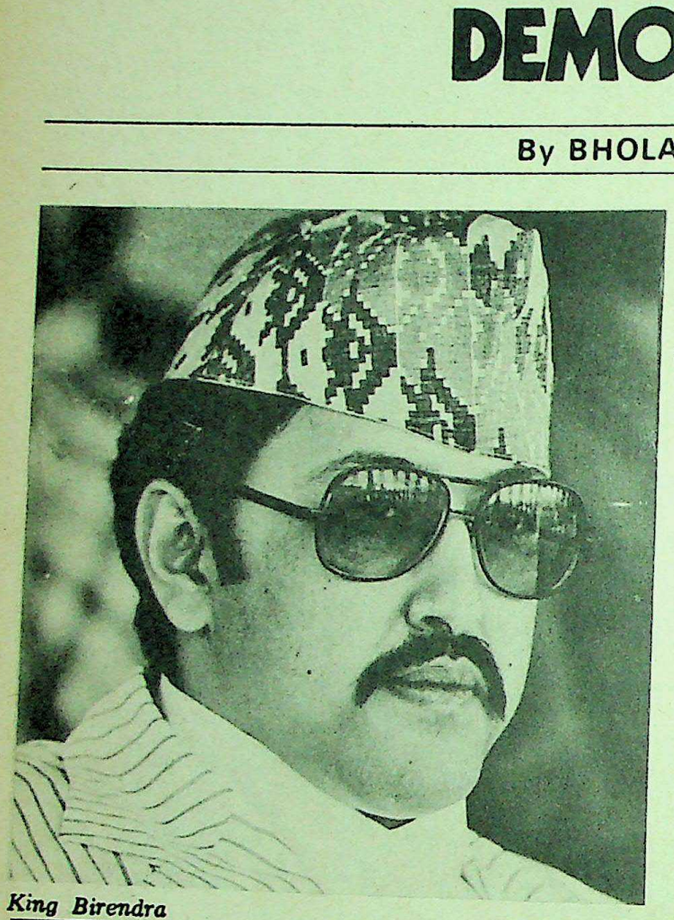
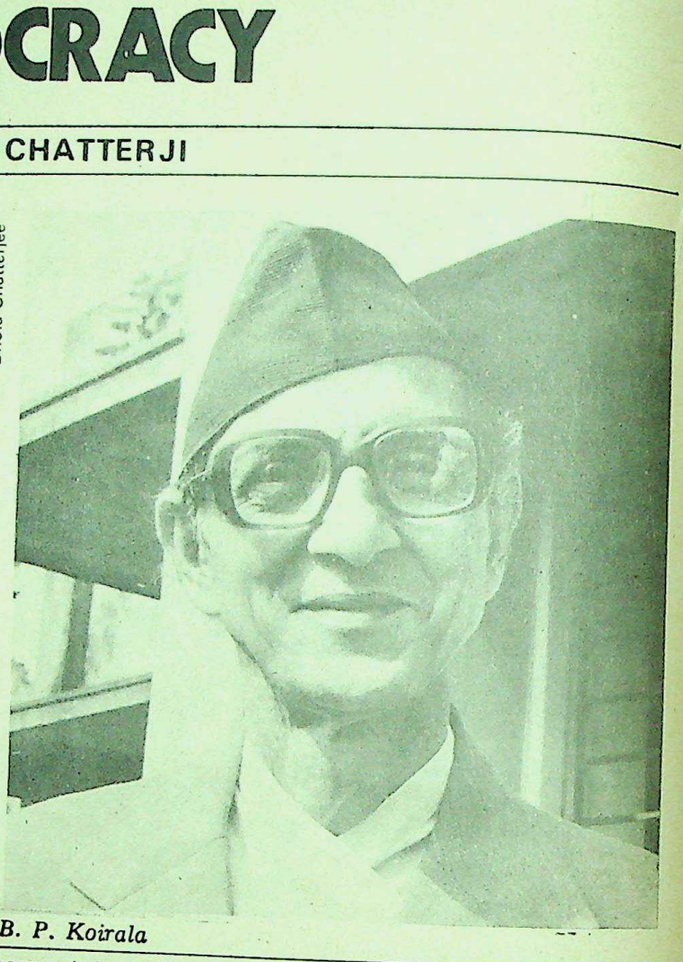
NEPAL: RE-ENTER DEMOCRACY

By BHOLA CHATTERJI



Bhola Chatterjee

King Birendra



B. P. Koirala

IN another few days, May 2, to be precise, the people of Nepal would troop to the polls to decide whether the authoritarian Partyless panchayat or a multi-Party system of polity should rule the country. For the first time in the history of the country 72 lakh voters would on the basis of universal adult franchise participate in a national referendum the significance of which could hardly be overstated. Even a cursory glance at the Nepalese political scene would leave no room for doubt that 1980 is destined to be a turning-point in the kingdom's contemporary history. If 1950 was a watershed in the life of the people, 1980 is most likely to determine whether Nepal would remain a single political entity or break up into as many mutually hostile political units as there are ethnic and linguistic groups.

The battle lines have been drawn, contending passions aroused and the aspirants for the electorate's sanction are grimly biding their time to make or mar things. And that in the name of the King, country and welfare of the nation. A bloody revolution catapulted Nepal into the 20th century in 1950, it is now set to make up for two lost decades through yet another revolution, albeit by consent. Sounds paradoxical? No reason why it should if one takes a close look at the men who are in the limelight, all the circumstances and, of course, the dumb multitude that drags an existence which holds out little hope and no promise.

By common consent the Eton-Harvard-Tokyo-educated 34-year-old King Birendra Bir Bikram Shah Dev, tenth in the line of the Shah dynasty founded by Prithvi Narayan Shah, and 65-year-old former, first and so far last elected Prime Minister, Bishweshwar Prasad Koirala, are the two men who matter most in the life of the ruggedly beautiful land of the Himalayas. On a collison course until recently, the two are now in a rapport that not a few look askance at. The responsive relations between King Birendra and Koirala are at once the most puzzling and reassuring factor in the Nepalese equation, depending on which side of the fence one is.

At the time Koirala, the undisputed leader of the now technically banned (the panchayat system forbids the existence of political Parties) Nepali Congress, made the 1950-51 revolution, King Birendra was an infant. His grandfather, the late King Tribhuvan, was virtually a prisoner in the hands of Mohan Shumsher, the last of the hereditary Rana Prime Ministers who despotically ruled Nepal for a century. King Tribhuvan cast in his lot with the Koirala-led democratic forces to rid the country of the stranglehold Rana feudalism had put on it as well as to liberate the institution of monarchy. Between then and King Birendra's accession to the throne in January 1972, following the death of his father King Mahendra who had sent Nepalese democracy to the block, the political situation had undergone a sea-change. The Palace, which had assumed absolute power, was locked in a fierce struggle with Koirala who was determined to restore Nepal to democracy.

For better or worse the developments since have facilitated the initiation of a meaningful dialogue between King Birendra and Koirala. This has eventually encouraged them to identify the areas of agreement regarding the basic problem of Nepalese politics—restitution of democratic government to the people. Much to the chagrin of the Partyless panchayat faithfuls and even some of his own friends, Koirala's repeated emphasis has in recent times been on two points: (a) King Birendra's bona fides are not suspect; (b) the need for effective cooperation between the Palace and the people to get the country back on the rails. As Koirala recently said at a referendum rally in Bhairahwa, the kingdom would not be able to come to grips with the crisis that confronted it unless democratic rule was re-established. Equally true was the fact that neither democracy nor monarchy would survive without mutual cooperation. More, he emphasized, in the given context "monarchy's role in nation-building is paramount". He has at the same time cautioned whoever would care to listen that since "monarchy is an institution acceptable to all...it should not be involved in any controversy".

THIS was no music in the panchayat exponent's ear. The advocates of the Partyless panchayat democracy, an evident contradiction in terms, have been continually harping on the note that it enjoys the King's unreserved support. For the system is the only effective answer to the kingdom's problem of politics. Through public speeches, Press statements and cleverly manipulated reports in The Rising Nepal the country's only government-owned English language daily, broad hints are given to the gullible that, whatever might have been the developments since the King's referendum announcement on May 24 last year, the Palace counts on them to pull it off. With crude cunning the panchayat camp exploits every available forum to sell the line that the Palace and the panchayat system are but two sides of the same coin. In fact the security and safety of the Crown and the country are inseparably linked up with the continuance of the panchayat system. As former nominated Prime Minister Tulsi Giri, one of the most sharp operators in the panchayat camp, put it some days ago, "threat to it (Nepal's national interest), if any, would come, not from outside, but from fifth columnists such as the banned Nepali Congress".

Taken at their face value the raucous cries of the panchayat promoters would suggest that a favourable referendum verdict is a foregone conclusion. Tap any of the senior panchayat leaders, for instance, Matrika Prasad Koirala (elder half-brother of B. P. Koirala), Kirtinidhi Bista, Tulsi Giri, Nagendra Prasad Rijal (all former nominated Prime Ministers) and the present Prime Minister, Surya Bahadur Thapa, and he would reel off a fantastic volume of statistical data to establish that the Partyless panchayat sysem inheres in it all the virtures and none of the vices of every conceivable brand of democratic polity.

Their argument is that King Mahendra had introduced the panchayat system "because nationalism and democracy were difficult to maintain under a multi-Party system". Tulsi Giri would go a step further, convinced as he is that nothing is unfair in war and love, and assert that "the panchayat system was peculiar to the Nepalese people and was not less democratic than the democratic system obtaining in any of the rich countries". Comments are unnecessary, considering that it will not be very easy to find Giri's peer even among amoral panchayat promoters who habitually make a virtue of political opportunism.

Talking of Giri, one cannot help mentioning that few Nepalese politicians can match his capacity for rationalizing even the most blatant act of perfidy and personal aggrandizement. More than once he has been the country's nominated Prime Minister only to be given the sack for mucking up matters, internal as well as external. Until recently he was under a cloud for his alleged involvement in what is known as the "carpet scandal"—a multi-million rupee export racket that made a great stir in the country. The former Prime Minister had maintained a low profile since the May 24 referendum declaration last year. Giri is reported to have told some politicians that, as soon as he would able to get himself absolved from the "carpet scandal", he would expose all about the graft, corruption and misuse of public money men in high places indulged in. Not only that, he would spare no pains to unhinge the Partyless panchayat system which was a "fraud" on the people. Most panchayat leaders hold that Giri who cuts up rough at little or no provocation and who reportedly enjoys the support of the now disbanded Rastrawadi Vidhyarthi Mandal, an outfit of fanatically panchayat supporting musclemen, is indeed a thorn in their flesh. But there is little they could do about it, for Giri has patrons who are too powerful to be touched.

THAT the panchayat camp is a house divided against itself is not exactly news. Unlike Alexander Dumas's Three Musketeers, every one of the senior panchayat leaders stands for himself, for the Palace's patronage, for personal power and all that goes with it. Matrika Prasad, otherwise a suave person, is a panchayat campaigner not because he has convinced himself that the system is based on sound principles and guarantees a cure for what ails the country. After all, he was president of the Nepali Congress at the time of the 1950-51 revolution; and he could not possibly have unlearnt all the lessons of history he had learnt the hard way. But then, lack of will to undergo suffering and make sacrifice, the desire for power and the good life plus family conflict have landed him in the company of men not one of whom would hesitate to consign him to limb when it comes to the crunch.

Matrika Prasad is not unaware of this. He is also alive to the fact that he could never occupy the Prime Minister's chair unless the Palace desired it and that his panchayat colleagues would oppose him severally and collectively. And he is aware that the present Prime Minister would feel no qualms about deserting the panchayat camp should the referendum verdict go in favour of the multi-Party system.

In terms of resources, however, the panchayat camp is apparently very firm on its legs. Knowledgeable sources confirm that the panchayat propagandists have so far collected about (Nepalese) rupees (100 Indian rupees-145 Nepalese rupees) one crore fifty lakh. Others apart, the panchayat camp is aided and abetted by all manner of vested interests, not excluding a sizable number of former Ranas, landed interests, businessmen and those who have during the 19-year panchayat rule benefitted by their active association with the system. It would not do to suggest that the system has no committed supporters. It has and the bulk of them are from the officially constituted network of basic panchayat units in the rural and urban areas.

It is a hard fact that the panchayat camp also has allies in the royal family, King Birendra excluded. Some very influential members of the sprawling royal family, who control between them the most sensitive and complex segments of the administrative apparatus, have a high stake, both political and economic, in the authoritarian system. Small wonder that nothing would stop them from throwing a spanner in the works. And the ramified organizational structure the panchayat system has spawned over the years, particularly in the remote hill areas where the 20th century still has a tenuous foothold, would be of considerable help to the anti-democratic forces. Intrigues and conspiratorial politics, exploitation, physical violence and the nearly total absence of any effective opposition have generated a climate of fear and fatalism. Continuous drumming on the point that the institution of monarchy and the panchayat system are indissolubly interlinked has not gone to waste. Could it be denied that until the other day King Birendra was the most eloquent champion of the panchayat system.

The picture has another side. The panchayat camp no longer enjoys the King's active patronage. Not that the King has suddenly grown tired of exercising absolute power. Rather a combination of factor has obliged him not to ignore the writing on the wall. He knows it quite well that a section of panchayat hardliners and externally inspired forces of destabilization had a hand in the arson and violence that rocked Kathmandu last May. Neither is he in the dark about the aspirations of some of his close relations, not to speak of their extensive financial interests. Also, if Iran reminds of the tragedy that might befall a tripping monarch.

Koirala's words and deeds assure him that the democrats form a dike between anarchy and the institution of monarchy. He is convinced that Koirala is not talking for effect when he says that the Palace and the people must pull together for an effective response to both internal and external challenges.

Of the numerous other factors which are likely to queer the panchayat camp's pitch, the blighted economy is certainly a major one. The performance of the economy in the last two decades has been generally indifferent and, at times, positively counter-productive. In spite of the steady inflow of fairly large quantum of foreign aid and assistance, reasonable mobilization of local resources, elaborate planning and what have you, the economy has refused to oblige the panchayat administration. If official economic experts who are wonted to making understatements, for instance, Y. P. Pant, call the economy "unsatisfactory" others would say that it is in downright bad shape. The fact that Nepal, which has all along been exporting food, "seemed likely", as Lok Raj Baral put it, to be converted "into a food importing country" speaks volumes for the difficult state of the economy. The panchayat government's management of the economy is a sad account of utter inefficiency, wasted opportunities and wrong priorities, of acts of malfeasance and misfeasance. It seems the economic policy formulators do not even have an understanding of the cruel problem of poverty that smites the people. The acting president of the Nepali Congress, Krishna Prasad Bhattarai, is not far from wrong when he says that the 19-year panchayat rule has only increased the already massive volume of poverty and unemployment. As he said at a Pokhara Bar Association meet recently, "the rich had become richer and the poor poorer under the panchayat system".

To illustrate the point, five families, not of Nepalese origin, have, during panchayat rule, literally climbed from rags to riches. They are still making their pile, thanks to the highly profitable two-way traffic between them and the panchayat leaders. And where the poverty line gets drawn is anybody's guess. The economic stagnation is much too severe to escape even the most superficial observer's notice. Soaring prices, a shrinking employment market and nil growth rate indeed would not help narrow the panchayat camp's widening credibility gap.

IF cowardice is infectious, courage is perhaps more so. For proof, just step into the Nepali Congress' office at Ranipokhari. With each day that passes, increasing numbers of people from almost every walk of life come there to identify themselves with the democratic forces. Streams of young men and women, their eyes sparkling with hope, come there every day for guidelines and material assistance that the leaders might give them. Their requests are modest; campaign literature, posters and strips of blue cloth—blue happens to be the election colour allotted to the multi-Party camp. More often then not they draw a blank, for the Party coffers are always empty. A few words of encouragement, instructions to make do with locally collected resources are all that Krishna Prasad spares the young idealists before ordering them to remote areas, to reach some of which might require quite a few days' trekking.

The Nepali Congress, its long years in the wilderness notwithstanding, has a large cadre of committed workers. Its organisational base, however, is not as strong as might be desired. To make up for this there is the charismatic Koirala who projects a picture of quiet confidence. He has no doubt about the outcome of the referendum; and he firmly believes that King Birendra will not break his word. As he sees it, the lingering shreds of suspicion, if any, have been dispelled by the King's grant of general amesty. Which, in fact, has put the panchayat camp at a disadvantage and done the democrats a good turn. It may not be irrelevant here to touch on other groups and individuals that have made common cause with the democratic forces. For instance, Dilli Raman Begmi, along with former Prime Ministers Tanka Prasad Acharya and K. I. Singh. Besides, there are the communist groups, both pro-Beijing and pro-Moscow. True, numerically and otherwise the pro-Moscow communists led by Keshar Jung Rayamjhi count for little. But this does not apply to the group that functions under Monmohan Adhikari's leadership. Founder of the communist movement in Nepal, Adhikari is said to be the leader of one of the pro-Beijing groups. The fact of the matter is that Adhikari, who is Beijing oriented, is the only Nepa i communist leader with a certain following. Admitting his friendly attitude toward China, Adhikari tol me, in no uncertain terms, that he was first and last a Nepal patriot and that the point at issue currently was not communism but the restoration of democracy. In the circumstances, the only course open to him was to work for the success of the multi-Party camp, of which, Adhikari readily conceded, Koirala was the unrivalled leader. That is why he chose to cooperate with the Nepali Congress.

This is not to suggest that the Nepali Congress will just romp through the referendum. It is hamstrung by forces and factors that just cannot be wished away. Relentless persecution and suffering over a two-decade long period have not left the Party unscathed. Dogged, almost all along by the interminable process of fission, fusion and fission, it is certainly in no position to claim that it is as purposefully united today as it was when it won, hands down, the country's first general elections in 1959. Lack of resources, intra-Party conflict and, above all, the large gaps in the leadership chain have had their adverse effect. Could it be denied that the distance, albeit in terms of leadership qualities, between Koirala and the rest is much too great? Another complicating factor is the presence of the big powers. They are not disinterested onlookers; each has its own set of reasons to take more than merely an academic interest in the goings-on in Nepal. It is just that some do it brazenly while others prefer to act on the sly. This is something the democrats can hardly afford to ignore.

Be that as it may, it does not call for much inside knowledge to say that things will never be the same again in Nepal, irrespective of the referendum verdict. Even if the panchayat group gets through, the kingdom will not revert to the authoritarian system it suffered from these past two decades. For that matter, a carbon-copy of the Westminster variety of Parliamentary framework will not immediately become operative should the people opt for the multi-Party system. But one thing is sure and it is that post-referendum Nepal, no matter what nomenclature its political system might adopt, will have no more than two alternatives to choose from. Either its political system must depend for its survival on the people, ensuring their participation in the decision-making process, or it must brace itself to meet the challenge of the forces of disruption and disintegration. King Birendra knows it, so does Koirala. Which, in a way, explains why the two are talking on nearly identical wavelengths. ■

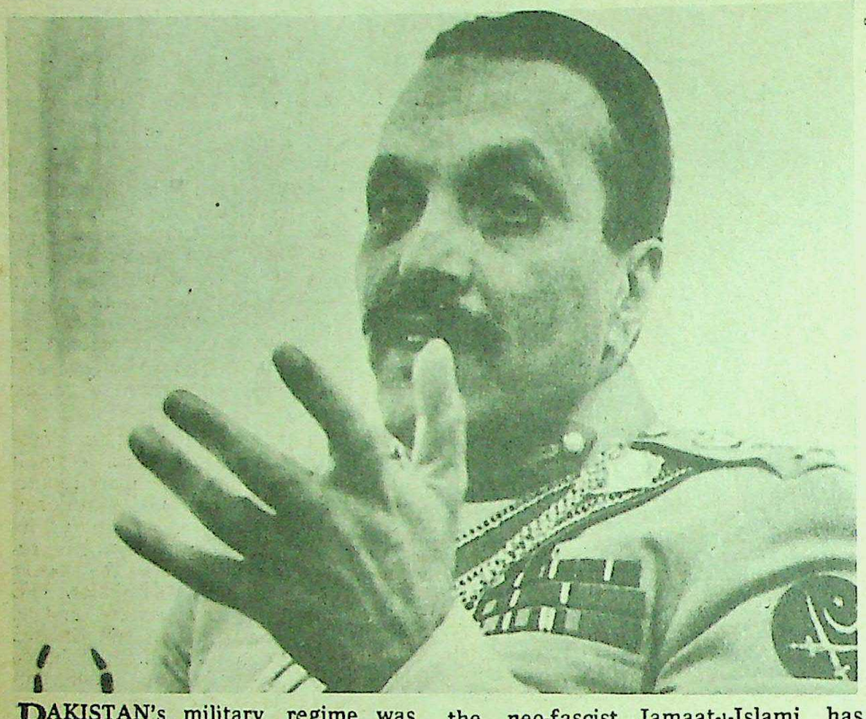
Move over Zia

But who will take his place ?



— Raghu Rai

PAKISTAN's military regime was never regarded as a stable political enterprise in any major capital, with possible exception of Peking. The Chinese leaders have, over the past two decades, amply demonstrated their fondness for Pakistan's uniformed Presidents, but even they must now be developing serious doubts about Zia's viability. Developments in Pakistan over the last month indicate that the dictator's isolation is virtually complete. The General is more unpopular than he was at the time of Bhutto's execution a year ago. Undoubtedly aware of this fact, he recently told Pakistani journalists: "I am not a know-all. There are many Pakistanis who are abler than I, who are more capable than I, more competent than I. They must come at the right time to take off from where I leave. But I must leave at the proper place and not just run away". The fact of the matter is that the overwhelming majority of the country believes that there is no time like the present for the General to depart. Zia's refusal to share power gradually isolated him from the right-wing political Parties. Many of these have lost all credibility for having collaborated with the military in the first place. In reality they were cynically utilised by the Generals who felt the need for a modicum of civilian support in the period leading up to Bhutto's execution. Their services were dispensed with soon afterwards. Today even the neo-fascist Jamaat-i-Islami has withdrawn its support and called for a civilian Government.

The new crisis is clearly a result of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. Zia was confronted with a real dilemma. The fact that hatred for his regime is almost universal inside Pakistan meant that he could not utilise the Soviet intervention to win mass support. The response of the Pakistani people to Afghanistan has been extremely muted. Many of Zia's opponents cherish the hope that the Red Army might solve their problems with a quick thrust onward to Islamabad. In private they will even say so. Immediately after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, the Pentagon and the US wanted to transform Pakistan into a US military base. This display of indecent haste further limited Zia's options. A regime as unpopular and unrepresentative as his could not afford a decision which might further inflame public opinion. So the US plan was rejected on the grounds that the £ 175 million being offered was 'peanuts'. At the same time Pakistani civil servants made it known to the United States that most of the aid should, in any event, be routed through China, which was still regarded as the country's 'oldest ally'. The State Department was displeased and talk of replacing Zia began to be heard in the corridors. Aware of what was taking place, the desperate dictator threw out some feelers to the Soviet Union. He offered to allow mutually agreed inspection teams to be stationed on the Pak-Afghan border and stressed Pakistan's commitment to 'non-alignment'. The Cuban Foreign Minister recently visited Pakistan to assess the situation, but Moscow itself has yet to respond to the overtures.

Between 14 and 17 March there was a half-baked attempt at a coup designed to topple Zia. It failed and a Chinese military delegation in the country led by Xiao Ke, Vice-Minister of Defence, pledged in public support 'as ever' the struggle of Pakistan 'and its armed forces' to safeguard the country. Zia dismissed two of his senior military colleagues and appointed six new Lieutenant-Generals. The two dismissed men, General Faiz Ali Chishti and Ghulam Hassan, were relieved of their military commands and dismissed from the Federal Cabinet. General Chishti had been the mastermind behind the coup which toppled Bhutto in July 1977. An extremely aggressive and self-confident officer, he had clearly chafed at the succession of mistakes made by Zia. General Ghulam Hassan, a Pathan General, was the Co-ordinator of the Intelligence Services and third most powerful General in the country.

Some weeks prior to his removal, Chishti had visited North America and Britain. While in London he had been unusually frank in informal discussions with Pakistanis resident in London. He stated that Zia was a disaster for the country ; that his incessant lies were an embarrassment to the military; that the army was in a demoralised state and "I've reached the end of my patience". Whether Chishti was being groomed to take over from Zia by the US State Department is an open question, but American journalists had evinced a remarkable interest in his movements since last December. Chishti remained confident even after his removal. A friend who rang him from London and asked what he intended to do was told : 'I'm at least the elected President of the Rawalpindi Golf Club !"

The break-up of the unity of the top echelons of the army is the strongest manifestation yet of the crisis afflicting Pakistan. Zia is seen as a liability by the United States. But who can replace him ? Another coup would not necessarily improve matters, though it might provide a bridge to the leadership of Bhutto's People's Party, which would win a majority in any election. But an election could prove to be an expensive gamble. It would unleash a set of mass mobilisation and in Baluchistan it would return a nationalist Government.

The cigarette war

Smoking injures the vendors, too

Dharna of cigarette retailers opposite the Municipal Corporation

"NEXT time you stop to buy a packet of cigarettes, think about the poor vendor's economic exploitation at the hands of manufacturers. Come to think of it, the courteous vendor is obliging the owners of cigarette industry. What does the vendor get in return for selling the cigarettes? Hardly anything; eight paise as gross pront on a packet means a daily gross income of only Rs 16 if a vendor sells as many as 200 packets. And most vendors don't sell as many as 200 packets; they subsist on the sales of bidi, pan matchboxes and cold drinks. This is grave injustice and we decided to do something about it", the organising secretary of the Mumbai Bidi-Tambakhu Vyapari Sangh, Mr Harishchandra Shetye, told SUNDAY.

To press their demands, the Sangh launched an indennite strike on April 4 and ever since not a single vendor in Bombay has reportedly traded in cigarettes. Till the time of going to press, there has been no perceptible softening of stands on either side—the 14,500 vendors represented by the Mumbai Bidi-Tambakhu Vyapari Sangh and the cigarette manufacturers by the Cigarette Manufacturers' Association. A compromise seems to have been ruled out and each side is apparently waiting for the other to surrender. The prelude to the strike was the dharna outside the factories of the two major cigarette manufacturers in the city—Golden Tobacco and Godfrey Phillips on March 27.

The Sangh's most important demand is that the commission for vendors must be raised to 15 per cent of a cigarette packet's market price and the wholesalers be given a commission of 2.5 per cent. If and when the cigarette manufacturers accept this formula it would mean a gross profit of 37.5 paise for the vendor and 6.5 paise for the wholesaler on a packet of cigarettes priced at Rs 2.50. The Sangh has communicated its demand to all the five principal cigarette manufacturers; Godfrey Phillips, ITC, Golden Tobacco, National Tobacco and the Vazir Sultan Tobacco company.

The Mumbai Bidi-Tambakhu Vyapari Singh was founded in 1968 under the leadership of George Fernandes who was responsible for initiating trade union movements in other fields too. The office bearers of the Sangh contend that over the years, cigarette vendors and wholesallers have been treated very shabbily by cigarette manufacturers. The prices of cigarettes have skyrocketed during the last decade but the vendors' commission has remained static. According to the Sangh organisers, the Government should have intervened in the matter long ago and brought an end to the "unpardonable and savage exploitation". Ashok Vaikul, the Sangh's secretary and the owner of a small cigarette shop in Bombay told SUNDAY: "We were agitating for some sort of common commission that is, trying to get for ourselves something akin to what the Government gives for all essential commodities. For instance, the grain and groceries retailers get 15 per cent. Also, lottery sellers get 15 per cent and the retailers of non-essential items like liquor get as much as 35 per cent as commission. Despite the fact that cigarettes are luxury items, on an average we only get six per cent as commission". A cigarette vendor told SUNDAY: "What I earn as commission is shameful. After sitting in the cigarette stall for more than 14 hours every day, we can't earn more than Rs 10. This is the gross profit. From this sum we have to substract the establishment cost, among other things. Eventually, our net income works out to less than Rs 9 every day".

Ashok Vaikul is confident about the success of the strike in Bombay. He says: "We first gave the manufacturers an eight-day ultimatum to amend their rates of commissions. They did nothing. So we did what we had said we would. Since the strike not a single cigarette pack has been lifted from any of Bombay's cigarette manufacturers. We are fortunate in one way. Since smokers found it impossible to buy cigarettes, they switched over to bidis where our commission is considerably higher, between 30 and 35 per cent. We have the strength to see this strike through".

The Sangh has now taken up the task of taking their struggle to other parts of the country. A delegation of Sangh workers came to Calcutta in the third week of April and organised a meeting which was attended by a large number of wholesalers and vendors. The Sangh proposes to organise a strike in Calcutta while the Sangh office bearers who had travelled from Bombay told SUNDAY in Calcutta: "We are happy with the response we received. We shall soon go to Delhi and Ahmedabad to meet cigarette vendors and wholesalers". On March 22, the group left for Ahmedabad.

Calcutta has roughly one lakh vendors, most of them without a proper licence issued by Corporation authorities. The initial investment is paltry enough to attract a large number of unemployed people. As a matter of fact, Calcutta is the largest cigarette selling centre in eastern India. ITC dominates the market in the region and the vendors and wholesalers are yet to form a proper union.

The Mumbai Bidi-Tambakhu Vyapari Sangh recently won a small battle against cigarette manufacturers. Sometime ago, ITC launched Classic, a luxury brand priced at Rs 10 but the vendors in Bombay refused to sell it unless they were given 15 per cent as commission. ITC did not agree to this demand and as a result vendors did not sell Classic. On the other hand, Golden Tobacco agreed to dish out a 15 per cent commission on their new product Panama Prince. As a result of this, cigarette vendors are making 28 paise as profit on every Panama Prince pack. The Sangh is also responsible for boosting the sales of Sivakasi match boxes in and around Bombay at the expense of Wimco. Sharad Rao, the Singh's president says that the movement of cigarette vendors will soon become a national phenomenon.

R. A. Poddar, chief executive advisor of Godfrey Phillips is bitterly critical of what the Cigarette Manufacturers' Association (CMA) calls "blackmail" on the part of vendors. He told SUNDAY in Bombay: "You have to remember that the vendors have made absolutely no investment—at one time we calculated that their annual profit on investment works out to over 740 per cent. Most of the vendors are selling the cigarettes at inflated rates and earning 1,500 per cent as profits in the process. And why are vendors in Bombay alone demanding larger commission? All over the country vendors get a standard 6 per cent commission".

It however appears that the movement will soon have the country in its grip. Unless a compromise is reached, in the near future smokers of all shades will face an acute cigarette famine. In Bombay, most middle class and lower middle class customers have already switched over to bidis.

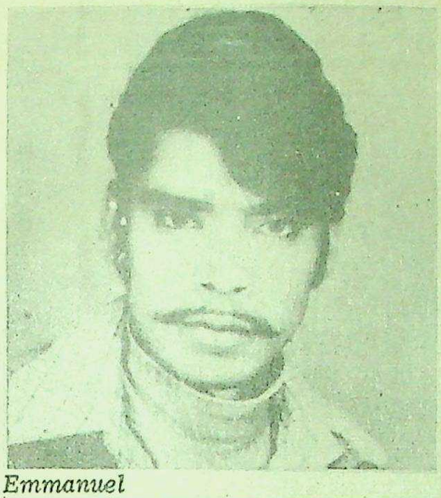
What was Emmanuel's crime?

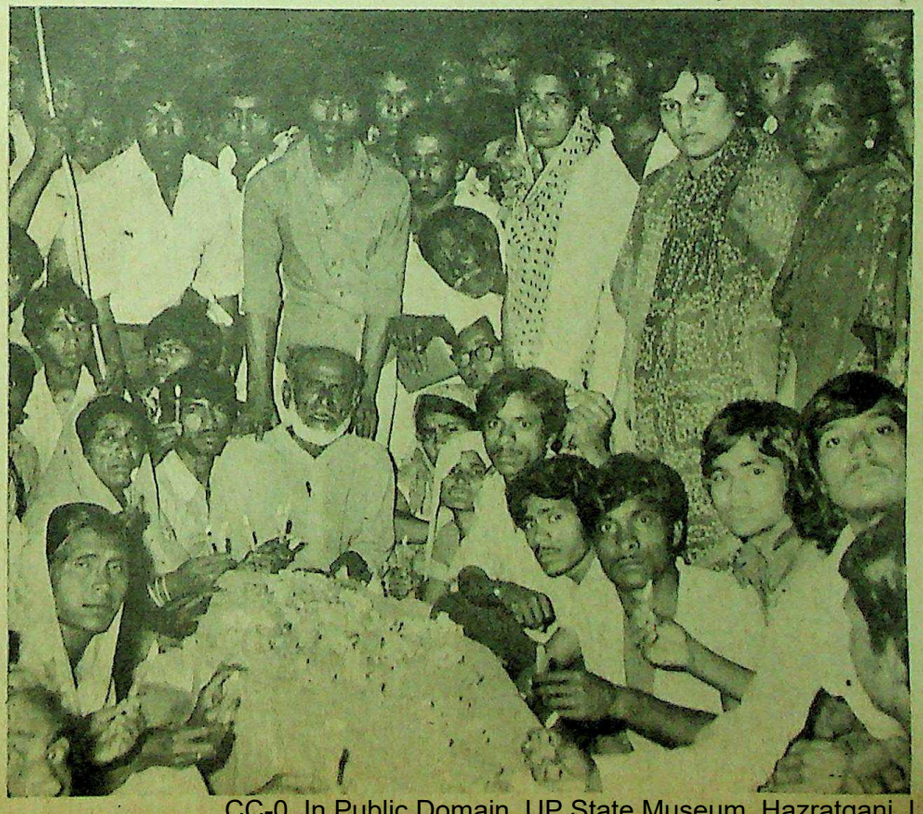
A case of no clues



Emmanuel

ON the morning of March 29, Emmanuel Williams, 22, finished his bath, got ready and left his home for Mehta Export, the factory where he worked. On the way he stopped at a tea stall near his house at Moor Lines, Delhi Cantonment, to have a cup of tea. Even before he could get his cup of tea, he suddenly felt a hand on his shoulder. He turned around and saw constable Vijay Pal Singh, standing next to him. Before he realised what was happening he was whisked away to the Delhi Cantonment police station for interrogation. The reason: he was suspected to be involved in the kidnapping of a girl, Raj, who had been missing for the last two days. Raj, a 14-year-old girl, and daughter of Jaipal Singh, a gate keeper at Palam cinema worked as a maid servant in a nearby locality. On March 27, she went out for shopping but never returned. To this date her whereabouts are unknown. Anxious about what had happened to his daughter, Jaipal Singh went to the Delhi Cantonment police station and lodged a complaint. He, however, did not file an FIR until March 31, wherein he stated that he suspected that Emmanuel might be involved in the kidnapping of his daughter. Sometime back he had found a photograph of Emmanuel in the possession of Raj. Suspecting that they were having an affair, he had admonished her. Further, he said that on the day his daughter disappeared, some people had seen Emmanuel around the locality where he lived. In the meanwhile, according to D. F. Williams, Emmanuel's father, word had got around that the police had taken away his son. He waited throughout the day for him to come back home. When finally, till the evening he did not return, he went to the police station to inquire. There he found his son in police custody, sitting in a corner and weeping after being subjected to torture. A similar pattern developed in the following days. Either on his way to work, or while returning from work, Emmanuel would be picked up by the police, interrogated and then released. Emmanuel would return home a broken boy and tell his father the torture he had gone through.

The dead body of Emmanuel



Helpless at what was happening, D. F. Williams, finally approached Mrs Vimal Nagi, an ex-Metropolitan Councillor and Member of the Contonment Board for help and advice. On April 8, Mrs Nagi, after hearing the story went to the police station and met the Station House Officer. She also saw Emmanuel in the police lock-up who, she said, on seeing her said: "The police will kill me, they won't leave me. Please help me get out of here". Once again, that night Emmanuel was released. But this did not stop his plight. Emmanuel's father said that every day the boy was taken for interrogation and he returned home in a bad condition. On April 11, too, Emmanuel was taken for interrogation by the police at around 4 in the evening. And the same day after a couple of hours, Emmanuel was found lying by the roadside about a 100 yards from his house, in an unconscious state, frothing at the mouth. Immediately, D. F. Williams's neighbours contacted him. He rushed to the spot and took his son to the cantonment general hospital. The doctors at the hospital referred the case to the Safdargunj hospital, where Emmanuel was admitted in the emergency ward. At no stage, despite the repeated beatings, could the police extract a statement from Emmanuel saying that he was involved in the kidnapping. For five days he battled for life, all the while unconscious and in a state of coma, unable to utter a word. On April 16, at 3.30 pm he died, without having issued any statement. Before his body was released, a post mortem was conducted.

That evening Emmanuel's body was brought to Moor Lines, to his home and was put in a coffin. By this time word of Emmanuel's death had spread and tempers got inflamed. Relatives, friends and neighbours who were aware of the police beating decided to take the body in a procession to the police station. With cries of "Khooni police hai, hai" (murderer police, shame, shame) and "Baccha mar diya, hai, hai" (they have killed a child, shame, shame), the procession proceeded to the police station. Most of those in the procession carried black flags and some had even draped themselves with black shawls. As the procession reached the police station and people refused to move, the SP and the ASP arrived. A. M. Das, the general secretary of the Air Force Civilian Workers Union, who was leading the procession along with Mrs Vimal Nagi, then explained the situation to the senior police officials, who assured them that the matter would be looked into. Finally, after a four-hour long dharna, and after the assurance had been given, the body was taken to the cantonment cemetery and Emmanuel's body was laid to rest in the presence of senior police officials. Subsequently, police personnel, Vijay Pal Singh and Naval Singh involved in the interrogation, have been suspended pending an inquiry.

Though no final medical report has been made out, according to the post-mortem report a greenish substance was found in Emmanuel's stomach and it is claimed that he died due to some unknown poisoning. But the real cause of the death will be announced after the examination of the viscera. The medical report also says that no signs of external injury were found on the body of Emmanuel. But it is common knowledge that police beating does not always leave marks on the body. And as a police officer admitted, "He was given beatings, but not third degree ones".

According to Mrs Vimal Nagi: "The police tortured him so much that he probably decided to commit suicide. He could not take the torture any more. After all, if every day you are tortured without any hope of the beating ending, then what do you do?" Emmanuel's father suspects foulplay, and as he told this reporter, "It was because of the police that he died. I can tell you, my son was innocent". There are some interesting facts, however. Though the police, on the basis of the information given by Jaipal Singh, suspect that Emmanuel did have a hand in the disappearence of Raj, they did not either arrest or officially keep him in police custody. Yet, they regularly brought him over for police interrogation and kept him for considerably long periods of time. Secondly, there seems to be a contradiction as far as the number of occasions on which Emmanuel was interrogated is concerned. Though the police authorities should have a record of the exact number of times on which a person is interrogated the statement issued by them says: "Emmanuel was called for interrogation to the police station three or four times". Emmanuel's relatives and neighbours, however, say that he was called for interrogation virtually every day. The police are also singularly tight-lipped and defensive on this issue. "An inquiry is on and therefore we are in no position to say anything. It is only after the inquiry is over that the facts will emerge," said Dr K. K. Paul, SP, South Delhi. But the police maintain that they had no hand whatsoever in Emmanuel's death.

The police maintain that they see no reason why they would be involved as no complaint was made against the police between April 11 and 16 and say that the matter was politicised after the death of Emmanuel. But as Emmanuel's father said: "At that time we were more bothered about saving the life of my son. We did not even think of complaining against anyone." Again, the police say that they got to know of Emmanuel's condition only when the Safdargunj hospital authorities informed them that it was a medico-legal case of suspected poisoning. What the police, however, admit is that "some irregularities were found in the investigation of the case" as a result of which two police personnel were suspended. The nature of the irregularities they refuse to reveal. The "irregularities" are being investigated by Additional Deputy Commissioner of Police, Mr Sewa Dass. Whatever may be the cause of Emmanuel's death, his father will now be without his only son. Shortly after his death, a delegation was led to the Lt Governor's house and Mr M. S. Jagmohan has promised to pay compensation for his death. But will that compensate for the loss of his only support during his old age?

SAUMITRA BANERJEE, Delhi

Isle of discontent

SIX years back when the Indian Government gave away a tiny, uninhabited island of Kachatheevu, situated in the Palk Strait, to Sri Lanka, the fishermen of Rameshwaram were not really happy. The island which contains a small chapel of St. Anthony, where a big feast is held annually, was once the personal property of the Raja of Ramnad. Since Sri Lanka claimed it, Mrs Gandhi who was keen on building up better relationship with the Sri Lanka Government handed over the island. But with certain conditions. The annual St. Anthony's festival was to go on, and pilgrims from India would not be asked to show passports or visas. Also, Sri Lankan and Indian fishermen would be allowed to fish in the "traditional" waters. This small condition which seemed so innocent then has become a bone of contention over the last years. The situation in Rameshwaram today is quite grim and thousands of Indian fishermen who fish around the island are living in constant fear. Franklin Rayon, one of the more articulate fishermen leaders told me that from "time immemorial" Indian fishermen have been fishing in waters beyond Kachatheevu. "The waters around Rameshwaram hardly produce any fish. So our fishermen used to go beyond Kachatheevu island, fish for the lucrative prawns, rest on the island for some time and then return to Sri Rameshwaram", he explained. "Sri Lanka fishermen didn't really object to this, never mind the small quarrels and misunderstandings occuring now and then. For the waters around Kachatheevu offer good prawns throughout the year."

But once the island was handed over to Sri Lanka, the situation became "terrible" for the Rameshwaram fishermen. "The Lanka authorities allowed the feast of St. Anthony to continue, and pilgrims from Sri Lanka continued visiting the shrine, but the Indian fishermen always felt unwanted on the island during the week-long festival which takes place in March". More than 30,000 "pilgrims" from both countries congregate on the barren island during this festival which is an excellent occasion for bartering and smuggling in-demand goods from both countries. "A couple of days before the festival this year the Lanka naval authorities seized 60 mechanised boats". continued Franklin Rayon, "and after seizing our prawns, asked us to go back —thanks to their rude behaviour and incautious approach, one of the mechanised boats was sunk". Rameshwaram fishermen claim that the Sri Lanka navalmen are only interested in pocketing the prawns which they would sell clandestinely through their friends. In fact their presence is resented even by the Lanka fishermen. For as their boats move around they destroy the nets of the Lanka fishermen".

Nearly 800 mechanised boats are engaged in the trade in Rameshwaram: a number of them are repatriates from Sri Lanka and had bought the boats through loans by Government agencies. "A number of boats have been lost in recent years due to the unpredictable cyclone and to make things worse, we are the victims to the Lanka navalmen's greed", complained P. A. Fernando, Secretary of the Rameshwaram Fishermen's Association. It is believed that each boat catches 10 kg of prawns on an average: each kg of prawn can fetch Rs 60 to Rs 80 in the export market. "Sri Lanka naval authorities are playing a hide-and-grab game", continued Franklin Rayon. "Some days they don't turn up. And then suddenly they appear, and order our fishermen to follow them. Of course, the situation today is not as bad as three or five years ago, when they used to take our fishermen to jails on the mainland and starve them for couple of days".

Leaders of the Rameshwaram fishermen told SUNDAY that when the going is good, prawns and other fishes worth Rs five lakhs are caught every day, but not even one fourth of it reaches the mainland. The Lanka naval authorities wait for such "fine, bountiful" days and then attack, it is alleged. "We do not have enough coast guards in this area. A couple of times when we got into 'trouble' with the Lanka authorities, the timely presence of our coast guards helped us immensely", explained Franklin Rayon. The fishermen are in contact with the Coast Guard (Eastern region), St. George Fort in Madras and are expecting a number of beneficial measures to be taken soon.

A TOP producer thought he was being very wise when he wanted to sign up Raakhee for a role in one of his overcrowded multistarrers. It was supposed to be a very "challenging" role and therefore the producer assumed that the star concerned would not demand a fabulous sum. The very name of the producer was supposed to make the star jump for the role. But Raakhee is not just another star—she is an individual who thinks. When she quoted her price, the man acted in typical, crude fashion. He told her that if she didn't agree to their price (peanuts) they would take the next plane to get another star and she would jump for it at half their offer! He thought the threat would force Raakhee into accepting his offer. On the contrary, it put her off completely!

SPURRED on by her films' success, Rekha has become bold and innovative. Like she did this Madras film with Kamalahasan when she found out that another South Indian sex-bomb, Kalpana Iyer was slated for that role. Never before had Rekha gone out to ask for roles, leave alone, one in a film from Madras. And now she has gone one step further to prove to Raakhee that she can also wear white in her hair

Yogita: Kishore Kumar's loss is Mithun's gain

Sital Das

Raakhee knows her price. Producers should know this like Raakhee did in Kabhi Kabhie and Tapasya. Good for Rekha; at least she is concentrating on her work.

NOW that the Kishore-Yogita divorce has come through, will it be long before Leena officially begins living with Kishore? And will it mean Mithun and Yogita tying the knot legally? Hope that doesn't upset the scales because Mithun is a rising star and marriage might tilt the balance unfavourably for him. Yogita, who was showing a bit of promise after her Kishore-marriage-fiasco, may again slip down. Why can't such girls (like Rekha and Parveen) who need to be constantly in love with a man stay that way—they make a hash out of their marriage, by hurrying their spouses into it unwillingly and then making a hash out of their careers by concentrating on other things besides their work!

WHAT started as a helpless undertaking might well turn out a money-spinning venture: Raakesh Roshan was helping out a friend who wanted to make a film, and then the friend backed out. So Raakesh made Aap ke Diwane and if the advance reports are to be trusted, the film should do very well. ■

EVEN during the "wet" years of Karunanidhi's regime, Madras was never notorious for the kind of film parties which take place in Bombay. In sharp contrast, such parties and get-togethers have become common today; sycophant journalists are shepherded into a safe hotel and their fantasies are irrigated by alcohol. Of late, some actors and actresses too are throwing "wet" parties in their hotel suites. And a heroine with a musical name organised one such binge but some of the journalists were reportedly annoyed as she kept the best booze for her producers and served second grade alcohol to the Press.

IN one of his forthcoming films Hitler Umanath, actor Sivaji Ganesan is shown wearing a Hitler-like mask. That may be the only connection the film has with Hitler. Years ago, Sivaji produced a film entitled Vietnam Veedu, a terrible melodrama about a house of perpetual conflicts. In one of the scenes from the script (which was also produced by Sivaji), he was heard saying: "My sons are never good to me but then why should I complain? After all even Gandhi's sons weren't faithful to him". Well, one of Gandhi's grandsons who's an IAS officer wrote a letter to Sivaji Ganesan correcting the observation. Sivaji promptly dropped the incorrect line from the script and didn't include it in the film too. Incidentally, of late, Sivaji is showing great aptitude for decorative titles. He has acted in General Chakravarthy, Justice Gopinath, Pilot Premnath, and now, Hitler Umanath. Suggested titles: Stalin Muthuchamy, Marshal Tito Manickam and Mountbatten Mannarsamy. Please note, PIOUSJI holds the copyright for these titles.

NOW that Kamalahasan is accepting assignments in Hindi (he has three Hindi films on hand), it's high time some enterprising producer remade his Tamil super hit Kalyana Raman. As the dim-wit Kalyanam, Kamalahasan was superb and the film pulled crowds solely because of him.

Recently when Madras Doordarshan announced that Kalyana Raman, would be telecast, dozens of letters, mostly from students, requested the Doordarshan authorities not to telecast the film during the examination season. And some "miscreant" (was it a student?) even telephoned the Doordarshan Kendra and announced that four bombs had been planted inside the building. The film was telecast according to schedule. Scores of police personnel combed the sprawling Doordarshan Kendra and realised after four hours that it was only a hoax.

HOW can we have yet another hero called Mohan when Lakshmi's actor-husband Mohan is still in the field? The makers of Nenjathai Killathey feel that Lakshmi's Mohan may not stage a come-back in Tamil films at all (we hear he has a couple of Malayalam films), and people have even forgotten his existence. As a matter of fact, he was never popular in Tamil films and hasn't acted in more than four Tamil films. And Mohan seems to be an intelligent and sensitive person. He avoids sticking to his wife's saree. When Lakshmi took up the direction of a Tamil-Kannada bilingual, she didn't even whisper her husband's name during the casting. When asked why she didn't do so, she quipped: "He just didn't suit that role"

SRIPRIYA's Natchathiram too has opened to full houses: if the initial enthusiasm is carried on, the film will help to prop up Sripriya's sagging popularity.

RAJNI SHARMA wants SUNDAY readers to know that she hasn't given up trying for Hindi films: She has a couple of assignments like Satte Pe Satta (the film has five heroes including Amitabh and five heroines). And though Tamil producers are paying more attention to her than Hindi ones, she believes her stars will soon shine in Bombay.

Barely musical

The song had a very catchy beat, so it was not surprising that it shot to the top of the popularity charts all over the world. The group that called themselves The Village People had established themselves in the big league with the release of the song called "YMCA". Suddenly, everyone, from grandmothers to primary school kids, was humming the tune. Some branches of the YMCA even picked up the song and began using it for advertising purposes, but that was before someone discovered that the lyrics had homosexual overtones. The Village People were under a cloud for some time, but not their music. No sir, their music continued to go places. The group was later asked to do a film—Allan Carr's "Can't Stop The Music" and the picture shows them with Valerie Perrine in a scene from the movie itself. Although you wouldn't think so, judging by their costumes, the film is being brought to theatres this summer with a 13.5 million price tag. Looks as if The Village People are baring up well to the demands of Hollywood.

Stiff upper Chunnel

The Chunnel (the British Channel Tunnel) is not yet dead. Around 1975, when the British Prime Minister Harold Wilson backed out of the Anglo-French project because of financial reasons, the French were rather annoyed. That was understandable, since the idea of the Chunnel has long enjoyed official support in France. Of late, however, under the Prime Ministership of Mrs Thatcher, the project has received a shot in the arm. As regards Government involvement in the project, the French national railway, SNCF, is directly linked and in fact totally committed. However, there are others in the French private sector who have impressed the Conservative Government with their proposal for private financing of construction. One such company is Spie-Batignolles, one of the founder members of the European Channel Tunnel Group. The company has approached the French Government about the project but the Government is silent.

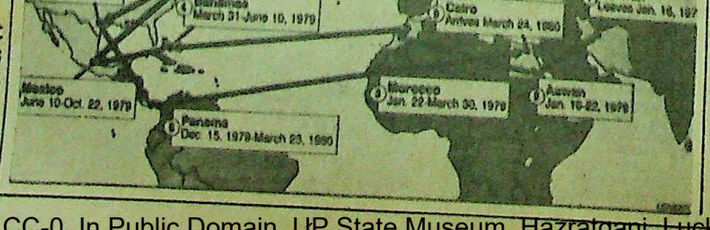
No wonder then, that Frenchmen say: "But it is not the French you must ask about the tunnel—we have always wanted it. It is the British who must decide".

Hair today, gone tomorro'

Two hundred of the best-groomed heads in England gathered in Eastbourne for the annual conference of the National Hairdressers' Federation. And what did they confer about? Oh, well, the kind of attitude that drives people to use boot polish on their hair, for instance. In addition, they were told to modernise their views and be nice to young people, no matter what their idiosyncracies were. Mr David Colclough, president of the body, told his members that it was not their business to moralise on their clients. He insisted that they should open their minds—and doors—to all people, no matter how outlandish they looked. Punks for instance.

Running—not a country

The Shah has done quite a bit of travelling lately, although it would seem that he has finally found a place of sanctuary. From Teheran, which city he left on January 16, 1979, he went to Aswan and from there to Morocco. From Morocco it was a long hike all the way to the Bahamas and then to Mexico. He was in New York from October 22 to December 2, 1979 and in San Antonio for two weeks in December following which he celebrated Christmas in Panama. He arrived in Cairo on March 14 this year, where Sadat was determined to show his gratitude to the Shah for the help that the former Iranian monarch extended to Egypt in the face of a boycott by Arab nations following the Camp David peace agreement with Israel. There has been a furore over the Shah's arrival in Cairo and the warm welcome extended by Sadat, has increased pressure on the Egyptian President to redouble his demonstration of loyalty to the Arab cause.



Programmed action

Computers are the "favoured tools of people who dominate. They serve to exploit, to document, to control and to punish. Tomorrow telematic techniques will inaugurate 1984", said the Committee To Liquidate Or Neutralise Computers (CLNC) in a letter to the newspaper, Liberation. The Committee members, "technicians in the computer field, well placed to appreciate its dangers to society", have lived up to their name and their professed ideals. In early April they set fire to the computer works of Philips Data Systems at Toulouse, near Paris. And to clinch their objectives the group removed programmed tapes containing material "destined for use by French forces and secret services", which loss Philips has denied. The company, however, need not have worried about losing business, thanks to the CLNC group which is also known as Direct Action. The urban guerrilla group members destroyed programmed tapes of their rival company — CII-Honeywell-Bull.

And the French Government? They are not bothered about any direct action. Inspite of the attacks the Cabinet has decided to expand the existing memory banks for industrial, official and public use. As far as the CLNC is concerned, that's more fuel for their fires.

Who's right?

Ballet dancers of the Rome Opera House staged a wildcat strike on April 10, only hours before the opera Giselle was scheduled to open. Giselle starred two big names Rudolf Nureyev and Carla Fracci. The stars, unused to this sort of treatment, declared that they would dance irrespective of what the Rome Opera House dancers did. Backstage, Nureyev told the striking dancers, "In a true democracy the right to strike is sacred but so is the right to work". Not surprisingly, then, as he went to work, the 32 male and female dancers walked on to the stage to read a statement about their strike.

Save my Teddy

Pope John Paul II has been known to do a lot of things: hug babies, watch circus clowns perform, write poems and even see his own play being enacted at the Vatican. Recently he was asked to perform a rather extraordinary miracle. At Rome's Fumicino Airport, 36-year-old James Leo Connor from Philadelphia paced up and down wearing a sandwichboard with a message imploring the Holy Father to help Senator Edward Kennedy win the Pennsylvania primary. And the Senator did win!

Where is the World Government of the Age of Enlightenment? It is in Buckinghamshire, in the stately ancestral home—Mentmore Towers—of Lord Rosebery. And there are Ministers, too. There is the Minister of Information and Inspiration and a Minister of All Possibility. The function of the World Government is to take those who have been unable to find mental peace on a "journey towards creative intelligence." The Ministers try to explain how mental peace can be achieved through transcendental meditation.

Most of those who visit Mentmore Towers have tried drugs and hormones, the whole works. In desperation they each spent a pound for a day of "enlightenment". But what they received was nothing.

Dogged resistance

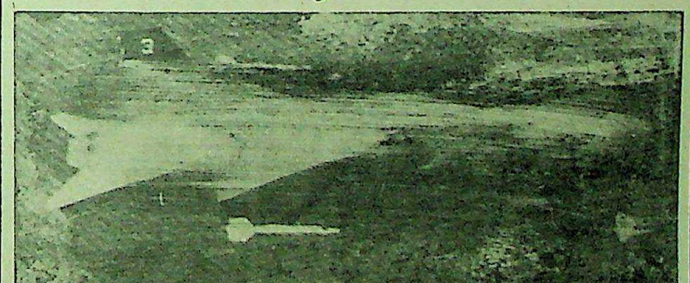
This is one dog who has earned his salary many times over. Rats, the British army cross-bred Corgi terrier, was honourably discharged from the Services after a vet found that his health was going to the dogs. More than being physically ill, Rats has been mentally shaken. Reason: for the past couple of years he was based in Crossmaglen in Northern Ireland, and while accompanying his human colleagues on patrol, he braved the occasional bombs. He has also been injured by something called a "car bomb" and been burnt by a petrol bomb. In fact, he still has four pieces of car metal in his body from the first mishap, when he also received head and leg injuries. In addition, he has been presented with a gold medal for devotion to duty. The Prince of Wales Company of the First Battalion Welsh Guards, with whom he did his last stint of duty, gave him a fitting farewell. Since Rats loves Army helicopters, they flew him to his place of retirement in one. His place of retirement, incidentally, is a secret since Irish terrorists have a price on Rats' head. It's a dog's life indeed!

Bitter Pill for husbands

If you have been deprived of something, revolt. That's precisely what the wives of European Economic Community bureaucrats in Luxemburg did. Their demand was that their husbands—based in Strasbourg—return permanently. The European Parliament is now in Strasbourg while a new £1,200 million building has been built to house it permanently in Luxemburg. Parliament staffers, who number about 800, have to commute to and fro for one week every month along with tons of documents from Luxemburg to Strasbourg.

Wives and husbands tolerated this shifting temporarily because they had been told that the Parliament would shift to Luxemburg permanently this year. That never happened since the department which controls the Parliament's working life passed by seven votes to four the decision to remain in Strasbourg. The lonely wives have already signed a petition to be handed over to the Chairman of the EEC Mr Roy Jenkins, to shift the headquarters permanently to Luxemburg. There is a standing joke about the Luxemburg wives: that they do not have to resort to the Pill because their husbands are hardly ever at home.

Them planes don't fly no more



American military planes don't fly. The US Air Force's F-15 and F-16 and the Navy's F-14 and F-18 are having serious technical complications. These planes have engines that wear out too fast, stall in manoeuvres or even explode in mid-air. If they are to be kept in combat readiness their defects have to be set right, so the Pentagon is diverting urgent defence funds to keep these four aircraft types flying. Costs are also rising. A single F-18 costs around 17.4 million dollars. Once the planes are in the air they can outfly or outshoot anything that flies today, according to the Pentagon. But till the technical problems are ironed out the USA is in a losing race against other super powers.

Body beautiful

UPI

Whoever heard of women flexing their muscles? Well in the beginning of April there was a body building Championship in Atlantic City, USA, where 33 contestants not only showed their well-formed muscles but also their bodies. The judges agreed on the choice of 24-year-old Rachel McLish of Harleton, Texas as the winner. There goes one more sacred preserve of men!

Economy drive

"The most massive and profound industrial revolution in peacetime history" is about to take place in the shape of what the American Press terms "world cars", said Ford Motor Company chairman, Philip Caldwell. They will be smaller, will consume a lot less fuel than other American cars and will also be marketed internationally. These models, the Ford Escort and Mercury Lynx, will have components from 12 different countries, will be assembled in the USA and Europe and sold almost anywhere in the world. General Motors another big name in the car industry will make its first "world car" in 1981, while American Motors and their French partner Renault will join hands to produce a similar car in 1982.

Jurisprurience

Goa's most eligible bachelor, the young and debonair Law Minister Dayanand Narvekar, a busy lawyer until he took to politics, has a serious problem on his plate. Four women employees of the Judicial Commissioner's Court have complained to him that fornication within the court premises is not at all unique. Narvekar, whose good looks have set many a pretty heart aflutter, did not remain insensitive to the occupational hazards of the young damsels and ordered an immediate police investigation. However, the acting Inspector General of Police, Prabhakar Sinari bowed out on the plea that the conclusions would in no way enhance the reputation or prestige of the judiciary.

By way of a gentle reminder, Mario Cabral e Sa points out that about a year ago, PWD plumbers were summoned to unclog the drains of the court's privies. There was a great deal of ribaldry when they emerged with over 150 used rubber condoms, but discretion being the better part of valour, no one enquired into the mystery.

Meanwhile, having failed by way of the police, Narvekar referred the matter to the Central Government and received the answer that the judiciary was to appoint its own vigilance officers. But then again, that doesn't solve many problems. Narvekar is already ordering an investigation into the case of a young female typist who, lacking legal qualifications, is about to be appointed a judge.

Picking up the tempo

Neither of them saw the "No Entry" sign at the crossing of Royd Street and Free School Street, Calcutta. The driver of the three-wheel tempo swung his vehicle across the corner and the motorcyclist, close on his heels, did likewise. The shrill sound of a police whistle rent the surroundings and the two lawbreakers were flagged down by an indignant traffic constable. All of a sudden there was the sound of an engine being gunned and it became clear to all around that the tempo driver was taking the opportunity to make a quick getaway. The constable swiftly ordered the motorcyclist to start up and chase the errant tempo. The ensuing race did not last long as the motorcycle soon overtook the tempo and the policeman—who was riding pillion—was able to flag it down once more, this time for keeps. The chastened tempo driver had to contend with a very irate policeman, while the motorcyclist waited nervously to see what was going to become of him. After it was all over, the constable walked up to the motorcyclist. "And you", he announced grandly "are free to go since you helped me." And to prove his gratitude, he erased the motorcyclist's number from his book.

All's fine

What is the maximum fine (under the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act) if one causes injury or death to an animal? Be it a horse or a squirrel, the penalty is Rs 50. Despite this, the Madras branch of the Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals has filed a case against the producer of a Tamil film, Kali. It was during the shooting of this movie that ten horses were recently injured in a fire. Since there was no fire service unit in attendance and it took more than eight hours to admit the horses to the veterinary hospital, two died.

Please God, how about a few goals?

If you don't have a god, worship an idol. But what if you don't even have an idol to worship? In Calcutta, reports Arijit Sen, the answer is simple. Find yourself a goalpost, get yourself a pundit and then kneel down and pray. Each year, the first day of Baisakh (Bengali New Year), brings football officials, players and fans in their thousands to the maidan, the scene of many an epic soccer battle. At most of the big soccer clubs, a goalpost is put up amidst a great deal of pomp and ceremony and at the hour appointed by the Hindu almanac, a pundit invokes the blessings of the almighty. One has never been able to understand the invocation but it is obviously directed towards the dual blessings of saving and scoring goals, to the satisfaction of the club in question.

The origins of this ritual date back to the days when trophies became more important than anything else. The recruitment of top players is also backed up by bringing the game within the ambit of the Kali temples of the city of Calcutta— and the pundits, of course. However, the gods have never been able to keep everyone happy at the same time.

This year, April 14 saw thousands brave the scorching heat to gather on the Mohun Bagan and East Bengal grounds. But, while East Bengal's prayers ended at 9 am, Mohun Bagan's began one hour later. The intervening period was utilised by the supporters of both clubs to exchange brickbats from the ramparts, during which 30 teenagers were injured. Talk about religious militance.

Tenants' penance

The things some people think of! Madras must be the only metropolitan city in India where houseowners advertise their preference for prospective Brahmin tenants.

There is the case of an ultra-conservative Brahmin houseowner in Santhome who is trying to throw out his tenant—who is also a Brahmin — because he doesn't much care for the latter's fondness for fish.

And he is not the only one having problems. Arthur Pais recently underwent a rather strange experience while househunting with his fiancee. When he saw a house that he liked, he naturally decided to discuss the rent. But he received a shock instead when the owner told him discreetly, "We are pious Catholics and we don't like the idea of giving out our house to people who roam around together even before they are married. For that matter, how can we be sure that you'll ever get married?"

The Hit King

"You want to know what's the safest business in films? You put up a large, impressive set for your film, and once your film is completed, start renting it out to producers who are making films in languages other than your own," says D. Rama Naidu, one of the shrewdest and most successfull producers down South. Naidu has half a dozen Telugu hits to his credit, and is now putting finishing touches to his ambitious Hindi venture Bandish starring Rajesh, Hema, Danny and Tanuja. Earlier he produced such bumper hits as Prem Nagar, Dildaar and Dil Aur Deewar, "I signed Rajesh and Hema much before Rajesh staged a comeback through Amar Deep, and Hema was already receiving bad publicity, thanks to a couple of films but then I sell my films on the basis of the story and both Rajesh and Hema did good work for my Prem Nagar," Rama Naidu told Arthur Pais.

His next venture, a remake of one of the hits in Telugu stars Jeetendra, and of course Rajesh Khanna. Naidu recently opened a very useful, comfortable dubbing theatre in Madras. Mr B. Nagi Reddy, himself a very successful producer and studio-boss (Vauhini in Madras) was among the first few invitees to bless the new venture. Reddy was "patron saint" Naidu when the latter forayed into films.

All at sea

First he had his hands and feet bound with metal chains. Then Nathubhai Pahade, aged 54, slipped from the boat that was carrying him into the waters of the Jamuna. A motley crowd of about 100 people cheered exuberantly as he did so and then waited in anticipation to see how long it would take the swimmer to reappear. It took a few seconds, but his head soon bobbed above the surface and the people cheered again, this time slightly louder than before. Pahade kept afloat for half an hour before he made his way to the shallow waters and was picked up by the boat to be brought back to shore. The intrepid swimmer was unchained by Vidyaben Shah, president of the Gujarat Samaj and, free of his shackles, he waved gleefully to all those who stood around.

Said Pahade, "I have swum the seven seas but I have not kept this honour for myself. It is for the youth of today and the children of tomorrow". And, Saumitra Banerjee adds, he has literally swum the seven seas, all within the period of just one month. However, Nathubhai Pahade is not just a swimmer; he was involved in the Independence movement and during the 1942 Quit India movement, was sentenced to eight months RI by the British. Incidentally, he is a dancer as well and has been performing Kathakali and Bharat Natyam for many years. He bases his style of swimming, with his hands and feet bound, on Pranayam, a yogic exercise and says it was his desire to do something different that prompted him to take up this challenge.

Film feast '80

A little boy tugs your sleeve and says "Two for six" Translated, that means he is offering you cinema tickets at three times their genuine price of Rs two. This actually happened to Paranjoy Guha Thakurta before the screening of an unsubtitled print of G. Aravindan's award-winning film Thampu during the Calcutta Film Festival '80. Incidentally, this was the first-ever Indian film festival of its kind organised by a state Government.

Between April 11 and 17, four of the city's premier cinema halls in the New Market area screened about 60 films including ten Ray evergreens and some old Bengali films, many of them obtained from the Pune archives. With most of the non-Bengali films (there were over two dozen in Telugu, Malayalee, Tamil, Kannada, Hindi and Oriya) being subtitled and with tickets going at nominal prices, filmgoers in Calcutta responded enthusiastically. With a bonus Bengali New Year holiday thrown in, most of the four daily shows ran to packed houses. And though many tried to prove otherwise, certainly a good time was had by all.

Would you rather wear dentures than think about your toothpaste— now?

Have you ever wondered whether your toothpaste is giving your teeth the protection they need? Maybe it isn't. That's why you should look at Macleans. Because Macleans actually gives your teeth a two-way protection, which is necessary for their health.

Macleans fights destructive acids harder

Leftover food particles in your mouth produce acids that destroy tooth enamel. Is your toothpaste alkaline enough to neutralise these acid attacks? Macleans is. Because Macleans is specially formulated with an alkaline base. Laboratory tests demonstrate that the acid-neutralising action of Macleans protects teeth better and longer.

Macleans fortifies tooth enamel simultaneously

Clinical tests prove that Macleans helps protect teeth from caries. The Fluoride in Macleans combines with tooth enamel to strengthen it and increase its resistance to decay.

Only Macleans with its two-way action fights acids while it fortifies tooth enamel.

Beginning May 4

This week the Sun and Mercury are in Aries, Venus is in Gemini, and Jupiter, Saturn, Mars and Rahu are conjoined in Leo. Uranus and Neptune are in Scorpio, and Kethu alone is in Aquarius. The Moon will be moving through Capricorn, Aquarius and Pisces from Sagittarius.

ARIES (March 21 — April 20) There is threat of a sudden change on your business or professional front. If the threat materialises, a change for the better will result. The rest of this week will bring a lot of domestic joy. Your business affairs will prosper and you will make fantastic headway. This week favours love and marriage. You are advised to check all extravagant tendencies. Good dates: 6, 7, 8 and 10. Lucky numbers: 4, 2 and 8. Favourable direction: North-west.

TAURUS (April 21 — May 22) A valuable new friendship may develop this week. Be content with slow (but sure) progress and meet inevitable delays and obstacles with patience and tact. Occult advice may prove very helpful at this juncture. Exercise care and discretion in your dealings with friends of the opposite sex. Devote a little extra attention to business details and some good fortune will be yours. Good dates: 5, 7, 9 and 10. Lucky numbers: 3, 6, and 9. Favourable direction: South.

GEMINI (May 23 — June 21) This will be a week of mixed fortunes. Pay great attention to your financial and professional affairs. Hard work, your own hunches and elders benefit you. A property deal will be clinched in your favour. Many will win promotions through clever hunches. Some unreasonable opposition on the part of an old person of the opposite sex is to be expected. Good dates: 4, 5, 7 and 9. Lucky numbers: 2, 7 and 8. Favourable direction: North.

CANCER (June 22 — July 22) A fair measure of success and good fortune is indicated. Speculation is likely to pay. Your prospects have now completely changed for the better. You will be helped by high officials and a promotion is probable. Letters from distant places will bring good news. Your domestic front will remain a source of joy and happiness. Check all extravagant tendencies. Revive old contacts to suit your ends. Good dates: 6, 7 and 9. Lucky numbers: 3, 7 and 8. Favourable direction : North

LEO (July 23 — August 22) A busy week lies ahead of you. Make the best of existing favourable influences. More than average success is predicted for most people. In many cases, promotion will result from hard work and application. On the social front, things look slightly complicated. Accept all reasonable risks and forge ahead on all fronts. Wait for letters before taking an important decision. Good dates: 4, 6, 7 and 9. Lucky numbers: 1, 3 and 9. Favourable direction: East.

VIRGO (August 23 — September 22) Exercise caution and restraint in your professional and personal life. Take nothing for granted. Keep away from gambling, betting and speculative ventures. On the whole this week should prove moderately lucky. A journey may have to be postponed. Domestic problems will be solved at the weekend. A friend of the opposite sex may give you cause for worry. Good dates: 6, 7, 9 and 10. Lucky numbers: 7, 8 and 10. Favourable direction: West.

LIBRA (September 23 — October 22) A week of mixed fortunes is predicted for you. A sudden change of fortune will strengthen your position and your success will be praised by all your friends and relatives. A new friendship will brighten your prospects. A promotion is probable. You will gain in business by using original methods. Your domestic life will not pose many problems. Legal problems should be promptly handled. Good dates: 4, 6, 9 and 10. Lucky numbers: 2, 7 and 9. Favourable directions: East and North.

SCORPIO (October 23 — November 21) This week begins on a happy and joyful note. A happy romance is forecast. You will gain in speculative ventures. You are, however, advised not to take needless risks. This week is particularly favourable for business expansion and speculative investment. Letters will bring good news. You are advised to check all extravagant tendencies. Good dates: 4, 5, 7 and 9. Lucky numbers: 4, 7 and 2. Favourable direction: South-east.

SAGITTARIUS (November 22 — December 22) A modicum of success and happiness is predicted, especially if extravagance, law suits and heavy expenditure are avoided. Influential relatives and friends, especially womenfolk, will prove helpful. Your home front will remain lively and joyful. Be discreet in speech, correspondence and actions. You are likely to meet an old friend of the opposite sex. Good dates: 4, 5 and 8. Lucky numbers: 3, 2 and 9. Favourable direction: West.

CAPRICORN (December 23 — January 20) One of the most important and exciting weeks in recent times lies ahead of you. Expected and unexpected good fortune is predicted. Your domestic front will present a happy picture. Valuable new friendships are foreseen. Unexpected medical expenditure is predicted. Borrowing or lending money may lead to unnecessary problems. Good dates: 5, 6, 8 and 9. Lucky numbers: 7, 2 and 9. Lucky numbers: 7, 2 and 9. Favourable direction: North-west.

AQUARIUS (January 21 — February 19) This week will prove difficult and trying. Safeguard your health and that of your womenfolk. You will benefit in diverse expected and unexpected ways. A promotion is on the cards. Guard against physical and mental overstrain. Be discreet in speech, correspondence and actions. Marriage, changes and travel should be postponed. Good dates: 6, 9 and 10. Lucky numbers: 4, 7 and 10. Favourable direction: West.

PISCES (February 20 — March 20) Your power of reasoning and keen perception should enable you to successfully circumvent treachery and evil machinations, particularly in business. Watch finances carefully and do not speculate. Intellectual activities are well signified. Make hay while the sun shines. Exercise care and prudence where documents are concerned. Good dates: 4, 5, 7 and 9. Lucky numbers: 1, 2 and 4. Favourabe directions: West and East.

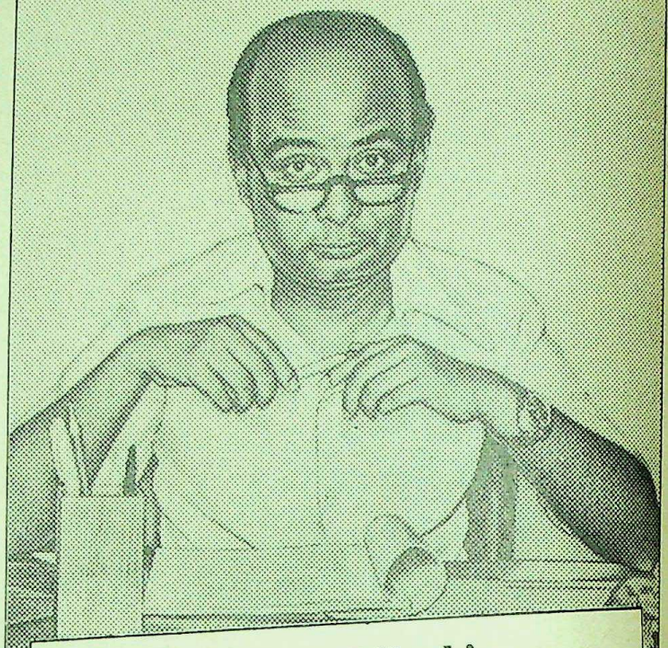
"How can a bank assure a happy retirement for me?"



Allahabad Bank's Pension Deposit Scheme is planned to make your retirement secure.

This Pension Deposit Scheme helps you plan a secure retirement. You need to deposit Rs. 10/- or its multiples each month for a period between 63 and 120 months. After which you receive a monthly or quarterly income for as long as you want—while your principal sum remains completely intact. You can choose the period of your deposit so that it matures when you retire.

This table will give you an idea how the plan works :

Period of Deposit (Months)	Monthly Deposit	Monthly Income	Quarterly Income	Lump Sum repayable at closing of account (as per Bank's rules)
63	Rs. 100/-	Rs. 68.50 (from 65th month)	Rs. 207.50 (from 67th month)	Rs. 8291/-
84	Rs. 100/-	Rs.100.00 (from 86th month)	Rs.304.00 (from 88th month)	Rs. 12,157/-

Moreover, if you wish, this regular income can also devolve on any beneficiary you choose.

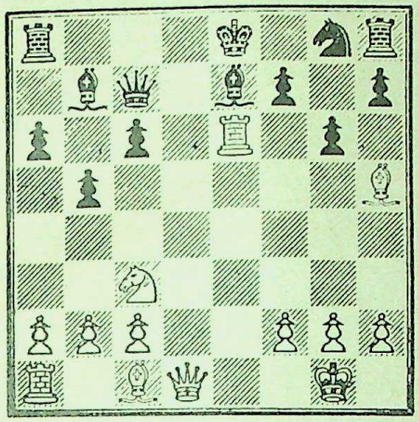
Polugaevsky (Black)



Kasparov (White) to move
Position after Black's 13th move

A new Fischer?

IN THE PAST year a 16-year-old Russian has been making an impact on the world scene unknown since the early days of Bobby Fischer. His name? Well, there seems to be some confusion over this point. Although he is known to the world as Garry Kasparov, I am reliably informed that he is known to his father as Garry Weinstein. This seems a curious anomaly, especially in a country which does not go in for stage names.

Whatever alias he may decide to adopt, Garry Kasparov/Weinstein's play and results bear the unmistakable stamp of true genius. He first sprang to light in last year's Soviet Championship, which having qualified for the final, itself a remarkable feat for a then 15-year-old, he made a sensational start and was actually leading after six rounds. Naturally such a pace could not be sustained by one so young, but his final score of 50 per cent in such company would be highly creditable for an established grandmaster of twice his age. To prove this success to be no mere flash in the pan, the Soviet Chess Federation sent him to play in the international tournament in Banja Luka in Yugoslavia last spring. Not only did he win first place, but he came through unbeaten, 2 points clear of a field including Andersson, Smejkal and Petrosian. Not a bad baptism into international chess.

Without doubt Kasparov and Weinstein are destined to become champions of the world. Here is a game which is already famous as their first win against a World Championship contender:

White: G. Kasparov: Black: L. Polugaevsky
USSR Championship Final 1978 Sicilian Defence

1. P—K4, P—QB4; 2. N—KB3, P—K3; 3. P—Q4, P x P; 4. N x P, P—QR3; 5. N—QB3, Q—B2; 6. B—K2, P—QN4; 7. B—B3, B—N2; 8. 0—0, N—QB3; 9 N x N, P x N; This position is known to theory as being very comfortable for Black, but Kasparov immediately sets the game alight with a hitherto unknown pawn sacrifice.

10. P—K5!? Q x P; 11. R—K1, Q—B2; 12. B—R5! B—K2; Not 12 . . . P—N3? 13. Q—Q4!

14. R—K1! So simple. If 14 . . . P x B then 15. Q—Q4, P—B3; 16. Q—Q1! followed by Q x P+ keeps the attack very much alive. An extraordinary conception.

14 . . . R—Q1; 15. Q—B3, P—QB4; 16. B—B4! Q—N3; 17. Q—N3, P x B; 18. B—B7 Not 18. Q—N7? Q—N3!

18 . . . Q—N3; 19. B x R, Q x Q; 20. RP x Q, K x B; It is the ensuing phase of the game I find so impressive. A rook is usually no match for two bishops in the endgame, but Kasparov manages to establish an unshakable grip on the position, despite the reduced material.

21. QR—Q1+ K—B2; 22. N—Q5+ B x N; 23. R x B, P—KR3; A rather pathetic attempt to develop his rook, but what else can he do?

24. R x RP, R—R2; 25. R(5)—K5, K—Q2; 26. R(5)—K3, R—N2; 27. R—Q3+ K—B3; 28. R—R3, R—N3; 29. R—KB3! Stronger than 29. R x P+ K—Q4, when the black king becomes active.

29 . . . B—B3; 30. P—B3, K—Q2; 31. R—Q3+ K—B2; 32. R—K8, N—K2; 33. R(8)—Q8, N—B3; 34. R(8)—Q7+ K—N3; 35. R x P, B—K2; 36. R—K3, B—Q3; 37. P—B4, P—B5; 38. K—R2, B—B4; 39. R—K2, P—N5; 40. R—K4, P x P; 41. P x P, B—B7; 42. R x P, B x P+ 43. K—R3, B—K8; 44. P—R4, N—R4? He had to try 44 . . . R—N6+ 45. K—R2, R x BP; 46. R x R, B x R, though after 47. R—KR7 White's kingside pawns would certainly decide the issue in his favour.

45. R—N4+ K—B4; 46. R—B5+ Resigns. The knight is lost.

Footnote: Black did not manage to move his king's knight until move 32! Can this be a record?

MICHAEL STEAN

bridge

ONE of the surprises of the European Championship was the uneven form of the Swedish team that had won so impressively in Denmark two years ago. On this deal from an early match against Israel they were badly off course at both tables.

Dealer, North. E-W vulnerable.

	♠ A Q 9 6 ♥ Q J 8 7 ♦ 5 ♣ A K J 7
♠ — ♥ K 6 ♦ Q 10 9 8 6 3 ♣ Q 9 8 6 4	N W E S	♠ 7 3 2 ♥ A 10 9 5 4 2 ♦ — ♣ 10 5 3 2
	♠ K J 10 8 5 4 ♥ 3 ♦ A K J 7 4 2 ♣ —

The Swedish North-South pair seemed to charge at the grand slam:

—	1♣ (1)
1NT (2)	2♣
5NT (4)	7♠
No

(1) Conventional, 17+.
(2) Positive and showing at least five spades.
(3) Diamond suit and 3 to 4 controls.
(4) Apparently a grand slam force, asking partner to bid seven with two top honours in spades.

East led the Ace of hearts, so the Swedes soon knew their fate. The Israeli bidding was much better co-ordinated.

SOUTH	WEST	NORTH	EAST
—	—	2♦ (1)	No
2NT	No	3♣ (2)	No
3♣	No	4♣	No
4♦	No	4♠	No
4NT	No	5♥	dble
6♠	No	No	dble (3)
No	No	No

(1) Roman Two Diamonds, indicating a strong 3-suiter.
(2) Showing that the short suit was diamonds.
(3) Presumably a Lightner double, correcting the previous request to lead a heart.

Holding the King of hearts, West nevertheless opened ♥K, on which East dropped the 10. The Vu-graph audience naturally thought a diamond would follow and that the Swedish pair in the closed room would be relieved to find they had gained on the board. But West, seemingly without reflection, led a club at trick two, so the slam was made. No doubt it was difficult for him to picture the declarer with a concealed six-card suit. Possibly, too, the 10 of hearts was not the right card in their signalling system.

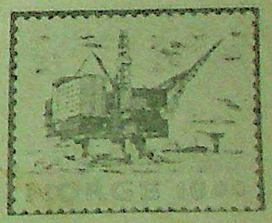
EVEN BEFORE the first stamps, the Penny Blacks, were issued in 1840, the Treasury was obsessed with the fear that unscrupulous people would wash or bleach the postmarks from used stamps in order to re-use them. The printers, Perkins, Bacon and Co. and Thomas De La Rue Ltd., conducted interminable experiments to develop an indelible postmark and a fugitive printing-ink. One result of these researches was the issue in January 1880 of this unexciting penny stamp known to collectors as the Venetian Red. The stamp is still very common if postmarked.



A NORTH SEA oil drilling production platform, Statfjord A, is featured on one of three new Norwegian stamps devoted to modern engineering projects in Norway. Another new Norwegian issue is a miniature sheet containing four stamps which show aircraft used in polar exploration. This is intended to publicise Norwex 80, the international philatelic exhibition to be held in Oslo in June. London will also be staging an international exhibition at Earls Court in May and the Post Office plans to issue a miniature sheet to mark the occasion. Other British issues during 1980 will illustrate Britain's contribution to the world of music and will commemorate the centenaries of the Amateur Athletic Association and the Welsh Rugby Union.

UJJAIN : The sale of country liquor has increased manifold here thanks to Kal Bhairav the drinking deity, whose temple across the Kshipra River is a centre of attraction for Kumbh pilgrims. According to temple priest Sunderlal, more than 500 devotees are visiting the temple every day as compared to some 30 to 40 on other days. He expected the number to swell from April 13, the second auspicious bathing day of the Kumbh. Normally, the 'prassad'—in this case liquor—is offered to deity in the morning and in the evening, but these days it is being offered about a dozen times on request from the visitors— United News of India (Y. Ramakrishnan, Madurai)

SHAHABAD : Just for a cup of coffee, the Super Fast Bombay-bound Miner Express was detained for over an hour at Wadi junction. A passenger of the train, who took a cup of coffee, found the quantity was less and cold. He manhandled the vendor and that created the trouble. The Railway Police who appeared on the scene, were pushed out by the irate passenger. Then the sub-inspector was forced to bring down the passenger, who was a militaryman, seized his movement order and identity card. After taking his written statement, he was allowed to move. A report has been sent to his military unit for disciplinary action— Indian Express (K. S. Soma Sunder, Bangalore)

NEW DELHI : There was panic as patrol cars dashed to the Bank of Maharashtra in the Dholpur House on Shahjehan Road on April 1 and armed guards took up positions. The bank had received an anonymous telephone call that it was going to be raided. The petrified bank officials immediately informed the police who swung into action. It was only later, when the police control room had received several bogus calls during the day that the officials realised that these were the usual April Fools Day pranks —The Times of India (Satyajit Chakravarty, Shillong)

PANAJI : The body of a three-year-old boy was practically eaten up by ants in the Hospicio hospital morguemat Margao. The Speaker of the Goa Assembly, Mr Froilano Machado, said he had himself seen the child's body as the parents were from his constituency of Cortalim. Mr Herculano Dourado (Congress-I) had moved a calling attention motion on the death of the boy, Rehman Agha, who was admitted to the hospital on April 8 after an accident and died there. The Health Minister, Sheikh Hassan denied that the death was due to negligence. He said he was not aware whether the body, as alleged by Mr Dourado, had been eaten by ants. At this stage, the Speaker intervened and confirmed the charge—The Statesman (Kajal Chakraborty, Calcutta)

UJJAIN : Mr Arjun Singh Dharu, leader of the Lok Dal group in the dissolved Madhya Pradesh Vidhan Sabha and a former state parliamentary secretary, has rejoined as sub-inspector of police. The Ujjain district superintendent of police, Mr D. D. Gupta, told UNI that Mr Dharu, after reporting for duty, had gone on five days' leave. He will be posted at some police station in Ujjain district, the superintendent said. Mr Dharu had been dismissed from service on the charge of corruption but the high court subsequently ordered his reinstatement. By that time, Mr Dharu had won the 1977 assembly election and become a parliamentary secretary. According to official sources, Mr Dharu's return to police service entitles him to a large amount of compensation and salary arrears—The Times of India (Santha Ramachandran, New Delhi)

NEW DELHI : Two constables of the Delhi Armed Police — Rampal and Rishipal—have been arrested for allegedly trying to sell one of the two cars stolen from Gurgaon a few days ago, according to the police. It is stated that the two cars were found abandoned in Delhi on Monday (March 24). According to the police the constables tried to sell one of the cars (RJA 7787) to someone in the Jama Masjid area—The Statesman (M. P. Gupta, Ranchi)

UJJAIN : It is not all simple living at the Kumbh Mela here. The tents and shamianas of some of the leading sadhus now here to attend the mela are equipped with fans, coolers, refrigerators and telephones. Of course some of them still prefer 'Khas Tattis' to keep them cool, with their 'chelas' frequently sprinkling these with water. 35 telephones have already been provided to leading sadhus and the telephone authorities are receiving requests daily for more and more connections—Nagpur Times (A. B. Vishwakarma, Amravati)

CENTRE OF ATTENTION

THE Pradesh Election Committees (PECs) of the Congress (I) met on April 18 to finalise the Assembly ticket lists in the nine states. Overheard in Delhi Congress (I) circles on April 17 :

Q : What will the PECs do?

A : They will compete with each other to go to 1, Safdarjung Road to tell Mrs Gandhi that they left the decision to her? The PECs have been so constituted that no unanimous decision can possibly emerge. The possibility of a decision by a majority vote is remote. Therefore, many Congress (I) men in the capital feel that the ultimate choice will have to be left to the Central leadership. As an example, they point out the composition of the Punjab PEC, which has 13 members. Eight of them are shared equally by the two main rival groups led by Giani Zail Singh and Darbara Singh. Two belong to Chaudhury Balram's group and the remaining three to Swaran Singh's camp. The balancing factor will be Swaran Singh and in all probability the indecisiveness of the Punjab PEC will land the list in the hands of the Centre.

THE BARODA MUDDLE CASE

"BARODA" has become an important name in Delhi. While on the one hand the Supreme Court was busy hearing a petition seeking the reopening of the Baroda Dynamite Case, Lalwani of Baroda stepped in with the "Baroda Knife Case". Interestingly, the lawyers in both cases have the same surname. While Ram Panjwani is trying to persuade the Supreme Court to reopen the Baroda Dynamite Case, R. L. Panjwani appeared for Lalwani in the assault case. R. L. Panjwani is lesser known so the publication of court reports caused some embarrassment to Ram Panjwani, who is a ruling Party lawyer.

IDENTITY CRISIS

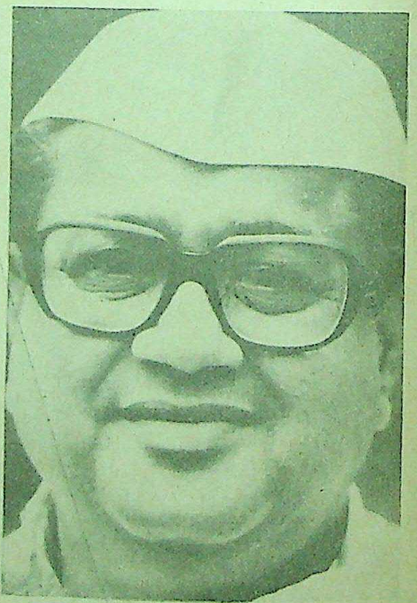
SHRI BRAHMA MAHENDRA, General Secretary, Punjab Pradesh Congress (I) Committee, is allegedly involved in the Poornima Singh episode. Mr Bhupesh Gupta, CPI leader of the house, stated the episode in the Rajya Sabha on Monday, March 31. All Delhi and Punjab papers — the language papers included — carried the news on April 1. Brahma Mahendra did not issue any contradiction till the evening of April 2. He issued a statement after consulting Mr Bhagwan Singh Siddhu, President of the Patiala Rural DCC (I) and also a leading criminal lawyer of Patiala who has vouched for Mahendra. Sanjay Gandhi has also criticised the CPI leader, Mr Gupta, at a public meeting in Patiala for making remarks in the Rajya Sabha

Who is Brahma Mahendra? He belongs to Patiala and is the son of an income-tax practitioner. His age is about 35. Stays in Modi Building, near Anardana Chowk, Patiala. He was never a functionary of the Congress (I) or Youth Congress (I) till he suddenly became — thanks to Mr Kamal Nath — Secretary of the Patiala PCC (I) in 1979. He was a hangeron and closely associated with Kamal Nath, Devinder Singh Garcha, MPs, and others. For the last five years or more, he was always in Delhi, very often in the Western Court, sometimes even forging MPs' signatures. His stay, generally in Room 54 can be verified from the Western Court reception.

What was he doing in Delhi? Did he have any ostensible means of livelihood? Was he doing any political work or other activity? No. Was he involved in a stabbing incident (over an attempted misbehaviour with some girls)? The case was registered and he was in Rajendra Hospital, Patiala, for over a month. He was in Delhi trying to arrange Sanjay Gandhi's Patiala programme and, on the night of the incident, he was with Devinder Singh Garcha and Mr Balbir Singh. Brahma Mahendra also used to frequent the temporary residence of Garcha at D11/67, Shahjahan Road Flats which is in the name of Chawla, a journalist working as a stringer for the Indian Express.

TITLED

THE man to watch in Delhi is Jagdish Tytler. He is now sitting officially in the PM's house every morning and evening, handling the public appointments of Mrs Gandhi. While this rise in the status of Tytler should have made his opponents in the Party jealous, a section of them are happy. After all, they say, powerful men like R. K. Dhawan and Yashpal Kapoor will soon be joining the anti-Tytler camp.



WHO'VE RUSHED IN NOW ?

The Afghanistan situation has given rise to a new brand of political humour in the capital. Recently a poster appeared on the walls of the city which said : "Travel free : visit the Soviet Union before the Soviet Union comes to visit you. For particulars contact Russia's comrades available all over India."

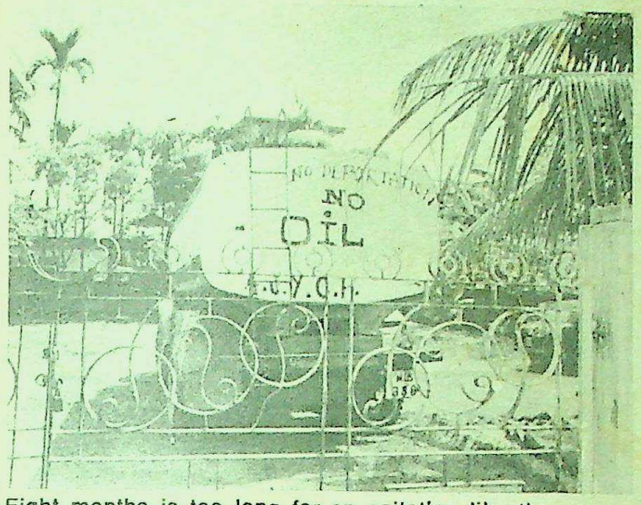
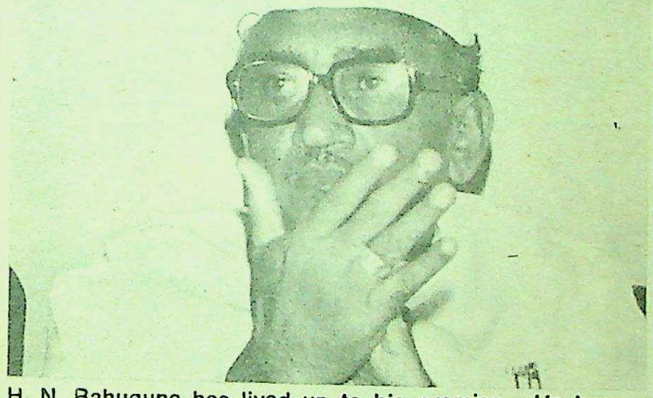
RUPEE ONE
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION

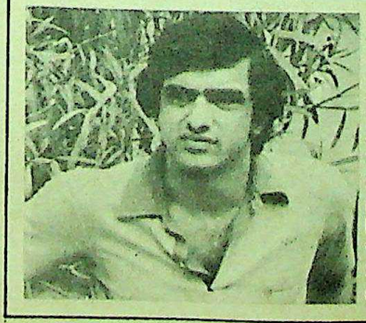
May 25, 1980



Eight months is too long for an agitation like the one in Assam to continue. It has taken over 80 lives, crippled the state's economy, harmed national integration and created panic among the state's non-Assamese citizens. Now everyone's worst fears, of communal violence, seems to be coming true.



H. N. Bahuguna has lived up to his promise. He has quit the Congress (I), resigned his Lok Sabha seat and unleashed a massive broadside against Mrs Gandhi. How will this affect the Assembly polls in UP ? As Bahuguna has a reputation for starting new phases in our national politics, how will the others take the cue from him ?



It has been many years since India has had a a world champion. But Prakash Padukone is not at all affected by his success and all the fame that goes with it. All the receptions and the publicity have not gone to his head, for he is still a very genuine person. SUNDAY presents an in-depth profile of the star.

Secret mischief

M. J. AKBAR's report on the "Full story of Moshe Dayan's secret trip to India" (April 27) reads like the unfinished script of a Hitchcock thriller movie. However, there was an element of anti-climax in the whole thing. This sort of journalism is really very appreciable. One wonders how seasoned politicians like Morarji Desai took such a calculated risk. It needs only an elementary knowledge of international affairs to be aware that the Israeli connection is the most sensitive issue with oil-producing Arab nations and our crude requirements are met only by them. Mr Desai's secret invitation to Moshe Dayan to visit India can only be called 'adventurous'. This sort of secret diplomacy is highly deplorable when national interests are at stake.
Andres Tudu, Burdwan.

MR AKBAR's story on Moshe Dayan's secret visit to India is simply fascinating. It is hard to believe that a figure like Moshe Dayan came to India like a thief.
Amrit Lall, Barasat, West Bengal.

WHAT prompted the former Prime Minister, Mr Morarji Desai, to invite Moshe Dayan to take a secret trip to India remains a mystery. India's stand on the Arab-Israel confrontation is too well known. Vajpayee too should be blamed for the idea. The episode must have tarnished the image of the Government of India. It has also revealed the fact that the government sought the help of America. The Israeli consul-general seems to have won even if it's on paper. Morarji Desai owes an explanation to the Indian people for encouraging this trip.
Shyamal Gupta, Calcutta.

YOUR readers may be interested in a little background on India's Israeli connection. It has been like a grapevine that has been spreading on Indian soil ever since Israel was born. The Israel lobby had found strong supporters among the so-called Gandhian diehards of the Congress (O). Some of them fell for the kibbutz and moshava as alternatives to the Russian agricultural collectives and the Chinese communes. Jayaprakash Narayan and his socialist friends believed in the anti-USSR, pro-Western Socialist International brand of socialism. And US-backed Israel has been an essential part of this movement in our country. When the Janata Party gained momentum, India's Israeli connection got much prominence. The Jana Sangh and its parent organisation, the RSS, had always cherished a secret love for Israel.
Jag Mohan, New Delhi.

ONE cannot but admire the courage of former Prime Minister Mr Desai for allowing Moshe Dayan to come to India and present Israel's point of view personally. There is no doubt that India is pro-Arab and it is mainly due to the oil politics. But does this mean that she should condemn Israel blindly? The Israelis are a very brave people and one cannot help admiring them. Moreover, Israel has been shouldering much greater responsibility than the Arabs who are clinging to worn out values. it seems we are non-aligned in name only. We are supposed to judge issues on their merits which we have failed to do. India's stand on the Afghan issue has made this obvious. If India is to play a meaningful role in world politics today then it should shed hypocrisy and assert its rights even if that displeases the Russians and the Arabs.
Mrs Krishna Malhotra, New Delhi.

THE 'expose', as you call it, does not say when exactly Moshe Dayan visited this country. Neither the year nor the month is mentioned. We can only make a guesswork from the reference to Morarji Desai and Vajpayee. Again, it does not identify the house where the Israeli leader was supposed to be staying. Why this poverty of information? More important, you kept quiet all these days. You should have published the story before the Israeli newspaper came out with it.
V. Krishnamoorthy, Trivandrum.

Agitators, judges, executioners

"ASSAM defies the army" (April 27) could not really be considered an eye-opener. The agitation in Assam is taking a new turn. The agitators as well as the police officers have decided to give notice to the Bengalees to quit Assam as early as possible. But this can be done by the tribunal or the court. The Bengalees should take a firm stand against this kind of anti-national feeling of the Assamese-speaking people.
Ashish Sarkar, Dibrugarh.

I SINCERELY hope that good counsel will prevail over the leaders of the Assam movement and they will co-operate with the Prime Minister in settling the Assam question. Otherwise, it might have serious repercussion on the future of the north-eastern region. Not only that, the foreign powers will jeopardise the national integrity..
Debabrata Sengupta, Howrah.

IF we go back to history we find that the Ahoms themselves are foreigners for they had come from Upper Burma and they are the ones who invaded India sometime around 13th century. Mongoloid by origin, the Ahoms have gradually adopted Hinduism. As far as the foreign nationals issue is concerned, the Ahoms should realise that they too are foreigners on the Indian soil. So the cut-off year should be 13th century and not 20th century.
Saswathi Ghose, Calcutta.

SUBIR ROY speculates that Mr H. C. Sarin may repeat what he did in Telengana. I think that mere administrative solution will not be enough for Assam. The people of Assam do have genuine grievances but unfortunately the movement has taken a secessionist turn. The bour[illegible] the Assamese community and the feudal lords, in order to maintain their exploitation, have misdirected the movement. The Assamese people instead of rising against these exploiters started their struggle against the non-Assamese people. The Assamese people must be convinced that the whole country is aware of their problem and that it is the exploiters not the common non-Assamese people who are responsible for the present situation.
Marmabina Sen, Bangalore.

THE cover (April 27) shows a photograph of the agitation in Meghalaya. The photograph was taken in front of the Meghalaya Legislative Assembly. But the caption reads "Assam defies the Army".
A. Zaman, Gauhati.

SURELY a magazine of your stature should know the meaning of army. Your heading "Assam defies the Army" may be sensational but it was a thoughtless act on your part. The article nowhere refers to the defiance of the army. This is one organisation in the country which means business and is available when the need arises.

S. Mukherjee, New Delhi.

TV's true colours

SAUMITRA BANERJEE has raised a vital question in "A colourless scheme" (April 27). So long as the TV is considered a luxury item and is a source of entertainment there is little justification for exempting it from taxes. Doordarshan was brought into the scene to serve a meaningful social purpose. But so far what has been its achievement? The committee set up by the Government in September 1976 to examine the feasibility of colour TV came out with the observation that the "development programmes like Krishi Darshan, health education, science education and children's programmes should be given importance in the colour production as colour heightens the impact and the message will be more effective". If there are plans to include these and other developmental activities in colour TV as well as encourage community viewing of it then it would certainly be worthwhile.
Bijoy Kumar Jaiswal, Katihar.

Nth time, no mistake

THIS refers to "Soviets blundered in Afghanistan" (April 27) by Madhu Limaye. This is not the first time that the Soviets have blundered. Such blunders were committed so many times in the past. One could never forget the Soviet troops in Hungary in 1956 and in Czechoslovakia in 1968. The countries threatened by the Soviet aggression—directly or indirectly—should be assured that they will be given prompt and effective help by the rest of the world.
Kiranmay Nanda, MLA West Bengal Legislative Assembly.

MADHU LIMAYE is right in stating that "the military intervention of the Soviet Union is a blunder of the first magnitude". He is equally right in saying that a national policy has to be evolved in response to the Soviet action. But I must say that the author himself has blundered in equating the Soviet invasion in Afghanistan with the American naval build-up in the Indian Ocean. The Soviet naval bases in the Indian Ocean stretch from Aden in the west to Danang and Cam Ranh Bay in the east. Surprisingly, it receives a fraction of the publicity. How many Iranians, Afghans or other south-west Asian people have been killed by the Fifth Fleet? And how many by Soviet MI-24 helicopters, T-54 tanks, napalm and chemical warfare attacks on the innocent villagers? Mr Limaye is expected to have a right perspective when he is dealing with such issues. Mr Limaye also says that the "Soviet Union is the largest country in the world. Its productive capacities are vast, and it now has achieved military parity with the United States." So, what is the justification for such a show of strength on a small country like Afghanistan? The article dismisses the western security interests in the west Asia. According to Mr Limaye, the Soviet interest in the Gulf is nil and the Americans although miles away have a "vital stake" in Afghanistan. "The question" is not "whether the Americans will accept a non-aligned Afghan regime with which the Soviets can live," the question is whether the Soviets will accept a non-aligned Afghanistan at all.
Ajit Kumar Roy, Calcutta.

CONFUSION! I cried out after going through the write-up. Throughout the article Madhu Limaye has tried to justify the Soviet action in Afghanistan. His point that India's security will be endangered is not clarified.
Dipankar Das Choudhury, Shillong.

Supreme power

DRS Meyyappan and Veerapandian's spirited search for "social and environmental pros and cons of nuclear field" (April 13) is really rather reassuring; the air of confidence refreshing. More concerned about amorphous public debate than reality it is clear that they have missed the point completely. First, some factual misconceptions. Their conclusion of Tarapur being a futile venture is based on their misconceived notion about the "expense" involved in purification of fission fuel. Even outright purchase of enriched uranium does not substantiate that claim, especially bearing in mind the dwindling supply of oil and the pathetic management of coal mines. If the United States, on the other hand, ceases to supply us with enriched uranium, India is perfectly entitled to use the already built reprocessing plant at Tarapur for proper processing of the used fuel rods. Meanwhile, the oxide fuel would be adequate for running Tarapur.

No sensible nation in the world however is banking its future on an enriched uranium light water reactor like Tarapur. The fast breeder technology with thorium as the input is the answer. The touching concern of Drs Meyyappan and Veerapandian about the depletion of thorium resources is unfortunately misconceived—once the breeder technology gets off the ground one doesn't require any fresh input—the breeder reactor breeds the fuel! Their acute anxiety about the imminent explosion of a breeder ractor is, I am afraid, a horrific fantasy—it hasn't happened in the last 20 years.

Worried as we all are about genetic imbalances caused by radiation, I am sure that most of us are rather more concerned with what is happening in Iran, in Afghanistan and indeed in most of the third world countries. Caught in the erratic grips of the superpowers, and faced with the dwindling oil levels in the Gulf, the threat of a major war is infinitely worse than an unlikely event of core meltdown. We accept death due to malnutrition as merely a curse of impoverished nations; but a not so terrible disaster in a remote island in the United States evokes immediate antipathy towards anything nuclear. It appears that some of us are at last catching up with the fashions of California!

With all due respects to Prof A. K. Saha, it is difficult to visualise hydrogen, theoretically a tremendous source of energy, filling up the power vacuum of tomorrow. The whole idea is yet to get off the laboratory stage. Within 20 years oil could run out. Hoping for hydrogen as a possible substitute of oil and other sources of power would be dangerous optimism. Professor Saha's dismissal of nuclear energy as inconsequential is frankly irresponsible and hardly substantiated by any factual evidence. The somewhat slow progress of the nuclear power programme in our country is not a reflection of the irrelevance of nuclear power but probably a rather sad commentary on our management of the research and development programme as a whole.

Fusion energy as a possible immediate alternative is a pipe dream. The intensive research costing billions of dollars is yet to lead to a probable commercial breakthrough. For India to beat everyone else in that race is unrealistic; for India to think of fusion energy in commercial terms would be far fetched. I repeat what I had already indicated in the article: with solar, hydel and thermal energy tiding over the low power demands in tomorrow's India, there is no other alternative but to press hard a nuclear programme. The contemporary sagging trend in the power situation, without nuclear power, would lead to a collapse and total darkness. There will be no load shedding. There wouldn't be any more load to shed, just complete power cuts all day long.

WHY ASSAM'S AGITATION MUST NOW STOP

The students are not professional agitators. Nor do Prafulla Mohanto and his men see the agitation as the last Battle of Saraighat. They have legitimate fears about the percentage of immigrants in Assam's population, and now they are showing every sign of wanting a dialogue. The time has come for Delhi to withdraw the Army, and the AASU and Gana Sangram Parishad to withdraw the agitation—long before a point of no return is reached. TOOSHAR PANDIT reports from Gauhati

WHEN the newspapers announced on May 23 that Mrs Indira Gandhi had called an all-Party conference on May 31, it was the clearest sign so far that there might yet be a sensible solution in Assam. This was tacit admission that the government basically would use cooperation now instead of provocative confrontation. The chessgame in Assam has reached a dangerous point; tensions could easily explode into virulent clashes between the various communities. The recent bloodshed at Howli and Tinsukia is a gruesome reminder of what could happen : 85 people have already fallen victim to the eight-month-old movement. There are perceptible signs of growing restlessness among the non-Assamese, many of whom think that the movement is directed specifically against them, whether they are recent immigrants or not. Fears of being displaced and losing their hard-earned possessions have become a recurring nightmare for them. And numerically, the Assamese and the non-Assamese are evenly matched.

Every sensible person in Assam is convinced that conciliation rather than confrontation is the answer to the impasse, and that is why one hears so much about "dialogue" and "negotiation" these days in Assam. Even the All Assam Students Union (AASU), which has spearheaded the agitation, is now strongly inclined not only towards negotiation, but is making a deliberate effort to keep itself away from the extremism which is now beginning to manifest itself even more strongly. Provocative pamphlets and inflammatory wall-posters have begun to appear in the name of the agitation. One recent poster said : 'Between the snake and the Bengali, kill the Bengali first'. The AASU has disowned such sentiments. And this is important because the AASU forms the heart of the Gana Sangarm Parishad (GSP, a united front of ten groups and associations officially in charge of the movement). But the AASU can hardly ignore the fact that the longer the stalemate continues, the greater the chance of militants increasing their influence.

Prafulla Mohanto and his followers in AASU are not among those who see the agitation as a prelude to secession, or the Last Battle of Saraighat, or even as the first renaissance. They are well-meaning people who genuinely feel that if the immigrant population is not thinned out, the Assamese will soon be reduced to a minority in their own state. Their ambitions are not political power (although the same cannot be said for some of the other factions of the GSP). The students want this problem to be solved : soon, and peacefully. Moreover, the students had already paid a huge price. They have been away from their schools and colleges for eight months now, and many of them are becoming impatient to return to their classes. "We have already missed quite a few all-India selection tests," one of them moaned to this reporter. Another complained that the students of Cachar, who had not been agitating, had gained through default. A third pointed out : "Losing a year is bound to put us at a disadvantage in the job market". Clear proof of the students' desire to return to their classes is available from the city bookshops : once again books have begun selling. "Why else should they buy books now?" a city bookseller asked.

People believe that it is the professional politicians who created this mess. First, they turned a blind eye to largescale immigration in order to gain political leverage among the new populations. And now they are delaying a settlement. Circumstances catapulted students to the leadership of the movement; indeed, the students came to the fore because of the people's lack of confidence in the politicians' ability either to solve the problem or lead a genuine movement.

But the signs of weariness are visible now. And the internal debates between the "hawks" and the "doves" is finding expression in the occasional indecision in the conduct of the agitation. It was a bit of an anti-climax when the AASU announced a two-day pause after having worked up the agitation to a feverish pitch, culminating in a spectacular torchlight procession all over the state, in which millions participated, on the evening of May 16. After this two-day holiday, they announced a programme to evict "foreigners' from government lands and the tribal belts, to be followed by a nine-day nonparticipation movement by government and semi-government employees from May 21. Nobody needed to be persuaded to make these gestures a success; the non-participation, in particular, was complete. But all this was more by way of keeping the hearth warm rather than stoking up fresh fires. In truth, the tempo of the movement has clearly slackened after the AASU decided not to press its ultimatum to the government to screen and deport "foreigners" by May 15.

The Assamese certainly have not given up, far from it; but the atmosphere is surprisingly relaxed and is hardly reminiscent of the passion of a revolution. The picketers at Narengi, the pipeline headquarters of Oil India, which has been one of the focal points of the movement ever since the agitators stopped the flow of crude to Barauni on December 27, now wear a tired look. The lush green fields near the Judges' Court, that had been converted into an open prison to hold the unending crowds of demonstrators courting jail, has once again become the haunt of budding footballers, starry-eyed couples, and elderly retired folk out for a gossip. Picketers are exchanging gossip with CRP personnel and having tea with them in front of the state secretariat at Dishpur. Most shops and establishments are open. If there are fewer vehicles on the road, it is only because fuel is in short supply. Of course, vital installations continue to be disrupted. The cement plant at Bokajan has closed down. Banks and post offices are not offering normal services. But, considering the magnitude of the movement, these are at best minor inconveniences.

It was perhaps inevitable that the movement would lose some of its momentum after a while. But more important is the fact that the AASU leaders have deliberately opted for a more controlled agitation, unsure of what a combination of Army crackdown and reprisals from the non-Assamese could lead to. Plus, there is always the fear that the leadership of the movement could always pass into the hands of extremist elements if the confrontation took on Bangladesh proportions.

THE AASU leaders were anxious to resume a dialogue with the government as soon as opportunity provided. It was hardly a coincidence that Mr H. C. Sarin, the principal adviser to the Government of Assam, and Mr B. G. Verghese, of the Gandhi Peace Foundation (who was in touch with the students), talked about resumption of negotiations on the same day, May 20. Both knew that the students were willing to talk.

Sarin had been carefully preparing the stage for such a meeting ever since he assumed office on April 21. His first decision was to overrule those zealous bureaucrats of the Union Home Ministry who wanted to use force to settle the Assam problem. Simultaneously, he opened a channel for communication with the students through influential people enjoying the students' confidence. Prominent among them was the Jnanpith award winning Assamese novelist, Dr Biren Bhattacharya. Sarin met him twice for dinner at the government guest house where he was living before leaving Gauhati for talks with Mrs Gandhi on May 18. Early in May, Mrs Gandhi's troubleshooter for Assam, Mr Yashpal Kapoor, had a secret meeting with some of the student leaders and their advisers in Shillong. Sarin also kept in touch with a number of AASU advisers: Kumud Nath Sharma, the dean of the faculty of law in Gauhati University and official "interpreter" for the AASU leaders at meetings with Delhi leaders; H. K. Borpujari, professor emeritus, Gauhati University; Lolit Rajkhowa, lecturer at the Law College; Nagen Saikia, general secretary, Asom Sahitya Sabha; and Ganesh Phukan, a former finance secretary and brother-in-law of the owner of Assam Tribune. These efforts were supplemented by two former chief justices, M. C. Pathak and Baharul Islam, and a former vice-chancellor of Gauhati University, Dr Mathura Nath Goswami.

So when Sarin floated the idea of two-stage discussions—first a dialogue and then the negotiations—he was confident that his proposal would be welcome. After his return from Delhi on May 21, he held a series of meetings with some of the student leaders and their advisers to ascertain their views about this proposal. At one of those meetings, the chief secretary, Mr Rameshchandra, was also present. Sarin gave the categorical assurance that the government was willing to release the detenues; it would work out a phased programme for the reinstatement of those government employees who had been dismissed for taking part in the movement; and, lastly, it would gradually withdraw the emergency measures it had adopted as the talks progressed. The government was rudely shaken out of its belief that there would be talks when the AASU leaders made a public statement demanding restoration of the April 2 situation as an essential pre-condition for any dialogue.

But if the government was surprised by this, nobody else was. The AASU is riding a tiger from which it is not easy to dismount. Nobody can afford to carry the charge of betraying the movement as a millstone around his neck for the rest of his life, and with so many leaders in jail, any hint of compromise will not be easy. Further, the movement is already divided between the hawks and the doves. If the AASU, operating from the Cotton College Students Union Hall represents the doves, then three important constituents of the GSP—the Purbanchaliya Loka Parishad led by Nibaran Bora, the Assam Jatiyatabadi Dal led by Girin Barua, and Jatiyatabadi Yuba Chatra Parishad led by Prabin Gogoi—definitely represent the other end of the spectrum. It is these militants who are resisting the resumption of negotiations. The reason is simple. Unlike the students, these people have political ambitions, and would like to use the movement to attain power in the next elections to the State Assembly.

Nibaran Bora has never been able to win an election, although he has tried several times. Originally a socialist, he was senior to Golap Borbora who rose to become the first Janata CM of Assam—a fact which so enraged Nibaran Bora that he promised to bring down Golap Borbora's government in less than six months. But the politicians are not powerful enough to sustain the movement if the AASU withdraws; they do not have the credibility which the students have (Nibaran Bora had contested the last elections on the slogan of economic independence for the north east, but he lost). The politicians therefore will fight hard to ensure that the AASU remains within the fold. The importance of the students was evident when the Gana Sangram Parishad's call for a satyagraha failed in February after the AASU had temporarily suspended the movement.

On the other hand, no AASU leader can afford to be branded as a tool of Mrs Gandhi. The president of AASU has already become the victim of a smear campaign: it is being asked why he has not been arrested when the rest of the leaders have been detained. After all, the government clearly knows where exactly he has gone "underground". There is, in fact, a deliberate effort to drag the AASU towards a more militant stance. It is a kind of a vicious circle, and when required, blackmail is clearly being used. How?

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

On May 14 at 7 p.m., the Gana Sangram Parishad issued a statement asking the people to prepare themselves for what it described as a "massive programme of action" if the government did not start screening and deportation of the "foreigners" by May 15. On the same night, in a separate statement, the AASU asked the people not to take up any programme of detection or deportation of the foreign nationals even if the Central Government did not offer an acceptable solution by the end of the deadline of May 15 set by the AASU. Obviously the GSP and the AASU were not speaking the same language. But the very next day, the AASU fell in line, and issued a declaration that the "people of Assam will have no alternative but to take up the matter of detecting the foreigners in phases". This is how pressure tactics work.

Even then, the tone and tenor of AASU is far less shrill than that of the GSP; the former is far more keen on negotiations. An instance. Reacting to Sarin's call for a dialogue, the AASU said that one condition for the resumption of talks must be that the government would not talk of either 1967 or 1971 as the base year. Significantly, the statement did not insist on its own demand for the acceptance of 1951 as the cut-off year, implying that the negotiations could be resumed if both sides started off on a clean slate. On the other hand, the Gana Sangram Parishad insisted that "the government shall have to accept 1951 as the dateline for the identification of foreigners" before the discussions could be resumed. The two statements clearly reflect the divergent trends within the movement, and highlight the impediments in the way to a peaceful settlement.

But Delhi, after a clumsy effort at using the stick (which failed) has clearly decided to use the carrot now. The "crackdown" was defeated by the Assamese people themselves when in one defiant gesture they marched out onto the streets the day the armed forces marched in. The process of releasing the detained leaders has now begun, and the indications are that the efforts of Messrs Pathak, Islam and Goswami will bear fruit and negotiations will resume. Will both the government and the leaders of the movement be wiser in their discussions the next time around?

How backward is the North East?

By A. N. PRABHU

ALPHABETICALLY, Assam is next only to Andhra Pradesh in the list of Indian states. Economically, it is somewhere at the bottom. It is a paradox of Assam being rich and the Assamese poor. This eastern state along with six other newlyborn states and union territories—Tripura, Nagaland, Meghalaya, Mizoram, Manipur and Arunachal Pradesh—have rich resources of minerals and raw materials. Only the oil in Assam has been exploited so far.

While politicians made hay when the sun was shining, the people of the north-east grew poorer. Poverty is steep in the region. As the population has increased, so has the percentage of those living below the poverty line. In 1960-61, 16.31 per cent in the rural and 22.63 per cent in the urban areas were below poverty line. In the next decade (1970-71), the percentage increased to 33.09 for rural and 40.30 for urban areas. (Source: Seventh Finance Commission). This says enough about the meagre work done to help the downtrodden.

The only area where development has taken place is oil. Assam's daily production of crude is estimated to be worth about Rs 3 crores a day, or about Rs 90 crores a month: this would mean about Rs 1,000 crores a year. The state's annual budget has been in the region of Rs 300 crores only. Statistics give but a glimpse of the real situation. Yet they do partly indicate the reason for popular feelings: Assam produces about five million tonnes of crude a year. According to Assam Entrepreneurs' Association, which submitted a detailed memorandum to the Prime Minister in February this year, for every tonne of crude oil processed and sold, the Union Government receives a gross amount of about Rs 2,000. Of this, Assam gets only Rs 42 a tonne by way of royalty. The Union Government, however, gets as excise Rs 864 a tonne. This would mean Assam's share of oil revenue every year is Rs 29.4 crores (that is Assam's royalty plus share of excise) and the Centre's is Rs 604.8 crores.

At the present unstable rates, Assam crude is said to be worth 866,775,000 US dollars. Being highly aromatic, Assam crude could fetch even more. The association's estimate of Assam's oil production, based on the 'real value' at world prices, is about Rs 7,000 crores a year.

Meanwhile, large quantities of natural gas, an important bi-product of oil extraction, have been burnt wastefully, thanks to the apathy of Central planners. The Assamese call this "criminal wastage". The crude has been pumped out for more than four decades but no plan has been envisaged to make use of the gas.

The Assamese learnt that oil held the key to success in their talks with the Centre: it could force the Centre to concede their demands. The Assamese also witnessed how the high-paid whitecollar Oil India officials struck work, holding the country to ransom for three days last year. The Oil India strike thus set the precedent for the current agitation.

Assam supplies some 80 per cent of the domestic onshore oil production. Yet there is no downstream production. In Gujarat, Baroda has developed into a petro-chemical centre. Assam has nothing of the kind. It has a fertiliser factory and a small Methanol plant at Namrup and a DMT plant at Bongaigaon. Besides, the polyster fibre plant at Bongaigaon was originally meant to supply fibres for ultimate conversion into fabrics. The idea was to gainfully employ local weavers. But no effort has been made to process the plant's 30,000 tonnes of polyster fibre. To say this is "neglect" would be a gross understatement. The Assamese are suffering only for their humility perhaps. This, despite Assam's shortage of foodgrains which undoubtedly is at the root of the present trouble. It is preposterous that a region so rich in resources is deficient in foodgrains.

The North Eastern Council has under its administration a total geographical area of 2.55 lakh sq. kms. The area under cultivation is only 0.33 lakh sq. kms.—about 12 per cent of the land area. The total production of foodgrains in the region at present is 3.5 million tonnes. Going by the Government of India's yardstick of 474 grammes per day per head as the average food requirement, the region needs a total of 4.6 million tonnes of foodgrains. The region thus shows a deficit of 1.1 million tonnes of foodgrains a year. (Source: NEC publication Number 8). The region also has tremendous potential for generating hydel power. One estimate puts its capacity at 12,000 mw. The total availability of power at the moment is, however, 156.73 mw whereas the estimated peak demand is for 333 mw. The shortfall was 177 mw in 1979-80 (Source: NEC publications). The per capita power consumption in the north eastern region is 25 kwh compared to the all-India average of 120 kwh. Investment in the region has been among the lowest—Rs 13,858 lakhs—a little higher than Himachal Pradesh's Rs 7,128 lakhs (which is another state with high potential for hydel generation).

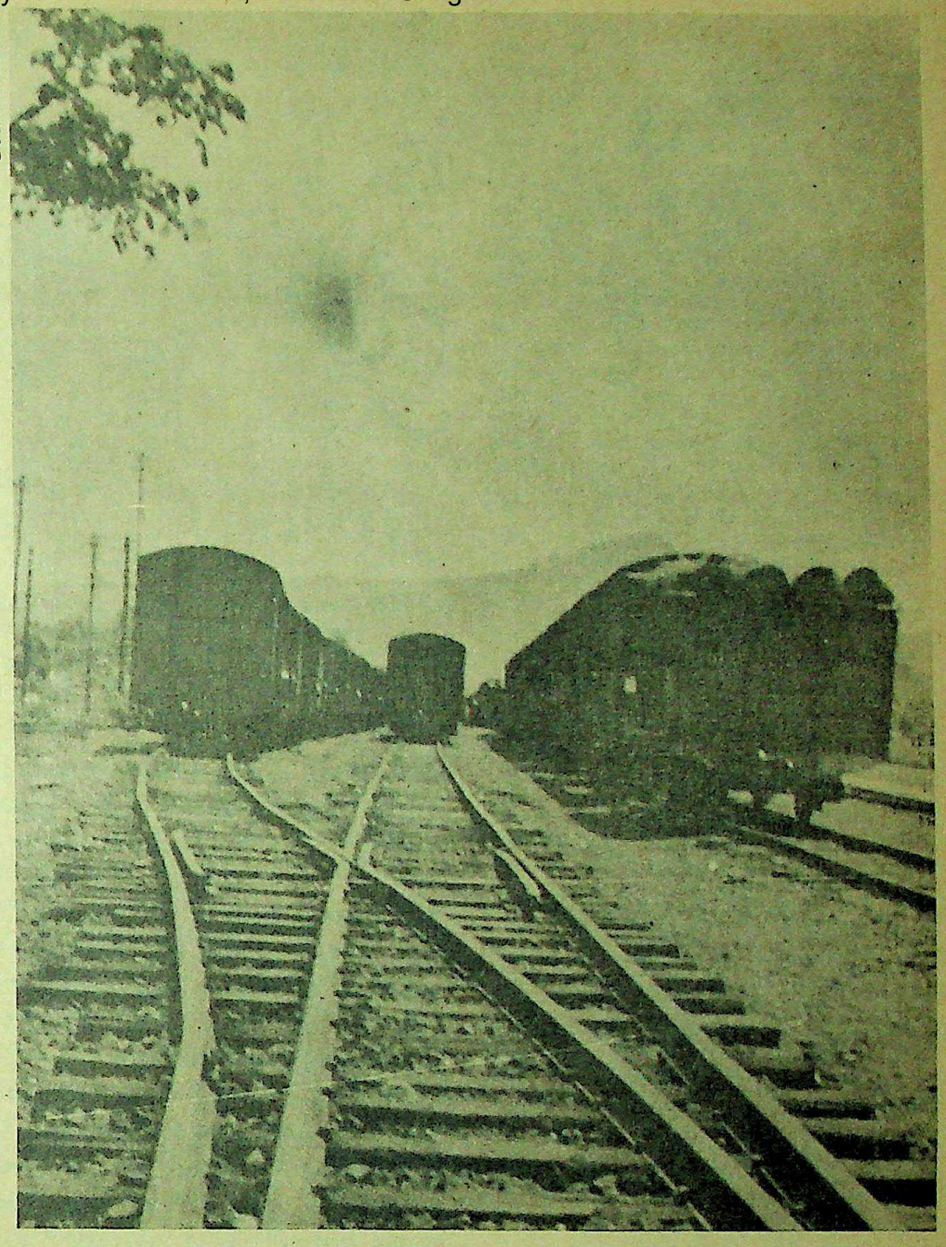
Income from excise, which is an indicator of the state industrial development, is also low. While agriculture has not yet developed appreciably, Assam's excise revenue from items other than potable liquor was Rs 2.67 lakhs against Bihar's Rs 252 lakhs, Himachal Pradesh's Rs 26.87 lakhs and Jammu and Kashmir's Rs 6.03 lakhs. Investment in irrigation not been high either. It was Rs 38 crores in 1978-79 against Andhra Pradesh's Rs 7,875 lakhs, Bihar's Rs 71,082 lakhs, Punjab's Rs 10,571 lakhs, Haryana's Rs 27,624 lakhs and Sikkim's Rs 39 lakhs. Assam's revenue from taxes showed an increase from Rs 12.27 crores in 1960-61 to Rs 61.20 crores in 1976-77. Kerala's on the other hand increased phenomenally from Rs 20.19 crores to Rs 106.49 crores in 1960-61 to Rs 208.46 crores in 1976-77 and Punjab's from Rs 25.66 crores to Rs 201.98 crores (Source: Seventh Finance Commission). The Finance Commission's estimates of comparable per capita state domestic product at current prices shows a small increase in the case of Assam. The following table has been compiled from the Seventh Finance Commission report:

COMPARABLE ESTIMATES OF PER CAPITA EXPENDITURE

	1970-71	Average 73-74 to 75-76
Andhra Pradesh	586	928
Assam	570	791
Bihar	418	645
Gujarat	845	1,134
Haryana	932	1,399
Punjab	1,063	1,586
Maharashtra	811	1,349
Madhya Pradesh	489	779
Uttar Pradesh	493	715
West Bengal	729	1,033
All-India figures	625	940

Transport and communications have been the north-east's major handicap. The region is precariously linked with North Bengal through a narrow neck of road. The result is not only that the region is economically undeveloped but the people have to pay relatively higher prices for consumer goods. Worse, it has encouraged the feeling that the region is cut off from the mainland.

Barring Assam, the entire region has only two sets of railway tracks, more symbolic than of any real value. Tripura has 12 kms of railway track and Nagaland nine kms. To add to the difficulties, there are two gauges. The entire requirement of consumer items—steel, foodgrains, cement, salt and other items—have to be brought from other parts of India. The region is rich in limestone of high quality for making cement. The Mawmluh-Cherra and Bokajan cement units in the region produce only five lakhs tonnes a year. The shortfall has to be made up by bringing cement from as far as Bihar and Orissa. At the most, the railways can carry only 3.5 lakhs tonnes. The region, therefore suffers from perpetual shortage of this vital construction material.



Devi Prasad Sinha

Stranded wagons carrying Assam's produce to the rest of India

Besides oil, the region has commercially exploitable minerals such as limestone and dolomite, fossil fuels such as coal (of which it has an estimated reserve of 1,000 million tonnes), refractory grade silimanite, graphite and fire clays. The value of mineral production in the region amounts only to 7.5 per cent of the value of national production and forms 6.9 per cent of the national income. The major contribution to this is from petroleum production. This alone accounts for 85 per cent of the total mineral production. Which means other minerals have hardly been exploited.

There is a strong case for rapid development of the north-east. The current agitation has driven the point home more sharply than ever. The first thing to do is to link the region with the rest of the country. The Government of India seems to have taken note of the intense feeling of the people: a committee of Ministers acknowledged the region's needs the other day. It noted that almost one-fifth of the total outlay in the entire country for laying new railway tracks and converting gauges has been allocated for improvement of rail communications in the north-east. The outlay for 1980-81 is about Rs 17 crores and half of this will be spent on work in Assam. The work includes the laying of a parallel line on the busy New Bongaigaon-Gauhati route and the construction of six new tracks to serve Assam and other north eastern states. The length of these tracks is about 213 kms and laying them is estimated to cost about Rs 52 crores. Besides, a techno-economic survey which proposed laying new tracks in the Lumding-Badarpur section costing Rs 2.3 crores has been approved.

One tends to be cynical about th government setting up committees which merely "take stock" of the progress made. The general feeling is that they are useless. It is for the government to prove the cynics wrong. ■

'Mrs Gandhi is Sanjay's rubber stamp'

The news was hardly surprising: it was inevitable that the all-but-public quarrel between Prime Minister Indira Gandhi and Congress (I) Secretary General H. N. Bahuguna would end in the latter leaving the former's Party. This time Bahuguna added a touch of difference to his resignation—not merely did he leave the Party, but he also resigned his Parliamentary seat since he had won on the Congress (I) ticket. M. J. AKBAR met him at his house at 5 Sunehri Bagh Road in Delhi on May 21. He was not planning to stay in this spacious Ministerial bungalow much longer; he would move as soon as he got another house. His supporters from UP were dropping in to see him and take instructions on whom to support in the coming Assembly elections. Bahuguna himself was off that night to Allahabad, Lucknow and Kanpur to begin his campaign against Mrs Gandhi.

Q YOU have changed four Parties in the last four years. Is there no place for H. N. Bahuguna in Party politics?

A: Since the imposition of the Emergency, Indian politics has been passing through a very uneven phase. When you accuse me of changing Parties, I would only like to tell you that the Congress in which I have worked for 41 years, the Congress of Gandhi and Nehru, the Congress of the freedom struggle, gave us a value system, a grounding in politics. This value system was totally derailed when the Emergency was imposed. Therefore, in 1977, I think it was the call of duty and ideological commitment to have forsaken the Party in the interest of the nation. The change in 1977 was consistent with the basic values of the Congress because democracy, freedom of expression, independence of judiciary, etcetera were restored. Therefore, that battle for enancipation should not be considered a change of Parties, we participated on the right side. But, I do agree, that since the Party which was returned to power was a conglomerate of varied ideas, composed of elements who were also inconsistent with the ideological grounding which we had received in the Congress, such as the Jana Sangh, it would have been wise on my part not to have remained a part of the Janata, not to have become a part of that Government, not to have agreed to the merger of the CFD in the Janata. I have already admitted that. I have said that I owe an apology to the nation for this. The only consideration before me was that a new alternative (the Janata) was trying to take birth, and I would have been accused of sabotage if I had tried to raise the banner of revolt right in the beginning. This happened to be my primary consideration in going along with the stream for some time, and trying not to change the current. My disenchantment, for that matter the nation's disenchantment, with the Janata Party grew very fast. I have earlier stated the reasons in Sunday. I tried to correct things. I argued, I pleaded (to change) the Janata's communal character, to make its policies socialist. Nobody in the Janata Party can say that my change was a sudden change.

As Cabinet Minister, I would not have been a dumb, driven cattle.

Now, when I left the Janata I did not join the Lok Dal: that is a common misconception. I revived the Congress for Democracy. We had a convention, drew up a 31-point programme, showed it to everybody, including Chaudhury Charan Singh. I met dead ends. The only person who (responded), on her own, was Mrs Indira Gandhi. And when she met me, and talked to me in a language which was not like her normal style. (I have known her all my life, we have been in the same Party for 47 years, she comes from the same town as I. I have known her from childhood), I found that there was a change, an element of repentance for past mistakes, and I thought that that perhaps was the only way that I could help bring the administration of the country back on the rails. I also believed that Mrs Gandhi would provide the healing touch. The administration had been badly shaken, the quality of governance had fallen. Communal riots had overshadowed our whole political life. The nation was losing its very identity. At that point of time I thought that a changed Indira Gandhi, who approached me on her own, where I was approaching everybody else...Having failed to see salvation anywhere else, I fell into this, well, trap, in good faith. I believe that human beings do change.

Q: You never suspected that you were being used?

A: I did, but Mrs Gandhi said, 'I have come to you only because I flet that we had done a wrong to you'.

Q: Were these her very words?

A: These are her very words. And she asked me, 'Did I go to anyone else?' This made me feel that she was being very honest. The way she called me, accepted 30 of the CFD's 31 points, included them in the manifesto, told everybody 'We are including these points in the manifesto and Mr Bahuguna and Mr Narasimha Rao will join them up'...Well, I couldn't bargain for anything more. After all, a political agreement is not written on stamped paper. I thought Mrs Gandhi had begun collecting the pieces, Indian politics had become so fragmented by then, and, I am sorry to say, continues to be so...This long letter of mine (sent before the resignation) to Mrs Gandhi shows the aberrations that have crept into her politics.

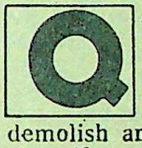
I first wrote to Mrs Gandhi on January 7, even before she had constituted her government—nobody can say that I did this because she did not make me a Minister, there was no ministry then—outlining what should be done. I talked of national consensus. I talked of applying the healing touch. I talked of assuring the administration that there would be no victimisation. I talked of looking into the north-east. My point is: what is a political Party and what should politicians do in this country? Share the booty quietly, accept the aberrations, or point your finger out, even at the risk of being pointed back at?

Q: Mrs Gandhi, in her reply to you, has implied that you would not have created problems for her if she had made you a Minister.

A: Then why didn't she do it? It was easy enough for her. She knew very well that my being inside the Cabinet means trouble for her. She didn't take me because she knew that it would be difficult for her to carry me along. I would not have been a dumb, driven cattle, I am a human being.

Q: Are you suggesting that the other Ministers in Mrs Gandhi's present Cabinet are dumb, driven cattle?

A: I am sorry, I won't say that, they are very good people, but at the moment they have assumed that posture. They are honourable people, but they have assumed that posture (of being dumb, driven cattle). I have been writing to Mrs Gandhi continuously. I raised almost all questions, from the simple removal of the ban on textbooks imposed by the Janata, to the creation of a peacekeeping force, onto to a commission to find out the conditions of those living below the poverty line. But all this went unheeded. She tells me I keep busy thinking about myself. What else is she doing? (getting excited) Changing officers, punishing officers, promoting officers, rewarding officers, rewarding people who have stood by her: her only test is, who is with her, her test is not who has served the nation, or who has the capacity to serve the nation best. Her only worry is who is with her.



ARE you trying to imply that a structure for dictatorship is being created?

A: This country will demolish any such structure in no time if anybody tries to create one, but these are the trends, and they should be checked well in time. Therefore, I went on raising my voice. Anybody should see that if I was interested in the loaves and fishes of office, then the way to it did not lie in the manner I behaved from January onwards. Raising questions, raising policy issues, raising objections, speaking out in public. In the Hindi newpaper Hindustan, in mid-January, I gave a interview, and one question was what would happen to the government servants who had dealt with Maruti or the Shah commission. I said that the Congress culture is that no government servant shall be punished if he was doing his duty at the behest of the outgoing government. But Mrs Gandhi did not heed that. From N. K. Sngh to R. C. Sharma is a long story. The number of persons sent out and sent in is not something small. You cannot have personalised administration, it should be impersonal, it should be objective, to maintain the morale of the administration.

Now, I have made a public statement that the Congress culture is opposed to such a thing and I hoped that this government would not do such a thing. Do you think Mrs Gandhi did not know what I was saying. I was saying this even at public meetings. All through my election campaign (for the 1980 Parliament) I spoke against the Emergency. Wherever I went I said that the Emergency was a bad thing, and I want to tell you this again. I never gave up my posture with regard to Mrs Gandhi, I merely said that she wanted me to join her, she says she is a changed person,· I took the people into full confidence all around the country. But the Press was so angry with me at that time that this went largely unreported except in a few places. Therefore, you cannot say that this eruption of mine is based on anger arising out of personal ambition, that is less than fair. You might ask, why didn't I say all this earlier. If I had resigned just after the Cabinet had been formed, people would have turned around and said that just because I did not get a place in the Cabinet I was behaving in this fashion. Even after I sent in my resignation from the Party posts, I waited for nine days, hoping that she would call me in front of a working committee meeting and ask me to substantiate the charges. I waited and waited, I gave her full nine days. I have patience. But these nine days have been considered a loss by my friends.

Q: You mean you could have begun campaigning against Mrs Gandhi earlier?

A: I am not going in for narrow political gains in the Assembly elections. That's not my idea, that's not my purpose. My purpose is to raise the political climate of this country to a level from where nobody will be able to harm its basic structure.

Q: Have you found any, what might be called 'Emergency' tendencies, in the last few months?

A: The way the administration is being demoralised by supersessions, promotions, demotions, transfers, and the way the (administrative) apparatus is being freely used for personal purposes is a bad sign, a bad beginning.

Q: You have said that Sanjay Gandhi is the real boss of Congress (I). What do you mean by that?

A: He makes all the decisions. Mrs Gandhi is merely a rubber stamp. I have known this from within. Though I have never met him after the elections—except once, when I went to Mrs Gandhi's house to congratulate her on January 7 or 8 I bumped into him, and I congratulated him on his victory and he congratulated me: except for those few sentences, I have not seen him, I have not talked to him. But I can watch things happening. Even when Mrs Gandhi does not know anything, orders are made, issued.

Q: Can you give any example?

A: Well, this happened before everybody. During the Parliamentary election campaign, Sanjay Gandhi got Virbahadur Singh of UP nominated to the central parliamentary board, as a permanent invitee, like Mr Gundu Rao. After the elections were over, Mr Virbahadur Singh came to attend a CPB meeting. So, 12 or 13 of us were sitting, including Mrs Gandhi. Mr Virbahadur came a little late. Mrs Gandhi herself said, "Aap andar kyon aa rahe hain, aap rukiye bahar zara. Aapko kuch kahna hai to baad mein kahiye (Why are you coming inside, there is a meeting going on. If you have anything to say, tell me afterwards)". Then I quietly whispered to her, "I think he has been appointed as a special invitee to the CPB. I haven't seen any order from you, but I saw it in the Press." Then Mrs Gandhi told him, "Accha, accha, baithiye (Okay, okay, sit down)." I made discreet enquiries about the appointment and found out that Mr Sanjay Gandhi had told Mr Antulay that he should be made a special invitee. Mrs Gandhi knew nothing about it. Then, look at the manner in which the Ministers are taking instructions from Mr Sanjay Gandhi, or the two secretaries of the Congress (I), Mr Buta Singh and Mr Antulay, take orders from him.

Q: Are you suggesting that what happened during the Emergency is happening again?

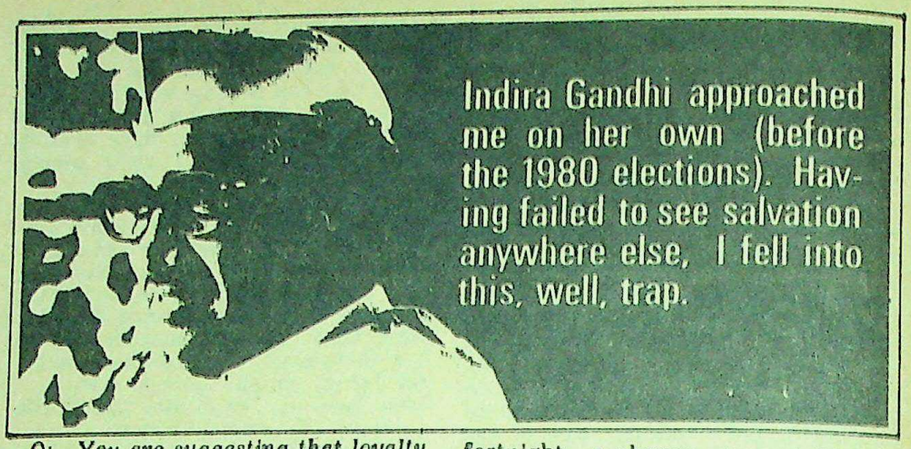
A: I am saying that what happened during the Emergency was bad enough. What is happening now is the beginning of a bad type of situation unless it is checked. I think my resignation may shake Mrs Gandhi, I hope Mrs Gandhi will wake up and realise the situation before it is too late for her to correct it.

Q: Do you really think that your resignation will shake her?

A: I hope so. Shake means make her realise that there are people who can raise their voice. Perhaps she was taking everybody for granted, she will not do that now. I hope that some respectability will revert back to the Congress leaders.

Q: Do you think that the move you have made will have a snowball effect among the Congress leadership?

A: That I can't say. Rank and file, yes. I have already received telegrams, letters from almost every district of UP. Leading Congress (I) people now say that they would like to strengthen my hands. I haven't counted, but yesterday (the day Bahuguna resigned) alone about 300 messages came. I have been receiving telephone calls from Madhya Pradesh, Rajasthan, Maharashtra, Bihar, West Bengal, Tamil Nadu, Karnataka, saying, 'Thank you very much. Nobody could have done this. This is a new chapter you are adding to Parliamentary procedure.'



Q: YOU have made another serious allegation that smugglers, hijackers have been given Congress (I) tickets in the Assembly polls. Would you care to substantiate this?

A: Well, Mrs Gandhi, in her reply to me, has not said no to this charge.

Q: Would you like to identity anyone?

A: I would not like to name people. It's not fair, but who does not know who the hijackers are? Who does not know who the smugglers are? People know it. People who were arrested under COFEPOSA, two of them in UP, a person who is a leading smuggler in Bihar and has many cases and convictions to his credit, has been given the Congress (I) ticket. You know what COFEPOSA means? It means that the Government of India, not the state government, is suggesting detention.

Q: You are suggesting that loyalty overrides all other considerations.

A: Personal, personal, it's all personal. They want the whole apparatus of state to be run as a personal business.

Q: Can you effectively challenge Mrs Gandhi by remaining outside all Parties?

A: Certainly. I need not join a political Party. But an apparatus will emerge, and I am more than sure that Congressmen—I have great faith in Congressmen—will rise to the occasion.

Q: Will your friend, the Shahi Imam, campaign against the Congress (I) in this Assembly elections?

A: Once again I will say that we have not done it for the marginal purpose of a few seats in the Assembly elections. Otherwise I would have resigned earlier and started campaigning long back.

Q: How, do you see the future of the nation?

A: The eighties are going to be a very, very difficult period. The economic situation is going to be difficult, the north-east is already in the doldrums, the internal administrative machine is passing through the worst phase in its life. The apparatus of state is already being damaged. In view of the drought, the high price of energy, the international tensions, the spread of armaments and the movement of large fleets and armies, all this is going to cause a very difficult time ahead. It will require political genius to meet the challenge of the times. I am afraid that the present outfit with which Mrs Gandhi wants to manage the affairs of state is too poor to foot the bill. It requires a great deal of comprehension, understanding, goodwill, and, above all, objectivity, which is totally lacking. I wish well of Mrs Gandhi, maybe she will change. But unless she changes I see grave times. There will be social tensions, economic tensions. Aren't you seeing the growing number of atrocities on Harijans everywhere? Just recently in UP, in Almora and Hathras, we have seen this. Every day this is happening in spite of Mrs Gandhi's claim that her government believes in the protection of the weak. Now, how long can she say that the Janata had spoilt things? Well, that's why she came, because the Janata had spoilt things. I am not boasting; but I became Chief Minister of UP, and within a fortnight a change was visible to everybody. You can ask the administrators, you can ask the common man whether or not a change was visible. How long can we continue in this darkness, and hear that in the last three years the Janata ruined everything? Is it that the work of 30 years before the Janata came was so fragile that the whole thing collapsed in three years? And even if it was broken in three years, why couldn't it be rebuilt in three weeks? We could have started so many things. For instance, a national wage structure for teachers: a committee could have been set up to go into this. This is only one small example. But nothing was started. How much time does Mrs Gandhi need? How much is she asking for? This country will hardly give ten months.

Q: How long do you think Mrs Gandhi will last?

A: You can see my interview given to Hindustan in mid-January. I said, 100 days will prove whether or not this government has acquired a sense of direction and purpose. I am sorry to say that I have come to the conclusion that this government has no (direction or purpose). There will be trouble for Mrs Gandhi if she does not sort out things within a year. I will tell you something. Before the Shahi Imam agreed to campaign for Mrs Gandhi during the last elections, he took it in writing from me that if something was not done within 100 days, he would leave. I wish Mrs Gandhi well, she is the Prime Minister of the country. I wish her government a sense of direction, the healing touch this country needs it.

Q: Do you thik that if Mrs Gandhi gets enough legislators in the Rajya Sabha she will try to change the Constitution?

A: I don't know. She is becoming very unpredictable.

Q: Unpredictable?

A: She is only doing what suits her in the short term. Subjectivity is the primary consideration. Personal outlook, personal gains, personal loss (no commitment) to any cause, not to any ideas.

Q: Loyalty also to Sanjay Gandhi?

A: They have become inseparable now. The mother means the son, and the son means the mother.

Q: Will you contest the seat you have just resigned, when the election comes around?

A: Wait and see.

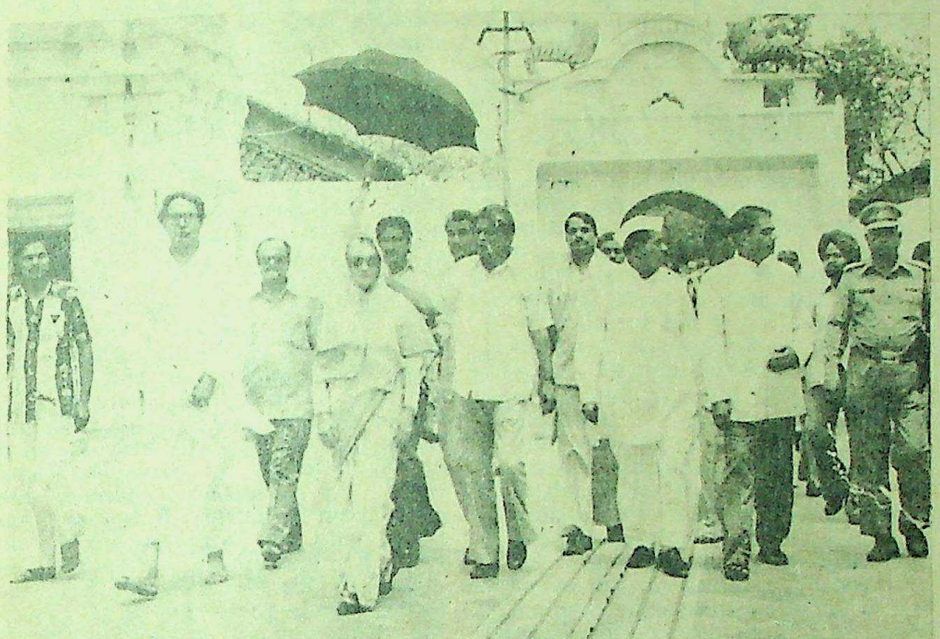
Can anyone stop the Congress(I)?

By M. J. AKBAR



Mrs Gandhi in Rajiv Lochan temple of Raipur district with V. C. Shukla.

TWENTY-three kilometers to the west of Lucknow is Malihabad, a small town which has played a disproportionately large role in the history and culture of Awadh. Burqa-clad women and fair faced men with bristling martial moustaches, indicate the character of this town. This is Pathan territory, prosperous fields, gardens of the delicious kalam mango, and this land has provided the commanders and soldiers to a succession of armies. (The Hindi film Junoon was partly shot in one of the oldest *haveli*s of Malihabad and some of the elderly family women were upset that in a house where once tigers roared, the sounds of dancers—nachaniyas—was now being heard.) Baijnath Kureel, a senior and respected member of the Congress (I), is contesting from here and his victory is considered all but certain. Apart from the personal respect which Mr Kureel commands, the fact that his main opponent is from the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) is enough to remove any doubt among the Muslims about whom they should vote for. For them this is a classic Congress constituency represented by a national Congressman.

The only surprise in the Assembly election of 1980 is why all the Congress (I) candidates in UP cannot be as sanguine as Mr Kureel is about his victory. The opposition, which seemed crushed by late April has suddenly revived by the last week of the campaign. Why isn't Mrs Gandhi getting a two-thirds majority in all the nine states which are going to the polls? Why have doubts begun to arise particularly about four states —UP, Punjab, Orissa and Tamil Nadu? It is hard to believe that Mrs Gandhi will not win, but even Congress (I) campaign managers are not as confident as they were when the nominations were being filed.

This is the Summer of Apathy. There is a marked disillusionment among the people, particularly since so much was expected of 'The Hope of 1980' after the despair of the Janata. For the people, all that seems to have happened after the return of Mrs Gandhi is that prices have continued to go up while the administration has continued to dither.

The size of all political meetings including Mrs Gandhi's has been astonishingly small. The blazing summer sun was not enough reason for the poor crowds. Only in the last phase of electioneering was something akin to excitement visible. Tamil Nadu perhaps has been the most active: loudspeakers have been blaring out songs pregnant with political hints and films with blatant political messages have been showing on Madras screens for most of May. When Mrs Gandhi began her month-long election tour from the 'safe' state of Madhya Pradesh, both Congress and opposition leaders were astonished by the poor response she got. In fact, it was this more than anything else which put heart into a broken and disintegrating opposition. Coupled with this was the obvious anger among vast numbers of Congressman over the distribution of tickets. A whole new class of legislators was being created and the traditional Congressmen, who formed the backbone of the Party, suddenly found themselves with nothing in hand and nothing to look forward to. Mr H. N. Bahuguna was only the most striking example of a widespread phenomenon within the Congress (I). And the Congress (I) also realised that it would have to begin paying the price of being a ruling Party. Congressmen were regretting towards the end of May that President's Rule had been imposed. They no longer had any clear targets; there was no longer a Banarasi Das in UP or a Ram Sundar Das in Bihar or an MGR in Tamil Nadu to blame for all the states' ills —drought relief, price rise, diesel shortage, law and order. Instead there was a Governor and an administration which the people clearly identified with the Congress (I).

Of course the ruling Party benefited from President's Rule, particularly through reorganisation of the state machinery. UP has seen thousands of transfers of everyone from constables to gazetted officers in a government effort to make the administration more pliable to the Congress (I) needs. And during the elections the help of the administration can be invaluable for any Party. The Governor of Uttar Pradesh has even gone on record with an astonishingly partisan statement in favour of the Congress (I). He said that he had doubts about whether a viable coalition government (which is the very best that the opposition can hope for) could be formed. In Punjab the stories of Garcha, the unfortunate MP involved in the Poornima case, were making the rounds and being exploited by the Akalis. They had even created a slogan out of this: "Congress ki yehi pahchan; Bagal mein larki, haath mein jaam (This is how you recognise the Congress—a woman beside you and bottle in hand)".

But the most effective weapon in the hands of the opposition remained prices, which was hardly surprising. Mrs Gandhi's victory was partly due to rising prices, and people expected her to control them. Instead, sugar disappeared during the crucial marriage season. The verse with which the Lok Dal wooed the women in the north was "Maar gaya mahangai. Bahena; Bik gaya mera saara gahana; Ab mat sun Indiraka kahena (Rising prices has killed my sister; All my jewellery has been sold; Don't listen to Indira anymore)". In Maharashtra a Congress MP found that the audience which would wait for hours

If one were asked to name the safest state for Mrs Gandhi one would have to name Gujarat. The Congress (I) should gain comfortable victories in Maharashtra, Rajasthan and Madhya Pradesh (although Nanaji Deshmukh insisted to this writer that the BJP would win in MP). One state in which Mrs Gandhi should do better than conventionally expected is Bihar. Not only has the choice of the Congress (I) candidates been comparatively less controversial but the opposition is genuinely divided. In theory the total opposition is divided into nine or ten groups but in practice this is hardly the case. In Punjab, the fight is between Congress (I) and the Akali-CPI-CPI (M) alliance with the BJP being a factor only in a few constituencies and nobody else making any significant difference. In Maharashtra, it is again a triangular contest with the Congress (I), the Congress (U), the BJP and the Janata Party making different triangles in different constituencies. And so on. Even in UP, apart from the 80 odd seats where the BJP has a presence, the contest is a straight one between the Congress (I) and the Lok Dal. No one disputes the fact that not only is the Lok Dal an important force in UP but it is going to do much better than the forecasts of many commentators would indicate. But in Bihar, not only is the opposition split but each splinter has its own following.

Let us compare the opposition in UP and Bihar. In UP neither the Congress (U) nor the CPI can make any real difference but in Bihar the CPI is strong enough for the joke to gain currency that the CPI should be renamed the CPB (Communist Party of Bihar). Similarly the Congress (U) under Ram Lakhan Yadav cannot be sneezed at. After all the Party has four MPs with important regional leaders like Abdul Gafoor and Dharam Bir Sinha. While the Lok Dal is a credible force in UP and can, with some legitimacy, claim to be the nucleus around which the opposition can form a coalition, the Lok Dal in Bihar can hardly make such a claim. Its individual strength, will in fact be genuinely tested in this election. The Janata Party is dead in UP but in Bihar, Satyendra Narain Singh has not yet allowed it to die. Lastly there is no H. N. Bahuguna in Bihar. Bihar is so confused that it is difficult to see the only Party which can promise an uncomplicated Government, the Congress (I) losing, despite the last minute efforts at unity by the Lok Dal, Janata and Congress (U). Indeed, if the Congress (I) loses in Bihar its fortunes will have declined at an unheard of pace. In Tamil Nadu the traditional enemies are once again in battle. It is clear that MGR, with the sympathy emanating from his martyrdom after the dismissal of his Government, has the largest single vote. But is his following strong enough in electoral terms to challenge and defeat the combined vote of the Congress(I) and the DMK? According to one Congress (I) theorist MGR might walk off with as much as 40 per cent of the votes but he will lose the battle for seats as the 25 per cent of the Congress (I) votes added to the 25 per cent DMK votes will give the alliance a clear lead. Soon enough we will see which theories were valid.

The opposition in Orissa bases its confidence on history. In the elections of 1971 the people of Orissa on the same day at the same general election gave Mrs Gandhi a handsome majority in the Lok Sabha but simultaneously defeated her in the Assembly polls. Both Biju Patnaik and Nandini Satpathy are contesting in the Assembly elections and projecting themselves as future CMs. Are they finished or can they still convert their personalities into state-level votes? And just in case there is no clear majority for the Congress(I), will Nandini Satpathy take her band of MLAs and lead a Congress (I) Ministry? Of course, there might in the end be no need to answer most of these questions. The Congress(I) could form Governments without any help everywhere. Certainly one month ago nobody expected the opposition to prevent a clean sweep by Mrs Gandhi. The only news is that it might be unwise to declare victory before the returning officers, in the hundreds of constituencies, officially announce the results. ■

Can he tilt the U.P. balance?

Bahar chahe to ley jaaye ham se rang-e-hayat
Hamara khoon-e-jigar hai har ik chaman ke liye.
(Urdu couplet on a board outside the entrance to Mr H. N. Bahuguna's house in Delhi)

SEVEN p.m., May 23, Kanpur. A stage has been erected at one intersection of a busy chowk, and a huge larger-than-life plywood cutout of a striding Bahuguna dominates the scene. A large crowd is waiting in silence. By seven thirty, the star of the evening comes: he is literally carried onto the stage on the shoulders of enthusiastic admirers. H. N. Bahuguna has come to explain to the people of Kanpur why he left the Party he had joined six months ago. And the crux of his message was: vote for whoever you like, but don't vote for Mrs Gandhi. The people listened with rapt attention. We will only know by June 1 whether his message has made its impact on the people or not: after all, Bahuguna's appeal had one drawback; he had no specific Party to offer as an alternative to the Congress (I).

A city like Kanpur, with a strong Muslim population, and a large working class, is a good place to test the impact that Bahuguna can make on the coming Assembly polls in UP. His support is largely among Muslims, the people of the hill areas, and sections of the urban population. But in a situation where the gap between the Congress (I) vote and the opposition (led by Chaudhary Charan Singh's Lok Dal) vote in a couple of percentage points, any shift in the voting could mean the difference between a narrow victory and a narrow defeat.

The 1974 Assembly elections in UP are still remembered with a variety of emotions, ranging from awe to disgust. The Congress was in poor shape, but Chief Minister Bahuguna was in charge of the Party's campaign. In what is considered a miracle of many kinds, Bahuguna managed to get the Congress 213 seats — less than a majority, but enough to form a government with a handful of defectors. Can Bahuguna do for the opposition what it did for the ruling Party in 1974 — that is, tip the nearly balanced scales?

There is no doubt about one thing Bahuguna's bitterness against the Congress (I). On May 21, he began his campaign against Mrs Gandhi from a town which is called home by both Bahuguna and Mrs Gandhi: Allahabad. He then went to Lucknow, where he addressed a meeting on the evening of May 21 — the same evening Mrs Gandhi held two roadside meetings in the city (this was the first time she was holding street-corner meetings in Lucknow; on every previous occasion she addressed the crowds at more spacious locations). Bahuguna then moved to Kanpur, and from there, via Delhi to Garhwal, from where he won the seat in Parliament. After Garhwal, he would return to the plains, and finally end his efforts with a last meeting in Patna. But will this be sufficient?

Mr Bahuguna may have changed sides four times in the last four years, but there has been one element of consistency in all this — each time, he has ended up on the winning side, whether the odds seemed stacked for him or against him. Has he joined the winning side again? It might not seem so at the moment. But it would be foolish to underestimate him. His secretary, Rahman, told me that he intended to put up another couplet on the door, along with the one quoted at the beginning when Bahuguna moves on to his next, non-ministerial, house in Delhi. This couplet will go like this:

Kuch aur bhi hain meri zindagi ki tasweerein
Main woh nahin jo mere doston ne samjha hai.

The birth of a new lobby

MR Bahl is an affluent restaurateur and runs one of the best eating houses in south Bombay. He is contesting the elections as the Congress (I) candidate from the Colaba constituency. Mr Bahl represents the new lobby that 1, Safdarjung Road wants to strengthen in Bombay, the Mecca of money, the treasure island of the country's political money-hunters. In the last few years the business community though primarily siding with the Congress (I), had become an unreliable ally. In fact, in 1977 business houses were divided, with the Marwaris financing the Congress (I) and the more traditional business houses siding with the right-wing Parties. This was accentuated by the victory of the Janata in 1977, and continued in the 1980 Parliamentary elections. When business men realised that the Janata's days were numbered, they hedged their bets. While their predilections remained basically where they were, they went out of their way to contribute to the Congress (I) coffers.

Since businessmen have become unreliable, most of them being fair-weather friends, 1, Safdarjung Road has clearly decided on a lobby of its own, namely the hotel and tourism lobby. This is where Mr Bahl becomes very important.

The hotel lobby has always been pampered by the government. In fact, Mr Oberoi got his second tower sanctioned in Bombay only through the influence of the Congress (I) in the Bombay Municipal Corporation. It is said that during the Emergency, there was a proposal to bring down prices of eatables by 12.5 per cent in the hotels. It was put to practice in all the grade two and grade three hotels and restaurants, but the five star hotels refused to toe the line. They lobbied ceaselessly to be kept out of the purview of the 12.5 per cent cut, and reportedly succeeded after donating the proceeds of three days' sales to the Chief Minister's fund and the Prime Minister's fund. While the hotel lobby is in a position to render enormous favours, from rooms to food, it is also a milch cow. How useful it is to have the hotel lobby on one's side becomes obvious when one reads how the political lobby, whether for tickets or change of Chief Ministers, meets in hotel suites. In Bombay, suites at the Ritz and the Nataraj serve as shamianas for the Maharashtra Pradesh Congress variety of politicians. The Taj suite is used by the likes of Mr Devaraj Urs and Rajni Patel. As a fund collection source it is a bottomless treasury. For instance, it is said that the Sharad Pawar Cabinet had taken a decision to restrict the distribution of licences for new bars in the city and suburbs. But according to several hoteliers, these licences could be had for Rs two lakhs and there were about 20 licences given during Mr Pawar's regime.

The coming days will see the hotel lobby growing stronger under the patronage of the Congress (I) which is expected to sweep the polls in Maharashtra. Mr Bahl's main rival is former MLA Ranjit Bhanu of the Janata (JP) and the other is the BJP's Harish Jagtiani, son-in-law of the top tax consultant. Mr Bahl is supported ironically by another Janata restaurateur Mr Manmohan Singh Bedi who probably has the country's one and only 300-seater restaurant in Bombay. One can see how Party interests take a back seat when property interests are at stake. Mr Bhanu is depending on the votes of the hotel workers who number about 15,000 in the Colaba constituency.

The sugar lobby will be fighting an interesting battle in Mr Sharad Pawar's constituency, Baramati. His Congress (I) rival is Mr Vinayakrao Chopade, who belongs to the shepherd community. Chairman of the Meera Cooperative Sugar Factory, Mr Chopade has not only the support of the sitting MP, Mr Shankar Rao Patil, who won by 17,000 votes in this Assembly Constituency but also the support of the Janata sugar baron Mr Sambajirao Kakade. Mr Kakade is a bitter rival of Mr Pawar and added to his many grouses against Mr Pawar is the fact that the latter supported Mr Mohan Dharia from the Baramati parliamentary constituency in the last parliamentary elections against Mr Kakade who was the Janata candidate.

Dry Gujarat's days are numbered

IRRESPECTIVE of Party labels, dry laws have always been followed religiously in Gujarat, one of the last bastions of the policy of total prohibition. But the spell is breaking now, with the Congress(I) tribal leader, Mr Jhinabhai Darji, openly championing liberalisation. Never before in the home State of the puritanical Prime Minister Morarji Desai, has it been a poll issue. Even now other Congress(I) leaders, including Mr Madhavsingh Solanki, aspirant to Chief Ministership, are uneasy about publicly declaraing the prohibition policy that they will follow if the Party is returned to power. Privately, most leaders confess that strict prohibition laws have failed. This is constantly underscored by the recurring tragedies caused by illicit and poisonous liquor drinking by the poor.

Abstemious to a fault, Gujaratis have been in the past quarter century raised on the belief that drinking was bad, not only for one's health but also for one's soul. So that while lone voices of dissent were heard here and there, none dared to make it a political issue — not even the daredevil politician, Chimanbhai Patel!

Jhinabhai, hailing from the tribal belt of south Gujarat from where Mrs Gandhi set off on a political comeback trail, is a sort of maverick in Gujarat politics. He is credited with the political theory that the Congress(I) needed the backing only of the poor—comprising Kshatriyas, Harijans, Adivasis and Muslims (KHAM) to make a clean sweep. He now wants prohibition to be liberalised and though his colleagues are fighting shy of saying it openly, in the event of the Congress(I) coming to power, Gujarat will soon have a relaxed policy, more or less on the lines of Maharashtra.

The dry laws have been in force for a long time in the state and no one knows for sure how much the exchequer is losing in revennue. It could be anywhere between Rs. 10 and 30 crores. Way back in 1969, the Gandhi centenry year, the state Government had asked economists at the prestigious Sardar Patel Institute of Economic and Social Research to look at the economic impact of prohibition on the slumdwellers in Ahmedabad. Their finding was that it has had no impact on their poverty. The report incidentally has never been published.

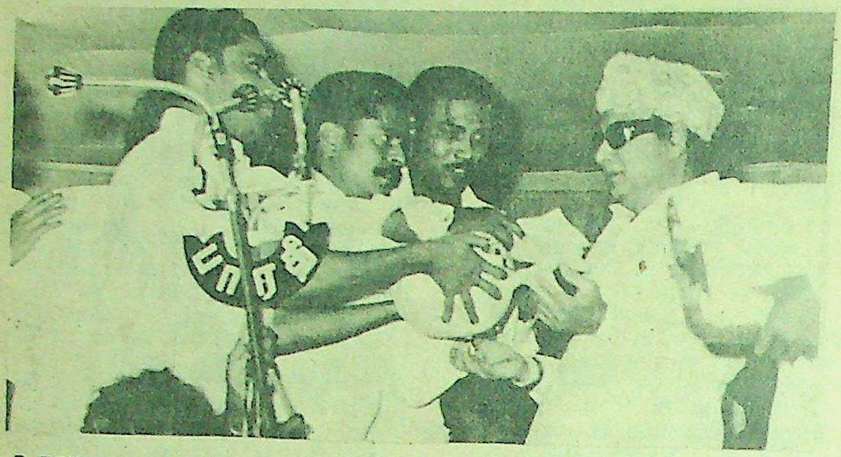
MGR without an answer



MGR is a little sore that his political film Idudhan en Badil (This is my answer) may not be completed before the elections. But the songs from the film are being used everywhere. Songs which praise Annadurai's sagacity, extol his humanity and bemoan the betrayers who discredited Anna (for betrayers read Messrs Karunanidhi and company).

If the DMK was the first to launch the poll campaign, its rival AIADMK was not far behind. The DMK is contesting 110 seats in conjunction with its ally the Congress (I) which is also contesting 110 seats. The AIADMK is contesting 172 seats and the remaining 62 seats are being shared between the two Communist Parties, the Gandhi Kamraj National Congress, the Lok Dal and the Congress. There is jubilation in the DMK camp that Mrs Gandhi has confirmed that Karunanidhi will indeed become the next Chief Minister if their "progressive alliance" wins in the election. But senior DMK leaders are apprehensive about the outcome of the elections because they know that Karunanidhi does not today have the same charisma that he possessed in 1971. And since the DMK is contesting only 109 seats, Karunanidhi's dependence on the Congress (I) is inevitable.

But MGR is not worried. In fact, he is convinced of his personal charisma. Of late the rural masses have flocked to listen to him. Naturally he has been thinking about victory: "If we win a majority and form a Government, we won't mind working in cooperation with Mrs Gandhi at the Centre. The January election (to the Lok Sabha) was more of a vote for Mrs Gandhi to establish a stable Government at the Centre. The May state Assembly election will be a vote for a stable and corruption-free Government at the state level and surely the people will choose the AIADMK and its allies." Though MGR's Tamil is no match for Karunanidhi's hard-hitting alliterative prose, he has nevertheless managed to muster a group of writers who have come out with carping criticism of the DMK leader. Very little criticism, however, has been directed against Mrs Gandhi. When MGR's electoral partners like the CPI (M) and the CPI criticise Mrs Gandhi, the film actor-politician is quite embarrassed. This has had an effect. The CPI (M) leader, P. Ramamurthy, has recently remarked that his Party's support to MGR is not unconditional and may not last forever.

Disqualified by luck

THE withdrawal of one candidate from 1,400 makes no headline news. But the matter was different in Ladnun constituency of Rajasthan. When the returning officer of Ladnun Assembly constituency, after the publication of the list of withdrawals, started allotting symbols to candidates, Deepankar who had filed his nomination papers as the Congress(I) candidate was surprised to find that he had not been allotted the hand symbol. He was informed that he would not be given the symbol since he had already withdrawn from the elections. But Deepankar would not agree since he "had withdrawan only one of the two nomination papers filed by him". The returning officer observed that the rules provided only for withdrawal of candidature and not of nomination paper. Thus Deepankar was no longer an eligible candidate. So the question of allotment of any symbol to him did not arise. The officer also added that the list of withdrawals, which contained Deepankar's name, had already been published to which no one had raised any objection, not even Deepankar, himself.

This caused a flutter in the Congress(I) camp. Deepankar and others made a desperate bid to have the mistake remedied but the returning officer would not budge. When the news reached the state election department in Jaipur, there was all-round panic. After all, it concerned a candidate of the ruling Party. Immediately, a high official from the election department talked to the returning officer on the phone. The official advised that the intention behind Deepankar's withdrawal of one set of nomination papers did not mean that he was withdrawing his candidature. The returning officer quoting rules pleaded his helplessness since he could not heed the advice which was contrary to law. A meeting of high officials of the election department followed and later on the district election officer was asked to stop printing of ballot papers till the matter was finally settled. The printing of ballot papers is generally started immediately after the symbols are allotted. The postal ballots are also despatched within 48 hours of the allotment of symbols. When the district electoral officer drew the officer's attention to this, he was told that since the rule under question was only an executive order it was not binding and could be done away with.

Subsequently, the relevant papers were called for from Jaipur. Apparently, not satisfied with the papers, the chief electoral officer summoned the returning officer to Jaipur with the original papers for a thorough scrutiny by the departmental authorities. Meanwhile, the election commission also asked for the necessary papers. However, attempts to rescind the withdrawal ultimately proved abortive. In the confused situation the postal ballots could not be despatched till three days after the deadline.

The extraordinary enthusiasm shown by the chief electoral officer in Jaipur to save the Congress (I) nominee has attracted criticism. According to legal experts, any decision taken by the returning officer can be challenged only through an election petition and that too after the results.

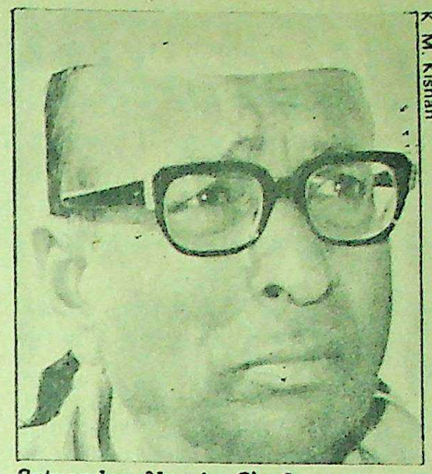
Caste feud over new Bihar CM

THE latest election joke doing the rounds in Patna is that Sanjay Gandhi is contesting the Assembly elections from the city itself. How? All the four seats in Patna city have been allotted to unknown Sanjayites. This has only heightened the underlying tensions between the Rajputs and the Brahmins who are vying with each other to curry favour with either Mrs Gandhi or her son. The Congress(I) in the state has been divided into warring camps.

The question uppermost in everybody's mind is: if the Congress(I) comes to power, who will be the next Chief Minister? If a choice is to be made from within the state, Dr. Jagannath Mishra, the Emergency Chief Minister and the Legislature Party chief appears to be the most likely candidate. He is believed to be in the good books of both Mrs Gandhi and Sanjay Gandhi and has thus acquired for his supporters the lion's share of Party tickets. Not only was his opinion sought by the Prime Minister during the removal of the Janata appointed Chief Secretary, Mr L. Dayal, he also succeeded in persuading Mrs Gandhi to retain the present inspector-general of Police, Mr S. K. Chatterjee in favour of Mr Fazal Ahmad, a replacement suggested by the Rajput lobby within the Congress(I). Dr. Mishra's main rival appears to be Mr Kedar Pandey, the Bihar PCC(I) president. The fact that Mr Pandey does not enjoy the confidence of Mr Sanjay Gandhi places him second in the running.

In the event of the mantle falling on the shoulder of a state politician now at the Centre, the best rated are Mr Sitaram Kesari and Mr Bhisma Narain Singh. It is at this point that the Brahmin and Rajput rivalry comes into prominence. The Rajputs who support Mr Bhisma Narain Singh are trying to isolate the Brahmins. Meanwhile they are trying to win over Mr Sanjay Gandhi with the help of Mr Sanjay Singh, the Congress(I) leader from UP who is taking an avid interest in the affairs of Bihar. The objective of the Rajput camp is naturally to send as many of their own community to the Assembly as possible.



K. M. Kishan

Satyendra Narain Singh

Dr Jagannath Mishra

K. M. Kishan

But it may be difficult for the Congress(I) to get the required number of seats to form a Government. That is what the opposition wants and has been waiting for. The opposition lobby headed by the Janata chief, Mr Satyendra Narain Singh, may join hands with the Rajput faction in the Congress(I) to put up a Rajput CM. If their strategy succeeds then the new Chief Minister might be Mr Bhisma Narain Singh. However, from the point of view of Mrs Gandhi Mr Singh's prospects do not appear to be very bright. He has already been relieved of his communication portfolio in favour of Mr. C. M. Stephen. His name has also been left out of the state drought relief committee. Mr Sitaram Kesari, on the other hand, is the man closest to Sanjay Gandhi in Bihar and was the only leader from the state to shape the final list of Bihar Congress(I) candidates. The fact that he belongs to the backward community may work in his favour.

If the pipe-dream of the opposition of forming a government comes true then they will have to unite to form a government. In that case the Janata chief, Mr Satyendra Narain Singh, MP, Mr Karpoori Thakur of the Lok Dal and Mr Ram Lakhan Singh Yadav of the Congress(U) will fight it out among themselves for the Chief Ministership. The three Party leaders failed to reach a poll accord because they could not sort out the question of Chief Ministership among themselves.

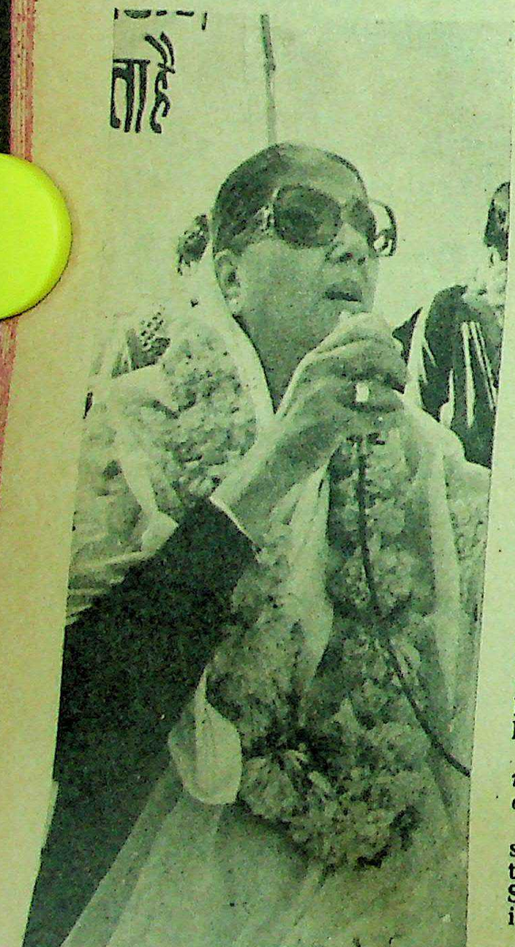
Mother and son

In the Madhya Bharat region of MP royalty still sways the masses and what better way to reflect current political realities than for partisan politics to enter and split the Scindia royal family. Rajmata Vijaya Raje leads theBharatiya Janata Party campaign while son Madhavrao is in the Congress(I).AJOY BOSE spoke to both

"He deserted me when I needed him most"

Mrs Vijaya Raje Scindia, Rajmata of Gwalior, is undeterred by her ignominous defeat in the last Lok Sabha elections. She is campaigning furiously in Madhya Pradesh for the Bharatiya Janata Party. Among her major political opponents in the State is her own son Madhavrao Scindia, who is campaigning for the Congress(I).



Ashok Bose

Q: What does it feel like, having your son as your main political opponent in the state?

A: What can I do? He does not listen to me any more. He thinks he is being very clever. Once Mrs Gandhi gives him a few slaps, he will learn. Then he will come back to me.

Q: Your son says that he has joined the Indira Congress because he considers Mrs Gandhi the most progressive force in the country. Please comment.

A: It's just the opposite. Mrs Gandhi is not progressive. She is just the opposite. Does he consider the Emergency progressive? She is a dictator of the worst kind. How can my son say that she is progressive?

Q: Has your personal relationship with your son deteriorated ever since he joined the Congress?

A: I am not a hypocrite. I can say that our relationship remains cordial. Naturally it has deteriorated. How can it remain the same after he has done such a thing to me?

Q: Your son is very hurt that while he has not criticised you in public, you have done so.

A: He is hurt! Has he ever stopped to think how I feel? At the time I needed him most, he deserted me. Children never stop to consider the feelings of their parents. They only think of their own feelings. How can I avoid criticising him if he is my main political opponent in the state? It's just not possible.

Q: Do you think that a divided Scindia family is going to affect the Assembly elections?

A: It will to a certain extent, definitely. But at every public meeting I try to explain why the division took place. I am sure that the people will be convinced and vote for the Bharatiya Janata Party.

Q: But they did not during the mid-term polls.

A: These last four months have proved that Mrs Gandhi is not able to do anything but make empty promises. I think that the people have learned a lesson and will not vote for her again.

Q: Do you feel that Bharatiya Janata Party is more coherent than the old Janata Party?

A: Oh yes. Now we are of the same ideology. It is like (the situation) in 1967 when I was in the Jana Sangh. We all think the same way so it is much easier to function.

Q: What do you think are the election prospects in Madhya Pradesh?

A: It will be a tough fight but I think we will ultimately triumph.

"I will accept whatever Mrs Gandhi decides"

Although he joined the Congress(I) only a few months back, Madhavrao Scindia in his short career in the Party has already overshadowed old Congress heavyweights in the State like P. C. Sethi and V. C. Shukla. For instance, in the coming State Assembly elections, his candidates have got precedence particularly in the Gwalior division over most other State leaders. Young and dapper, the Oxford-educated 36-year-old ex-Maharaja has been travelling in an imported helicopter over the rugged terrain of the Gwalior division to garner support for the Congress(I) in the Assembly elections.

Q: The Scindia family has always had a decisive influence over Assembly elections in the Gwalior division. Now, for the first time, the house of Scindia is divided. Do you think your mother's opposition to you will pose a serious challenge to the election prospects of the Indira Congress in this region?

A: Firstly, I don't think old feudal glory is enough to win the support of people anymore. My mother may have that illusion. I don't. What people are bothered about today is getting things done. And I think I can claim with some pride that I have got a number of things done for this region including a number of agricultural and industrial projects in just the last three months.

Q: But surely you are taking advantage of being the former maharaja of the area?

A: There is no doubt that my family background gives me an advantage. I am also proud of the Scindia tradition. But, I personally would like to detach myself as much possible from my family and be recognised for my own merits.

Q: Don't you find it difficult to explain why you have joined a Party which was directly responsible for sending your own mother to jail?

A: The point here is to not see one's political attitudes on a purely personal level. I don't agree with the arrest of my mother during the Emergency. But I don't think that makes it impossible to be with the Congress Party. I think that Mrs Gandhi is the main progressive force in the country and I think she is the only person who can solve the many problems facing India. Whatever may have happened to me personally or to my family is subsidiary to this. And I am not the only one. There are many like me. For instance I know of this loyal Congress worker in Gwalior who spent the whole 19 months of the Emergency behind bars. There was obviously some stupid mistake. But he is still with Mrs Gandhi. I think it is the people who cringed and bowed during the Emergency and wrote letters of apology to the government are the ones who are now opposing Mrs Gandhi. It was a difficult decision for me to join the Congress Party but I know I have done right to see things politically first and then personally.

Q: Your mother has been very bitter about your joining the Indira Congress. Has your personal relationship deteriorated with her after you became her political opponent?

A: As far as I am concerned, I don't see why different political beliefs should influence personal relations. That is why I have never criticised my mother on a public platform. She on the other hand, at every public meeting, comes out personally against me. In the last mid-term polls, I deliberately avoided going to Rae Bareli and campaigning. My mother spent one full day in my constituency abusing me. This in spite of the fact I had earlier told her that we should avoid each other's constituencies. Anyway, even in these Assembly elections, I won't talk about her. Let her talk against me. It is her wish.

Q: Coming to the bitterness you have caused inside the Congress (I) in Madhya Pradesh, there are a number of old Congress leaders and workers who allege that you have been overnight given precedence over them particularly in the matter of distribution of Assembly seat tickets?

A: There is bound to be some heartburn after the distribution of election tickets. Some people will have to be rejected and they will naturally resent it. I think tempers will cool down soon and they will learn to accept the Party leadership's decision.

Q: But there is a rebel Congress candidate in almost every constituency in the Gwalior and Chambal divisions.

A: It's unfortunate that this has happened. I am travelling all over and trying to explain that Congressmen should remain united and fight the opposition. I think I will succeed.

Q: People are also charging you, with giving a large number of tickets to your own staff or as they describe it mahal kae chamche?

A: You must have heard this from opposition politicians.

Q: No, ordinary people told me this.

A: Then they must have been misled. The only staff member of mine who has been given a ticket is Mahendra Singh. But he too is a former MLA. I think all this talk of mahal kae chamche is just propaganda by the Bharatiya Janata Party.

Q: According to what the people say, you have been given as many as 20 tickets out of 34 in this division, out of which eight have gone to your own staff members?

A: I wish it were true. I have got only nine tickets out of 34; with the exception of Mahendra Singh, none are my staff members.

Q: Do you think this feeling among the people is likely to erode your chances in the Assembly elections?

A: Well, to a certain extent, it will but I hope to convince the people to vote for us.

Q: So you think it will be smooth sailing for you in the Assembly elections?

A: No, no. In the Gwalior and Chambal divisions, it will be a tough fight. This is the main citadel of the opposition forces in the state. In the 1977 Assembly elections, the Congress won only two out of 34 seats, one by 86 votes and the other by 2,000 votes. But in spite of this, I am confident we will win.

Q: Most people who had joined the Congress just before the mid-term polls have been relegated to secondary positions by Mrs Gandhi. How have you been the exception?

A: Well that's a difficult question to answer. But all I can say is that Mrs Gandhi must have been convinced of my sincerity for doing something for this region.

Q: Some people say that you are strongly tipped to be the next Chief Minister of Madhya Pradesh. Will you accept the Chief Ministership?

A: I will accept whatever Mrs Gandhi decides.

Q: You say that you want to move away from old feudal traditions. How do you then tolerate people touching your feet all the time as the maharaja?

A: You know, it is a difficult thing to break old feudal norms and loyalties. I feel distinctly uncomfortable when people touch my feet but if I tell them not to, they will consider it an affront because they think it is traditional. One should make the transition slowly, not hurriedly. I am trying slowly to get over this maharaja business. I know it will be difficult, but it can be done. ■

Sham shaadi

How about getting foreign tourists to "participate" in an Indian wedding? This experiment was tried recently in the pink city of Jaipur and, according to Prakash Bhandari, worked famously with a group of French tourists. It was Denzil Coelho's idea; an Indian based in Paris, he was conducting the group on an Indian tour. Coelho decided that instead of witnessing a typical Rajasthani wedding with all its paraphernalia, the tourists should satisfy their curiosity by actually participating in one. He wrote to Udesh Sharma, the general manager of the hotel in Jaipur where the tourists were expected to stay, asking him to prepare for a "mock marriage". Taken aback, Sharma wrote to Coelho's employees in Bombay requesting them to confirm the contents of Coelho's letter. They did and half amused and half surprised, Sharma began preparing for the "marriage" like the conventional father of a Rajasthani bride.

It was an unusual experience for Sharma, but he was determined to stage a grand performance. An elephant was engaged for the dulha, horses for the baratis.

Kamal Jutka

Musicians were hired. A mandap, made of pure silver, was erected and the hotel's foyer was decorated with colourful bulbs and flowers. When the French tourists arrived, they were asked to select the bride and groom from among themselves. Maurice Avrillon was chosen as the groom; Mrs Simone Lambert as the bride. Neither Mrs Avrillon nor Mr Lambert —wife and husband of the "groom" and "bride" respectively — objected to the "marriage." The other tourists were to be a part of the barat—the men dressed in churidar pyjama, sherwani and safa (turban) and the women in lahenga with dopattas. A local make-up man provided beards and moustaches for the men; the hotel beautician helped the women to dress for the occasion. An assistant manager of the hotel, Rajendra Goswami, was chosen to perform the Kanyadan. Though he looked younger than the bride, Mrs Lambert, Goswami agreed to play the part of her father.

The procession preceeding the actual ceremony was a spectacle. Mr Avrillon, the groom, rode on the elephant like a Rajput prince, grinning from ear to ear. The baratis danced and sang to the music of the shehnai. Mr Lambert danced too, unperturbed by the fact that his wife was soon to be "married" to another man. Mrs Lambert played the part of a coy bride well enough except when, unable to resist the temptation, she ran up to the elephant and insisted on riding with the groom. Goswami, as her father, rose to the occasion and tried to dissuade her, but the bride was a rebel who eventually had her way. Once on the elephant, she threw convention to the winds and kissed the groom smack on his lips.

The pheras around the fire were conducted by two pundits while Coelho explained the various mantras to the tourists. After the "marriage" was solemnised, the bride, groom and baratis were treated to a colourful Rajasthani dance. The last word was Goswami's: he cautioned everyone — albeit lightheartedly — that no dowry had been involved.

County bounty

When Sunil Gavaskar signed for Somerset, not all his admirers in India were happy: the majority felt that county cricket was hardly his cup of tea. Amidst a great deal of scepticism, on May 9 this year, Gavaskar joined his Somerset colleagues who had already had two weeks of rigorous cricket in the Schweppes County Championships. The next day, with his skipper, Brian Rose, he shattered yet another record in a 55-over Benson and Hedges match against Kent. Though Kent is no longer a formidable force on the county circuit, it still boasts of Asif Iqbal, Bob Woolmer, Derek Underwood and Chris Tavare. Gavaskar scored a chanceless 90 with 12 hits to the fence while Brian Rose, at the other end, slammed an unbeaten 137—the last 36 runs with six mighty sixes. Somerset emerged triumphant but the tables were turned the very next day when the two counties played a 40-over John Player League game. Gavaskar scored 40 in roughly 46 minutes but Kent won by a 13-run margin. Then, on May 17, Gavaskar got his first county ton—123 against Middlesex, with three sixes and 12 fours. It was a display of immaculate batting, a blend of caution and ruthless aggression. Somerset lost the match by one run, but the Indian star was the hero of the day. It has been a good start for him this summer.

Capital punishment

So you're suffering from insomnia because mosquitoes are buzzing around your ears. Well, if you are a resident of Delhi you need not lose any sleep over it—literally, that is. Don't worry about any of those mosquito repellants and creams; just reach for the nearest telephone and dial the number 344284. Provided your telephone is in working order, you will get through to the central control room of the malaria department of the municipal corporation. Since the mosquito problem is grave in the capital, the department is meant to provide instant relief to harassed residents of the city.

The French disconnection

Javanta Das

There was this recent incident when Rekha and Moushumi were both on the sets of Daasi. A French television crew that was hovering around was focussing its camera lenses on Moushumi and virtually ignoring Rekha. The reason, it seems, was that someone had warned them about the star's temper, her tantrums and her recent boycott of the Press. Initially all went well but there soon came a stage in the proceedings when Rekha could take no more. She approached one of the members of the French team and said that they could film her while she was rehearsing. And she added by way of caution that they were on no account to disturb her while a shot was in progress. But nothing happened. The Frenchman failed to react and Rekha could not understand why he seemed to be paying no attention to her advice. Then some kind soul went up to the disappointed actress and explained that the Frenchman did not understand a word of English.

East Bengal's Ayatollah

Pritimoy Chakraborty

P. K. Banerjee (back to camera)

While the team events during the Asian Table Tennis Championship progressed, one of the most conspicuous people in the Press box was East Bengal's football coach, P. K. Banerjee. One of the claims he made was that he could deal better with Muslims than Ayatollah Khomeini. And how exactly could he prove that, asked a listener. "The people of his (Khomeini's) country speak only one language. But in my team alone, the Muslims speak in four different languages. Nasir Ahmad in Bengali. Habib and Latifuddin in Hyderabadi Urdu. Najeeb in Malayam and the three Iranians, Majid, Jamshed and Khabbazi in Farsi. But in spite of that I've been able to tackle them."

Thrice blessed

If there had been a beauty contest among the women participants at the fifth Asian Table Tennis Championship which ended at Calcutta on May 18, the honours would have been cornered by three stunningly pretty sisters from Pakistan. With their bewitching looks and charming ways alone, Rubina Shakoor and her two sisters, Seema and Nazo won the hearts of everyone privileged enough to enter the arena. Clad modestly in their traditional salwar and kameez, the three set many a heart aflutter.

S. N. M. Abdi had the time of his life trying to meet them—separately; such was their demand. But it was worth it once they began talking. "Our Abbu (father), Syed Shakoor Ahmed played hockey for India before Partition and our Ammi (mother) is a good badminton player. We are six sisters. Three of them have got married but earlier on they were reasonably good table tennis players. The three of us have represented Pakistan in a number of international tournaments but we have never enjoyed ourselves as much as we did in Calcutta", they said.

What did they like most about India? Cherubic Seema replied: "Oh, the rasgollas and Indians—I mean your hospitality and courtesy". Rubina, the eldest sister was enamoured of Banarasi sarees of which she bought a few as gifts for people at home. Their favourite Indian actor? Amitabh Bachchan, of course! The best Indian movie they saw in Calcutta? Khubsoorat—"Rekha was really wonderful". Any complaints? "Yes", said Seema, Rubina and Nazo. "The Bangla bandh upset our sightseeing programme. Can you believe that we are returning to Pakistan without really seeing anything besides your fabulous Park Hotel?" Nazo's favourite couplet: Sare Jahan se achcha Hindostan hamara/Hum bulbulen hain iski, yeh gulsitan hamara. (Our Hindusthan is better than the entire world. This country is a garden and we are its nightingales.) Oh, yes, nightingales the three certainly were. On May 19, the sisters flew home.

At Tito's funeral, the leaders conferred

ON May 8, thousands of mourners gathered solemnly at the Federal Assembly building, adjoining the Marx and Engels Square of Yugoslavia's capital Belgrade as eight military officers carried the pale oak coffin of Marshal Josip Broz Tito and placed it on an open gun carriage covered with the blue, red and white Yugoslav flag. In the distance could be heard the booming sound of cannons firing the 21 gun salutes. As the military band struck up the dirge, Yugoslav Air Force aircraft flew overhead and the jeep drawing the carriage, slowly moved forward. After about two hours the cortege reached the garden of Marshal Tito's estate overlooking Belgrade. The coffin was then placed in a white marble vault bearing a stark inscription: "Josip Broz Tito, 1892-1980". The body of the Croatian peasant's son was finally brought to rest in a garden he loved. Many cried as the cortege passed them and as the body was finally laid to rest. He had died three days before his eightyeighth birthday.

The funernal was one of the biggest gatherings of world leaders in history and was attended by 155 delegations which included four kings, 32 Heads of State, 20 Prime Ministers accompanied by 49 Foreign Ministers and a large number of high-ranking officials from more than 100 countries. But for the large number of leaders, the great gathering presented an unusual opportunity for private conversation without the buildup and expectations that precede more formal summits. In short, the scene was one of a hundred mini summits.

Seven hours and forty-five minutes after she had taken off from India, Mrs Indira Gandhi landed at Belgrade on May 7, to attend the funeral. As the door of the chartered Air India aircraft opened and Mrs Gandhi stepped out, she was received by the Prime Minister of Yugoslavia and escorted to the Belgrade Intercontinental Hotel, where she stayed during her visit. For that matter, leaders from all over the world who had come to pay their last respects to Tito, had been accommodated there. Only Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev and Japanese Prime Minister Masayoshi Ohira decided to stay at their respective embassies.

Even before Tito's death, Mrs Gandhi had indicated to the Yugoslav leadership that she would attend the funeral. After Tito's death, once Mrs Gandhi's visit had been finalised, many leaders expressed their desire to meet her in Yugoslavia. Chairman Hua Guofeng of China, Leonid Brezhnev, West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Zambian President Kaunda were some of them. The embassies of the respective countries made the preliminary arrangements and the details were worked out in Belgrade. Mrs Gandhi on her part said she would like to meet Mrs Jovanka Tito, Marshal Tito's widow.

After checking into the hotel, Mrs Gandhi left immediately to meet the Yugoslav leadership. The meeting originally had been fixed for the morning of May 8, but had been preponed by the Yugoslav leaders. With this meeting began Mrs Gandhi's hectic schedule, in the course of which she would confer with some of the most prominent world leaders. At the huge presidential building she was received by President Lazar Kolisevski, along with the Prime Minister and the Foreign Minister. In a 70-minute meeting the leaders discussed the future of the Non-Aligned Movement after Tito, Brezhnev's discussion with the Yugoslav leaders and Afghanistan. Of particular importance was the discussion on the divisions within the non-aligned ranks. It was stressed that non-aligned countries should take the initiative in world affairs.

After that Mrs Gandhi returned to her hotel to meet Chancellor Schmidt of West Germany. Detente, fear of induction of arms to Pakistan, German fears of the USSR's missile programme and oil prices figured in the discussion. Mrs Gandhi initiated talks on the North-South dialogue while the German Chancellor pointed out that a general all-country discussion was of little use and that bilateral discussion would be more helpful.

The next day, she met Britain's Margaret Thatcher for breakfast. Since neither actually eats anything for breakfast they drank tea instead and discussed the domestic situation in India and Britain, as well as the situation in Afghanistan. At 10.00 am Mrs Gandhi met President Kaunda at the hotel but they decided to hold their discussions that night. After Kaunda left, she was informed that Lillian Carter had arrived so Mrs Gandhi personally escorted Mrs Carter back to her own room. It was of course an informal and personal meeting, where largely domestic matters were discussed.

BEFORE leaving for the Assembly Building to lay a wreath on Tito's coffin, she met Brezhnev and told the Soviet leader about the growing anxiety among non-aligned nations over the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. The talks lasted for 45 minutes and an Indian spokesman said, "Mr Brezhnev replied that he too was keen on a settlement and suggested that Afghanistan and Pakistan speak to each other. Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko was also present at the meeting. Mrs Gandhi insisted that the Soviet presence in Afghanistan was being used by the US to erode the non-aligned movement. Mr Brezhnev replied that the Soviet Union attached importance to the non-aligned movement and wanted India to play its role.

After the meeting Mrs Gandhi proceeded to the Assembly Building. Later in the day Mrs Gandhi met the Rumanian President, Ceaucescu, and once again the non-aligned movement was discussed. She was then visited by Mrs Bandarnayake of Sri Lanka and she then called on Jovanka Tito and talked with her for about half an hour. Mrs Gandhi also met Mario Suarez and the Cuban Vice President.

The other important meeting she had that day was with Chairman Hua Guofeng of China. For the first time since Nehru met Chou En Lai in 1960, the leaders of the world's two most populous countries held a discussion. Both leaders desired the strengthening of relations between the two countries. Chairman Hua said that he wanted to see India as a strong nation and wanted her to play a greater role in the non-aligned movement. He called on Mrs Gandhi to forget the past and to look forward to the future. Mrs Gandhi said that though she wanted good relations between the two nations, it would not be at the cost of relations with other nations. Relations between the two countries will of course depend on the Indian approach to the problem in Aksai Chin, the remote area of North-East Kashmir retained by China after the 1962 Sino-Indian border conflict. India insists on a settlement before relations are normalised, while China for the moment wants to shelve the issue.

The last meeting Mrs Gandhi had was an informal discussion with Kaunda, Nyerere and the President of Guinea. The discussion which began at 10 pm carried on until 12.15 am. The leaders discussed the problems facing the non-aligned movement, the way in which unpleasantness had been avoided at Havana and the non-aligned movement without Tito, who had provided the European link. Kaunda in fact, asked what would happen to the non-aligned movement now that all the founding fathers — Nasser, Nehru, Sukarno, and Tito — were no longer alive. It was decided that the non-aligned countries should take the initiative.

One issue which Mrs Gandhi discussed virtually with all leaders was the future of non-alignment after Tito. After all, Tito had lent great weight to the Non-Aligned Movement. It was at the Havana Summit that Tito decided to fight against the theory that non-aligned nations were natural allies of the Communist Bloc. Now with Tito, one of the founders of the Non-Aligned Movement, gone the question which naturally arises is who will take over the leadership. And this perhaps was uppermost in the minds of leaders of the non-aligned nations, including Mrs Gandhi. It may not be possible for countries with Soviet leanings to play this role. Therefore, what remains to be seen is how far and for how long the Non-Aligned Movement stays clear of the power blocs and maintains its own independent identity.

SAUMITRA BANERJEE

Bride beheaded

The real culprit will get away

THIS is not fiction. Not even the proverbial triangular mix-up. It is a tragedy that befell a Hyderabad family on May 9 when a father butchered to death his 17-year-old daughter, Jagdamba, who was in her bridal attire. The father, Yelliah, who owned a garage, had arranged his daughter's marriage with Shankar, a railway clerk. What Yelliah did not know was that his daughter was deeply in love with Prakash who lived near by. Both the families lived in the Ashok Bazar locality.

The date for Jagdamba's marriage with Shankar had been fixed. Yelliah had left no stone unturned to make it a grand affair. He had even sold property worth Rs 40,000 to finance the marriage. A day before the mahurat, Jagdamba mustered enough courage and sent a note to Shankar, her prospective husband, saying that she was in love with Prakash and that Shankar should not agree to the marriage. Shankar immediately dashed to Jagdamba's home to verify the authenticity of the note. The would-be bride confirmed her message, much to the shock of her parents and Shankar promptly gave up the idea of marrying Jagdamba. Jagdamba's father was naturally furious. Neighbours and family friends suggested that Jagdamba should marry Prakash. There was a small hurdle, though. The girl belonged to the Munnurukapu community while her lover was a Mutharasu. The elders took it upon themselves to iron out this caste complication.

As a result of their efforts the marriage atmosphere was hastily revived. Preparations for the mahurat once again began in earnest. Everybody seemed to have forgotten the brief, unsavoury interlude. The bride's family was particularly joyful. Then tragedy caught everybody unprepared. On May 9, the day of the mahurat, the mandap was tastefully decorated and music added to the atmosphere of festivity. Inside the house, Jagdamba was going through the traditional rituals surrounded by her friends and female relatives. But there was no sign of the bridegroom's party. A nervous Yelliah sent word to Prakash's home. The man returned and informed Yelliah that Prakash was untraceable since the previous night.

For Yelliah it was the unkindest cut of all. Unable to control his emotions, he rushed into Jagdamba's room and ordered everybody out. Then, dragging his teenage daughter by her plait, he proceeded towards the adjacent bathroom where Yelliah's eyes fell on a chopping knife. He first dealt a blow on his daughter's head and with the second blow he literally beheaded her. Completely drenched in Jagdamba's blood and with the knife in one hand, Yelliah set off towards the Fazalgunj police station where he surrendered himself.

The assembled guests and elders were furious at Prakash's disappearance and the dubious role of his parents. Angered by Jagdamba's gory death and the role played by Prakash in the tragic development, a few hot-heads raided Prakash's house. Soon after, Prakash's father was taken into protective custody by the police but Prakash himself remained untraceable.

The police say that the case is simple enough with hardly any scope for investigation. In the eyes of the law, Yelliah is a murderer though there is universal sympathy for him and his family. When Yelliah's lawyer moved a bail petition in the court, the prosecution did not oppose it. Why Prakash jilted his "beloved" however remains a mystery.

Real money vs real Janata

IN front of Mr S. L. Shakdher, the Election Commissioner, all the various leaders of the different shades of the original Janata Party claim to be the "real" Janata: everyone seems to want the symbol of the haldhar kisan. But the desire to be known as the "real Janata" has become less keen of late, and for a good reason. Because the history of the Janata Party is littered with IOUs. During the hectic months when the Janata was ordering fancy advertising campaigns, it was also adding up its bills. If the Party had won, of course, payment would have been no problem. But it got demolished. And the "real Janata" still has to pay at least Rs 17 lakhs to an army of publicists, printers, hoarding contractors and newspapers, in return for services rendered in 1979.

Meanwhile, in Delhi, when Babu Jagjivan Ram defected once again, first to form his private version of the "real Janata", the Janata (J) he not only took his presence out of the Janata Party but also two typewriters belonging to the Janata Parliamentary Party. On March 11, Madhu Dandavate wrote to Babuji requesting him to return the property of the "real" Janata. But Babuji obviously had different ideas about the problem; the typewriters, worth about Rs 7,000, remain in his custody.

Children missing for 27 months

Parents have in vain pleaded before three PMs

THE three-wheeler sped away noisily on the afternoon of January 13, 1978. Its occupants were three young brothers — Satish (8) Praveen alias Beenu (5), Susheel alias Banti (2) and the driver, Raj Kumar. No one suspected anything. The children did not raise an alarm since they knew their driver well; in fact they called him 'uncle'. Unti a few days ago, Raj Kumar was a regular visitor to the children's home and for eight long years he had been their neighbour and a sub-tenant of Mr Kirpa, a scrapdealer and the children's father. They never returned

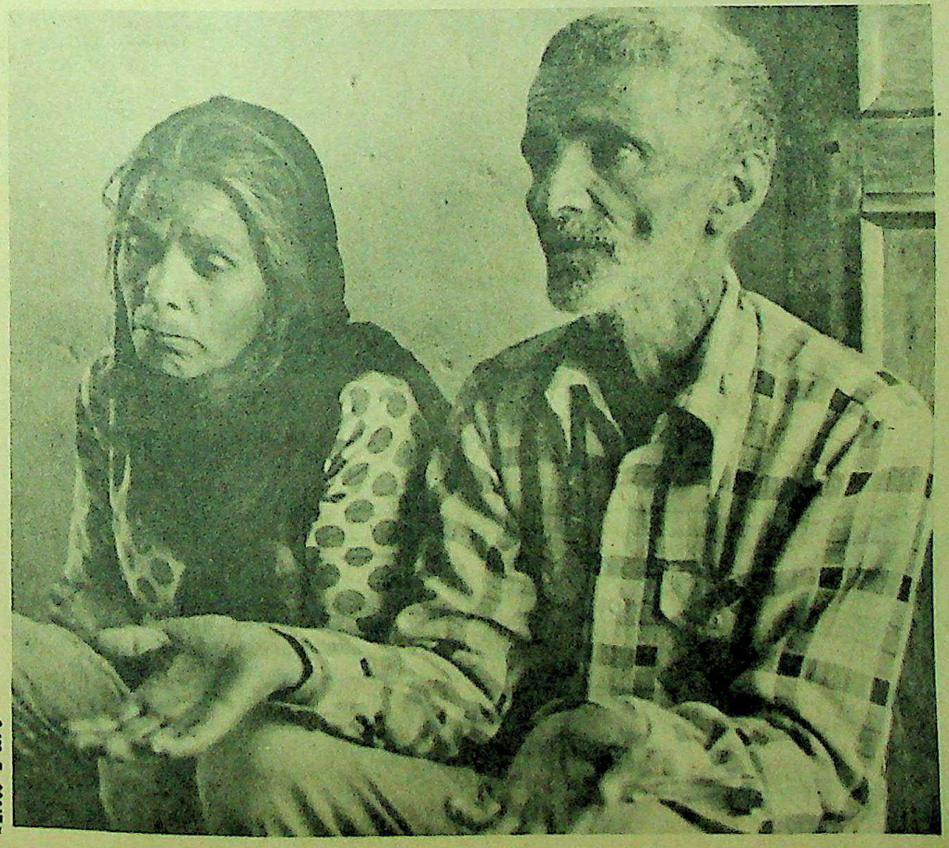
On that fateful day, Kirpa was on his usual rounds and his wife Sharda was busy with the visiting estate officials of Chandigarh; they had come to check the records following a complaint against the new landlord Munshi, who had purchased House 2606 in Sector 22C for Rs 60,000. The complaint was about Munshi's ability to pay the amount. On a request from the old landlord, Munshi had permitted Kirpa to retain the barsati on the second floor without charging an additional paisa. However, Munshi did not want Raj Kumar, a sub-tenant of Kirpa to stay. A misunderstanding cropped up as Raj Kumar thought he had been thrown out at Kirpa's instance. According to four-year-old Guddi, sister of the kidnapped brothers, Raj Kumar had promised to buy sweets for the children and taken them to the market in his three-wheeler.

The police hunted for Raj Kumar in Ludhiana, Amritsar, Srinagar and elsewhere. But he was not to be found. This intriguing case was eventually handed over to Inspector Des Raj. Des Raj was perhaps the only investigating officer who inspired confidence in the kidnapped children's parents. As a matter of fact, Des Raj asked the relatives of the alleged kidnapper to hand over Raj Kumar 'within a week'. Kumar's folks agreed to do so and gave an undertaking in writing to this effect.

Soon enough, the situation took an interesting turn. Raj Kumar's brother-in-law, incidentally, his namesake, who claimed to be an office-bearer of the Amritsar City Janata Party, allegedly tried to influence the police investigation. But he failed before the never-say-die Des Raj. Des Raj was, however, transferred to Haryana under the orders of SSP, Chandigarh.

According to Kirpa, after Raj's transfer the police lost all interest in the case. "We have spent Rs 8,70 We sold our utensils. We have now lost all hope. Some newspapermen came to us. They say they have published a few stories. But who is bothered?" Among the three kidnapped brothers, only Satish attended school.

The grief-stricken parents, Kirpa and Sharda



Anil Puri

Kirpa and Sharda told this correspondent: "Twentyseven months have passed but nothing has come out. The local police were cool even when they were informed of the exact hideout of the accused. They even called us fools...We have written to the three Prime Ministers on different occasions but failed to draw sympathy from them. Perhaps they were too busy handling far more important issues or maybe because we are poor people". Sharda went on: "Once we went to meet the Chief Commissioner (CC) of Chandigarh Union Territory. But his personal staff refused to let us in. Then a newspaper reporter, Mr Bhanot, took our darkhasat (application) and handed it to CC".

"On January 17 last year, Kumar returned home and stayed with his family for three days. We informed the police, including the Inspector General and requested them to raid the premises where Kumar was believed to be staying. But nobody paid any heed. We gave the police several other tips and also the list of people who had seen the children and met Raj Kumar in Srinagar, Sirsa, Delhi Amritsar, Ludhiana and elsewhere. We have even given them (the police) the names of persons who were in constant touch with him (Raj Kumar) and were delivering threatening letters to us. But the police are still keeping mum. Perhaps they are only meant to serve the rich", Kirpa said wiping his tears. Sharda sadly complained that they were living on the good wishes of the authorities. "When we last met the Chief Commissioner he said: 'Agar kismat main hoga to mil jayenge' (If fate so wills, the children will be found)".

The living quarters of the Kirpas measures eight feet by eight feet. In this tiny room live the remaining five members of the family—parents, two daughters and a son. One of the daughters is married. She lives close by with her husband. Curiously, Raj Kumar hasn't stopped writng to the Kirpa family. His letters to Sharda are passionate and couched in polite language. Reading his letters to Sharda one gets the impression that Raj Kumar shares a romantic relationship with the mother of the kidnapped children.

The police have refused to believe Kirpa's allegations. "We can understand the cries of frustrated parents. But was it a simple case of crime?", the investigating police inspector Pandit Jai Narain asked. Narain told this correspondent that he was planning to visit Srinagar soon and that he would conduct a search in the orphanages in the region. It is possible that Raj Kumar might have dumped the children in an orphanage.

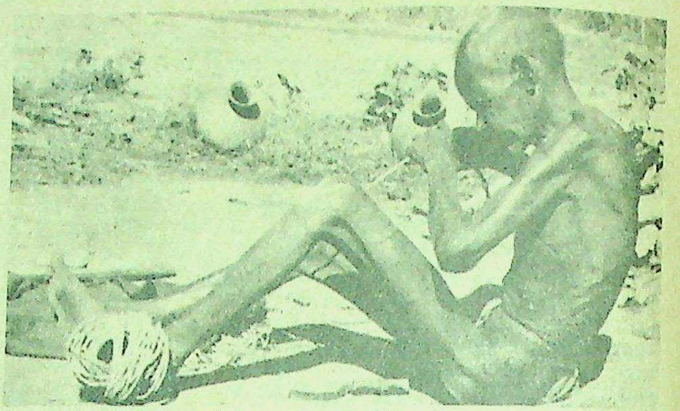
Adivasis duped

Racketeers corner forest land



An adivasi engaged in rope-making

SEMI-CLAD, semi-starved tribals, living in makeshift leafhuts and barely eking out an existence deposited Rs 11.40 lakhs, for something that they have never possessed and probably will never set their eyes on. It all happened in the Panchpir subdivision of Mayurbhanj district, Orissa, where under the garb of the "Land to the Landless" scheme, racketeers and fortune-seekers acquired for themselves valuable 'reserved forest' land.

The racketeers collected applications from the landless tribals and deposited Rs 11.40 lakhs as 'forest royalty' on their behalf. This, however, was no act of benevolence. With an eye on the enormous profits that could be reaped from the 15,321 acres of richly endowed forest land, the racketeers acquired sale deeds of the same land with the signatures of prospective adivasi owners on them. Thus even before the adivasis had an inkling of what was going on, rich 'forest land' meant for them had passed on to the hands of fortune seekers engaged in clandestine timber operations, who had lost no time in taking advantage of the illiterate tribals. Not all the land was, however, timber land. In most cases the land settled in the names of the tribals was unfit for agriculture.

It is not merely the adivasis alone, but the Government which is also being robbed of its land. Strangely the government seems to be unaware of the goings-on. Politicians and senior bureaucrats were impressed at the efficiency with which the tahsildars and revenue officers managed to distribute surplus land, which was reflected in the ever mounting official figures. Indeed, the scheme was proclaimed as a vote-catching gimmick and the achievements in implementing the programme were cited to exploit the tribal vote bank. Not everybody, however, could overlook the real consequences of the scheme: the damage that was being done to the rich timber of the reserve forest area. Puny attempts were made by some honest forest officers to save the forests from organised conspiracy and fraud, but these were promptly suppressed by government officials.

The indiscriminate grant of lease of the 'protected forest' lands has had farreaching consequences. The leasing iut of 'protected forests' has led to the loss of 'buffer' stock of wood used for consumption—and has caused the local people to use the wood from reserve forests to satisfy their daily needs. In an attempt to protect the forests of the district, it has been suggested that the surplus woodlands should be maintained as intermediate forests and the reserve forests, which are state property, should be declared 'lease banned'. It has further been suggested that all the previous cases of the lease of protected forest lands in the names of the landless adivasis should be reviewed, and in appropriate cases, leases already granted should be declared void and be vested back in the government. The Government is yet to step in to put an end to the racket. Meanwhile, the adivasis remain as poor as ever, while the fortune hunters lose no time in making what money they can.

Sanjay may dominate after polls

Power and Politics

By BARUN SENGUPTA

SOME pundits in Delhi still have their doubts, but I personally think, it will not be difficult for the Congress(I) to form a government in each of the nine states, either independently or in collaboration with some regional Parties. Indeed, in eight states Congress(I) Chief Ministers should come through while the Chief Ministership in the remaining state will go to the DMK. How long Mr Karunanidhi will be able to retain his Chief Ministership is a different matter, but there is little doubt that he will fulfil his life's ambition once again. In the eight other states, even if the Congress(I) gets 45 per cent of the seats they will form the governments. And if they can secure 35 per cent of the valid votes polled it should be easy to get at least 45 per cent of the seats. The other Parties are hopelessly divided and no one would expect any of them to secure 35 per cent of the valid votes polled or 45 per cent of the seats.

For the Congress(I), distribution of Party tickets was itself an ordeal. Even Mrs Gandhi had to admit publicly that some "good people" were left out in the process. Selection of Chief Ministers and Ministers will be a more serious problem. Except in Orissa, where Mr J. B. Patnaik is a certainty, there are two, three, or sometimes four candidates for the post of CM. When tickets were distributed, each of them tried to grab the maximum number and during the election battle each tried his best to get as many of his own supporters elected and as many of his adversaries defeated. After the results come out, they will all be engaged in the third round of battle — trying to occupy the most prestigious chair in the respective state secretariats. And at the same time, opponents will have to be kept far away. In this, the final battle, they will make frantic efforts to get either Mrs Gandhi's or Mr Sanjay Gandhi's support.

Ultimately, the extent to which Mrs Gandhi and Sanjay will intervene in the selection of Chief Ministers and Ministers will depend on the actual results. If the Party secures more than 55 per cent of the seats in most states, Sanjay will naturally have a big say in the ministerial selections. Of course, it can be safely predicted that no group will be isolated from power completely, irrespective of who gets the Chief Ministership.

For the largest state of India, Uttar Pradesh, the name of Mr C. P. N. Singh is being mentioned in some circles, though in all likelihood the post will go to Mr N. D. Tewari. Mr Singh is considered a rising star in the Congress(I), but in the eyes of the Party high command he is not experienced enough to occupy the most important chair of Uttar Pradesh yet. At the moment, he is likely to get a more important assignment at the Centre after which he might be sent to Lucknow. So for the present at least, Mr Tewari is expected to get the Chief Ministership. Mr Kamalapati Tripathi's son is also tipped for an important portfolio, provided the family behaves well.

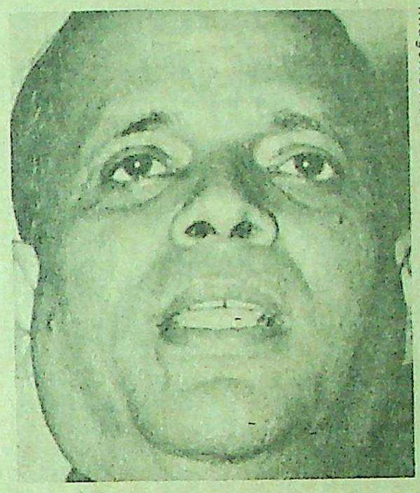

Image makers

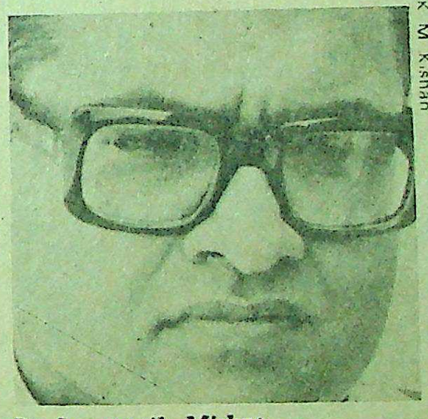
J. B. Patnaik



K. M. Kishan

Dr Jagannath Mishra

In Bihar, the contest will ultimately be confined to Dr Jagannath Mishra and Mr Kedar Nath Pandey. Dr Mishra is still the favourite and unless all the other leaders of the state gang up against him, it will be very difficult to deprive him of the Bihar CM's post. Of course, he will have to accommodate supporters of Mr Pandey, Mr Bhisma Narayan Singh and Mr Sitaram Kesari in his cabinet. In no Congress(I)-run state is the Chief Minister expected to get absolute authority again. The system of checks and balances will go on operating in all the Congress(I) states.

Mr V. C. Shukla, I am afraid, is in for some serious trouble. And if Mr P. C. Sethi goes ahead with his newly formed Shukla-Sethi alliance against Arjun Singh he will also be in for trouble. To declare a crusade against Mr Kamal Nath is one thing, but to go on propagating — even in limited circles — that Mrs Amteshwar Anand is interfering in Madhya Pradesh politics is something else altogether. The Party high command will not tolerate this. Even if Mr Arjun Singh cannot be made the Chief Minister of MP now, Mr Shukla's future in the present set-up of the Congress(I) will continue to remain bleak unless he changes his attitude drastically. The scene in Maharashtra is very complex because there are so many claimants for the Chief Ministership. According to persons close to the Party high command the veteran Mr Vasantdada Patil is expected to get the first chance. In Gujarat it will either be Mr M. R. Solanki or Mr Yogendra Makwana while in Rajasthan Mr Jagannath Pahadia will in all probability be the first choice.

In Punjab again there are a large number of claimants. Some people are keen on getting back Mr Zail Singh as the Chief Minister of the state, while Mr Darbara Singh's name is also being mentioned. Some pundits suggest that Mr G. S. Dhillon's claim cannot be ignored either. It is to be seen whom Mrs Gandhi and Mr Gandhi prefer.

Sanjay played a significant role in the selection of the Party's candidates. In the election battle he was second in command. If everything goes well for the Party he will have a big say in the choice of Chief Ministers and Ministers. And when that comes about, the Party will by and large accept his dominant role, with or without reservations, whatever the pundits might say now.

Mister Grand Slam

ASHOK KAMATH profiles Prakash Padukone

Vidyanand Mullerpatan

THE TV crew from Madras had just finished filming the interview with the new superstar. On an afterthought, the producer suggested that they shoot a sequence of him chatting with his parents. Prakash called the senior Padukones and the trio posed for the TV camera, although the Padukones were visibly self-conscious. Someone suggested that they actually talk. Prakash broke into Konkani and that seemed to ease things a bit. "Hope to see you again in May after you've won the world championship," the producer remarked, as he took his leave of "Prashanth", 64, 15th Cross Road, Malleswaram, Bangalore 560003 —the home of Prakash "Grand Slam" Padukone.

The TV floodlights, the radio microphone, the photographers' flash bulbs, the media men in general tripping over each other for exclusive interviews, not to talk of the gladiatorial reception. What does it all feel like to suddenly have the spotlight trained on you like never before?

"Well, it really is a great feeling," admits Prakash. "You know, scarcely did I imagine that I would get the kind of reception I did when I landed in Bangalore. On the flight from London to Bombay, the Air India crew gave us a reception of sorts. We landed in Bombay in the early hours of the morning and there were a couple of hundred well-wishers and friends to receive us. But the reception at Bangalore airport was something unprecedented. It is probably once in a lifetime that one gets the opportunity of driving in an open jeep with people lining the sides of the road, lustily cheering you. At least these things didn't happen to sportsmen in this country often."

"But one has to take all this in one's stride. At least that is what I honestly believe in and that's one thing I have been able to do. Whether this kind of personality cult, as you term it, can have an adverse effect or otherwise, is entirely up to the individual at the receiving end. Becoming the cynosure of all eyes can have a twofold effect: at one level it might go to the head of the concerned person and at another, expectations are automatically raised high every time you go out on court."

In a society where social responses oscillate between extremes of blind idolatry to downright iconoclasm, it is common enough to see sportsmen being treated according to their performances. To drive home the point I remind Prakash of the report that soon after he lost the final of the All-England Championship, Liem Swie King's statue was demolished and the fallen hero was the target of brickbats even in his hometown.

"Yes, I agree that we have to be more balanced in our reactions. We either put our heroes on a pedestal when they win or (once they lose) consign them to the dustbin. At least, speaking for myself, I am not affected in either way since I play for my own satisfaction. The receptions and all the exposure and the glare of publicity are only incidental. Next year, if I don't retain my titles and consequently do not get this kind of reception, I will not miss it at all. Nor will it mean that I will not try my best after that." It sounded like a new Prakash talking; Prakash the philosopher.

"Like one of my friends told me that he felt the entire thing was being overdone. He felt that people were making a mountain out of a molehill. It is not for me to comment on whether people have over-reacted or done otherwise. I am only saying that if someone has done something remarkable, go ahead and honour him. But at the same time, do not kick him where it hurts, when he fails." At the moment, anyway, Prakash has reason enough to bask in the euphoria that has followed his hat-trick of triumphs in the Swedish, Danish and All-England Badminton Championships.

Prakash with his fiancee, Ujjala Karkal

WHAT is the young badminton star like as a person? In Prakash's own words, "I am basically a very reticent person. I take a lot of time to get used to people. I prefer a quiet atmosphere with my small circle of friends. Not for me any heavy socialising or anything like that". Speaking to him, one can vouch for that fact. It took a considerable effort to draw Prakash out of his shell. But as the interview went along, he became more articulate, more forthcoming in his replies. At the end of it all, one got the impression that he is desperately trying to shield his eyes from the glare of publicity, without being offensive in the process.

Almost anyone who has anything more than a nodding acquaintance with Prakash speaks of him as being a glutton for hard work. In fact, his being a cut above the rest on the badminton court has often been ascribed to the fact that he is his own ruthless taskmaster. Does he really enjoy his uncompromising, spartan discipline and rigorous work schedule? Does it not require a certain amount of masochism to drive himself to reach training targets he sets himself even when there are times when he does not relish doing it?

"It is like this. Of course there are times when, in the midst of training, I feel like giving up. Like say this morning I decide to run 25 laps but by the time I've completed say 20, I am too physically or mentally tired to continue. But I never quit. I tell myself that it is like notching up 13 points in a game and then becoming tired. On a court I never give up until I've reached (or my opponent has) the magical 15 points, no matter how tired I am. Likewise, I never give up until I've completed the number of laps or sit-ups or whatever—I have set myself."

"Maybe there is a certain amount of masochism involved to inflict pain on yourself when you are training but there can be nothing more satisfying than reaching the target you've set yourself. And it pays handsomely in the long run. I have adopted the Indonesian training system. Until I trained with the Indonesian national team in Jakarta in October-November 1977, I followed a rather unscientific system of training. It was in Jakarta that I realised the importance of training for a little of everything: speed, stamina, power, footwork and flexibility. For speed we do sprints, for footwork improvement we do the skipping exercises, for developing strength we do weight training and for flexibility we go through gymnastic exercises.

"Every morning, six days of the week, along with a band of local friends, I train for about an hour and a half at the Kanteereeva Stadium. On Mondays we do only long distance running. This is to improve our stamina. Then of course, the sprints help us improve speed. On Tuesdays we concentrate on weigh training while on Wednesdays we work out in the gym. Thursdays are devoted to skipping, Fridays are again consumed by weight training and Saturdays we devote to shadow badminton. We go through all the strokes in the game with all the seriousness of actually playing. After the end of a stroke we make it a point to return to the centre line before executing the next one. On some Saturday mornings we play some other games just to break the montony. The workouts begin at 7 a.m. every day. But that is not the end of the routine."

"I am back home by around 9 and in office by 10.30. Normally I break off from office around 4.30 pm and head straight for the club. It is only in the evenings that I play badminton. We play in all seriousness: no one is allowed to take the games lightly. You know, it is so hectic—the training and my job in the bank—that I make it a point to keep Sundays completely free for rest. I just don't stir out on Sundays."

The Padukone household in Malleswaram represents a typical middle-class home: unostentatious, functional and with all the attributes that distinguish a house from a home. The house belongs to Prakash's grandfather, Mr. P. Annaji Rao, and was built a couple of months after Prakash was born. The living room "reeks" of Prakash and badminton. A glass shelf, almost bursting at its seams, contains trophies, mainly won by the second son of the household. The All-England trophy gets pride of place in the centre of the room. Across a rather amateurishly designed thermocole-trophy runs the legend: "Hail King Prakash".

PRAKASH is the second child of Ramesh and Ahalya Padukone. The eldest, Pradeep, is an electronics engineer in the United States; Mahesh works for the State Bank of Mysore; sister Padmini is currently doing a course in catering in Pune while the youngest of the lot, Harish, is a second year B. Com. student. Prakash himself graduated in Commerce from the MES College, hardly a stone's throw away from home. A couple of days after he won the All-England title at Wembley, his employers—The Union Bank of India—announced his second promotion in less than two years. What does his work at the bank involve? Says Prakash, "I am attached to the Development Manager's office. I am mostly involved in deposit mobilisation. Naturally there is a certain amount of customer relations work. I started off as a grade II officer, got my first promotion after I won the Commonwealth Games title and now I am a grade I senior officer. I quite enjoy my work. Banking is not all that drab as some people make it out to be. I would have preferred to work in one of the branches because one gets to learn a lot if one is shifted around from one department to another. But it is only fair that I work in the administrative office because it makes things simpler when I have to take leave to play in tournaments or attend coaching camps."

Prakash belongs to the minority tribe of sportsmen who have been able to match their performances on the field with those inside the classroom. Until Pre-University he maintained a first class grading and graduated in Commerce with a second. How did he manage? Were there points when he found himself at crossroads where academics clashed with badminton? "Not really. The badminton season did not exactly clash with my examinations. Except on one occasion when I was training for the Thomas Cup in Patiala and I had my second year university exams coming up. I took my books along with me to the camp and after a hectic day of workouts, I would study late into the night for my exams. I returned to Bangalore one day before the start of the exams, completed them and reported back at the camp. That way, I have invariably managed to have the best of both worlds."

After beating Liem Swie King for the first time in five encounters, Prakash ascribed his success to the fact that he managed to slow down King and thus upset the former champion's rhythm. Does he fancy that — other conditions remaining more or less the same—the tactic will pay off when they meet again? "Honestly," Prakash beamed, "I think that is the only way one can beat him." At least that is the only way I can. If I try to beat him at his own style of play—the fast, hustling, power game—it will be disastrous. Like it was on the four occasions before my Wembley triumph.

Two photographs from Prakash's family album

"No, it is not as though King does remarkably more work than I do. I think we work more or less the same. But he has started that kind of work early. All champions normally start early. It was not so in my case. In addition, there are a lot of other factors that go to build up the physical and mental resistance of a player. Like diet for example. We are uncompromising vegetarians at home. All my non-vegetarian eating is done outside home. And that apart, I undergo strict training in the morning, rush back home for a bath, shave and breakfast, rush to the office, work and then go back to the court. I'm not complaining, but it is quite different for King and many other champions. They spend most of their time in the camp, training in the morning, have a rest in the afternoon and are fresh for another session in the evening. In terms of ability to put in hard work, the conditions are more conducive to King and his kind. Sportsmen in India have also to keep their jobs going because that is what is going to provide security once our playing days are over."

IF someone came forward and told our top sportsmen to concentrate on their respective sporting careers, assuring them that they would be taken care of after their playing days are over, would it lead to an improvement in the performance of the sportsmen concerned?

"Yes, it will lead to a more professional approach to sports if some kind of security can be provided for the future of our sportsmen. But like I said, without the assurance that even after your playing days are over you will be provided with something to fall back upon, sportsmen and sportswomen cannot be asked to concentrate on their respective sporting disciplines and not look beyond."

And talking of professionalism, does Prakash intend turning pro? Is there any future for professionalism in the game of badminton? "At the moment at least, there is little point in my turning pro. If I do, it would mean that I cannot take part in Asian and Commonwealth games. This means my avenues of international competition are restricted. Moreover, in badminton we have nothing like the tennis circuit for pros. The money involved in pro badminton is nothing compared with pro tennis or pro golf or pro boxing. There is an acute need for money to come into badminton in a big way like tennis or football or boxing. And I suppose one way to see that done is to get the Americans involved in it."

"A step in the direction of holding prize-money badminton tournaments was made last September. Three thousand pounds for the first prize is not a bad beginning. But like I said, it will take time before a circuit is developed and professionals can look forward to it as a source of livelihood like many tennis players do."

Does Prakash see badminton as a mass sport in this country? "It is difficult to say, considering the costs involved. Unless equipment is subsidised, it is difficult to imagine a situation where badminton develops a really broad base". True indeed. But in its own small way, Prakash winning the All-England title is probably about the best thing that happened to the game of badminton in this country in recent times. The fanfare, the pageantry, the publicity was as much for Prakash as it was for the game of badminton. Prakash's fortunes on international badminton courts will no doubt give a renewed fillip to the game. At another level, because of the glamour and glory the game has recently acquired, parents need not necessarily look up to a Gavaskar or a Kapil Dev as models for their children: a Prakash Padukone could also do the trick.

In the meanwhile, even before the starry dust has settled, Prakash at the moment appears to be riding a streetcar named desire—a desire to win the official world champion's title at Jakarta. ■

League beleaguered

The fate of Calcutta's annual football mela, the League, is uncertain. S. N. M. ABDI reports.

Nikhil Bhattacharya

Policemen in action during the East Bengal-Mohun Bagan finals

MAY is drawing to a close but the Calcutta Football League has failed to start. This had never happened before, not even during the traumatic Naxalite upsurge. Come what may, the League would start by the second week of May. But not this year. Many still bravely believe that the situation can be retrieved. But for most, the prospects are gloomy. If eventually the League is not held, "it will be sheer agony for me as I cannot spend the long summer months without the staple diet of football" says Kamal Das, a 19-year-old for whom the maidan is a place of pilgrimage.

Of course there are others who disagree with Das; they believe that a football tournament should not be held in Calcutta until the menace of soccer violence is controlled. The last two days of the Federation Cup (staged in April-May) saw the ugliest outburst of violence in the history of Calcutta football. More than 150 people were injured and Eden Gardens, the venue of the matches, incurred damages amounting to Rs 50,000 when irate spectators smashed concrete seats and collapsible gates. The Federation Cup finals, played between East Bengal and Mohun Bagan saw a complete law and order breakdown. The fanaticism of football followers and fierce club loyalties reached such a peak that the supporter of one club killed another club's supporter as the two were watching the match on television.

The West Bengal Chief Minister, Mr Jyoti Basu saw it all. He was there at the stadium to give away the prizes. Before his eyes, officials of the two clubs quarrelled and fought on the sidelines while the players settled scores among themselves inside the playing area. Taking the cue from their heroes, the spectators in the stands went on a rampage. The Chief Minister was prompt in condemning the players and club officials for setting a bad example before their supporters. Later, both the clubs apologised publicly. Soon after, the Chief Minister announced that he would meet representatives of the three big clubs and officials of Calcutta Police to discuss ways in which vandalism on the football ground could be prevented during the forthcoming League and the IFA Shield matches.

But there are other problems besetting the League. Problems legal and an issue of face. As things stand, if the IFA decides to abide by the verdict of two courts, the League can start immediately. But if the IFA decides to press its point of view in a higher court of law, the League may not be held this year at all. According to the IFA Handbook, every year, the winners of the second, third and fourth divisions were promoted to the first, second and third divisions respectively for the next year's League. Correspondingly, the team at the bottom of the table in the first, second and third divisions was relegated at the end of the season to the second, third and fourth divisions respectively. However, towards the close of 1978, the IFA hit upon a new idea. At a special meeting of the governing body it was decided that holders of the first four positions in the second, third and fourth divisions would compete in the first, second and third divisions in the forthcoming League. Similarly, it was also agreed upon that four teams at the bottom of first, second and third division tables would be relegated to the second, third and fourth division for the next season. In January 1979, the IFA sent a copy of the altered regulations to the Registrar of the Societies and it was duly recorded. Informing the registrar was necessary because the IFA is a registered society under the West Bengal Societies Registration Act of 1961.

The new "rule" dealt a severe blow to a medium budget local team, Bhratri Sangha. At the end of the 1979 League it found itself among the last four teams in the first division. Relegation to the second division stared it in the face. So it went to court, challenging the validity of the IFA's governing body's rights to change the regulations. Bhratri Sangha declared at Calcutta's City Civil Court that only a three-fourths majority of the IFA's general body (composed of 177 members) can effect such an amendment. It maintained that the IFA's governing body (composed of 34 members) did not have the power to make the alteration. The court upheld this, giving an ad-interim order of injunction restraining the IFA from enforcing the amendment.

The Sangha won the first round convincingly but the IFA filed a suit in the Calcutta High Court, challenging the order of the lower court. The judgement once again went in favour of Bhratri Sangha. It said, among other things: "Taking the prima facie of the matter, we cannot help but observing that there is hardly and substantial ground which would prompt us in disturbing the order of the Learned Judge of the Court below."

The IFA's dynamic and affable secretary, Mr Ashok Ghosh, is naturally worried about the League's prospects. On May 21 he told me: "We have left it to the (IFA) president to decide whether we should go to court again or not. If he decides not to appeal in a higher court, the League may start at the end of June". Mr Ghosh also pointed out: "To save time, we may divide the first division teams into two groups which will mean lesser number of matches. We may also make arrangements for staging five matches at five grounds daily. We have already forwarded this proposal to Calcutta Police." ■

SHATRU claims to have taught his girlfriend Reena Roy how to "talk". True, she was really dumb when she launched her filmi career and her smarter sister Barkha had to do all the talking for her. And now Shatru complains that she talks too much—talks back at him, of all people. Yogita Bali is another girl who has been trained in the art of talking—by Mithun Chakravarty. Before she met Mithun, she would hardly talk. The reason? She was busy mooning either over Kiran Kumar or Kishore Kumar. Now its Mithun. What ever Mithun says, she repeats it. What he doesn't say, like they are having an affair—she says, in place of him. That's talking.

YOU should have seen Zeenat Aman compering the popular Awards Nite in Bombay recently. Her way-out, knock-out looks added plenty of glamour to the occasion. The award winners however seemed to be the most unlikely choice. For one thing Jaya Bhaduri Bachchan, did not really come up with a dazzling performance in Naukar. Many among the audience felt that Jaya's award was a "consolation prize". And surely, there were better male performances than Amol Palekar's. It was more of a critics' choice. Now coming back to the compere. She had her hair done up in Red Indian style and her lively wit and entertaining chatter were the highlights of the show. Rekha sat through the event with a smirk on her face which read: "Wait till next year—that'll be the year of Rekha."

BENGALI cinema has been introduced to a good combination; Amol and Smita from Bombay. A Press conference was held recently to announce the making of Ashwamadher Ghora, the Bengali production in which the two are cast. Smita sat throughout the conference huncned in her seat like a curious youngster. She looked as if she was brought to a party of grown-ups. The star was gaping at everyone and everything with a wonder-struck look. But she will come alright in the movie. Her off-screen crumpled looks are now quite familiar to the glitter-world sharks.

EVERYONE knows that a male star feels embarrassed if the word gets around that he needs a wig. But who could imagine that a female star would feel equally embarrassed and try her utmost to hide the fact that she needs spectacles? Can you beat it? For specs are quite in, especially those with the new in-frames. But our little girl Moushumi avoids glasses like the plague. She even doesn't mind getting a squint. Maybe she believes that men don't make passes at girls who wear glasses. And that is why she has this squint and makes most of the passes herself, especially at heroes like Vinod Mehra.

SANJEEV is no more the biggest contender for the title of filmdom's biggest kanjoos. Now it's his pal Jeetendra who is in the running. Jeetu wrested the title from the senior, confirmed kanjoos Rajendra Kumar. One wonders what Reema Kapoor, brought up on the extravagance of the Kapoors, would have done as the daughter-in-law of Rajendra Kumar?

THE producer who can heave a sigh of relief is Raj Grover. He has finished shooting Parveen Babi's bit for his new film Taaqat. Now it doesn't matter really if she decides to chuck films for good. There was no doubt that she would complete a big-budget film like Shaan. But a new producer like Raj Grover would have been badly hit if she had jilted his film. ■

A MALAYALAM director who has more than 50 films to his credit will soon need a psychiatrist. He is convinced that his wife has become a victim to the evil spirits generated by Balu Mahendra. It's disgusting to listen to such stories, but they're being floated every day since Shoba's tragic death. Ironically, Balu Mahendra was the man who photographed his biggest hit.

THE moment Pratap Pothen was paired with Sri Vidya in two successive films, the pulp Press in Kerala started spawning gossips. "Since my Thakara turned out to be a record smasher, all kinds of nasty stories about me have been created. But linking my name with Sri Vidya was the limit. She's married to a very successful producer, and touch-wood, it's such an ideal relationship. Just as I was thinking how nice it's to work with a seasoned artiste like Sri Vidya the gossip mills have started grinding..." complained Pratap.

ONE cannot help admiring Jayalalitha's candour. When a Bombay-based journalist thought she was married to "some Jayaram" because she calls herself Jayalalitha Jayaram, the star not only corrected him (Jayaram happens to be her father's name) but also added that she has been going steady with the Telugu actor Shoban Babu for the last seven years. "I cannot marry him as he's already married," said the actress who's struggling to stage a come-back. Asked if Shoban Babu could be a help to her, Jayalalitha replied, "I'd rather try on my own." Whether she succeeds in doing it or not, one must say this much of her: that she's one actress who doesn't go around cribbing, and despite the emotional and professional upheavals in her young life she carried herself with poise and dignity.

STARS in Madras seem to have more chamchas and side-kicks than the ones in Bombay. Some of the enterprising ones help the upcoming stars to organise fan-clubs (called Manrams). They go around decorating cinema halls, screening new movies of their matinee-idols and keeping a tab of his/her box-office records. Chinna Annamalai, once a struggling chamcha, made his fortune when he organised hundreds of Sivaji Ganesan Manrams throughout Tamil Nadu. As a token of appreciation Sivaji helped him turn producer. Some of his earlier ventures including General Chakravarthy were hits but his most ambitious film Dharmaraja turned out to be the thud of the season. Annamalai must be thinking that he should have been independent long back.

THE failure of Dharmaraja is worrying K. R. Vijaya. Most of her hit films starred Sivaji and it's a long long time since she carried a film on her own shoulders.

A WELL-known psychiatrist in the city may soon go bonkers. He often gets frantic calls from fans who want to speak to Dr Rajkumar. There is one particularly lonely lady who keeps telephoning him at odd hours. The psychiatrist has been telling his callers that he is not the Kannada hero, Rajkumar (who resides mostly in Madras) and has an honorary doctorate. Our suggestion to the harassed psychiatrist is to add his family or caste name to the insertion in the telephone directory.

Sometime ago when the psychiatrist had gone to England, his wife was harassed by the lonely lady who refused to believe that her matinee-idol was in the UK. "I just want to hear him sing once over the phone. I saw him coming out of a studio this evening. How could he have gone to London?" she insisted.

Jayamalini: Dancing oomph girl

THE first film directed by Lakshi Muzhalai Pattalam is fairly interesting but since it was supervised by her 'guru' director K. Balachander, the credit for its success has gone to him.

BHARATIRAJA and his cameraman for five films, Nivas, seem to have parted company for good after producing Kallukkul Eeram. This film was directed by Nivas in which Bharatiraja played the hero. Will Bharatiraja act again? Right from his first venture he has been acting in his own films in the Hitchcock tradition. But if he threatens to do a full length role again, distributors may refuse to touch the film.

THE surprise hit of the season is Oru Talai Ragam, a film packed with new talents. The film has Toopa playing the heroine opposite Shankar. A college campus serves as the background for the film. This film is expected to thrill viewers of all shades.

NANDITA BOSE, the Bengali actress who was threatening to make it big in Malayalam films is sitting idle these days. What went wrong? The grapevine tells me that she was in the habit of putting on silly airs. Malayalam producers believe that since they can have more popular artistes like Zarina Wahab, why bother about Nandita?

Thar' she blows !

This Monroe was no Marilyn, however hard she might try to show herself off as one. In fact, this skirt-blowing, leg-baring girl is Constance Forslund, who is starring as the one and only Marilyn Monroe. She showed a lot of leg during the filming of This Year's Blonde, the first in the series of three NBC-TV presentations, based on Garson Kamin's Moviola, the bestseller which deals with the life of Marilyn Monroe. Ms Forslund recreated the famous skirt-blowing episode, originally taken from the movie, Seven Year Itch. In the film Marilyn Monroe's skirt had blown thanks to a mischievous wind, but Ms Forslund adopted a different technique to achieve the same result: she stood on the West 50th Street Metro airshaft. And as the skirt blew, photographers lost no time.

Gone are the days when birds were used to send wartime letters and messages from one place to another. Birds are now used for peaceful purposes and being trained in the arts. Indeed, in the Ukraine, a canary singing group has come into existence and ornithologists are breeding and training canaries that can sing the bass for the group. This singing group has not confined its chirping to light music but is trying its beaks at classical music too, for the repertoire includes the Moonlight Sonata and some Russian folk songs. One wonders who the conductor is going to be.

Royal air farce

This time it is the RAF Buccaneer nuclear bombers that do not seem to fly. During a recent exercise with the United States Air Force, one of the British bombers crashed in the Nevada desert with a broken wing caused by fatigue cracks while trying to evade some American fighters in a simulated low level air fight. The poor performance by the Buccaneers have led RAF officials to consider scrapping the entire force. This no doubt will deal a blow to Europe and the North Atlantic that would be left without the services of the highly trained squadrons till 1982.

Inscrutable ailment

That old historical tormentor of travellers—the Sphinx — is in torment. Nearly 5,000 years of harsh weather has made the Sphinx lose its beautiful neck, paws and sides. They are all crumbling and adding to the sands of the pyramids.

The hullabaloo was raised by the Egyptian newspaper, Al Ahram which said: "Whether we like it or not, the Sphinx is sick and his condition —despite official statements—is not reassuring". This raised a hue and cry in the Parliament. According to the newspaper the causes for the Sphinx's flaking and crumbling skin were sandstorms, wind, rain, rising underground water and pollution from cars. When the issue went to the Parliament, the Minister of Culture Mr Mansour Hasan said that there was nothing to worry about and that he was waiting for a more detailed diagnosis. Egypt was going to sign a contract with Sweco, a Swedish engineering firm for a thorough examination.

See no cleavage

There she was! Bewitching Ms Zsa Zsa Gabor in a very provocative dress with an even more plunging neckline. She arrived hand in hand with Tony Randall and together they made an odd couple for the roundup benefit of the Myasthenia Gravis Foundation at Madison Square Garden in New York City on May 9. It was only natural for the photographers to start clicking their cameras. Poor Tony Randall. Seeing all the attention the lady was getting he whipped off his huge Stetson and did the only thing he could think of: cover her neckline.

Japanese citizens simply do not think the same way as other people do. And it needed a Japanese to tell us that. The Japanese Brain is a book written by Dr Tadanobu Tsunoda of the Tokyo Medical and Dental Research Institute and according to him his countrymen's grey cells function unlike those of others. He has 20 years of research to back him up. Sound and language interpretations function differently in Western and Japanese brains. The learned doctor says that the Japanese can hear rippling water or the sound of a cricket more clearly than anyone else since Japanese brains integrate all the functions of mechanical and musical sounds. That is why, according to Dr Tsunoda, the Japanese have a priority for sentiment and culture while Westerners stress more on logic and ethics.

Times are bad for the gay community. Homosexuals can be dismissed from jobs if they are discovered to be gays, an employment appeals tribunal has recently decidid in Britain. Naturally, the gay community fears that they will face a lot more persecution in later years. The tribunal had upheld the dismissal of a 43-year-old handyman since he was supposed to have "indulged in homosexuality."

Women mostly ignored

By S. URMILA MAJUMDAR

"FROM a political and economic point of view women in China enjoy equal positions with men. The Constitution, Party and State shows great concern for the well being for the women."

"Abortion is legal. Anyone can have any abortion like anyone can have a bad tooth pulled out."

These are two of the few statements that Mrs Hasna Jasimuddin Moudud makes about Chinese women in her book. Mrs Moudud first lets us know of her desire to study "especially the women" in China; then we discover that she devotes no more that 10 of the 89 pages in her book to the topic.

Even in the first chapter one begins to have doubts about the central theme of the book. There is a section titled 'Federation of Chinese Women' which takes up six pages, the longest passage in the entire book dealing with women in China. But all other references made by the author on the topic are confined to scattered statements. Indeed, so scanty is her treatment of women and, comparatively, so exhaustive her treatment of many other things that the book could well have been called anything from 'Nature in China', to 'China, the Land of Tea'.

The book is simply a Bangladeshi Minister's wife's diary, and not a particularly brilliant diary at that. Even the descriptions lack the insight one associates with class writing.

This is more a teenager's diary.

However, as a travelogue, the book might have some value, for the author provides details on scenic spots, folklore, the arts and cuisine of China, and succeeds in informing us, albeit en passant, that the post liberation period has provided women with better opportunities in all spheres of activity.

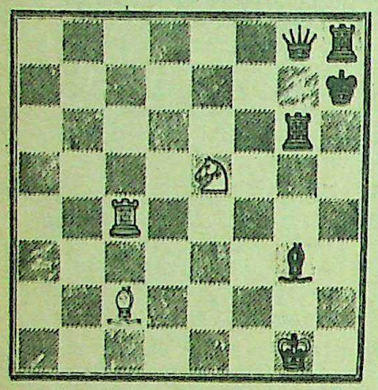
K. A. Mikaze (Black) to move



Harry Kiri (White)

THE Japanese grandmaster K. A. Mikaze can get himself mated from almost any position with remarkable speed. Take the position he reached as Black against Harry Kiri in the Yokohama League last month. Harry, who loves to sacrifice his pieces, had already sacrificed most of them by the time they reached the position in the diagram. He would have resigned long ago, but he knew of Mikaze's reputation.

While Mikaze (Black) was thinking about his move, Harry spotted that if it were his (ie White's) turn he could try 1. R—K4 whereupon Mikaze might find 1. . . R—N2 allowing 2. R—KR4 double check and mate. He then noticed that the fact that it was Black's move in the position made it much more difficult for Mikaze to walk into a mate in two. But Harry was underestimating his opponent's resourcefulness.

Mikaze moved. Harry hadn't expected this one and thought for a long time over his reply, which made his opponent very impatient, so much so that when Harry eventually did make his move, Mikaze banged down his reply without thinking. Harry glanced at the board and coolly delivered mate in one!

How did the game end?

THE Italians showed more enterprise than their American opponents on this deal from the qualifying round of the world championship last year. With better inspiration in the play, they might have gained points instead of losing them.

Dealer, North. Game all.

	♠ Q 10 9 3 ♥ — ♦ J 8 4 ♣ A J 10 6 3 2
♠ 7 6 5 ♥ 8 7 5 4 ♦ 9 6 3 2 ♣ K 5	N W E S	♠ A K J 8 4 2 ♥ 9 3 ♦ K 7 ♣ Q 8 4
	♠ — ♥ A K Q J 10 6 2 ♦ A Q 10 5 ♣ 9 7

When Lauria, for Italy, opened One Spade, Soloway overcalled with Four Hearts and played there. This was the bidding at the other table:

SOUTH	WEST	NORTH	EAST
Franco	Kantar	De Falco	Eisenberg
—	—	No	1♠
dble	No	3♣	No
3♠	No	3NT	No
4♥	No	5♣	No
6♥	No	No	No

West led a spade. South ruffed, drew trumps, and led a low club, on which Kantar smartly played the King. De Falco won with the Ace and used his only entry to lead the Jack of diamonds. Eventually he had to lose the fourth round of diamonds to West's 9.

It would have been slightly better play for declarer to duck the first round of clubs. The best exit for West is a second club to dummy's Ace. South knows the heart distribution and can read East for ♣ Q x x. If he can judge that East holds six spades, then he must be 6-2-2-3 and the right card from dummy is a low diamond, not the Jack.

Winning Card Play, by Hugh Kelsey (Gollancz Master Bridge Series, £5·95), is thoroughly workmanlike, as one would expect. Casting no aspersions, for great minds think alike, it did strike me that the format and contents bore a cousinly relationship to Dormer's and my 'Play of the Cards'. Improve Your Opening Leads, by Hugh Kelsey and John Matheson (Gollanz, £3·50), contains none of the usual sterile injunctions but a series of instructive problems, with the full deal slown in the answer. In a quiet way, one of the best of recent books.

It is almost a century since Captain Cook first appeared on a postage stamp. A series issued in New South Wales in 1888 to mark the centenary of the colony included a 4d stamp showing his portrait. Since then hundreds of stamps have been issued in his honour, most of them in the Pacific islands which he visited during his three voyages of exploration. The Discovery, one of the two ships in which he made his last expedition, is featured on a recent stamp from St Helena.

"I love your 'V.I.P.' As a true Greek Orthodox, I fall for everything with the Classic line!"

It was a beautiful beginning. That spontaneous compliment to Classic, our prestige moulded luggage range, was all we could have hoped for.

But that was Delphina Mixopoulous.* A mixture of old-world Oracle and jet-setting beauty.

"Your 'V.I.P.' will go places" she said, in the same occult tone.

"It already has" we said confidently. "'V.I.P.' goes to 48 countries around the world!"

"I'm sure I've taken it to 49—at the very least!" quipped the shipping heiress who found it difficult to stay away from water. Even on land.

"The most beautiful thing about 'V.I.P.' is its clean line. Classic—that's a good name for it."

"We also have another range —Travelite" we informed her.

"Some people can travel light", she shrugged, "Me, I take along a dozen suitcases or more. All Classics."

"Of course, I always take a bit of Greece with me wherever I go—just in case. I feel a little homesick," she confessed. "So I choose the 'V.I.P.' blue of the Mediterranean sky, the green of the olive groves and the gold of the Grecian sunshine..."

"We've built one of the largest luggage factories in the world" we said modestly.

"That's splendid" she enthused. "We Greeks love monuments to everything. Even success."

"Of course" we said, "in today's world, practicality is important. So we build our 'V.I.P.'s really tough."

"That's how they survive all my Epic voyages" she exclaimed with an admiring smile. "My next Odyssey is to Africa...and I've got my 'V.I.P.' suitcases packed and ready for it."

"We're sure you'll like our Carry-ons" we said.

"Well" she joked, "there are some who say Greeks love to carry on. Regardless! That, of course, is another of those Greek Myths."

"We hope you will return to India soon" we said.

"Nai! Nai!" she replied. "I most certainly will! I've got to visit so many good friends. Like you."

Seeing our confusion she explained that 'nai' was 'yes' in Greek. Now, you know how the expression talking Greek arose!

We said a regretful goodbye, observing that nobody could now talk about the Greek influence in India and think only of Alexander the Great!

* To protect the privacy of our 'V.I.P.' customers, it has been necessary to conceal their actual identities.

Beginning June 1

This week the Sun alone is in Taurus. Mercury and Venus are in Gemini. Jupiter, Saturn, Rahu and Mars are conjoined in Leo. Neptune and Uranus are in Scorpio. Kethu alone is in Aquarius. The Moon will be moving through Capricorn, Aquarius and Pisces from Sagittarius.

ARIES (March 21 — April 20) This week your affairs make good progress despite some anxiety and annoyance. Your health may need an extra care. Much will depend on how you make the decisions. Your family life may create problems which may in turn affect the financial front. Check all extravagant tendencies. Wait for important letters before taking a decision. You will make new friends. Good dates: 3, 5 and 9. Lucky numbers: 2 and 3. Favourable direction : South.

TAURUS (April 21 — May 22) In the early part of this week you will gain on the financial front. Favours from high authority are likely. Elderly relatives will prove helpful, but money-matters need careful handling. Guard yourself against extravagance and imposition. Eschew speculation and avoid changes. A friend from the opposite sex may betray you. Good dates : 1, 2, 3 and 4. Lucky numbers : 1, 10 and 5. Favourable directions : West and South.

GEMINI (May 23 — June 21) This is an important, eventful week for you. Property-dealings and speculation are well-signified. A good time for romance and marriage. Go for all kinds of changes. Women folk may prove helpful but they may hinder progress. You may get entangled in needless quarrels. But gains on the financial front are predicted. A secret matter will progress. Good dates : 2, 3, 5 and 6. Lucky numbers : 3, 9 and 6. Favourable directions : South and East.

CANCER (June 22 — July 22) Exercise tact and patience in all your business transactions. Seek and act upon the advice of the elders. Guard against disputes. Avoid change. Safeguard your health and that of your family. Do not throw discretion to the winds. Be cautious in speech and correspondence. A sudden sickness may upset your plans. Keep your temper under control. Take care of your valuables. Good dates : 2, 4 and 7 Lucky numbers : 1 and 8 Favourable direction: North.

LEO (July 23 — August 22) New friendships and pleasant relationships are likely. Your own health and that of your family will improve. This week is favourable for marriage and dealings with elders. Make hay while the sun shines. You will gain on the financial front in unexpected ways. A good time for travel. Letters from distant places will gring good news. A friend may betray you. Good dates : 1, 4 and 6. Lucky numbers : 4, 6 and 8. Favourable direcitions : East and North-west.

VIRGO (August 23 — September 22) Moderate success in money-matters is predicted. But do not be careless in business interviews and correspondence. New friends enter your life and contribute much to your happiness. Children and womenfolk may cause some anxiety. Guard against over optimism. If you are careful, luck will surely smile on you. Good dates : 2, 4, 5 and 7. Lucky numbers: 5, 3, 7 and 9. Favourable directions: North-west and South.

LIBRA (September 23 — October 22) Success on certain fronts is predicted. You will gain financially, often unexpectedly. But guard against deception from women folk. Do not enter into arguments with colleagues. Postpone courtship and marriage. Concentrate more on business affairs. Adopt novel methods for success in business. Wait for important letters. Good dates : 1, 2, 5 and 6. Lucky numbers : 1, 2 and 3. Favourable direction : West.

SCORPIO (October 23 — November 21) This week may be somewhat disappointing. Problems on the financial front and complexities in business are likely. But new friendships will contribute to your happiness. You need patience and self-confidence to get through the difficulties. Seek and act upon the advice of friends and elders. Your own intuition should also prove very helpful. Good dates : 4, 5 and 6. Lucky numbers: 4, 8 and 7. Favourable direction: South.

SAGITTARIUS (November 22 — December 22) You will experience a strange mixture of good and ill fortunes. Meet unexpected loss and anxiety with courage. Postpone courtship, marriage and other changes. Do not be careless in your business affairs. Eschew doubtful friendships and concentrate on your profession. A new friend of the opposite sex will contribute to your happiness. Good dates : 3, 5, 6 and 7. Lucky numbers : 1, 5 and 10. Favourable directions : West and North.

CAPRICORN (December 23 — January 20) You will have an active, happy and successful week. You will prosper in business. Good fortune on all fronts is predicted although you may be faced with disagreements. Curb impetuosity and check irritations. Push your affairs to the utmost. An old friend will come to your rescue. Check all extravagant tendencies. Do not gamble for high stakes. Good dates: 3, 4, 5 and 6. Lucky numbers : 3, 4 and 8. Favourable direction: East.

AQUARIUS (January 21 — February 19) Success and happiness will be your portion this week. This week is favourable for love, marriage and other auspicious events. You may have to go on a pleasant journey. You will go through beneficial changes. Success of your children is predicted. Intellectual and artistic activities will keep you engaged. New friendships are also likely. Good dates : 1, 2, 3 and 6. Lucky numbers : 2, 4 and 9. Favourable direction : North.

PISCES (February 23 — March 20) Success, good fortune and happiness are predicted. You will benefit through elderly women and business colleagues. Your own originality and business acumen will also help you to succeed. You will gain through unexpected sources. Friends from the opposite sex will prove helpful. Watch your finances. Good dates : 1, 3, 5 and 6. Lucky numbers : 4 and 8. Favourable direction : South

CALCUTTA: The ladies compartment of the Bandel-Howrah Local was the venue of a unique farewell meeting on Friday (May 16) morning. The recipient was Mrs Hemlata Devi, a school teacher who had been travelling in that train daily for the past 42 years. The participants were her fellow commuters, women going to work in Calcutta. Friday was her day of retirement when she boarded the train for the last time. The meeting was perfect in every detail, supervised by Mrs Sovana Ghosh, a senior member of the commuting fraternity. Another senior member was elected president of the meeting. There was an opening song and speeches recalling Mrs Hemlata Devi's long association with the early morning journey every day. She was given presents and a scroll. Then with the closing song the function was over—a function that not many perhaps knew about, but those who did would remember for ever—The Statesman (D. N. Chopra, Ranchi)

COCHIN: An institute awarding fake diploma certificates in medical laboratory technology has been unearthed, city police claim. The institute has for the past three years been selling diploma certificates, purported to have been issued by leading doctors along with character certificates and record books to "trainees" to meet the growing demand for medical laboratory technicians in Gulf countries, police said. The existence of the Institute at nearby Kaloor came to light when a "trainee" who had paid his fee for a three-month course in the morning and got his "certificate" in the evening reported the matter to the police. According to police the institute has been charging Rs 1,000 for a first class diploma certificate, Rs 700 for a second class and Rs 500 for a third class. Police took into custody the 'principal' and another person besides seizing some records and seals used by the institute — The Hindu (G. Sriram, Madras)

SALEM: It is never too late for Cupid, god of love, to make even a person who has lived the full three score and ten years, fall in love. This has been proved by the well attended marriage of 73-year-old Nagappan with 63-year-old Kolundai at Andikarai near Mettur last week. Nagappan, a washerman, had remained a bachelor, but Kolundai was married four decades ago but was deserted by her husband. Her only daughter is the mother of three. The two had met at a dhobi khana and it was love at first night—The Hindu (Chandra Manoharan, Ootacamund)

GWALIOR: An American girl sat on fast outside the Gwalior Central Jail in sympathy with the nine dacoits who have been on indefinite fast here since May 1 demanding their release. Miss Sari Bond who is impressed by the Gandhian philosophy, sat with two workers of the Gandhi Seva Ashram—Deccan Chronicle (Dr S. Suresh Babu, Nizamabad)

NEW DELHI: A suit pending for the last 28 years is to come up in a court here later this month for hearing of final arguments. The suit was filed on Dec. 11, 1952 under the Displaced Persons Act by the late Rai Sahib Prithvi Raj, a contractor, claiming about Rs 2 lakh from Jamia Millia Islamia University and its Vice-Chancellor for having constructed a teachers' training hostel on his land. The issues in the case were framed in 1956. The recording of evidence running into 2,300 pages, was concluded on March 30, 1971. About 15 judicial officers have dealt with the case so far. An equal number of pleaders have been replaced by both the parties. A sub-judge who initially heard the case, is now a judge of the Delhi High Court, while another sub-judge who had heard it has since retired after serving as High Court judge — The Hindustan Times (B. B. L. Sharma, New Delhi)

KARNAL: The Block Development office at Radaur, 50 km from here, is the scene of a drama which has become a source of amusement in the area. According to authentic sources, Mr Jawahar Lal, Block Development Officer, was transferred from Radaur and his successor, Mr Vijay Sharma, took over on May 5. But Mr Jawahar Lal got his transfer order stayed. Now both have placed their chairs facing each other in the office. Both are signing the files and giving orders. One of them has taken charge of the cash and the other has charge of the office record. The office staff are in a fix as to whom they should obey. The people of the area do not know who they should approach for their problems. Both claim to be the real Block Development Officer — The Tribune (R. N. Sulthan, Chandigarh)

ROORKIE: A quarrel over 50 paise cost a young woman her nose. The police said a woman demanded 50 paise from her husband here last evening. The man refused. There was an exchange of hot words and in a fit of rage the man chopped off her nose. The chopped-off nose was later handed over to the police—Times of India (S. R. Swamy, Tuticorin)

SUNDAY NO BAR

Dharm Vir Jayner

Jagmohan

ON MAY 4, liquor shops in Delhi remained open for the first time on a Sunday after many months. Under Morarji Desai the capital had more dry days in a year than wet ones. In the new policy announced recently, the number of dry days has been drastically reduced and Sundays have been spared from the 'dry' net. But the initial happiness on the part of liquor enthusiasts of Delhi was shortlived. Though the state-owned liquor shops were open on May 4, there was no beer or whisky available. In some shops only brandy was available: hardly a cheering drink for a hot summer day. For a few days following the "relaxed" liquour policy, only empty liquor shops were open in the capital because the wholesalers were holding on to their stocks, hoping for a hike in the prices. Actually, none of the top people in the Union Territory of Delhi, who are responsible for the implementation of the liquor policy—Lt. Governor Jagmohan, Excise Commissioner Jagdish Sagar, and the chief executives of the two government agencies responsible for liquor distribution, K. N. Sahani and B. Chatterjee—drink. But shouldn't they be a little kinder to their elbow-bending brethren ?

SHIFTING FORTUNES

MANY government servants had been under a cloud during the days of the Janata raj, but now it is perhaps the turn of others. Ramanathan, press officer to Charan Singh when the latter was Prime Minister, is now posted as a deputy press information officer in charge of photo features in the Press Information Bureau of the government. He was recently given a notice by the government to "explain his conduct" during the Lok Dal regime although he was posted to the Prime Minister's office on government orders. Another unfortunate man is H. C. Bhargava, a senior superintendent of police posted with the Intelligence bureau. He was the man in charge of dealing with top opposition leaders like Nanaji Deshmukh during the Emergency. During the Janata raj he was entrusted with the task of carrying out a raid on Mrs Gandhi's farmhouse at Mehrauli, on the outskirts of Delhi. As a result he has now been given marching orders from the capital and shunted off to Kohima. Professional hazards, perhaps.

DONNING NEW COLOURS

THE University of Delhi, which has on its rolls nearly one lakh students, has got a new vice-chancellor, Gurubaksh Singh, who comes from the Benaras Hindu University. The pro-vice-chancellor's post has gone to P. C. Mukherji, a 59-year-old retired don from Calcutta. Mukherji, a former principal of Presidency College, Calcutta, had worked with Gurubaksh Singh at the Central University, Hyderabad, a few years ago. Two other important posts of the University, having ranks equivalent to that of the pro-VC, — the Dean of Colleges and Director, South Campus, have gone to youngsters in the University fraternity. P. L. Malhotra (42) the younger brother of Lt. Governor Jagmohan, has been appointed the Dean of Colleges. Malhotra had been the principal of the College of Vocational Studies which has a student strength of around 400 and is one of the smallest constituent colleges of the University. If Malhotra has superseded many, then so has Abid. Ahmed (41) of the business studies department, who has bagged the prestigious South Campus directorship. So far Delhi University—despite many agitations by students, teachers and the karmacharis—has been able to maintain its reputation of being a university which conducts its examinations regularly and where academic years begin and end on time. One only hopes that the Benaras and Calcutta University culture will not be 'imported' to the University along with the dons.

Manu's cruel curse

"HOW men exploit, abuse women" (27 July) by Saumitra Banerjee is an article which has been written, read, will be commented upon and then forgotten. Likewise, many articles have been written, read and forgotten. Isn't there really anything that can stop all these disgraceful and disgusting crimes and make society absolutely safe and peaceful for women? After all this hue and cry, has anything been done about the conduct of policemen? At least 70 per cent of reported atrocities on women are mainly due to policemen or police connivance.

Probably there is something terribly wrong with our society and culture. I wonder why there has not been a woman writer like Manu to define the role of woman vis-a-vis her husband and society, and that of man. If Manu were a female, the situation today would have been very different indeed !

Uma Chawla, Calcutta

THE issue on women was highly commendable. The highbrows once said, reminding all, that:

Woman was made—not from man's head, to be above him;
not from his foot, to be stamped by him;
but from his side to be equal to him;
from near his heart to be loved by him;
and below his arm to be protected by him.

Rumki Roy, Rourkela

OFTEN it is we women who are our worst enemies. Are not mothers-in-law and women constables responsible for the torture of women too?

Indu Dalabehara, Calcutta

YOUR cover story will go a long way to making up the minds of most male intellectuals who complacently believed that women are themselves responsible for the atrocities on them. The immediate need of the day is an accommodative attitude towards women; bringing up a daughter should not be any more difficult for parents than bringing up a son.

S. Ramesh, Jamshedpur

IN THE past rape was committed but never came to light. Recently the Press has paid the attention that women have demanded. The worst tragedy is that policemen are involved in the crime.

Banshidhar Pd. Rukhaiyar, Hazaribagh

RAPE is a social stigma. It seems quite pointless to listen to unending tales of woe of women who have fallen prey to lecherous crimnals, time and again.

Subhashis Ray, Puri

POPULAR film stars should be ashamed of propagating the idea of male superiority; even top actresses get at least one slap from their husbands on the screen, and rape victims of 'good character' almost invariably commit suicide. With such constant brainwashing through films, one cannot but expect a reversion to the days when a woman was tested in fire for the fault of being abducted. Ms Nargis Dutt, instead of condemning Satyajit Ray for projecting reality, should use her influence to check this trend.

Balamani Bezbaruah, Jorhat

Home was hell

I READ Mira Savara's account of "Wife beating: violence in the middle class family" (27 July). I myself have been badly affected by incidents of wife-beating in my own home. I come from an upper middle class family. I have seen my parents quarrelling day in and day out ever since I was a little child. My father was a very hot-tempered person and at times he had good reason to be angry. But the manner in which he treated my mother was unjustifiable: he would abuse her, her mother and father and also physically assault her, resulting in some injury at times. When my mother physically retaliated, he would complain about her to others as though violence was his sole right. We were silent witnesses to all this. The impact of my early years left me a very nervous person for the rest of my life, a handicap which has severely affected my personality, career and, above all, peace of mind. I realised this after going through psycho-analysis and psycho-therapy which eventually saved me from becoming a nervous wreck. Now when I see the same recurring, I am moved and curse my father for having been the cause of it all.

In a home where the wife is not respected by the husband, children lose respect for their parents and tend to behave similarly after they are married: the same story is repeated with the grandchildren. A woman who has been maltreated all her life develops psychological defects leading to problems of social adjustment.

Another point I would like to make is that parental traits are carried to children through environmental effects. My brother occasionally expresses his anger by throwing down plates and thinks fit to slap his wife when she makes an error because he witnessed such behaviour in his childhood. Do we women enjoy similar rights?

Anonymous

Sad commentary

"RAPE and the laws of Manu" (27 July) by Shubhadra Butalia was an eye-opener. Superbly written, the article cites some cases of women who had burnt themselves on the funeral pyres of their husbands, while others watched. The callous indifference with which these women were treated, especially by government officials, does not really come as a surprise when one considers a report in Weekend Review (2 August 1980): At an informal lunch in Delhi, a senior Union Cabinet Minister is said to have remarked, "Rape to hazaro saal se ho raha hai, aur aakhir aurat to bhogne ke cheez hai." The Minister in question was one of those to troop down to Baghpat. Even if what he said was in jest, it shows a lack of culture

Kanchan Sen, Calcutta

IT IS our duty to the victims of rape to get them married off happily; ignoring the ridiculous notion of virginity would help a great deal. In rape what does a woman lose that a man does not? Apparently, it is her "honour" in society. The idea that if virginity is lost, everything is lost should be done away with. On the other hand, rapists must be severely punished and socially boycotted.

Mahesh Kumar, New Delhi

READING our magazines and seeing our films, even normal persons would become rapists !

S.F. Sundara Raj, Tiruchirapalli

WHEN women are proving themselves to be equal to, if not better than, men in most fields, it is absolutely essential that they be guaranteed protection and safety in the interest of society.

Anjana Maitra, Rourkela

THAT was a truly emotion-charged cover story. I was shocked, angered and disgusted after reading it.

N. Ramesh, Hyderabad

MERELY creating laws will not help to check crimes on women. Such atrocities will continue as long as bourgeois society prevails. These atrocities are the poisonous fruits of capitalism: never does one come across them in a socialist country.

Marmabina Sen, Bangalore

IT IS a shame that rape, molestation and other crimes on women continue to occur when the PM of our "motherland" is herself a woman. It is high time that the Indian Penal Code was amended to treat crimes on women at par with crimes such as murder and homicide. Instead of mere suspension or dismissal the criminals should receive capital punishment.

Shame on the law

S.N.M ABDI's report "Ordered to have intercourse with his mother" (27 July) was shocking. A worse instance cannot be cited to show how filthily the police behave with women. The fact that policewomen commit atrocities against their own sex, in a country which has a woman PM is shameful. If guardians of the law resort to such brutalities, how can the people be expected to respect the law?

R. Bhaskaran, Tiruchirapalli

WHILE your cover asks the question "Why are men so cruel?" the more pressing question, I believe, is: "Why is the government so inactive?" S.N.M. Abdi's heartrending account of the torture of Rukmini, a pregnant woman, by two policewomen would prove my point.

Ramanath Rath, Behrampur, Orissa

DESCRIBING Rukmini's nightmarish experience with the Nandini police in Madhya Pradesh, the reporter pointed out that a woman sub inspector Edna Montis and a woman constable Naseem Begum not only tortured their pregnant victim but also "picked up a pencil and pushed it violently into Rukmini's vagina" resulting in her miscarriage. Does this not show that even women are no better in treating their genre than men?

P. Balasubramanian, Salem

Remember ?

I AM surprised that Dr T.D.Goswami, general secretary of the Gauhati University Teachers' Association should in his letter (Opinion, 27 July) suppress the clarification he sought and obtained from me.

In my clarification I had pointed out that the torchlight procession had stopped in front of our family-residence at Nijarapur, Gauhati, and shouted abusive slogans like "Death to the traitor Hiren Gohain". Dr Goswami probably sees no provocation in such incidents which are not all that uncommon. Only three or four days ago a visitor to the university campus looking for my house had been badly threatened.

It is not very helpful if leaders of the present movement evade responsibility for such incidents. They might have had a better hearing if they had taken steps at the initial stage to prevent their occurrence.

Hiren Gohain, Reader, Gauhati University, Gauhati

THE general secretary of the Gauhati University Teachers' Association Dr T.D.Goswami would have done better to refute Sunday's findings ("Assam: Tragedy unfolds", 8 June) on the present movement in Assam than to make a futile case against the predecessor president and the executive on whole imaginary and untenable propositions. The two general meetings of the association mentioned in his letter were not in fact requisitioned and Dr Goswami can never prove the contrary. Again, the idea of a Sangram Samiti was hotly debated in the September meeting and was ultimately rejected in favour of allowing the executive committee to take decisions on the foreigners' issue.

About the charge of 'inaction' by the executive committee under my presidentship, I have no comments to offer except quoting a resolution passed by the general body on 13 September 1979: "This emergent general meeting of the GUTA expresses its appreciation of the service rendered by Dr P.Sharma to the GUTA and its solidarity with the President Dr Sharma and strongly urges upon him to accept the mandate of the members to continue in office as President."

Purna Sharma, Gauhati University, Gauhati

My word !

THIS refers to "Offensive but not unparliamentary" (27 July). So Mr Khushwant Singh is at it again. Even at the Rajya Sabha his therukoothu (Tamil for folk theatre, literally street act) is on. But Bhupesh Gupta is more than a match for him. The brush between the two over the definition of the term sycophant is hilarious. I'm glad the communist leader refuses to withdraw his well-founded allegation ("Not a syllable of it will I withdraw.") Bravo ! Among the various dictionary meanings Mr Singh lists he conveniently omits the most relevant one: "Sycophant, n ... Flatterer, toady; parasitic person..." (The Concise Oxford Dictionary of Current English, Fourth Edition); "Sycophant. n... a servile flatterer." (Chambers's Twentieth Century Dictionary). Mr Singh speaks proudly of his Gandhism. Clearly he means Indira-Sanjay Gandhism.

We regret that in Rasheed Talib's article, "Can Mrs Gandhi provide a national consensus?" (Sunday, 27 July), certain sections were interposed, leading to a wrong paragraph sequence. Our sincere apologies to the author and the readers.—Editor

Leaks all over

I READ "How question papers are bought and sold" (8 June). Similar incidents occurred during the first year B.Sc examinations of the Jammu and Kashmir Board of School Education in March this year. Most of the question papers were leaked out and the authorities did not lift a finger. On 7 April the Chemistry Paper B examination was postponed

First demand: leadership

I WENT through "Are workers getting selfish?" (27 July) with particular care and attention and seriously pondered over the author George Fernandes's assessment of the situation: "Gone are the days when a fight for workers was equivalent to a fight for human values—the concept of unions as champions of workers has given way to the concept of unions as service agencies." If we read between the lines, we understand the phenomenon of degeneration of trade unions. In the analysis, many labour leaders, including Mr Fernandes, and organisations like AITUC and CITU, would be held responsible for this. There has been a gradual phasing out of the "principles of class struggle" and now even trade unions controlled by communists are the safety valves of workers' anger. The economism of workers has grown because of extremely sectarian methods of politicisation and mobilisation of workers for political advantages. In spite of all the talk of left unity, AITUC and CITU do not hesitate to use underhand methods to control each other's strongholds. Labour leaders, including George, owe us an explanation: is it not a fact that their petty rivalries have emasculated the working class movement?

I do not blame the INTUC or BMS—they have never believed in the Marxist-Leninist organisation of the working class, or in the principle of a classless stateless society as the ultimate stage of evolution with change in production relations. But those who believe in class war and understand the precepts of revolutionary Marxism and refuse to abide by it cannot escape our criticism. Bogged as they are in their own bureaucratism and hierarchies of district committees, state committees, central committees and politburos, the communist movement is incapable of inspiring any revolutionary ideals or principles. Student and working class organisations built on class lines necessitate a revolutionary programme and a concrete theoretical analysis must precede their establishment. But because of the conformist class character of the Indian coffee house Marxists (of whom, ironically, I am one) this seems impossible.

Why is it that we have very few A.K. Roys in our communist movement, and why, in spite of his excellent work in the Bihar coal-belt, does he never come into the limelight? Marxist leaders can be seen frequenting conferences and seminars on class struggles and proletarian internationalism. Why blame workers for demanding terrycot suits? The point is obvious. If the Indian worker is losing his radicalism, it is because his leaders have failed him. Raising the red flag on May Day does not usher in revolutionary consciousness.

Sanjeev Chopra, Convener, Collective for the Resurrection of Revolutionary Marxist Traditions, Jullundur

UNEMPLOYMENT is a national problem, but many trade union demands tend to be localised. Hence asking workers to think over a national problem will not be practical. It is the duty of the national trade union leaders to make workers aware of these problems. Again, the price rise is not due to the demand for more wages or bonus. It is the profit-hungry producer who raises the prices of products. Workers demand more wages only to meet the higher cost of living.

ID: DAY OF DEATH

M. J. AKBAR reports why Moradabad's Muslims were gunned down by police on the day of Id

Once again this was a case of police brutality, pure and simple. The forces of "law and order" unleashed their fury on thousands of Muslims who had come to offer prayers on their day of joy and celebration; hundreds died, including many children, in the massacre and the stampede. And hundreds were injured; for many of them death will come. Both the Hindus and the Muslims of Moradabad are telling anyone who will listen that what happened on 13 August in their city was not a communal riot: it was a straight clash between the police and Muslims. But the police, in order to throw a cover on their brutal misdeeds, are telling lies about what precisely happened, and building up false trails that might shift the focus of attention from the incidents of the namaz. Moradabad was not communal on 13 August, but the police might have made it communal by the time this appears in print.

Telegram sent by Hafiz Mohammad Siddique, Congress(I) MLA from Lalbagh, Moradabad, to the Prime Minister, Home Minister, Chief Minister of UP, and others on the evening of August 13

AFTER a long month of daylong fasting, during which not a morsel of food nor a drop of water may pass the gullet between first light and sunset, Muslims gather on their rooftops to search for that thin sliver of gold which will appear for ten minutes or so on the western sky as the sun melts into the horizon below it. This is the new moon which will announce the end of the month of Ramzan, and the beginning of the most joyous day in the Muslim calendar - the day of Id. This is the day which Muslims await: new clothes are made, presents are distributed, the sweet sewai is offered as a sign of friendship. The high point of Id is the namaz, to which Muslims go early in the morning, dressed in their new clothes, perhaps with a little attar in their ear. Apart from the adult women, everyone else goes to the Id prayers - including all the children, both boys and girls. The namaz is a celebration of God's goodness, and a reaffirmation of brotherhood, a concept which finds expression in the gesture which has become synonymous with Id - the embrace.

More than 50,000 Muslims gathered at the Idgah (the name means where Id prayers are held) of Moradabad. Sixty per cent of this city of five lakhs is Muslim, and Id obviously is one of the major celebrations of the town. Buntings with Id Mubarak written on them flutter from shops; painted advertisements on walls encourage you to smoke Biri 788 in the first line, and wish you happiness on Id in the last. The Idgah is a largish open field, walled on the sides, with one entrance leading to the main road. At one corner of the Idgah, near the main road, is a small mosque called EK Raat Wali Masjid, because it had been constructed decades ago in one night. As usual the Muslims came for their prayers, bedecked in their new clothes, and brought all their children along. (The desperate theorists, who are searching hard for a deepseated, widespread Muslim conspiracy against the police, might like to ponder over this point: would Muslims who came to fight bring their small innocent, children along with them to get massacred?) And, as usual, the crowd spilled over from the Idgah onto the main road, on which the namazis spread pieces of cloth and formed the traditional rows for the prayers.

Just opposite the Idgah, across the main road, are shops owned by Punjabi Hindus, and nearby is a Punjabi colony. Various organisations had set up shamianas near these shops to offer Muslims Id greetings after the prayers. At every such gathering in the country, the local administration posts policemen to ensure that nothing untoward happens. Some of the force was posted at the shamiana; other policemen were on the main road at the point where the congregation which had spilled over onto the roads finally ended.

The namaz is divided into three clear sections. First come the genuflections, which take a couple of minutes during the Id prayers. Then the congregation sits and hears the Imam recite passages from the Quran: this is the khutba, and takes about five minutes. The whole congregation then raises its hands in dua, which lasts a minute or two, and the namaz is over. It was during the khutba that a pig wandered into the namaz.

First question: did the pig actually wander into the namaz? We met eyewitnesses, including one who was not a Muslim (see Tyagi's story) who confirm that it did. The dispute between the people praying and the policemen arose when the Muslims asked the policemen how the pig had wandered in despite the presence of the police. After all, prayers are being held at that Idgah for generations, and the harijan colony which is nearby has also existed for as long as anyone cares to remember: so how come a pig, which is considered by Muslims to be an unclean animal which would completely destroy the sanctity of the prayer, has never disturbed the namaz before, and chose to do so this year—despite a police force being right there?

The policemen told the Muslims that it was not their job to prevent pigs from disturbing the namaz. Therefore, question number two. Was it the policeman's job to stop the pig or not? On the face of it, it would seem a silly reason for such havoc, but only those who have no idea about Muslim sentiment would expect Muslims not to get agitated if a pig disturbed their prayers—particularly if they thought that the police had deliberately sent the animal. A friend of mine who is in politics, whose integrity I trust and whose secularism I have faith in, commented: "How can I give a statement asking the police to stop pigs from disturbing a namaz? Is that their job?" The only reply to that I can give is: supposing a bunch of communal Muslims took a cow in front of a temple while a huge crowd had gathered for prayers, and started to slaughter it, would it be the job of the police to stop this stupidity or not? A pig in a namaz is just as provocative, and every administration in the districts of Uttar Pradesh knows it. It is not a question of reason or rationale: this is simply how a community feels.

It is easy to get depressed about Moradabad. But hidden behind the filth of the violence lie certain equally important truths about the people of India and our institutions...The quiet but splendid job done by the BSF and the Army in restoring the confidence of the fear-stricken people, for instance.

Kamal Sahai

THIS altercation took place where the congregation was tapering off; and then suddenly everything began happening very quickly. Within the five minutes that it takes to read the khutba and complete the dua the police had opened fire! The dua was not complete before began the deathly whine of bullets speeding through or into the massed namazis. One person, who was at the prayer, described it thus: "During the khutba I heard a noise from the back. People started standing up and seeing what had happened. Then they sat down again. But before the dua was over, the noise of the quarrel became very loud, and then before anyone could really react we heard the sound of bullets."

The Imam who was at the microphone saying the dua stopped, and began appealing to the police to stop this madness of firing into a throng of namazis. Nobody listened. The local Congress(I) MLA Hafiz Mohammad Siddique, who was there, also appealed over and over again to the police—but they had gone berserk. A stampede had begun, and cries of pain filled the air as terrified children came under the feet of a fleeing crowd, as a bewildered people bagan getting hit by bullets.

The police are now telling many lies to cover up their criminal assault on a defenceless congregation, and these lies fall to pieces under scrutiny. The first lie they tried to circulate was that they were fired upon by a Muslim, and that armed Muslims were sitting at the prayers waiting to create trouble. The police killed many, many that day: did they recover any arms from anyone in that congregation? The police say, very correctly, that an SSP of theirs was injured, and claim that five constables died and four are missing. True, the SSP was injured at the Idgah, but did any of the constables die at the Idgah? Or did they die much later, when an infuriated mob of Muslims decided to take revenge by attacking the police chowki at Galshahid? The police also tried to create the impression that Muslims began brickbatting first and then the police opened fire. Another lie. The police opened fire within less than five minutes of the altercation; the brickbatting came later. After the stampede had started outside the Idgah, Muslim youth who saw how the police were behaving loosed the top layer of bricks from one of the walls surrounding the Idgah and started hurling them at the police. The real truth is that if the police, whatever the provocation, had simply waited another two minutes or so for the namaz to end, and people to get up, the carnage would never have taken place. But the police acted with communal fury.

D. P. Singh, an elderly government official who had come to wish the namazis Id Mubarak, was sitting at the shamiana which had been put up by the municipality, was hit by one of the brickbats and later died. And even as the violence became a confrontation, thousands of Muslims began fleeing through whichever way they could. The fact that the Idgah was walled became a major disadvantage. There are some Muslim houses adjacent to one wall; from these windows women hurriedly threw down ladders and children were pulled up to the windows and brought to safety. Many rushed through the one exit which seemed safe, the mosque: but the police later actually entered the mosque and fired right on the courtyard of the mosque, according to eyewitnesses. Dr Naseem Ahmed recounts that he helped pick up 24 bodies from the compound of the mosque, including 13 children.

The police created havoc. Many Muslims who were killed cannot be traced: the police have no "record" of the bodies. To give just one example: Salim Mohammad was 25 years old, and he had been married to the young Naeema just five months ago. He was a worker, who polished brass in one of the factories which have made Moradabad famous all over the world. He went to the Idgah, which is hardly five minutes away from his house, to pray; he never returned. A friend of his who was sitting near by saw a bullet hit the side of Salim's face, and Salim fell dead. This friend went to the fallen Salim, removed the only thing of value he had, a wristwatch, and brought it back for the family. (We saw the watch when we met the family: it was a poor man's watch, a brand called SIWA; it had been given to Salim as a wedding present by his wife's family.) Today Salim's body cannot be traced. His family have asked for it, but the police say they cannot find a Salim among the dead.

It was after ten o'clock that an outraged mob of Muslims attacked the Galshahid police chowki, in violent reaction. As one Muslim put it, "What did you expect the Muslims to do after having seen their children killed on Id? Throw flowers at policemen?" It was during this attack that policemen were killed by the mob, the chowki was burnt, and two rifles stolen.

BUT it is this attack by the Muslims, more than anything else, which proves that the violence on that day was not at all communal in nature. On the way to the Galshahid police post, the mob could have attacked many Hindu houses, shops and factories: they did not. Right in front of the Ek Raat Wali Masjid, right in the heart of the violence, is, for instance, the New Kumar factory for brasswork. This is absolutely within the densely populated Muslim Idgah mohallah, and if Muslims wanted to ransack it nobody could have stopped them from doing so. When we visited this place on August 15, Hindu workers were still living on the premises of the factory, and the factory was still safe. We met Dharam Singh, who was still staying there, and he assured us that there had been no trouble so far.

If the mob which could reach a police outpost had wanted, it could have attacked the Punjabi Hindu colony just across the road from the Idgah; or it could have raided the large harijan colony which is barely a couple of hundred yards away from the Muslim localities. But there was no attack on non-Muslims; the only target was the uniform—of the UP police or the hated PAC, which, time and again, has given evidence of its notoriety. It cannot be repeated often enough that there was no communal riot in Moradabad. There was no RSS involved; and despite all the efforts of the police to call this a Muslim League or Khaqsar instigated riot, they have not succeeded in convincing too many people. It was simply a case of the force meant to preserve law and order becoming thoroughly irresponsible. As Shamsul Islam, general secretary of the city Congress(I) commented, "There was no government." Mrs Indira Gandhi herself admitted that the administration was in a bad shape. She went on to blame the Janata and the Lok Dal governments for this, but this is hardly the point. Similarly, the opposition is blaming the Congress(I)'s use of the police to help them politically for the extraordinary arrogance of the police; but the argument is less important than the fact that we seem to be reaching a stage where the policemen are becoming a law into themselves, a force of petty dictators. The sheer contempt which the Moradabad police, for instance, was showing for the local Congress(I) MLA was revealing. Who will dare police the police? The District Magistrate and the police officer in charge on Id day have been transferred promptly, but are such transfers any real solution?

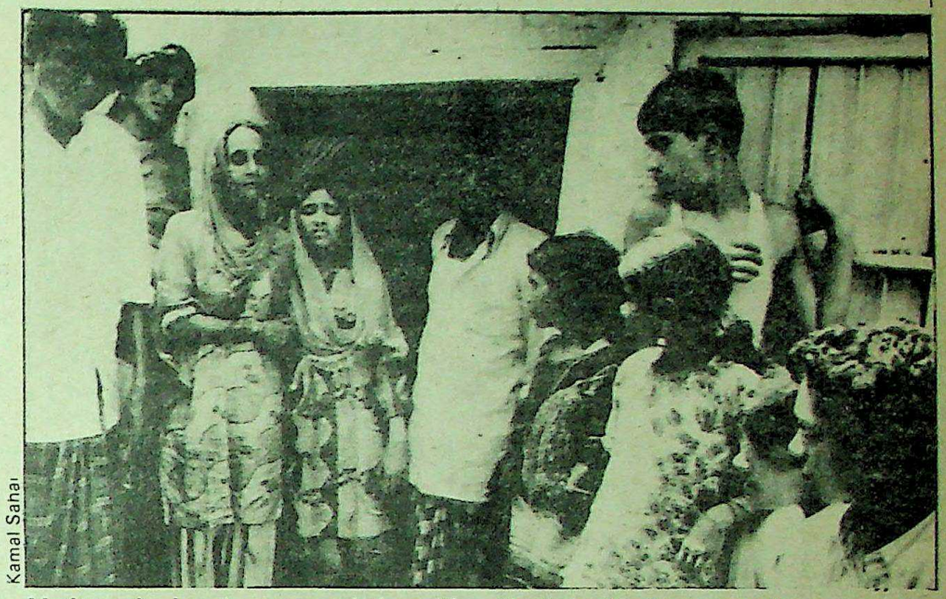
On the 14th and 15th, the police are alleged to have made efforts to give the disturbances a communal colour, to shift attention from their misdeeds. The atmosphere in the city was volatile enough. The Muslims were livid with anger, and anger is fertile breeding ground for violence. There is tension, there is fear, myths and impressions that have been buried in the subconscious begin to dance before one's eyes, and even yesterday's friend becomes suspect because he was born with a certain name. Communalists, of whom there is no shortage in our country, come to the fore to take over temporary leadership of enraged minds. Rumour is king. Creating communal trouble is not too difficult in such an atmosphere. The encouraging thing is that, by and large, both communities showed commendable restraint, given what could have happened.

Worse, the police were using "respectable" media to transfer the lies to the rest of the country. And unfortunately a few journalists (just a few; the majority, by far, were above reproach) were willing to play games. There was, for instance, the banner headline in one important national English paper which said that four BSF jawans had been killed, obviously by Muslims. The BSF itself had not given this story: and to its eternal credit, the local BSF not merely immediately denied the story, but took a special Press party to show that no one on its force had been injured in any way. This story came from, one presumes, the police, unless the correspondent literally made it up.

Communalism remains perhaps the most serious threat to our existence and integrity. There are enough people who are anti-national, who would like to see the tremendous experiment called India, born out of the faith of a saint called Mahatma Gandhi, destroyed.



Kamal Sahai

Mother who lost her son and the widow (both in the background)

Well, there was one story which was literally made up. A report appeared, again from a journalist who claimed to be sitting in Moradabad, that 500 armed Muslims had come from Sambhal and attacked the police headquarters. It so happened that we were at Moradabad on the 15th, the day on which this attack was said to have taken place, and everyone could see that nothing had happened to the kotwali. There had been absolutely no attack, from anyone. And yet this correspondent, filing a story from Moradabad, reported this attack. Similarly, the police have been trying to give the impression that there have been a great number of Hindu victims too, so that the impression may be created that this was a communal riot—but that again is simply not true. Almost all the victims are Muslims, who died or were injured during that terrible incident at the Idgah.

THERE is a saying in western UP that the people here "hariyali ke andhen hain" (have been blinded by greenness). This is rich and fertile agricultural country, quite different from the uncertain colours of central UP or the dust of eastern UP. This is, comparatively, a rich area; well irrigated, and the people have the confidence that comes from full stomachs. There are large populations of Muslims who have been traditionally politically articulate, and whose support means the difference between victory and defeat for a political Party.

Guns are hardly an unknown commodity. The gun is a status symbol, a weapon of defence against robbery, and a symbol of power among both Hindus and Muslims. When guns are available, they also tend to come out easily. This is what makes a communal disturbance in western UP so much more potentially murderous than anywhere else. A Hindu-Muslim conflagration here is dangerous in the extreme. And there are enough vested interests on all sides who stand to gain by it—the Muslim League for instance which, despite its strident provocations has not been able to make sufficient headway, politically, among Muslims. Conversely, the RSS or the BJP, stands to gain if the Hindu vote consolidates along communal rather than political lines.

The vultures that inhabit every community are only waiting for an incident like the one that happened at Moradabad to take place. This will be their source of sustenance for a long while. Time and distance destory the truth of any event: embellishments will make the Moradabad clash into a weapon for all kinds of motivated forces. A communal incident is like a self-sustaining bomb made of plasticine; the bomb can be moulded into whichever shape you want, and it will prove equally deadly wherever it is placed. Organisations like the Jamaat-e-Islami have been provided enough ammunition by the police in Moradabad to incite Muslims. The PAC, which in the past has already been condemned by enquiry commissions for partisanship, now has given Muslims one more very good reason to distrust it.

It is easy to get depressed about Moradabad. But hidden behind the filth of the violence lie certain equally important truths about both the people of India and our institutions which more than restore the balance. The quiet but splendid job done by the BSF and the Army in restoring the confidence of the fear-stricken people, for instance. In riot after riot (and I have covered too many of them in recent times) one has seen the people wait for the Army or the BSF to rescue them, not only from their enemies among the civilians but also their enemies among the police.

But how often can you bring out the Army to do the job which the police should be doing? The immediate aftermath of the Moradabad riots was Muslim anger in a dozen towns; this was only to be expected—you cannot hope that Muslims will sit and watch calmly hundreds of namazis being killed. No, they will demonstrate, and ask the government to punish the guilty. But there is always more than simply this, where Muslims are concerned. History, Pakistan: the myth that has roots in the subconscious, the myth of the sword-wielding Mussulman, which at times even sends a quiver of doubt into the sanest non-Muslim and he asks himself the question, are the Muslims basically an unreliable, emotional, anti-national community? Why do they keep fighting all the time? The cry of the minority must always compete against the cacophony of vested interests which want to either suppress it or exploit it: and when myriad cries fill the air it is very difficult to sort out the truth from the confusion.

Indian society is a conglomeration of a lot of volatile groups competing for the diminishing rewards of a stagnant or shrinking economy. At certain periods, tensions which are dormant become dominant, lighting fires in hundreds of places. Not all the cities closed by curfew today are victims of communalism. But communalism remains perhaps the most serious threat to our existence and integrity. There are enough people both Hindus and Muslims, who are anti-national, who would like to see the tremendous experiment called India, born out of the faith of a saint called Mahatma Gandhi, destroyed. The most heartening thing I found about Moradabad was that, despite the intense provocation, Hindus and Muslims of the city were not spitting hate at each other. More than 60 per cent of the city is Muslim, and Muslims are angry; and Muslims have enough communalists within them who would like to provoke the community to convert this into a Hindu-Muslim war. But that did not happen. It could have happened so very easily. Particularly when all kinds of rumours, including ones which said that mosques had been burnt, were being spread, on the 14th and the 15th.

Muslims of India have many enemies, quite a few of which actually publicly rejoice in the fact of their enmity towards this community. But perhaps their greatest enemy sits among themselves. This enemy is, by and large, kept in check by the community itself. He is not supported during elections; he is not given too much social respect. But that enemy is there, waiting for the Muslim mind to be provoked; he is waiting for the day when the Muslims of a village, of a city, of a district, of a state, of the country, will reject their secular leadership and turn to him. He is waiting and dreaming for that day. I saw this enemy lurking in one mohallah of Moradabad. He was a resident of that mohallah. We went in to talk to the Muslims about what happened, and they began narrating their experiences, showing us the wounds on the bodies of their children, and on the hearts of the adults. Then this man walked in. He was large, bloated. His pyjama stopped above the ankle. His thin regulation moustache drew a black line above the upper lip. He had small eyes that stared keenly at us: were they wondering why we 'do-gooders' had come? Did our presence reduce one weapon in his arsenal? He sat there quietly, waiting, listening; watching. Waiting to be recognised by us as The Leader. Every muscle on his face, every dart from his eyes, said: My time has come.

He was the local leader of the Jamaat-e-Islami. ■

The man on the cover

WE were waiting in the bright afternoon sunlight outside the kotwali, which had become the fulcrum around which administration in Moradabad began revolving after the city sank into the fearful silence and tension of curfew on five pm, Wednesday, August 13. A regular stream of vehicles carrying different kinds of authority—officials, politicians policemen, army—caused a strange traffic jam: a traffic jam looks so incongruous in a deserted city. Just opposite the kotwali, or the police headquarters, was the only shop which was open in Moradabad—a sweetmeats shop mainly servicing the police.

Suddenly a heavy police truck screeched to a halt. Out jumped four policemen, very brisk indeed, dragging behind them a man who was still bleeding from an open wound on the left side of his head. The blood was pouring down the side of his face, and had soaked parts of his shirt. His face was swollen; there was terror in his eyes; he was shivering. Kamal Sahai, our photographer, immediately turned his camera towards the bleeding victim. The policeman whose hand interfered with the picture suddenly realised that a photograph was being taken, and rushed in front of the camera. But by this time one picture, we thankfully realised later, had been taken. We were brusquely told not to take any more pictures. Why? Who was this man? We followed him into the kotwali, but were prevented by the constables holding him from talking to him. We appealed to a senior officer (who had been sent to Moradabad on special duty). He was a very sophisticated, soft-spoken officer, very unlike some of his arrogant and stupid brethren on the police force. He finally relented and gave us permission: a couple of minutes, and no pictures please.

The man's name was Shakeel Ahmad. He had been arrested for breaking curfew, near the police canteen. He said that he used to supply milk regularly to the canteen, and was well-known there. After two days (this was on 15th), he had become bored of sitting at home, had gone to eat a paan in the police lines and was returning home along with a friend called Babu Singh when he was nabbed by the police. They asked the two their names, told Babu Singh to push off, put Shakeel in the van, and beat him up badly before bringing him here.

And then one of the policemen who had brought him could not control himself any more. He first abused Shakeel Ahmad, then turned to us and said, "This chap had gone to the police lines to collect information about the police which he could pass on to the Muslims."

Nobody tried to deny that Ahmad was beaten up by the police, with fists and rifle butts. The police had given a typically brutal, awful demonstration of their prejudice. When, in fact, the police realised that we were beginning to find out more than they wanted exposed, they caught us by the elbows (and a policeman's grip can be a very firm one indeed) and escorted us out. What fate awaited Shakeel Ahmad I do not know, but I have little doubt that the policemen took their revenge on him for having the temerity to talk so frankly to us. Even assuming that Ahmad was guilty of something—and the policemen we talked to had nothing but vague suspicion and reeking prejudice as their reasons for what they did—what right did the policemen have to beat him up in such a fashion? It was pure coincidence that our photographer was there, and we were there, and the photographer's opportune click recorded this one instance of brutality for the magazine. But how many Shakeel Ahmads are there in Moradabad? Perhaps readers might begin to understand now why the minorities have so little faith in organisations like the PAC.

How I spent Independence Day, 1980

VIJYENDRA TYAGI, a photographer, describes the day he spent in Moradabad

AT about seven thirty in the morning the telephone rang. A journalist friend was phoning from the IENS building (which houses the offices of a large number of newspapers). I was told to come there at once; a party of journalists was leaving for Moradabad in a few minutes and I could accompany them if I wanted. We first went to see the Minister of State for Railways Mr C. K. Jaffer Sharief: he had been to Moradabad, and told us his version of the events. At ten minutes past nine, we were on our way. By 12.30, after a pause for a meal, we reached the outskirts of Moradabad. Our first job was to get curfew passes. We went to the District Magistrate's office, where we learnt that he was sitting at the kotwali. We turned towards the kotwali, and finally reached there after being stopped several times by policemen who wanted to see our curfew passes. When they learnt that we were a group of journalists and we wanted to go to the police headquarters, they let us carry on.

At the kotwali, the DM was not present, but we met some senior police officers. They immediately began reeling off figures and arguments trying to substantiate how justified the police were in all they had done. We said, after a while, that we wanted to visit the place where the trouble had begun, and please could we have curfew passes. But some police officers replied that the situation in the city was very bad, and advised us not to go into the city but return to Delhi after this chat with the police. They could not assure us safe conduct. But we took our passes and proceeded towards the hospital where the wounded were lying.

Every room was full of injured people. And on enquiry we discovered that most of the patients were suffering from bullet wounds. (The police have been trying to sell the theory that the majority of the deaths resulted from the stampede, then why were there comparatively so few stampede victims in hospital?) A couple of arson victims were also there. The patients were in a terrible state. Many of the wounds had been simply bandaged without any proper medicines having been applied. Patients had little or nothing to eat for the two days that they were there. Most were moaning in pain. The doctors complained about lack of facilities and amenities; the doctor in charge admitted that patients had died in hospital. There were many wounded still on the verandahs.

We went towards the Idgah. On the way, near the bus stand, we were stopped by some people who we discovered were Youth Congress(I) activists. We carried on towards the Idgah. Brickbats were still lying scattered on the road outside the Idgah, and the shamianas next to the road were damaged. I started taking pictures. By then, some people from the Punjabi Hindu community who lived right in front of the Idgah, came to us and said that a serious outrage had been committed here. A group of PAC jawans were standing near by and watching us talk to the Punjabi Hindus. In the distance , but not too far away, near a corner on one side of the Idgah, I saw three or four Muslims standing. I was going towards them when the PAC jawans saw these Muslims, went towards them and said, "Aap log ander chale jaiyen nahin to goli maar di jaayegi" (Go inside, or you will be shot). The PAC had absolutely no objection to the Punjabi Hindus wandering about with us: there were at least 25 of them. When I asked the PAC officer why Hindus were allowed to wander around with us, but the Muslims were being shooed away, he started laughing.

The Muslim mohalla is adjacent to the Idgah, and the road of that mohalla leads away from the main road on which we were standing. I walked towards this mohalla and could still see some Muslims beckoning to me to come and hear their story. I wanted to go, but the PAC advised me to stay away from those "dangerous elements". I told both my journalist friends and the PAC that I was more familiar with Muslims than they were: I trusted them enough to go and meet them, I said.. I went.

As soon as I reached the Muslims, they said they would show me things which the police and the others were not too keen to show us. Bullet marks on the walls of the Idgah, where the police had fired to either kill or wound Muslims. Hundreds of slippers left behind by children and adults who ran in panic. Somebody cried that this was his eight-year-old daughter's slippers; somebody else said this was his child Fatima's slippers and dopatta. I called out to the other journalists to come and see this; they came, and about a dozen Muslims gathered too. A doctor who practised in that area, and who also had a lot of Hindus and harijans among his patients, took us to the nearby mosque, where the rough carpets on which Muslims prayed were still soaked with the blood shed on August 13, and whose walls bore the marks of bullets. Someone told us that a few bodies were still lying near by. We decided to go there.

On the way, PAC jawans stopped us. We said we wanted to see the body which had not been removed yet. The jawans said that the body belonged to an army jawan who had come home on leave. While this discussion was still going on, I nipped across and took pictures. Four pigs were now picking at the corpse, which was hidden by a piece of cloth. It seemed to me that there was more than one body behind the layer of cloth. (Interestingly, the policemen had the same explanation of a jawan on leave lying dead for another body floating face down in a pig swill nearby.) By this time Devendra Pandey, a Congress(I) MLA, also reached the spot. Other people had begun gathering too. A harijan came and began driving the pigs away from the shrouded body. I asked him how this riot had started, and he replied: "Babuji, sach puchiye to yeh jhagra nahin. Yahan to police ne namaaz parhte hue logo pe goli chalaee." (Sir, if you want the truth, this was not a quarrel. Here, the police simply fired at people praying).

This harijan said that he was an eyewitness to the whole episode. "It was after 9.30, and the prayers were not over, when a pig entered the area where the people were praying. A Muslim asked a policeman how the pig had entered during the prayers, and wanted the police to remove it. The policeman replied that it was not his job to remove pigs. The Muslims praying then turned around and asked the policemen what their job was if they could not remove the pigs. There was an altercation. Somebody from up front told the police that they should not behave like this. But just due to this bit of provocation, the police began to use their lathis, and within a very, very short while, they started lobbying teargas shells and firing. This was the origin of the trouble, and now the police are trying to make this into a communal war."

After that I went to the police chowki which had been attacked by the Muslims after the police firing had taken its toll on Id day. Furniture had been destroyed. The police there told me about how they had suffered here. On my way back I saw some shops which had been burnt (they were Muslim shops, I learnt later). At this point, some policemen caught me, and began to get abusive and aggressive. "Ise thana le chalo," (Take him to the thana) said one constable, but then an officer came and set me free.

Our group then left to visit a relative of Devendra Pandey, who is in charge of the bus station at Moradabad. The people of the mohalla soon gathered around us, and told us stories of how Muslims had scaled walls on Id day to escape the police, and how the terrified people were running for safety with children in their hands. "We did not do a thing. It was the police." Women told us how they were sending milk for the children of curfew-bound Muslims if they could do so.

We went to the kotwali after that, and the journalists began talking to the rather dramatic DM, whose mouth was packed with pan. I slipped away and began walking towards some looted shops in the bazaar nearby. A little ahead, a sub-inspector and a few policemen were playing cards. As I approached, one of them asked, "Kyon be, kahan jaa raha hai?" (Where are you going?) I explained that I was a photo-journalist who had come down from Delhi. The sub-inspector ordered his force to catch me; immediately they held me. I showed them the curfew pass. In response one of the PAC jawans abused me: "Have you come here to get your mother raped? " I asked him not to abuse me. I showed the pass again, this time to the officer. Who replied: "This is a curfew pass, not a pass to take photographs. If you value your life, get out immediately!"

Slippers left by people fleeing from prayer

I rejoined my group and told them the story, and was rebuked for wandering alone. The time had also come, we all agreed, to go back to Delhi. Just at this point I saw a familiar face; somebody I knew personally, who lived in Moradabad. Once again I asked what had happened, and once again I heard what everyone else had been saying: "This was a straight case of police violence on Muslims, and the police was now desperately trying to convert this into a communal problem so that the mark of shame on their heads would be forgotten. The police and the administration were to blame. They were trying to link up the events with the story of the July 24 squabble between harijans and Muslims; they were trying to introduce different elements. But this was all a cover-up."

At ten minutes past six we left Moradabad for Delhi. At about 8.50 that night we reached Delhi. This was how I spent the 33rd birthday of our country.

The Delhi Riots

Agitated Muslims wanted revenge for the Moradabad outrage. SHUBHARATA BHATTACHARYA was right there in the heart of old Delhi when the riots were taking place on 15 August.

MORADABAD dominated Delhi on 15 August this year. The day began with the Prime Minister starting her speech from the ramparts of the Red Fort with an expression of grief over the unfortunate incidents in Moradabad two days earlier. Within five hours of Mrs Gandhi having assured action against those guilty of the Moradabad incidents, "whether they were officials or non-officials," violence erupted in the walled city of Delhi, within two kilometres of the spot from where the Prime Minister had addressed the nation in the morning. The mob frenzy, which lasted from around one in the afternoon till around 4.30 pm, left two dead, including a six-year-old girl, and over a hundred injured. Over twenty shops were gutted in the Chawri Bazar, Nai Sarak and Ballimaran areas. A Volkswagen van and an Ambassador car were burnt in Urdu Bazar, and at least 30 rickshaws were gutted.

There had been tension in Delhi from the Id day. On 13 August, there was communal violence in the Panchkuian Road area near Connaught Place after Id prayers. On 14 August, there was some tension in the Badaliyan Mohalla of Churiwalan in the walled city following eve-teasing by some Muslims. The daughter of a local physician, Dr Jogeshwar Nath, Anju Gupta, an advocate, was allegedly teased when she was leaving for work.

But these incidents were not the catalysts for the 15 August carnage; it was Moradabad. After the news of police firing at Moradabad reached Delhi, preparations were made for observing a black day, on Independence Day. Posters appeared on August 14, and black flags were hoisted by Muslims in many areas, even on the boundary railing of the Jama Masjid.

A handwritten poster in Urdu, which was pasted in Ballimaran, read : Hindustan ki azadi, 1980 ka tohfa—Musalmanon ko battaur barbadi ? Akhir is mulk mein yeh tohfe kab tak milenge ? Mashrik se Magrib aur shumal se janoof tak ke vakyat ke liye hamari hakoomat kyon nahin dhyan deti ? Aaj yaume siah pur-aman tarike se manaen, aur Moradabad ke shahidon aur Hind mein shahid tamam musalmanon ke liye duan mukfarat karen. Ehtijaz siah petian baandh kar pur-aman taur par karen. Muslim Member Parliament aur samaji karkoon bhi hukumat-e-hind se ehtijaz karen. (The gift of Independence Day 1980—destruction of Muslims ? How long will we keep on getting such 'gifts' in this nation ? Why doesn't our government pay any attention to these incidents taking place in the east, west, north and the south ? Observe a 'black day' today in a peaceful way and offer prayers for the martyrs of Moradabad and the Muslims killed all over the country. Observe the protest by wearing black bands, but maintain peace. Muslims MPs and social workers too should protest to the government of India).

The poster was not signed by any person or any organisation but bore the legend: Sogwaran, Dilli Shahr (The mourners of Delhi city).

There were many versions as to how the violence started. According to one, the speech delivered by the Shahi Imam of Jama Masjid on the occasion of the Jumma (Friday) prayers was inflammatory, and the rioting started after the prayer meeting dispersed. A violent mob carrying black flags left the mosque after the namaz and broke open the lock of a handicrafts shop owned by a Sikh in the corner of Chawri Bazar behind the mosque. This was followed by looting of a few neighbouring shops. A group of Hindus had collected in the Barsaboola Chowk (the junction of Chawri Bazar and Nai Sarak); they rushed foward to save the shops and a clash took place.

Another version said that the trouble started in Charkhewalan during a flag hoisting ceremony presided over by the local Congress(I) MP, Bhikhu Ram Jain. It is said that while the function was going on, a group of Muslims approached Mr Jain and asked him to put on a black badge and join them at a protest rally at 4 pm. Some Hindus there protested against the show of black badges at a flag hoisting ceremony, and tension followed.

According to yet another version, the trouble took place due to a clash at the trijunction of Charkhewalan, Ballimaran and Jogiwara. An Independence Day function was organised by the Shiv Shakti Parishad in which the Bhartiya Janata Party leader, Murli Manohar Joshi was invited. While the flag hoisting ceremony was on, a group of black flag-waving Muslim youth reached there from the Ballimaran side around 1 pm and tried to pull down the national tricolour. According to the Jogiwara Congress(I) leader, Satish Jain, one local BJP worker, Tara Chand, went and caught hold of the flagpole and prevented the flag from being pulled down. Soon afterwards, arson started and shops were looted and set on fire. The owners of the looted shops at the trijunction belonged to both communities.

Apparently the mob did not distinguish between them on communal lines.

WHEN we reached the affected area around 4 pm, I found the jeep (JKN 4313) of the commandant of the 20th Battalion, CRPF, D.A. Dhananjay, parked outside the gates of Kasturba Gandhi hospital opposite the Netaji Subhash park. "Zabardast pathrao ho raha hai, sir" (Heavy stoning is on, sir)—the message came over the radio from one of the units posted somewhere in the riot-hit area. A little further on, we met Mehboobali Zia, the city DCC(I) secretary, who was trying to maintain calm in the Urdu Bazar.Smoke was rising from behind the Masjid from the Chawri Bazar side, and some sounds of firing could be heard. There was no rioting in Urdu Bazar. The flag of the Indian Union Muslim League was flying at half-mast on top of the IUML office opposite the mosque.

We went then to the Esplanade Road side, on the other end of the Jama Masjid, and found the Hindu residents there in a belligerent mood, though no untoward incident was reported there. The police had managed to reach there in time to maintain peace. We moved towards Chandni Chowk en route to Nai Sarak. The busiest market of the city was completely deserted. Only pigeons were sitting outside the busy town hall at the Ghantaghar Chowk. There was no sign of arson in Nai Sarak either, but when we reached the Barsaboola Chowk, tension was visible on every face. The people there complained that the police did not do anything to prevent the shops being set afire.

At 5 pm police commissioner Pritam Singh Bhinder came to the Barsaboola Chowk in his car (DEB 1400). Almost simultaneously, the police loudspeakers announced the promulgation of curfew. "It's a bad situation. It is unfortunate for a policeman to handle a situation like this. My men have done a good job, otherwise a lot of lives would have been lost. But we policemen are always blamed for inaction," Bhinder said, when asked to comment on the situation on the spot. Tilak Raj Kakkar, the deputy commissioner of police (central) had blood oozing from his lips. His colleague, A. K. Singh, DCP (north) had been rushed to a hospital after they both had been hurt in the brickbatting that had followed the burning of shops. Mr Kakkar said that he had been at the Nukkar Chawri from 11 am. The trouble had started at 1.45 pm. He had two companies of policemen with him in the beginning; by five in the evening there were six companies (one company comprises 120 men). "There has been no police firing so far, only teargassing. I do not know the exact number of shells fired; we are yet to count," said Mr Kakkar. He replied in the negative when asked if the Imam was responsible for the riots. "There are some unruly elements on both sides," he said.

We then moved to the Ballimaran side, as reports of arson had come in from there. Rama Shankar, a local Congress(I) ex-councillor, was sitting at the entrance of the Ballimaran's narrow entrance. He said that there was a lot of tension among the Hindus of Katra Neel, across the road, who wanted to attack the predominantly Muslim areas of Ballimaran, so he and his followers had decided to stand guard. He said that the district Congress(I) president, Shamim Ahmed Siddiqui, was organising relief inside the Ballimaran locality. He was critical of the police and the fire brigade, who, he said, were too slow in reacting to the situation. He disclosed that around 1.30 pm some Congress(I) leaders from the area had informed P. K. Dhawan about the tension, and Dhawan had telephoned the Lt. Governor, Jagmohan, but the report from the LG's office had been that the situation was under control.

As we moved into the Ballimaran area, we found brickbats and broken soda water bottles strewn all over. We met Mr Siddiqui near Katra Alam Beg, off house no 2343, Ballimaran. A row of shops selling rubber mats had been set on fire, and fire engines were busy trying to contain the arson. Two owners of the gutted shops had reached the spot and they were trying to salvage whatever was left. Srichand Gupta of Allied Marketing Company said that everything in his shop was destroyed; but he had insurance cover. The fate of Mr Ram Lal, also a owner of a rubber sheets shop, was worse. His scooter, DLW 9674, was parked inside the shop and that too had been burnt. The victims complained that the fire brigade had arrived late and there was no arrangement for adequate water.

Siddiqui took us inside a Katra, where he showed us the body of Sabir Ali, the 26-year-old rickshaw puller, who was felled by a rioter's bullets. Ali had two bullet wounds near his neck; his brother, Akhtar Ali, also a rickshaw-puller, said that Sabir had finished his day's work that afternoon and was returning home after depositing his rickshaw when he was caught in a crossfire between two groups of rioters and died. Mr Siddiqui said that for three hours the body had been lying in the mohalla. He had informed the police and the fire brigade, but they did not seem bothered about removing the body. Sabir had married only three months back. His wife, Shohra Begum, was away at her parents' place that day.

We then moved towards the trijunction of Ballimaran, Jogiwara and Charkhewalan. The entire route presented the worst sight of destruction. Smoke filled the air, burning the eyes. At the predominantly Hindu locality of Jogiwara we found that the local Congress(I) and BJP leaders were presenting identical versions about the riots, though Mr Satish Jain, who was formerly a DCC(I) general secretary, differed with the RSS leaders when he insisted that he had seen elderly Muslim leaders trying to pacify the rioters and pleading with them not to loot shops. When we left Jogiwara and re-entered Ballimaran, Mr Jain's version seemed the truth; both Muslim and Hindu shopkeepers had been looted.

COULD the riots have been prevented ? After the Moradabad outrage, even a layman could have guessed that the Muslims of the walled city of Delhi would react. The authorities obviously knew about it : One newspaper office was alerted about the impending tension by an intelligence agency official at 1 pm. From a cursory survey of the affected areas it was evident that the violence was preplanned. The initial anger was against the police; the black flag-carrying Muslims had shouted, Allah-o-Akbar and UP Police murdabad before attacking the shops in Nukkar Chawri.

But in an area like the walled city, no violence can ever remain non-communal due to the history of mutual suspicions among the Hindus and the Muslims. And the narrow lanes of old Delhi are easy conduits for the mischievous rumours which start floating after every riot. On 15 August, a story spread that Muslims had decided to loot shops, so a big crowd of Hindus had gathered at Barsaboola even before trouble had started. The moment one shop was looted, Hindus retaliated. Soon, rumours went round Muslim localities that Hindus had looted Muslim shops. After that, there was no stopping.

Interestingly, in Ballimaran, there is a permanent police outpost, with armed policemen on duty, at a spot less than 20 yards away where the shops of rubber sheets and a diamond merchant were looted. Apparently the police did not act in time. Even the district Congress(I) leaders complained about the ineffectiveness of the police and the fire brigade.

At 6.50 pm on 15 August, a company of the Artillery Regiment of the army marched into Chawri Bazar from the Jama Masjid side, with light machine guns, carbines and Ichhapur semi-automatics on the ready. Preceding the marching column was an Army jeep. No. ZB 40098, in which sat additional district magistrate Arora with a microphone in hand, and announced that curfew was on and no one should move out of his house. The government of India was now in full command of the situation—but should it not have been in command much earlier.

We moved towards the Urdu Bazar police outpost, where the SHO, inspector Mauji Khan, was issuing curfew passes. Along with us in the queue were Muslims and Hindus who held in their hands invitations to various Independence Day functions, including mushairas organised by various government and non-government agencies. While the situation in the city remained tense, the Dilliwala was not going to give up his Independence Day mushairas. ■

OUR CALLOUS RULERS

By CHANDRA SHEKHAR

THE people's enthusiasm of 1971, the darkness of 1975, the hope of 1977 and the frustrating end of the Janata in 1979 marked the Seventies. Seldom in history has such a serious sequence of events been squeezed into such a short period.

The new decade looks like being still worse. On both the political and economic fronts, the situation is explosive. India is sitting on powder: one fuse is enough to ignite the whole country. Almost all the fibres—social, moral, economic and political—that constitute a nation are undergoing serious strain; the whole system seems to be on the brink of collapse.

The Press is burdened every day with tragic news about rape, murder, police firings and atrocities against the weaker sections. Police fire on students—five killed; Mass rape of tribal women near Gonda village; A woman was burnt after rape; 138 women committed suicide in Delhi: these are the headlines. The Baghpat incident was a gruesome tragedy: one hangs one's head in shame at the very thought of it. And yet, people seem to be devoid of sensitiveness to such crimes committed against humanity. It is not just apathy and indifference; fear has overtaken them.

The reaction of the ruling elite is even more callous. It makes the opposition its scapegoat for its lapses, and conveniently ignores its weaknesses. The Chief Minister of Uttar Pradesh confessed that a heinous crime had been committed against Maya Tyagi, but he was "unable" to take any action against the police, who, if they did not perpetrate the crime, at least failed to protect her. Such indignity against womanhood in a city in broad daylight was not heard of even during colonial rule! So, while the state is ruthless, the people are overcome by a fear psychosis; they are anxiety-ridden, alienated. And the opposition, on the other hand, suffers from a sense of self-righteousness. The various Parties seem to be vying with each other to inflate and exaggerate the propaganda value of such incidents; they will not agree to make a common cause to fight against the evil.

Such incidents as at Baghpat only confirm how the baser elements in human beings, their barbarity and savagery, have gained the upper hand under the protection of a ruling elite. But there is a still more serious violence being perpetrated by the state. The only answer that the state seems to have for social conflict is greater violence. Whether it is a caste or communal riot, or whether there are social tensions and conflicts, the authorities consider police firing the only way to restore 'law and order'. The old concept of the police raj persists, and all the talk of 'modernisation' in administration seems to be a deception.

How can one explain the Kafalta outrage in UP or the Belchi killings in Bihar? What is happening in Assam, Mizoram and Tripura? Mass killings by one section of the people against another, make a mockery of the authorities entrusted to maintain law and order. Hundreds of dead bodies were reported to have been recovered from some places! If such a state of affairs persists, the very basis of civilised society will collapse; and the future of democracy will be in total jeopardy.

The situation is alarming. And the response from those in charge is not only inadequate but agonising. Even on vital issues there is an endeavour for a joint, non-partisan effort to solve the problem; there is no initiative to forge a unity for cohesive action to resolve these problems. On the contrary the people in authority feel satisfied after indulging in acrimonious wrangles, and waste their energy trying to find scapegoats and scrape up lame excuses.

There are serious implications of what is happening in Assam. In Tripura, the tribals are totally disenchanted with the authorities. There is growing dissatisfaction among the people in Manipur, and in some parts of the North East a virtual insurgency is taking place. All this deserves more serious attention of the nation. The government cannot treat it as just a law and order problem, nor should one feel satisfied by describing it as the handiwork of some foreign powers, or the political manoeuvring of some communal forces. Further, the use of coercive power is not the answer to these problems.

The malaise is deeprooted. It has affected and sapped the vitality of the country's body politic. How can one ensure that a similar movement will not take place in Darjeeling by the Nepali-speaking residents for a Gorkhaland, or by the adivasis in Chotanagpur in Bihar, or by the tribals in Ahmednagar or Vidharba in Maharashtra, or the people of Uttarakhand in UP, or by the Maithili-speaking people in Bihar? One shudders to think of the situation; it could be similar to the one before the partition of India. And did the country's partition solve the problems—communal or otherwise? The disease we are afflicted by is like a festering sore; if it is not cured in time, it may prove cancerous, and the country's integrity and unity may be threatened. The problem of the Assamese, or the tribals in Tripura, is as real and genuine as the problem of the refugees in Assam. The problem is simple: exploitation and poverty.

Why did the tribals in Tripura resort to killings? Why did the Assamese go on a 10-month-old agitation against "foreigners"? These questions are as pertinent and relevant as the question, why was there an influx of refugees into Assam? Let us go deep into the facts. India is in reality, a multinational country; it has a pluralistic society. For years there has been discrimination between one linguistic group against another; and exploitation by the affluent of the poor. Today, there is an awakening among the people in backward areas. Above all, the instinct of self-preservation is arousing them.

They are inflammable material, susceptible to those arousing passion, trying to create a conflagration by whipping up chauvinism, mutual distrust, apprehension and discord. But what attempt has been made to bring about unity among different social groups?

The basic problem in this country is poverty; it is the root-cause of all this trouble. The refugees from Bangladesh settled in Assam in search of their livelihood. The tribal people in Tripura are facing a genuine threat to their economic existence. The Assamese are equally genuinely apprehensive about being overthrown by the outsiders.

In our country now, there is little difference between a democratic rule and a personalised one.

The country is supposed to be engaged in a grim struggle against poverty. The truth is, we have, by and large, failed in our battle against it. Our achievement has not been able to assure a subsistence income to our people. If we fail to appreciate this problem, we cannot win our battle for unity and integrity of the country. The problem is a human one. This is a battle for existence being waged by those who live in despair. No sabre-rattling, or chauvinism, can solve it. If we are serious about solving this problem, we have to create a new ethos of nation-building in India.

IRONICALLY enough, politics in India has become a game of sheer manipulation and manoeuvring. Its moral base has been completely eroded; hypocrisy and manipulative political acrobatics have become the norm in public life. Persons holding high posts indulge in this game with impunity, and the people do not resist. Why was the Belchi tragedy made a national issue? Was the Kafalta outrage, which took place under a Congress(I) government, any less serious than the Belchi one? The Baghpat incident was sought to be made a non-issue, while the Narayanpur episode (which occurred when the Lok Dal was in power in UP) was given extraordinary attention. This cannot be explained in any other terms but as a blatant and sinister design to take political advantage of human misery. This is what is called double standards in public life.

Then again, why has there been of late a lower rate of economic growth; industrial stagnation; reduction of employment opportunities; worsening law and order situation and a staggering price hike of sugar and other essential commodities? If the economic situation is so grim, what steps has the government taken to improve it? Why has there been dubious behaviour in Assam? Or why is dissension in Kashmir being fomented? These are the realities of political life which have become the norm in this country. What a tragedy! People are interested in politicisation of human miseries, not in solving them.

After freedom, we had promised to bring about social change through parliamentary democracy. This was the cornerstone of our national unity and integration. This would have been possible only if we could fix our priorities and make proper utilization of our scarce resources. But these objectives were thrown to the winds. If peaceful social transformation does not take place, the system is bound to be discredited, and sometime the strain will become too much. Wittingly or unwittingly, that stage is dangerously close.

Worse, in our country now, there is little difference between a democratic rule and a personalised one; whereas the two should be quite contradictory to each other. Further, in a democratic set-up, the bureaucracy should be impartial. But this impartiality has been deliberately destroyed. Take for instance, the mass transfers of officers recently in UP: the decisions were based on proven loyalty rather than merit.

When such things happen they are bound to vitiate the whole atmosphere. And in such a culture, who has the time for mass mobilisation for nation-building activities?

The nation is in great danger today. Yet there is little appreciation of the gravity of the situation by political leaders. Tragically enough, the ruling group is engaged in deification of individuals (to the extent of total extinction of human dignity) rather than attending to the serious problems of the country. There is a constant effort to create new gods. What an irony that democratically elected people in responsible positions choose to talk about a successor from one family only in this country! It does not even prick their conscience. How can any sincere effort be made by these persons to involve the people in solving the problems of the nation?

On the other hand, there is no streak of optimism among the leaders of the opposition. Those who were responsible for destroying the unity of what is now the opposition, have suddenly become protagonists of unity. While they successfully managed to bring the country to this catastrophic situation, they have no sense of repentance or regret. Yet they make claims to be fighters against oppression and injustice. They can hardly evoke any confidence among the people.

The indications are ominous. The stake is higher today than ever before. The system of parliamentary democracy itself is in serious peril. Booth-capturing by force; the apathy among the people about their right to exercise their franchise; the role of money and musclemen in the elections: all this has struck at the roots of democracy. The answer does not lie in the ability of the ruling party to manage its affairs and to retain its power; nor will the unity of various heterogeneous elements among the opposition led by old and outdated leaders provide an alternative.

But if there is pessimism all around, there is also a ray of hope. The solution has to be found outside the contours of the present political Parties. Let us reawaken the people, particularly the younger generation. Let us hope they will rise above petty personal loyalties, prejudices, narrowness and parochialism; let them understand the malaise of today's politics, and fight the nefarious attempts of power-seekers and opportunists by organising and strengthening themselves. Let them become harbingers of a new social order. ■

MIZORAM:

The chess game for peace

SANTANU GHOSH traces how the truce came about

THE fears, the hate and the blood-letting that had haunted the north-eastern state of Mizoram (area: 24,000 sq km; pop: 350,000) for 15 years were officially declared over as the Mizo National Front (MNF) president Laldenga called a halt to the insurgency from 31 July midnight and New Delhi offered a reprieve to the insurgents. Guitars twanged and hundreds of Mizos, cooped up in their homes (the night-curfew had not yet been lifted) in the hilltop capital Aizawl broke out into tribal tunes to the chimes of the church bells as the calander turned from 31 July to 1 August.

The celebration was actually planned for 30 July, the day Union Home Minister Zail Singh informed Lok Sabha of the truce. Mizoram's Finance Minister, Lalmingthenga, rang up his uncle Chief Minister Brigadier T. Sailo from New Delhi soon after. But, the celebrations had to be put off, as sirens announced the curfew. The next morning, however, the people danced themselves to exhaustion; posters hailing the agreement plastered the walls. Finally, the curfew was lifted on 4 August. Boys and girls in jeans were back again at their favourite pastime—the nulla rim (courtship).

In October 1979, soon after his release from detention in Delhi's Tihar jail, Laldenga conveyed to Mrs Gandhi through Yashpal Kapoor and Pranab Mukherjee his commitment to the Indian constitution and a desire to end uncertainties in Mizoram. And soon after Mrs Gandhi's victory at the polls he offered to resume negotiations deadlocked during the Janata regime. It resumed over a tandoori lunch with Yashpal Kapoor at the capital's five-star Taj Intercontinental Hotel, on 30 January 1980. Two days later Mrs Gandhi wrote back: "I am glad to have your reiteration of the commitment you made to work within the framework of the Indian constitution". That set the ball rolling.

Encouraged by this, a three-member delegation of the Mizoram Congress (an affiliate of the Congress-I), led by its president Lalthanhawala, 37, (one of the few non-MNF people trusted by Laldenga) rushed to New Delhi in early February to plead for the resumption of the dialogue. Mrs Gandhi met them at her 12 Willingdon Crescent residence on 10 February and indicated during discussions that she was not averse to the withdrawal of all treason and criminal cases pending against Laldenga.

On Sunday 13 April Laldenga met Mrs Gandhi for the first time in many years. Zail Singh, Yashpal Kapoor and Pranab Mukherjee were also present. At the meeting Laldenga proposed to send some of his emissaries to the MNF headquarters at Chhipui near Bandarban in the wooded Chittagong Hill Tracts in Bangladesh to seek approval of the National Council, the apex policy-making body, for a halt to the insurgency. OK, said Mrs Gandhi. A wireless signal flashed from New Delhi asked the Lt. Governor of Mizoram, N. P. Mathur, to release Aichhinga, a former MNF assistant general secretary and Zaiderzauva, the MNF president's frail looking brother-in-law who for some time was the MNF operational commander for the Aizawl area, from jail so that Digit could proceed for New Delhi. They arrived in the capital on 28 May and were lodged at a five-star hotel at government expense, as Laldenga held a series of meetings with Yashpal Kapoor and senior Home Ministry officials. Finally it was settled that Laldenga's 24-year-old bespectacled son David would accompany Aichhinga and Zaiderzauva to the Bangladesh headquarters of the MNF.

Monday 2 June. An IAF MI-4 helicopter flew them from Aizawl to the border village of Parva, from where the trio slipped into the endless rolling hills of Sajek range washed by the river Sangu. The MNF National Council met for two days, 13 and 14 June at Chhipui presided over by the elusive guerrilla leader Zoramthanga, 36, a Mizo of Manipuri origin and the number two in the outfit. The emissaries flew back to New Delhi on 24 June pale and exhausted after the long and strenuous trek down the guerrilla trail but excited because the Council favoured Laldenga's peace initiatives. The same day, Laldenga met the Prime Minister at her South Block office. Mrs Gandhi told him: "The whole of north-east is in trouble, I need your co-operation". The aging rebel chief replied: "Our co-operation is for your asking". The CBI was ordered to withdraw all criminal cases against Laldenga and other important MNF activists. Finally, on 28 July the agreement was signed. When Zail Singh announced it in the Lok Sabha on 30 July, Laldenga in a sweatshirt was right there beaming from the distinguished visitors' gallery.

For quite some time Laldenga had been telling visitors to his Chirag enclave residence in south Delhi that the 'super powers' and the neighbouring countries on whom he had been banking for support had 'betrayed' him. He could also see how desertions and feuds had shrivelled the MNF. His overground friends in the steering committee, drawn from five Mizoram Parties, too wanted him to bury his past. And, as a devout Christian, he dreaded the possibilities of the tribal north-east going, red following the trend set by N. Biseswar of the PLA in Manipur and T. H. Muiva, a dissident Naga insurgent leader. Besides, his years in exile, first at Mirpur in Dacca, then at an Inter Services Intelligence guest house in Karachi and finally in New Delhi, had mellowed him considerably and made him homesick.

Born at Pukpui village in south Mizoram on 11 June 1926, Laldenga had studied up to the sixth standard at an American missionary school at Jowai in Meghalaya, joined the army during the second world war and rose to the rank of a havildar clerk before he was demobilised. Returning to Aizawl he got a job as a cashier in the district council. Came Mau tam, the famine. The year: 1960. Laldenga banded together a few young men to start a relief organisation named Mizo National Famine Front. The failure of the Assam government to rush food to the starving Mizo hills (then a district of Assam) incensed the Mizos and Laldenga promptly cashed in on their anger to advocate secession. The MNF was born on 12 October 1962. In December 1963, Laldenga slipped into the then East Pakistan to seek arms but was caught near the Karimganj border in the Cachar District of Assam while returning to India. He explained that he had gone to East Pakistan "to meet the Mizo brethren in Pakistan on the border". Accepting the explanation, the then Assam Chief Minister B. P. Chaliha released him.

Soon after his release, Laldenga renewed his efforts to set up and enlarge insurgent bases in and around the Mizo hills. Arms came in boats through the river Karnaphuli, in East Pakistan. Having built up an armoury at Hunmuam near Lunglei, Laldenga on 21 January 1966 wrote to the then Indonesian President Sukarno: "Political self-determination and creation of a separate homeland are the only wishes of my people". Soon after, Laldenga and 58 of his lieutenants issued a two-page unilateral declaration of independence from Kulikawn, the then headquarters of the MNF. When the number of recruits in the MNF and its armed wing, the Mizo National Army (MNA), soared to about 10,000, Laldenga launched a major offensive on the midnight of 28 February 1966. Code named 'Operation Jericho', the attack caught the security forces totally unawares. Working on a blueprint prepared by the MNF's General Swamvela, the insurgents swiftly took over the key towns of Aizawl, Lunglei, Champai and Demagiri, without much resistance. An army brigade marched into Aizawl only on 7 March and with IAF Hunters strafing the rebel positions, the security forces finally gained control of Mizoram about a month after Laldenga's successes, on 21 March. The next 14 years witnessed sporadic acts of insurgency which included ambushes, extortion of taxes, recruitment of volunteers and intimidation of the non-Mizos. In early 1975, the insurgents stormed the Aizawl police headquarters and gunned down three top police officers including the IG.

Curiously, Laldenga also kept the olive branch dangling. At least six groups of his emissaries met Union government officials and the intelligence operatives at different places in the country and abroad since 1970. The most sensational of these meetings was the one between Lianzuala, a top MNF functionary, and intelligence branch officials at an army base near Silchar in February 1973. The Mizoram police who had put Lianzuala at the top of its 'wanted' list did not even know for years that such a meeting had taken place. In November 1973, another meeting was held between Laldenga's men and intelligence officials, this time in faraway Kabul. Then another at Bangkok. Finally, the negotiations conducted by a senior RAW operative, H. R. Hasanwalia (code name: Shingal), with Laldenga himself, first in Geneva and then in Cologne in 1975-76 bore fruit.

On 29 August 1975 Laldenga wrote to Mrs Gandhi that if she offered religious and cultural safeguards for the Mizos, then he was prepared to call truce. Laldenga moved on to Cologne in early December 1975, after a holiday in Rome. There, other top MNF leaders, Chawngzuala (the then MNF Chairman), Tiangchuaka, Biakchhunga and Lalhleia joined him. And, finally on 24 January 1976, Laldenga arrived in New Delhi to negotiate the terms of a settlement with Mrs Gandhi on an explicit understanding that he would be free to leave New Delhi whenever he wanted to. The breakthrough was achieved earlier than expected, on 18 February 1976 when the MNF leader signed a preliminary agreement accepting Mizoram as an integral part of India, and that the political problems would be solved within the framework of the Indian constitution. The accord was approved by the underground leaders at a convention held in Calcutta from 24 March to 1 April 1976, at the request of Laldenga. He was re-elected president and was authorised by the convention to negotiate with the government of India. Subsequent talks between Laldenga and the representatives of the government led to the now famous 1 July 1976 agreement (Laldenga calls it a 'press statement') carrying the signatures of Laldenga and the then union Home Secretary S. L. Khurana.

The agreement (or, statement) however, failed to achieve anything tangible because Laldenga and the government differed on their priorities. The government wanted the insurgents to lay down their arms as a precondition for further talks on the future status of Mizoram. Laldenga wanted the priorities reversed. With negotiations deadlocked over the issue, the Army resumed operations to flush out the insurgents in October, but suspended them during Christmas when the talks resumed. Om Mehta, then Minister of State for Home in Mrs Gandhi's Cabinet, negotiated with Laldenga and promised to permit the MNF to hold a political meeting at Aizawl after the parliamentary elections. But, Mrs Gandhi's defeat at the polls changed the entire situation. The Janata government opted for a tougher line and the talks bogged down for the second time over the surrender of arms. That Laldenga and the Union government were drifting apart became all too evident after a five-minute meeting between Union Home Ministry officials and Laldenga in New Delhi in May 1977.

Laldenga handed over power to the MNF national council, thus abdicating his right to negotiate. The Union government retaliated by asking him to quit India by 6 June. At the intervention of an MP, a meeting was arranged between the Prime Minister Mr Morarji Desai and Laldenga in early August. And, on 31 August he met Home Minister Charan Singh. Neither of these meetings helped to break the ice. Both Desai and Charan Singh insisted that Laldenga must unequivocally accept Indian citizenship and renounce violence in writing before any purposeful dialogue could be resumed. Laldenga was told again to leave India by 21 November. Finally in February 1978, Laldenga was put under house arrest and the government filed a number of criminal cases against him. The number two in the MNF, vice-president Zoramthanga was also summoned to New Delhi, allegedly through a forged message in the name of Laldenga in March 1978. And promptly he too was put under house arrest.

Even then the dialogue did not snap totally. But on 19 March 1978 when Laldenga formally withdrew the commitments made by him in the 1976 agreement, reducing it to a mere scrap of paper, and the government reacted by invoking the Unlawful Activities (Prevention) Act of 1967 to outlaw the MNF and its branch organisations. The insurgents, after a comparative lull, again became active in Mizoram. In June 1979 they launched a campaign against the vais (the non-Mizos) asking them to quit Mizoram. On 8 July 1979, Laldenga was arrested and lodged in the Tihar jail on charges of criminal conspiracy and waging war against the government. But in October he was released on bail as the CBI failed to submit a formal chargesheet to the court within the stipulated ninety-day period. The CBI, however, charged Laldenga, his son David, and a Congress(I) MP Bhagwan Din with conspiracy for obtaining a passport for Laldenga on forged documents. For a time the possibilities of a truce appeared remote. But by then, Laldenga was looking towards the future, and Mrs Gandhi. ■

'In Mizoram the tricolour was not flown on 15 August 1947'

A solution to the turmoil in Mizoram seems in sight again. The Mizo National Front leader Laldenga agreed to a ceasefire from the midnight of 31 July and withdrew the "Quit Mizoram" notice served on 'outsiders'. Simultaneously the security forces stopped their operations. SAUMITRA BANERJEE spoke to Laldenga in Delhi on the present ceasefire, the history of Mizo insurgency and future politics in Mizoram.

Q: Mr Laldenga, once you cooperated with the Government, later you took to insurgency. What led you to take this course of action?

A: You see, Mizoram was not represented in the making of the Constitution of India. We felt it was wrong to impose a Constitution of any kind on an area that has not been represented. I remember I had come across a book (where it was written) that George Washington met the king of England and the king asked him, 'George, is not the Constitution prepared by the London Parliament good enough for the people of America? I think the London Parliament made a very beautiful Constitution for you,' and George Washington's reply was, 'Your majesty, it is a matter of representation.' You see, a Constitution is a matter of representation always. So I believe that the Constitution of India was imposed and I think it is wrong. When a Constitution is imposed it is a case of domination. (The telephone rings and Laldenga excuses himself. It is a trunk call from Aizawl, the capital of Mizoram. As he returns, he says, "Aizawl is always a problem. It is too far.")

Q: Wasn't there any other course of action you could have resorted to? Why armed insurgency?

A: Well, actually, we met the (representatives of the) Government of India. The MNF never resorted to violence in the beginning. We met the then Home Minister, Gulzarilal Nanda, and Trilok Singh, a member of the Planning Commission. I also had discussions with the Chief Minister of Assam and I met Prime Minister Lal Bahadur Shastri in 1965. It was never our wish to resort to violence. When I met Lal Bahadur Shastri, a reinforcement of armed forces was rushed into Mizoram which provoked the people. I requested the Prime Minister to withdraw the Assam Rifles battalion, as the people thought that suppressive forces were being brought in. I was happy that Prime Minister Shastri withdrew the battalion. Then came 1966. The same battalion was rushed in again and the situation was very tense and the people became rather afraid. This was because we knew what the army had done in Nagaland. I requested the Chief Minister of Assam to withdraw the forces and even rang him up and said that I would come down and have discussions with him. But he refused to withdraw them. I was afraid that things might take a bad turn. So I rang up again—and I have witnesses—and the Chief Minister's secretary said the Chief Minister did not want to speak to me. That was a very unfortunate message. The army was poured in and the Chief Minister refused to talk to us! This is one of the factors that contributed to the building up of the movement.

Q: Is that what made you decide to take to arms?

A: As soon as suppressive measures were taken and the Government refused to talk to us, I knew that there was no other alternative but to fight. Most of the Indian Press had stated that the famine of 1955 (had the seeds) of insurgency. But this is very wrong. Nationalism was all along the politics of Mizoram. As far back as 1946 the idea of independence (of Mizoram) was there. On the eve of the independence of India, on 14 August 1947, leaders of all political, social, and religious organisations had resolved that if Mizoram was to join the Union of India, they should reserve the right to secede after ten years. But a lot of people in Mizoram did not even agree to this. They wanted to start (fighting) right away. A group of people, some ex-servicemen, declared that the tricolour should not be flown on Independence day. They were armed and vowed that anyone who flew the flag would be killed, and the tricolour was not flown on Independence day (15 August 1947).

Q: You wanted Mizoram to secede. Now you have agreed to negotiations and a settlement within the framework of the Indian Constitution. What brought about this change?

A: You see, in the course of our movement we have learnt that the geo-political situation and the (Indian) policy in relation to our movement is such that we have decided that our survival—and we have been fighting for our survival—should be (compatible) with that of India. However, we believe that as Mizoram was not represented in the making of the Constitution, certain arrangements must be made constitutionally. So our political demand really is a constitutional arrangement within the framework of the present Constitution. We feel this will be good for the people of Mizoram and we should seek our survival within the Indian Union.

Q: When did you start negotiating with the Indian Government?

A: It started as far back as 1971. We had clandestine meetings with representatives of the Government of India. But the fall of East Pakistan and the creation of Bangladesh strained the process of contact. (Contacts were reopened) in 1973, 1974 and 1975 in various places like Kabul, Bangkok, Rome and Geneva. Finally, the Government of India agreed to grant us safe conduct tocome to Delhi and seek settlement of the political problem within the Constitution. So, we came in 1976 January, on safe conduct. It was agreed that should the talks fail, we would be allowed to return to the place where we came from.The MNF convention was called in Calcutta in March 1976, which officially resolved to accept the settlement of the political problem of Mizoram within the framework of the Constitution. Then a delegation, headed by me, was deputed to have talks with the Government of India. We entered into a dialogue with the Government of India represented by officials.

Q: Why did the 1976 talks fail?

A: The officials could not talk much about political matters. It was pursued as a law and order problem and not as a political one. Though the MNF agreed to accept a solution, the political side was totally ignored. The official representatives kept stressing on a laying down of arms, without discussing a political solution. So the talks centred around the modalities of how the arms could be laid down.

Besides, when our talks were incomplete, the official representatives suggested that we issue a Press statement declaring how the talks had progressed so that the nation would know what we were doing. So we prepared a Press statement declaring how the talks had progressed so that the nation would know what we were doing ... which the officials later passed off as an agreement. This caused a breakdown in our talks. They wanted to force this down our throats. It was (a conspiracy) hatched by these officials. Even the radio carried the news that Laldenga had signed an agreement. The next day we said nothing doing and said that the talks were incomplete. After that the army resumed operations in Mizoram from October to December 1976. In December 1976 the talks were raised from the officials level to the political. It was at this point that I had talks with (the then Union Minister of State for Home) Om Mehta. The talks went smoothly. We decided we would resume talks after the elections (March 1977).

Came the Janata regime and I met Morarji Desai in August 1977. The Janata policy was quite different. Desai demanded a complete surrender without talks, an unconditional laying down of arms as a precondition to talks. This the MNF did not accept. Then I was arrested and thrown into jail.

When Mrs Gandhi returned, she once again agreed to resume talks to find political solutions rather than military ones. Keeping her word, she withdrew all the cases pending against me. In response, I sent an emissary to the MNF headquarters and the MNF once again agreed to accept a solution to the problem within the framework of the Indian Constitution. The MNF has responded positively and has agreed to a ceasefire and withdrawal of the 'Quit Mizoram' order.

Q: What are your demands now?

A: We picked up the threads from 1977. The MNF executive committee will convene to formulate political demands and the committee shall depute a delegation to present the demands to the Prime Minister. The exact demands the MNF has to spell out.

Q: But you would be knowing, at least broadly, some of the demands.

A: Well, thinking aloud, every unit of India is a state, and threrefore, Mizoram can never be more than a state. Today, Mizoram is a Union Territory, and this is not sufficient for a constitutional solution. Isn't it? So, I think—as I said we can think aloud—it can be a state. A full-fledged state with certain safeguards. I say certain safeguards because of our ethnic difference and economic backwardness.

Q: Do you mean like Kashmir?

A: That I cannot answer yet. It would be quite out of the way for me to say anything. All I can say is that a demand shall be made, taking the integrity of the nation into consideration.

Q: If Brig. Sailo's Ministry is allowed to function, do you think the peace effort could be sustained?

A: Frankly, I do not expect the ceasefire operation to be successful. Even now, some of Sailo's followers, the police and other personnel pretending to be the MNF, terrorise the people, collect funds and ambush several people. With him as Chief Minister the ceasefire will not be successful, let alone a political solution. If there is an interested party at the helm of affairs of the state he will obviously twist the agreement to his advantage. Otherwise he won't be human. (Laughs). This will wreck the peace effort completely. As a matter of fact, Sailo has been circulating letters saying that there should be a military solution.

Q: The Mizoram Government has issued a Press statement saying that members of the MNF underground have launched a massive fund collection campaign in Mizoram in the name of a Liberation Front. How do you expect peace under such circumstances?

A: I don't know what collection of donations is taking place. But it is only today (1 August) that the ceasefire has become effective. So, if something like this happens now (after the ceasefire) they can accuse us and not before.

Q: Do you intend to head the Government in Mizoram?

A: Well, frankly, I wouldn't be a politician if I didn't try (to become the head of the government).

Q: Do you intend to join the Congress(I)?

A: (Hesitates) I have not thought of it yet. Though I trust Mrs Gandhi's leadership, I have not thought of joining Mrs Gandhi, as yet. If I say I will join Mrs Gandhi, then the whole thing will flop.

India should welcome move for regional summit

Gen. Zia-ur-Rehman is on to a good thing, says PRAN CHOPRA

INDIA is responding with a sense of defeatism to an initiative by the Bangladesh President, Mr Zia-ur-Rehman. Instead of recognising it as a step towards a goal which a confident India would surely desire and work for, it is suspecting some kind of a trap or manoeuvre in the Bangladesh initiative, "an attempt to Liliputianise a Gulliver" to borrow a phrase used in private by a former Indian diplomat.

President Zia has proposed a summit meeting of the six South Asian countries, India, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Sri Lanka, Nepal and Bhutan, to discuss closer economic, social and cultural cooperation. As the largest of the South Asian countries, as the largest common factor in the economic relations among all of them, and as the country with the largest stake in this area, the largest actual or potential leverage, and as the country with the most to gain if South Asia became a regional entity, India should welcome such a summit.

And India would have welcomed it without hesitations if New Delhi had been in the confident mood in which she used to be ten years ago. At that time, in fact, India herself mooted such an idea, and if it refrained from pushing the idea much harder the reasons were not any inner hesitations but an external constraint. Some of the South Asian countries proved lukewarm about it, and if India had pushed them she might have been accused of trying to institutionalise and thus make permanent her own dominant position in this region.

Now however the idea emanates from her neighbours. The Bangladesh President has put it forward formally, officially, and at the highest level. But unofficially the idea has also been floated in Pakistan in the form of a most significant article in the Pakistan Economist which I will discuss a little later and which probably would not have been so conspicuously published in a more or less orthodox journal unless it had at least the tacit approval of important circles.

I can understand caution being mixed with welcome, as in the first comment by the official spokesman in New Delhi on the proposal by the Bangladesh President. But I cannot understand the hope which lurks behind the scenes in New Delhi that if India sits tight long enough and makes no commitment to it the idea will just float away without India having to take the blame for killing it. It is a sign of strength, not weakness, to sit at the table with yesterday's enemies, and here we are not talking about enemies but about neighbours who range from the subdued to the suspicious to the friendly, helpful and kindred.

To some extent Bangladesh is also responsible for India's defensive and suspicious response. Dacca has taken the initiative in a most haphazard fashion; a third rate cigarette company would not launch a brand in this way. When Mr Eric Gonzalves, one of the seniormost Indian diplomats, met President Zia in Dacca a few months ago not a word of this idea was breathed to him. Yet only a month later the Bangladesh Vice-Premier brought a fullblown proposal to New Delhi in the definitive form of a formal letter from President Zia to Mrs. Gandhi.

THE proposal was handled and sponsored very casually by the Bangladesh Press. It was first disclosed, and that too only in reply to a question, at a Press conference in Dacca which had been called for the Foreign Minister to talk about the Islamic meeting in Islamabad. The disclosure received a single column treatment in the Bangladesh Observer on a page on which it was dwarfed by the Foreign Minister's statement about the Islamabad meeting. A day later there was another Press conference by the Foreign Minister, and a public speech by President Zia, and neither of them made any reference at all to the proposed South Asian summit. Some promotion that! It has been claimed in Dacca that some South Asian countries have welcomed the idea. But no details have been given.

Worse followed after this half-cock launching. At Islamabad the Bangladesh Foreign Minister expansively said on May 19 that the summit would consider setting up "an organisation", and that the Maldives, Afghanistan and Iran would be welcome to join it. Now there may be nothing wrong about setting up an organisation or about widening the summit. But in the first place, these ideas are frightfully premature at this stage; in the second place, the time, venue and occasion for proposing them have to be carefully chosen; the choice by the Bangladesh Foreign Minister was either amateurish or insensitive to India's susceptibilities.

There are also some slightly more substantial reasons for caution in New Delhi both about the formal proposal by Bangladesh and the unofficial one emanating from Pakistan. Bangladesh and Pakistan take a very different view from India's about events in Afghanistan. India sees these events as part of a bigger problem; Pakistan and Bangladesh see them as the creation of Soviet expansionism alone. This being so, India is bound to be cautious about any ideas which might have been triggered off in Pakistan or Bangladesh by the Afghan crisis.

There is also another aspect. Both of these suggestions for regional cooperation came in the wake of a move started earlier by an unofficial organisation in Colombo (where incidentally the Bangladesh initiative first saw the light of day in the Press anywhere) for a seminar in Peking for discussing the establishment of a regional organisation which would include China as well. This gives colour to the suspicion which exists in some quarters in New Delhi that ideas of regional cooperation are being floated by India's neighbours only to internationalise their bilateral disputes with India and to create another platform where pressures may be exerted upon India.

But notwithstanding all these reasons for caution, ways of ensuring closer cooperation among the South Asian countries, and especially economic cooperation, ought to be high up on the Indian agenda. They were so once. They will be so again when India is once again more confident of itself, more giving, more outward looking, less afflicted by its present sickness of the soul which makes her preoccupied with petty politicking at home that some of the pettiness has infiltrated into its handling of external relations. But in the mean time India ought to be a little more open to ideas which others take the responsibility and initiative of proposing.

The question is sometimes asked what kind of economic cooperation there can be between India and its neighbours, when India can supply them most of what they need and they have hardly anything to sell to India. The question betrays both myopia and hyper-metropia. On the one hand it overlooks the fact that the present economic imbalance between India and its neighbours has in the short run a beneficial diplomatic dimension. On the other hand it overlooks the fact that in the long run there can be a balanced development of the whole region which will be the faster the more balanced it is.

PAKISTAN exports roughly one-fourth as much as India imports. Every one per cent of its needs that India may import from Pakistan would be four per cent of Pakistan's exports. This is the magnification India can have on Pakistan's export horizon, and on the import horizon also it could be substantial if not as much. Not every transaction would be on the best prices that India can get elsewhere. But markets are not won, and countries never, by only driving hard merchandising bargains. A loss sustained today may be an investment for tomorrow, and a loss in economic terms may be a gain in diplomatic terms.

As for the day after tomorrow, one only needs to remember the fact that all six countries of South Asia (with the possible exception of Sri Lanka in some respects) form part of a single geo-economic zone bound together by the drainage of the Himalayas into the Arabian Sea and the Bay of Bengal. The greatest single economic potential of this zone lies in its river systems which are the lifeline of its agriculture because of the irrigation they can provide, and of its industry too because of the enormous power potential. This potential cannot be developed as greatly or as fast by any one country of the zone as it can be by all the six together, and whatever each country can contribute to the proper harnessing of the rivers passing through it can pay many times over for all the merchandise which that country can import from India or any of the other five countries.

Nepal is an outstanding example of this. By harnessing its rivers for generating power (and they cannot be so harnessed without Nepal extending India the fullest cooperation for it) Nepal can save India a flood damage of almost Rs 1,000 crores which these untrained rivers cause in eastern India almost every year, and it can sell India unlimited quantities of power.

So much for the niggardly calculations which traders and merchants make about what today's Nepal—or Bangladesh or Pakistan or any of the other five countries—can sell India. More boldly relevant for the future is what was written in the excellent Pakistan Economist article by Mr M.B. Naqvi, a senior Pakistani journalist, after he had toured India.

He expressed amazement at the industrial progress he saw in India, but he still has the courage to urge that each of the six countries (he also spoke of the same six as the Bangladesh President) should open its markets to the goods of all the other five, and all the six should so coordinate their future investment and development planning that there may develop a mutually beneficial "interlocking interdependence through investments in vertically divided industrial complexes on a truly international basis. This allround interdependence for raw materials, essential components, accessories and other industrial intermediates of everyone should be supplemented by free political institutions that fully safeguard the interests of politically or economically weak sections."

There is a lot else in Naqvi's article and in his vision which shows how even such obstinate political problems as Kashmir can be made less stubborn through extensive cooperation in other fields. But here attention needs to be focussed on this economic core of his article because of the interesting coincidence, if coincidence it is, that the Bangladesh President has also proposed the same thing and at about the same time.

Carter barter

Sometime in early 1978, Billy Carter had read something about Libya in a newspaper. Six months later he was in Libya as guest of Ahmed Shahati, one of the most powerful men in Tripoli. Billy soon stepped into the unassigned role of an American Arab sympathiser, T.E. Lawrence-style. The result was a deal which he arranged between the oil-rich nation and an American oil refining firm, for several million dollars in commission. And a great deal of embarrassment for Billy's brother, the President: Billy had gone around

Telly Savalas as 'Kojak'

The stars went on strike. We mean those who caper their way on the silver screen. Just a few days back, actors at the 20th Century Fox studios staged a strike due to conflicts between performers and producers and put the thriving American industry into its worst labour crisis for 20 years. But who is responsible? No animate being but an entirely new phenomena known as the 'pay television'. Pay TV programmes are usually old or recent films screened for a fee paid by TV owners without commercials. This form of TV was worth $ 400 million last year. The actors along with musicians, radio and TV performers want six per cent of the gross revenue of the programmes before they are sold to pay TV programmes. But producers have only offered three per cent and that too after the cinema has been screened over 15 days during a two-year period. Whatever the outcome, the strike was not without the usual sets and actors. The posters had an emblem of the Greek mask combining tragedy and comedy—hardly an emblem associated with industrial strikes. Then there was Telly Savalas, all dressed up in a dark skirt as Kojak. A film actor is a film actor is a film ac...

Who ever heard of an actress, stuntperson and motor racer all rolled into one? Catherine Bach is all three—and more. She has made herself famous as the roadhouse waitress in the enormously successful television series appropriately called "The Dukes of Hazzard". And the young lady is original: the stunts she performs on the screen are all her own. Off screen, she has made a name for herself as a motor racer.

Her vehicle is a jeep.Picture shows her leaning on the tyre. One wonders if she, now relaxed and smiling is planning another of her stunning antics

Although Ms Bach's acting career has started with the television, she is a woman with great promise—and plenty of good looks which may be her biggest asset.

One of the most successful political films

I HAVE never cared much for Mrinal Sen's politics. Nor for many of his films. Yet I empathise with his concerns. For they are the concerns of any sensitive, honest creative person in our time. Or, for that matter, of anyone who chooses to keep his eyes open in this country of the blind. Each and every Mrinal Sen film has refused to go beyond its ostensibly simple-minded political matrix. Each and every film of his found glib ideological explanations for every human situation that went wrong. And this happened far too often for it to be either a coincidence or an artistic declension. Obviously the filmmaker has made a conscious, deliberate decision to keep his film that way. And it may be worthwhile finding out why.

His easy politics have not made Mrinal Sen's films any more popular. Rhetoric and harangue may have endeared him to a certain kind of audience who are perhaps particularly vulnerable to the appeal of naive ideological solutions but they have certainly not won him a big following. Except for the odd film like Bhuvan Shome, very few of his films have really packed the halls or made his distributors yell for more. In fact, his last film Parashuram, which won Arun Mukherjee the best actor's award, has not yet found a distributor and many of his other films have put him and his financiers back by quite a tidy sum. Chorus is a case in point. The head of a nationalised bank which financed the film reportedly kept the stills stuck up on the walls of his office room to remind himself of what he should never touch again.

If nothing else, this means that Mrinal Sen is an honest man. He is obviously not selling his politics for popularity or personal gain. The vast number of politically conscious people who swear by the Left are obviously not thronging to Mrinal Sen films; they are only paying lip service to the bitch-goddess of committed art and then joining the queue for Jai Santoshi Maa tickets. The suffering masses may be the subject of Mrinal Sen's films, but they are obviously not his audience.

Being a sensitive filmmaker and an intelligent man, I am sure he recognises this. Just as I am quite sure that he has no misconceptions about his role or his audience. Obviously then, he has chosen to stay within this cinematic matrix because he is convinced that it makes sense and is intrinsic to his creative universe. He could hardly be doing it for effect for the umpteenth time!

Mamta Shankar as the truant daughter

So it is time, I guess, we ought to take a hard, serious look at his craft again and see where he wants to take us and why. For despite their political garb, some of his films have demonstrated rare sensitivity and acumen. There is an unquestionable authenticity underlying all the didactic statements and shibboleths masquerading as social verities. And Ek din Pratidin is just the right time to do this. For in my opinion it is undoubtedly Mrinal Sen's finest film. By far.

It is a different kind of film, in one sense. As any Mrinal Sen afficionado would tell you. In another sense, it is the apotheosis of all that he has been trying to do and say over the past many years. It is a film about interiors. About a home; about the minds of people in that home; how these people react in a moment of crisis and yet how they stand together as a phalanx at the slightest external threat. Each and every person in this film, each and every member of Hrishikesh Sengupta's faltering family is carefully etched and convincingly portrayed in detail. There is no attempt to gloss over the inconsequential and propagate a vision. The vision of this film is made up of small, inconsequential details, human failings, tentative hopes, the tender violence we commit on each other at every crossroad of stress. And yet, strangely enough, from all these little details, these hurts that we inflict upon each other, emerges an arabesque of hope, an unusual vision of human destiny. Quiet, dignified, protean in its own way.

The film is set in the tumbledown ruins of a magnificent mansion built in 1857, the year of the Sepoy Mutiny. The intensely private drama of the family is played out against the frescoes, colonnades, mosaics and weathered splendour of the past. The broken walls, the cracked plaster, the broken panes of the windows replaced by torn calendar sheets. The taedium vitae of this sordid dwelling place becomes a magnificent theatre where the most violent emotions are expressed with restraint and quiet dignity. By moving away from the ostensibly political, Mrinal Sen has produced one of the most successful political films of our time. A film that even someone like me can understand, admire and find wholly unforgettable. The storyline of Ek din Pratidin is flimsy, and perhaps rightly so, in the context of Mrinal Sen's intentions. What charges it with special power is the filmmaker's insight into the subterranean tensions that hold a middle class family together: the financial insecurity, the latent emotional traumas waiting for an opportunity to break through the quiet waters of genteelity, the understated violence, the marauding sense of loss and deprivation. All this is played out against this magnificent scenario of brick and mortar, right in front of prying neighbours who move in and out of their lives (and the frame) with the easy grace of a stampeding herd of wild bisons running through a particularly small china shop.

Every little detail is taken care of in this meticulous film. The dented globe on the study table, the mismatched curtains, the plastic table cloth with floral design, the Bengali almanac, the surfeit of calendars to hide the peeling plaster on the walls, the gamchha hanging on the door. Everything is in place, just right. Every single neighbour has been beautifully characterised: they look, speak, bitch with perfect ease and authenticity, as Chinu the eldest daughter of the house (and its only wage-earner) fails to turn up home one evening.

This is what the film is about. Chinu's delay in coming back home one evening, and how the other members of Hrishikesh Sengupta's family react to this. As evening gives way to night, and then night gives way to morning, the tension builds up. Fear gives way to ire. Ire gives way to resentment. Resentment to hysteria. And hysteria to hurt. One by one the masks fall off and the wounded visage of middle class morality stares at you. Respectability breaks down. Everyone starts hurting each other, identifying blame, pointing a finger at each other as the tumbledown mansion takes on menacing proportions in the dark and the prying neighbours keep their nightlong vigil.

Then begins the panic-stricken search. To the police station, to the hospitals, to the morgue. The fragile security of the home is threatened and in its wake arrive anger, fear, humiliation, despondency, which like the traditional wolf had been kept outside the shuttered door by Chinu's secure bank job, however ill-paying it may have been. The night thickens with tension as this strange, tumbledown mansion traps everyone in the painful insecurity of its ruins. There is a strange sense of destruction and despair, of history working out its inexorable logic.

Ironically, the search never ends. Not even when the girl returns alone in a taxi just as dawn is about to break. Accusing eyes try to pin her down for having strayed, yet everyone is uncertain. No one knows how to react to her coming back, just as no one knew how to react to the possibility of her never coming back. And this is precisely where lies the quiet beauty of this film, its strange dignity. No moral questions are ever asked. Nothing is said explicitly. Only stray insinuations are made by some of the neighbours. And in these insinuations lie the vulnerability, the decadence, the painful self-pity of petty bourgeoisie morality. The conflicts and contradictions of our life become open wounds and fester in the glare of daylight. Till silence raises its voice and screams into the coming morning.

Hope? Yes, there is hope, says Mrinal Sen. Just as soon as the intran-

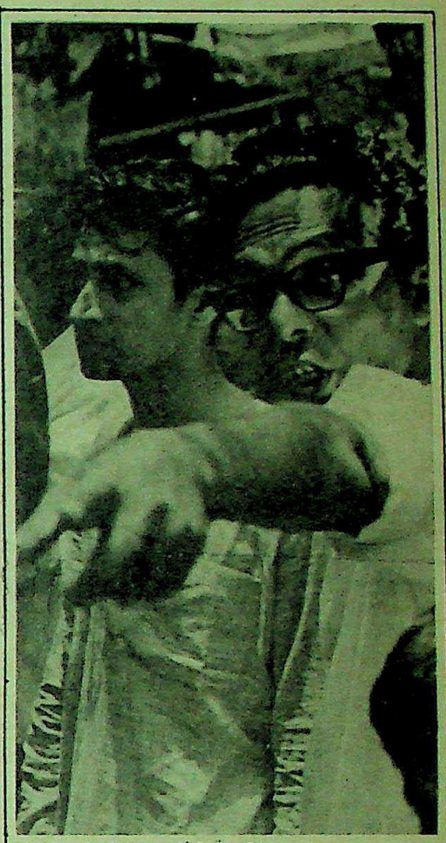
Sen's best

By AIN RASHEED KHAN

"I always give great deal of importance to the feminine characters because I believe that I know women better than I do men. I think that reality can be filtered better through women's psychologies. They are more instinctive more sincere."

Michelangelo Antonioni



Nimai Ghosh

Mrinal Sen (right) directing Ranjit Mallick in Interview

ALTHOUGH the emergence of the middle-class/lower middle-class working woman in our urban set-up has created distressing problems and new situations, it has not attracted the attention of very many film-makers in our country. Satyajit Ray's Mahanagar (made almost two decades ago) was the first serious and significant attempt to understand "her" problems. And the film moved us. Mrinal Sen in his attempt to understand and portray this problem has not only made what is undoubtedly his best and most subtle film so far but also probably his first where the film speaks for itself, not like theatre, nor like literature. It speaks in pure cinematic language. One might say that Sen has come out with totally unsuspected depths. I think Derek Malcolm of the Guardian put it beautifully when he said that: "the new film (Ek din Pratidin) is a magnificent example of a control and restraint we were beginning to think he might not possess." Well, one saw signs of this restraint and control in Oka Ori Katha, another well-made film of his which, unfortunately, never got a chance of public exposure.

What distinguishes this film from all previous Sen films is that this film beyond doubt establishes his mastery over the film media and also displays his growing concern and acute awareness of the demands of this media. Consequently, the other features that distinguish it from his other films and make it one of the finest made in the country, are technical excellence, structural novelty, controlled acting and a general stamp of reflection and maturity. And of course, little trimming and subtler handling of the social concerns.

The scheme of the film is neat and believable. He dexterously weaves small episodic threads into the texture of the film to establish the suspense, search, hidden tensions and rifts, in the course of 125 minutes or so.

As I have said earlier, structurally the film is different from his other films. The structure evolved out of the content. Each role is different from the other. As it becomes later and later, and the family's searches around the city morgues, police stations and hospitals continue, camera and characters are continuously on the move. The screeching hoots of the distant cars and the increasing noise of the scooter indicate the deepening of the night and the crisis. (Incidentally, the search in scooter and the noise is probably influenced by Fellini's "Amarcorde"). The physical restlessness and anxiety has been beautifully conveyed by imaginative camera movements. As the night grows deeper, the camera gradually becomes slow and finally it is almost static—and that is the moment when he reveals the rifts and the tensions. Now, he resorts to some excellent cutting to bring out the inward restlessness of the characters involved. All this is very consciously created.

A word about K K Mahajan and his brilliant photography. With his smooth and intelligent camera movements, low-key lightings and some superb track shots, he helps Mrinal Sen in revealing the "expressionist strength" of his images. In spite of the massive darkness that envelops this city every night he has been able to bring out the unreality of the city night and build a poignant contrast with half-lit indoor shots where the drama takes place.

While seeing a film like this one wishes one could share the maker's journey from the script to the cinematic execution, which must have been extremely exciting, and in this particular case, rewarding too.

Photographs by Subhash Nandy

sigent landlord makes a rude insinuation in public, the entire family once again comes together, as a solid phalanx to face the onslaught of moral censure. Fuck your bhadralok culture, screams Chinu's brother in frustrated anger, echoing the feelings of the audience, who by now have completely identified with the loss and the loneliness of each and every member of Hrishikesh Sengupta's family. The quiet exile of the pensioner father, who always looks lost and forlorn; the tired drudgery of Chinu's mother, who finally breaks down under the tension; Minu's vivacity and despair; her bewildered brothers, not knowing what to do and yet trying desperately to hold the family together. And yet, overriding all this is hope. That hope which unites the family against the marauding eyes of the neighbours, against society's brutal, uninformed censure. It is this incredible strength that finally holds together the Sengupta family, lends each person courage and dignity. And as the new morning arrives, and everyone returns to their predictable drudgery, the quiet sunlight heightens the grandeur and the sorrow of their lives.

Yes, this is a truly unforgettable film. With memorable acting by Satya Banerjee as the father, Gita Sen as the mother and Sreela Majumdar as Minu. Mamta Sankar has not much to do as Chinu but looks exquisitely beautiful whenever she is on the screen. She is undoubtedly one of the most lovely women that the Bengali screen has ever thrown up and one of the very few who look intelligent. And all this is heightened by some remarkable photography by K. K. Mahajan, who starts off the film with an exquisite visual sequence of a rickshaw entering the lane just outside the house. That sets the mood for the entire film.

Even if a film like Ek din Pratidin is made once in a long while, Bengali cinema has nothing to be despondent about.

Infighting plagues Congress (I)

By BARUN SENGUPTA

WILL Mrs Gandhi be able to control the infighting in her Party? Of the three or four major internal problems she is facing today, factionalism in the Congress(I) is one. In almost every state, even where they are not in power, Congress(I) leaders are more busy with intra-Party feuds than with anything else. Not that this infighting is a new development in Indian politics. Most Indian political organisations are afflicted by the disease which has assumed serious proportions since the fall of the Janata government. The Janata Party and government collapsed within three years mainly because of infighting. During the whole of the Janata rule and at the time of the parliamentary election campaign Congress(I) leaders repeatedly stressed this serious weakness of the Janata and questioned its ability to govern. This campaign issue fetched the Congress(I) a lot of votes.

Now, if people see that the Congress(I) men are no different what will it do to the image of the Party? Mrs Gandhi is quite aware of the seriousness of the problem and is getting frantic in her bid to control it as far as possible.

But, for various reasons it is a difficult task—no less difficult than even the problem of controlling inflation. First, intra-Party feuds are not a peculiarity of the Congress(I). So the malaise lies deeper. In the case of the democratic Parties their internal squabbles can be seen by everyone, because most of the time fights are conducted through the Press. In the case of the others the fighting goes on mainly inside the Party away from the public eye. The Congress(I), however, is a strange Party. It is neither absolutely democratic in its internal functioning nor is it a hundred per cent autocratic organisation. No one in it today will dare to oppose the supreme leader or even whisper against any of her firm decisions; but even an ordinary worker can abuse a PCC president or a member of the Party's parlimentary board without being afraid of any disciplinary action.

Once Mr A.B.A. Ghani Khan Choudhury was assaulted by Congress workers in the presence of Mrs Gandhi at Calcutta airport. Mr Choudhury was then the West Bengal PCC president. No action was taken against those workers. A few days after that incident Party workers belonging to the opposite camp insulted Mr Pranab Mukherjee at the state Party headquarters. Again no disciplinary action was taken. Although these incidents took place in 1979 the present situation remains largely unaltered. In such an organisation though there cannot be a scramble for the post of the supreme leader while the leader is still alive, there can very easily be fights for other coveted posts.

After Sardar Patel's death Nehru was the unquestioned supremo. The situation changed after his death and again reverted to the original pattern with the emergence of Mrs Gandhi as the undisputed leader after her massive victory at the 1971 polls. In 1977 some leaders tried to change that situation but they failed miserably.

Second, after the last Assembly elections, mainly on Sanjay's initiative, certain persons were installed as Chief Ministers inspite of strong opposition from powerful factions in those states. Now, after Sanjay's sudden death those powerful factions are trying to oust those Chief Ministers. This is bound to create tension inside the Party. Almost all the Congress(I) Chief Ministers are facing such a situation.

Third, for various reasons some senior Party-men were left out of the central and state governments. Even if they do not have any mass following or standing inside the Party, they are masters in the art of intrigue and they have the support of some powerful business houses. These people are also very active now.

Fourth, some very ambitious bureaucrats are also encouraging the internecine quarrels of the Congress(I). To give a classic example, an IAS special assistant of an economic Minister was trying to get his Minister changed and bring in another man from the same state with the help of some politically powerful business men. The special assistant went to the extent of requesting MPs and leaders of the Party to speak against his Minister to the PM. Fifth, a large number of Congress(I) leaders have no political conviction or sense of dedication. Their only motto in life is to occupy gainful and powerful positions. In an organisation where discipline has been much devalued for about 11 years, such self-seekers can always create havoc. And, that is what they may do if they cannot be controlled immediately.

Mrs Gandhi's problem is that, whatever a large number of Indians may think, she is no reincarnation of the goddess Durga. She cannot solve singlehanded all the problems, fight all the enemies and defeat all the intrigues simultaneously.

Mrs Gandhi's problem is that, whatever a large number of Indians may think, she is no reincarnation of the goddess Durga. She cannot solve single-handed all the problems, fight all the enemies and defeat all the intrigues simultaneously. But, for the survival of her government and Party she will have to thwart all the attacks. If her own Partymen do not stand by her during these days of crisis she is bound to fail. Because, the continued infighting in the Congress(I) will not only tell upon the prestige of the Party, but reduce the authority of the Government and weaken Mrs Gandhi's personal political position.

Will Rajiv be able to help her control the infighting in the Party? If he has the personality and the tact there is no reason why he should not be able to. After all, as the supreme leader's son he will have unlimited authority and with that authority he can first eliminate the cent per cent self-seekers from the Party, clear out the intriguing and ambitious bureaucrats from vantage positions and then proceed to impose discipline within the organisation slowly and steadily. If he does this then there is no reason why he should not be able to help his mother control intra-Party feuds. Definitely it requires personality, tact and judgment. No one can stop the squabbling of thousands of self-seekers only with the help of a danda.

"India is not our country"

Jamaat presents a blueprint for secession

THE Jamaat-e-Islami's threat to start a Khomeini type fundamentalist movement has added fresh tensions on a state and a government which already has more than a fair share of them: Jammu and Kashmir. Sheikh Tajamul Islam, (the president of the Jammat-e-Tulaba the youth wing of the Jamaat-e-Islami), preaching secession openly at a Press conference in Srinagar on August 5, declared that his organisation was all set to launch an Iran type Islamic revolution for the liberation of Kashmir. "India," he said, "is not our country". Nor was he willing to accept the validity of the Indian constitution for the state of Jammu and Kashmir. "Our allegiance is to the Islamic constitution and the Islamic constitution alone," he asserted.

While fringe secessionist views are not unknown in Kashmir, and in fact, are mostly dismissed with a yawn, what made everybody sit up was Tajamul's claim that the movement had the backing of the Chief Minister Sheikh Abdullah. The Sheikh decried the allegation as one more attempt to malign him. "It is a deliberate and calculated move to sour my relationship with the centre," he said. The very next day he summoned his cabinet to discuss the matter, on a prescription: crackdown on the 'anti-nationals'. By August 7 morning 64 persons were taken into custody, one of them under the State Public Safety Act. The first impression was the arrested persons were either the activists or the supporters of the Jamaat-e-Islami. But the police kept the identities of the arrested persons a closely guarded secret.

Whatever the Sheikh's calculations may be, there is no denying that the Jamaat-e-Tulaba has thrown up a challenge to his authority. Tajamul's claims that his organisation had the active support of more than 100,000 Kashmiris, if true, must cause some serious anxieties to the Sheikh. The 100,000 is an exaggerated figure, but even if they are one-tenth that, it is still a problem, as they are well-organised. Tajamul says that 250 active units of his organisation have already been set up in the schools, colleges and the universities. Apart from this the organisation has about 12,000 associate members known as Rafiqs. The policy making council has 54 members.

Their plan of action goes like this: First, the organisation will launch what it says will be a massive education campaign to impress upon the people that their salvation lies in an independent sovereign state of Kashimr. "Once we succeed in this, the people themselves will rise in revolt," Tajamul explains. He also asserts that his organisation is not averse to assistance from foreign countries. "Why not? After all Kashmir is a disputed territory," he argues: To him, India is occupying the state illegally and has violated her commitments for determining the status of Kashmir through a plebiscite. He, however, does not think that Pakistan too is occupying Kashmir illegally. His reasoning: Pakistan is still committed to holding a plebiscite and that clears her of the charges of occupation. Nor does he think vacation of Pakistani occupation an important requirement for holding a plebiscite.

The blind: showing the way

The government is no help

"The government is apathetic towards the blind. We are not like the other backward classes who constitute a vote bank. And, therefore, we do not have enough political backing to get our demands conceded," said S. K. Rungta, acting general secretary of the National Federation of the Blind (NFB), who went on hunger strike from 1 August to 5 August, in front of the Prime Minister's Safdarjung Road residence to press home demands for better facilities and more employment opportunities for the sightless. Their demands were, however, not new. Most of them had been included in the charter of demands they had intended to present to the Prime Minister on 16 March, the day the police lathi-charged the blind demonstrators proceeding towards the Prime Minister's house to present their demands.

Their chief demand is that blind persons, registered with the special employment exchanges for the physically handicapped, for one year or more be given employment immediately, and that blind persons should be treated as a backward class and given appropriate job reservations. "The government spends so much for our studies and our education and when we are finally educated there are no jobs available to us. We are also human beings, we too, have to earn a living," said Rungta. As a matter of fact, since March the NFB has been trying to negotiate with the government to ensure increased reservation of jobs for the blind in government offices. In reply to the charter of demands presented by the blind in March, the department of social welfare had stated on 25 April that a task force would be constituted to look into the matter. According to Mr Rungta, nothing more was heard. Finally, they wrote a letter to the Prime Minister to look into the matter. It was only in response to this letter that between 14 June and 31 July five senior officials in five different Ministries were appointed to look into the matter. "The government has no interest in the blind otherwise they could not have taken so long to appoint five officials," said R. Gupta, another blind agitator. According to Mr Rungta, out of a total of ninety lakh blind persons, only 1,200 are employed.

When there was no progress, S. K. Rungta decided to go on a fast unto death. It was at this point that the government woke up. First, on the eve of their fast unto death, representatives of the NFB were approached by officials of the Ministry of social welfare. The same evening the representatives of the NFB had talks with Mr Shankaranand, the Minister for social welfare. The talks failed as the Minister did not commit himself to a time-bound programme. The fast was then launched. Next, the representatives of the NFB had talks with the Labour Minister, T. Anjaiah. After two days of deliberations an agreement was reached which in effect conceded nothing. According to the agreement, all the Ministries have been requested to nominate an officer of the rank of deputy secretary for monitoring the reservation orders, especially to the physically handicapped.

As far as the time-bound programme for employment of the blind is concerned it has been agreed that letters would be sent to Chief Ministers emphasising the need to take all possible measures to rehabilitate the blind registered with special employment exchanges. A meeting of the employing Ministries and private employers would be called within a month to "impress upon them the need to employ at least one blind person immediately with ultimate objective of absorbing all blind persons registered at special employment agencies." The agreement has been reached without the government conceding any of the demands which the NFB had enumerated in its charter of demands. "Our sympathies are with the blind. We shall do all that we can and we shall study the problem," said the Labour Minister, Mr Anjaiah.

Meanwhile, Madan Lal Khurana has claimed that the commission constituted to enquire into the lathi charge on the blind on 16 March, has held the police guilty. According to him, though Delhi's Lt Governor Mr Jagmohan had asked for departmental action against the police officer, the request has not only been ignored, but the officer has been given an important portfolio in the crime branch.

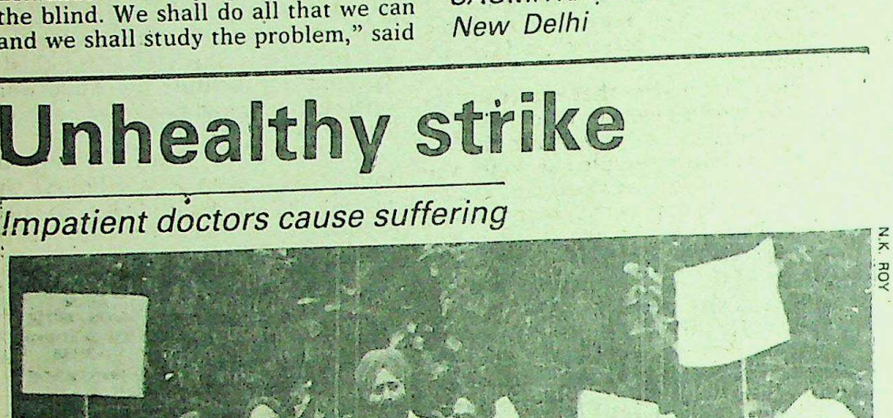
Unhealthy strike

Impatient doctors cause suffering



N.K. ROY

Junior doctors demonstrating outside Nirman Bhavan, Delhi

Since 5 July, around 1,600 junior doctors of Delhi's six major government hospitals have gone on strike. As a result, medical services in the capital may soon be paralysed. Only 600 senior doctors and about 220 doctors, appointed after the strike to help the former, remain to take care of the patients admitted to these hospitals. Some of the outdoor departments have already been closed down. The rest are able to cope with only half the number of patients (about 13,000 daily) requiring diagnosis and treatment. The Health Ministry, on receiving a fortnight's notice by the Junior Doctors' Federation of Delhi, took steps to prevent the strike from crippling the health service altogether.

Essential services such as maternity and emergency units are being run efficiently by overworked senior doctors and the newly appointed doctors. Small hospitals and dispensaries all over the city have been asked to accommodate and treat patients diverted from the major hospitals. However, these measures are at best palliative, not curative, and if the situation is to be prevented from turning into a crisis, the strike will have to be called off or new doctors will have to be found to replace the striking doctors.

The strike is fast turning into a nightmare for the poorer sections of society who form the majority of patients in these hospitals—the Lok Nayak Jaya Prakash, Govind Ballabh Pant, Sucheta Kripalani, Kalavati Saran, Ram Manohar Lohia and Safdarjang hospitals. Ramwati, a 31-year-old labourer was on the verge of tears because she could not have her infant who was suffering from a stomach upset and fever, treated at the Safdarjang hospital. The autonomous All India Institute of Medical Sciences which is cheaper is already overcrowded, with patients spilling in from all parts of the city and outside. So are the small health centres and dispensaries in Delhi. "If we are to go to a private practitioner, it means not giving my children food for the next few days—what am I to do?" she moaned.

Hospital wards which remain overcrowded with patients lying in the aisles and corridors, now have four out of ten beds vacant. Ironically, patient care has improved at these hospital wards simply because there are fewer patients to attend to and the same number of senior doctors are on the rounds. However, with barely 35 per cent of doctors' workforce in action,

Blinding carelessness

On 6 July 30-year-old Baban Vithoba Ughade was admitted to Ward No 20 of the Ophthalmology department of the Medical College Hospital, Nagpur with a minor eye complaint. Next morning, a senior doctor informed him that his left eye had developed an infection and had to be operated. The operation was performed. Baban lost his left eye. He is now having trouble with the right eye and fears that he might lose it too. Baban, a clerk in the retail sales of the Empress Mills is the sole breadwinner of the family consisting of five dependents.

The tragedy that struck the Ughade family is not a lone instance. Officially, some 20 patients have been affected by this infection described as "pseudomonas pyocynic—a very virulent type of infection even immune to antibiotics". No sooner was the infection detected, when the Ophthalmology department of the Nagpur Medical Hospital shut its door to fresh operations. But all too late, for already a dozen or more patients were partially or totally blinded.

What caused the infection to invade the operation theatre of the Medical Hospital? In Nagpur, improper autoclaving sterilisation of surgical instruments, inadequate cleaning of laundry and carelessness on the part of the operating surgeons combined together to cause the tragedy. Doctors agree that once the infection sets in there is hardly any cure other than removing the infected eye to prevent the infection from spreading to the other eye. The tragedy has been aggravated by the apathy of the hospital authorities to conduct an investigation. Their argument was that the investigation would involve a lot of expense: the investigation consisted of sending the eye swab for examination to Bombay!

The episode has caused a flutter in the Maharashtra legislature. Angry members rebuked the government for its indifference in dealing with human lives. Meanwhile, a staggering truth has come to light. It has been found that the Dean of the Medical college is allowed only Rs 250 (a month) for any purchase, and to make other purchases he has to obtain the permission of directors of various health departments stationed at Bombay. Small wonder then, that the sprawling complex of the Medical College at Nagpur lies in filth and dirt and in dire need of good management.

hospital work has been affected seriously, in spite of senior doctors putting in nearly 12 hours of work daily in place of the normal six hours.

All these problems have been created because the junior doctors have demanded better salaries (class I gazetted officers' grades), a curtailment of working hours, better working conditions and some other facilities, and the government refuses to budge unless the strike is called off. A junior doctor is one who does his or her house-surgeonship, or postgraduation in medicine or surgery. In Delhi, as in seven other centrally-run medical colleges, a junior doctor is paid between Rs 760 and Rs 1300, depending on his or her seniority. In the other states, their counterparts receive between Rs 200—Rs 500. The hours of work put in by a junior doctor in India are around 80-100 hours per week. The Junior Doctors' Federation now demands parity with doctors employed by the government in one of the services as Class I gazetted officers, who start on a salary of Rs 1,350 plus house rent and other allowances. Their working hours are 42 hours a week.

The Health Ministry refuses to grant their demands unconditionally because it claims that the JDF is not a registered body, has no bye-laws and hence is not justified in claiming to be a representative body. Their demands are therefore unreasonable. Says Dr(Mrs) S. K. Sandhu, assistant director-general of health services: "Compared to their cousins in the (other) states these doctor-students known as resident doctors are much better off". Her view that resident doctors all over the world are paid less than doctors employed in the health services, is backed by a house-surgeon who has little sympathy with the striking doctors. Dr Sandhu who is in charge of the Control Cell for Strike Purposes in Nirman Bhavan, feels that the motivation for the strike is partly related to the fact that doctors in India are no longer able to go to the West after graduation because of various restrictions placed on them by foreign, (mainly the American, British and Canadian government)."Moreover they are not willing to work in rural areas. Now since they have to stay in the country, they want a deal better than what they deserve", added Dr Sandhu.

Though it is true that resident doctors the world over get a smaller pay packet than their graduate batchmates who are employed with the national health services, an Indian doctor works twice as many hours daily. The JDF's demand for better working conditions could well be a war-cry of all working people in India. The demand cannot be an issue to strike. However, the government seems to be playing it cool, with the Health Minister, B. Shankaranand having found time to spend five days in Moscow watching the Olympics while his Ministry was embroiled in a situation affecting the lives of thousands of people. The situation has now became a prestige issue with neither the government nor the striking doctors willing to give in: the worst casualty is the poor patient who is not dying but needs treatment in Nepali girls

"MEIN shadi nahi karugi, kabhi nahin" (I shall never get married, never) said 19-year-old Mala, one of the 50 Nepali girls held by the Lucknow police under the Immoral Traffic Act recently. Tears started rolling down her cheeks as she talked about home, family and friends. It was a sordid story. She had been forced to became a prostitute by underworld operators who had smuggled her out of Nepal two years ago.

In the shadowy lanes of Chowk, the old city of Lucknow, are houses that closely match pigeonholes in their dinginess and stuffiness. Beyond the walls of these houses are the centres of the age-old profession. The dancing girls of the era of nawabs have disappeared and their place has been taken by the innocent-looking Kanchees of Nepal.

These unfortunate girls come from poverty-stricken mountainous areas of Nepal. Males of the family are generally employed away from homes as daily labourers and house servants. Employment opportunities for women are almost nil as the areas lie on a high altitude with almost no means of cultivation. The mode of operation to acquire the Kanchees is simple. A Nepali girl in the profession and belonging to the same area acts as a decoy. With ostentatious display of her costly belongings she impresses the girls. Word spreads around that she has a lucrative job in Lucknow.

The girls, belonging to the age group of 12 to 16 years, are organised into lots by the procurers, who are introduced to the girls by the decoy. Respectable jobs are guaranteed to the girls, while the parents are paid Rs 100 to Rs 150 for each girl.

Normally, during the first six months, a girl does not get paid at all. All their earnings are kept with the didis. The girl who earns the most gets a bonus, while others are beaten and raped by the 'bouncers'. Every month a new lot of Kanchees are smuggled in from Nepal, and for each 'new' girl the police is paid a fixed nazrana (sum of money). A girl is not kept in one place for more than six months. The sex racketeers keep the girls circulating from one 'kotha' to another and from one city to another. A girl is made to retire at the age of 25, after which she becomes a didi. The new didi in turn, traps 10 to 15 girls and starts a thriving business. All efforts made by the police to check prostitution have proved futile. The numbers of Kanchees are multiplying and business is booming in the city

Racism at Britain's Grays Inn

The lawyers are also prejudiced

ASPIRING BARRISTERS, as is well known, must eat their way into their profession. It is one of the central vertebrae in the ancient spine of the British legal system that pupils will not be called to the bar until they have eaten enough meals at the Inns of Court.

Not that one can just pop in, on a whim, for egg and chips at tea time. One must put on one's gown and turn back one's mind to the days—not so long past—when a successful applicant to the bar had to be 'a gentleman of good standing, not engaged in trade'. One must rigorously abide by the customs of one's Inn (and each is a law unto itself), or one may find oneself at a grim disadvantage later on in one's career.

If the quality of the legal service provided by each Inn were to be judged by the loving care with which its dinner-eating rituals were preserved, then we could be sure to find the most skilled advocates at Grays Inn. For there, when the food has been eaten, when the judges have retired to their private rooms, when permission has been given to smoke, and when the port has started to circulate...the splendid game of 'challenging' begins.

Imagine, if you will, a hall full of grown-up lawyers who have just eaten dinner. One of them may suddenly leap on to the bench on which he (or she) has been sitting, and challenge another to recite a poem. There will need to be a reason for the challenge: perhaps the other person has mispronounced the challenger's name. And it must be addressed to the most senior barrister in the hall. 'Master Senior, I wish to challenge X, on account of Y, to do Z...' (in suitably eloquent courtroom phrases, of course). Master Senior will call upon X to make a speech in self-defence and if that is unsuccessful, then X must pay a fine, in the form of a bottle of port, or else recite the damn poem.

The port flows; challenge follows challenge as barristers and their pupils leap up on to their benches and down again; and phrases are turned ever more wittily as the evening wears on. At a recent guest night, for example, avocado pears had been served for dinner. A young man who had brought his girlfriend to dine with him wished to challenge another young man who was sitting near by: it was alleged that the latter had remarked that the lady had 'a lovely pair'. In defence, he protested that he had been referring to the avocado and to the avocado alone. Master Senior declared that he could not judge the merits of the case until he had seen for himself. So the unfortunate young woman was marched to the top of the hall to show her 'pair' to the eminent barrister. All good, clean fun.

Sometimes things get a little out of hand. On Thursday, 10 July, the after-dinner rituals were in full swing. Songs had been sung, poetry had been recited, and everybody was talking and laughing and drinking and smoking in the usual fashion until a prominent and influential member of the Inn, Ms Clarissa Dickson-Wright, addressed the senior barrister. Master Senior, Sir, she said, these people (indicating a group of eight students) had not been contributing to the evening's entertainment; she moved that they be allowed to sing a song.

One of the eight protested that they did not know any songs to sing. Master Senior replied, in a light-hearted tone, that he found their behaviour offensive nonetheless; he would give them five minutes to come up with a song. Another of them rose to offer, on behalf of the eight, to pay the customary fine. Ms Dickson-Wright objected: Master Senior should order them to leave, she said. Master Senior ruled that the case was proved and the eight students must leave.

Diners at Grays Inn sit in 'messes' of four. Of the offending group one 'mess' consisted of two Africans, a West Indian and an Indian. A quick glance around the hall would have suggested that they were the only black students present.

They were not keen to go. They asked for leave to appeal to the judges (a part of the 'challenging' ritual which is rarely used). Ms Dickson-Wright got up on her bench again. If they wanted to appeal under the Race Relations Act, she said, they were welcome to try. But if they were not going to leave, then let a round of Rule Britannia be sung for them. Most of the diners joined in a rousing chorus of Rule Britannia. The eight students had no alternative but to walk out.

As the final verse drew to a close, the West Indian and one of the Africans returned. The West Indian stood up to express his disgust—but was jeered and shouted down; then the African student rose to his feet. He felt it was his duty, he said, to report the matter to his father, a high-ranking official at the Nigerian embassy. He would insist that a top-level complaint be made. He demanded the name of the senior barrister—that night a Mr Andrew Pinder.

The room fell silent. The diners were deeply embarrassed. They apologised profusely. They begged the young African to appeal instead to the judges of Grays Inn. The two men swept out, unrepentant. Ms Dickson-Wright went to find the remaining six and took them off to a local hostelry, where she bought them champagne and invited them to dine with her at one of her clubs.

It was a chastening experience for all. The young African father has never had any connection with the Nigerian embassy.

Maya Tyagi, the victim of Baghpat, garlanded Raj Narain when he went on a fast at Delhi's Boat Club lawns on 3 August to protest against police atrocities on women and establish the right of women "to live and to live with dignity and honour". And she gave him a glass of orange juice to break his fast on 10 August following appeals by opposition leaders including Bhupesh Gupta of the CPI, who was present when the fast was broken. Raj Narain lost ten kg in weight and managed to focus attention on this serious problem.

Bombay liquor lords settle with political lords

Hush money soothed the Government

THERE is a temporary truce between the Government and the 350 licensed liquor vendors in Bombay. On 28 December, 1979 the Collector of Bombay had passed an order discontinuing the licence of one Ganji Vijpal Visharia, a licensed foreign liquor vendor, on the grounds that his shop was within the prohibited area, being in the vicinity of a Parsi fire temple. The Collector said that the licence would not be renewed if the premises were not shifted by 31 March, and this date was subsequently extended to 30 June.

Ganji filed a petition challenging the order of the Collector after the latter sent him another notice on 1 July, 1980.

In fact, 350 shops in the city were issued orders to explain why they should not be closed because they were in the vicinity of 75 metres of schools and temples. The liquor vendors were shocked as many of them had only recently renewed their licences without any trouble. Under Sub-rule(2) of Rule 25 of the Bombay Foreign Liquor Rules, as amended in 1979, no licence could be granted in respect of any shop situated within the jurisdiction of any municipal corporation which was within the distance of 75 metres of any educational, religious institution and maternity home.

Justice Mody of the Bombay High Court who heard Ganji's appeal this week, granted an ad-interim injunction pending the admission of the petition. The counsel for the state applied for time to put in an affidavit in reply to oppose admission of the petition. The judge adjourned the matter till 25 July, but directed the respondents without prejudice to the rights and contentions of the parties to remove the seal on the shop and allow the petitioner to carry on his business in the mean while and to return the records seized by them.

Meanwhile the liquor vendors set in motion the wheels of their powerful lobby in the city. Two groups, the Maharashtra Wine Merchants' Association and the Maharashtra Rajya Deshi Daru Vikreta Mahamandal(MRDDVM), met the Chief Minister Mr A.R. Antulay to find out what the order was all about. They also took this opportunity to mint money by raising their prices. There was a scarcity of liquor since 150 shops were actually seized. A bottle which cost between Rs six and Rs seven was sold for Rs 12 after 1 July. The liquor vendors were angry. They alleged that they had made big payoffs to get the licences in the first place. The minimum under-the-table figure was Rs 15,000 and sometimes it went as high as Rs 2 lakhs, where permit rooms were involved. Members of the drinking public were equally incensed. Angry letters to the editor in newspaper columns said "Closing liquor shops on flimsy grounds is not at all surprising. Every year some kind of gimmick is thought up on equally flimsy grounds when a 'settlement' is reached. Last year it was enforcement and subsequent withdrawal of two dry days a week. It doesn't need an astrologer to predict that once the concerned shop owners meet the Government authorities across the table and come to a settlement under the table, the shops will reopen in the very near future."

The bigwigs in the liquor trade like Nandi Kapai of Mohan Meakin, K.C. Kapur of Metro Wines and Pratap Kolhe of Mayur Wines and Killedar and Jaiswal of the MRDDVM met the Chief Minister Mr Antulay. The legislator from South Bombay Mr O.P. Bahl who has a permit room that does roaring business, was also present. They have got a reprieve for two months from 11 July to 10 September on existing conditions. The citizens are waiting for the outcome with curiosity. If liquor vendors get a reprieve and continue in the 75-metre vicinity of temples and schools, then it can mean only one thing, that 'under-the-table business' rivals the flourishing hooch trade.

OLGA TELLIS, Bombay

Misused freedom ?

THE Kerala government has for long been watching the movement of the Police Association with concern. Increasing restlessness and indiscipline among the policemen including the constables and the officers will perhaps be the first major problem which the Left Front government will have to tackle. The agitation was triggered off by the government's decision to transfer the sub-inspector and the two constables on the charge of arresting a person. The Police Association reacted to this sharply and held a meeting to voice protest. The venue of the meeting was a place close to the bus station at Iddukki district.

As a retaliatory measure, the government suspended Rajasekharan Nair and Vijayan, two constables for taking the lead in organising a public meeting against official orders. The head constable of the Armed Reserved Camp, Bhaskaran and two other head constables, Jose Matthew and Feroze Khan who addressed the meeting were transferred. Ironically the Police Association had been launched with the blessings of the Marxist Home Minister, T. K. Ramakrishnan who had little idea that it would ultimately boomerang on him. From its inception there were differences of opinion among the ruling front Parties as to the freedom of the Police Association. A. K. Anthony, the KPCC president had warned that it might lead to indiscipline and trade unionism was the last thing the government would permit. There had been allegations from all quarters against the CPI(M) that it was organising policemen along trade union lines. Although the Party brushed off these allegations yet the slogan 'Inquilab Zindabad' that greeted the Home Minister at the inaugural function of the Police Association corroborates this view. They have also cited a few more instances.

The policemen with their newly achieved freedom were possibly under the impression that their Association was as effective a weapon as any trade union. They had allegedly defied orders from the high-ups especially that of transfer orders. The Association of the constables took another step by charging the officers for harsh behaviour. The officers in turn charged them with insubordination.

Recently the Police Association of Tellichery, northern Kerala, held a meeting to protest against the CPI(M)'s interference in their work. They also met the DIG northern range, Kumaraswamy, and pointed out the inconveniences faced by them because of such interference. Since the CPI(M) took over the home department there has been largescale transfer of police personnel.

Smita Patil, the new glamour girl

THESE days Simple Kapadia is looking after her didi Dimple almost like a mother-hen. But stories continue to circulate about her marriage to Manoj Kaytee, son of the producer of Neeyat in which she has a role. They have been seen going around together a lot , and she has even been mysteriously wearing a mangalsutra. When questioned about it, she has told people, "No Yaar, I am not married.„ May be she thinks wearing a mangalsutra is the in thing to do or maybe she is staying with her parents in spite of marriage. So the mystery of Simple's marriage still remains.

HAVE you seen the way Smita Patil looks in the commercial films? Nothing short of a stunner. With her new glamour, she has created "face-history" ! Already co-stars like Amitabh, who is a perfect match for her, and other heroes are seeing the magic done to their own jaded looks merely by being cast with her. The girls are beginning to squirm in their seats about the definite rise of Smita.

IT IS confirmed news that Dimple has signed on for the grand film Chanakya Chandragupta. The film has been in cold storage for the past two to three years and you only hear of it when a new big star is added to its cast. In the recent past Dimple's entry has been the only new step the film has taken by way of progress.

RAJESH is certainly seeing a lot of Dimple these days. In fact, when a friend jokingly told Dimple that Rajesh is having a roaring affair with his own wife, she threw her head back and laughed in with honest glee, acknowledging the truth of the rumour.

THE last time Amitabh and Shatru got together in a film, which had the word patthhar in its title, along with writers Salim-Javed and the superstar got the first jolt in a fairly smooth reign of a couple of years. The film Kaala Patthar was released and fell on its face.

Now the film, Patthar Ke Log has that strange Amitabh-Shatru-Salim-Javed combination. Amitabh felt wary and it seems he has walked out of the film. Apparently he has date problems and the writer-duo, themselves very insecure, are working on a new strategy: that of getting their scripts filmed within a year to also insure topicality and freshness. So they couldn't possibly wait for the hero who would take his own time. More important perhaps is Shatru's role, which seems to be longer and better than Amitabh's. So the superstar has wisely chosen to step out of it rather than grumble about it later.

DO YOU know that the topmost heroine who has been stripped to her almost-nothings by makers like Raj Kapoor and Feroze Khan, almost dies each time she has to don her skimmy attire? She admits herself that she is basically a shy person and has a lot of hassles before coming in front of the camera dressed — rather undressed — as she does. And as for those hip-swinging dances she is forced to throw in, it is not without embarrassment that she goes through the prescribed steps ! Strange, but true !

Deepa in O Inti Baghotsm

DURING Rathi Agnihotri's recent visit to Bombay a journalist asked her if she was one of the top heroines down South. "I'm the top one," said Rathi. This remark has caused much consternation among her female colleagues. Rathi is no doubt a very successful actress: her three recent films in Tamil, Telugu and Kannada have done remarkably well and she has also signed a couple of big Hindi films opposite Sunil Dutt and Vijay Anand. But a heroine like Sridevi who starred in Guru along with Kamalahasan is doing excellently at the box-office and she's confident that her Johnny opposite Rajnikant will be a super hit too. Sripriya, despite a lean period last year has bounced back into the top bracket. Director J. Mahendran who has just completed Johnny has signed her to act opposite Rajnikant in his next film. She's also there in Devar's new Tamil film. After all, Rathi, for all her charm and grace, has been around only for two years.

DESPITE his many film assignments, actor-producer Sivaji Ganesan is taking an active interest in the production of a historical play on Tippu Sultan. Although it's been a year since his unit has been working on it, it may not be staged before the middle of next year. It's more than three years since Sivaji staged a play. His last play Thangapadakkam was a smashing hit on the screen too. Presently it's being made into a Hindi film by Ramesh Sippy starring Dilip Kumar and Amitabh. It's titled Shakti.

FOLLOWING the success of Guru producers are showing extra enthusiasm in signing Kamalahasan. He's now acting in, apart from a dozen other films, in a Devar film which stars Sripriya. The previous Devar hit starred Rajnikant and Rathi Agnihotri.

KAILASH SARAOGI the man who made a fortune by dubbing Jayabharathy's Malayalam film Man Ka Angan into Hindi is hoping that his next dubbed venture Pratisodh will also be a big hit. But what happened to his dream of making a soft porno film in Hindi with Jayabharathy in it? After her marriage the "sexy" actress refuses to strip, it's reported. Not even for Kailash Saraogi.

WHAT happened to the Hindi version of Shankar Guru in which Amitabh was to enact three roles? The producers seem to have dropped the film after realising the declining popularity of Amitabh. According to director S. Ramanathan, the project is still alive. Incidentally, Amitabh has never clicked in a Madras-made Hindi film . The flop list includes films like Pyar Ki Kahani, Sanjogh and Do Aur Do Paanch.

PRODUCERS and directors come out with strange explanations when their films flop. Solwa Sawan, the Hindi remake of the super hit 16 Vayathinile flopped because it used Bhojpuri lingo apart from miscasting, according to one of its producers. Didn't Dilip use the Bhojpuri dialect in Gunga Jamuna? Did anybody boycot the film because of that?

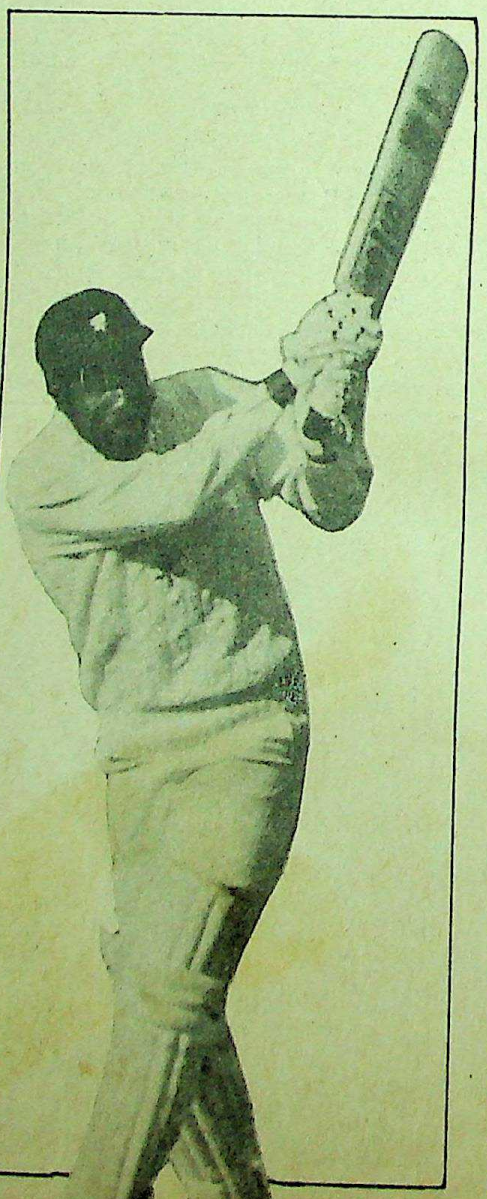
ASHIS RAY from London reports on the latest West Indian batting wonder, Vivian Richards



IT was in 1943 that Christopher Columbus discovered the island of Antigua. Set over 108 square miles in the heart of the Caribbean sea, it had been a much fought for prize between Spain, France and England. But, except for a brief occupancy by the French, it has always remained British, currently enjoying a dominion status of sorts.

The population in Antigua is only 75,000 and the terrain quite typical of the region—partly volcanic, partly coral surrounded by superb sandy white beaches, which are almost entirely reef-protected and with the replenishment of sunshine, ideal for swimming, snorkelling and all forms of acquatic recreations. In fact, very much in consonance with the territories in this area, the main industry is tourism and the island is generally teeming with American and European visitors all the year round. But contrary to the character of the neighbouring nations, Antigua, traditionally, has not staked claims of being a nerve-centre of real competitive sport, nor, in the past, has it boasted of exceptional talent in major games. Not even cricket, which is as synonymous with this part of the world as calypsoes and Reggae music. Indeed, even ten years ago, the island did not figure in the regular rota of first class touring engagements.

However, in 1971 a coaching body in St John's — capital of Antigua—picked two boys just out of Grammar School for a six week course at Alf Gover's institute in London— Anderson Roberts, a fast bowler, and Vivian Richards, a batsman. "It was bitterly cold. We were very lonely," the latter recalls in his book. "Once we went to see Arsenal play Leeds at Highbury. That was the highlight of the stay." But sharp and receptive, he also picked up useful tips relating to his batting. Gover, quick to size up the admixture of rare ability nurtured on hard wickets, refrained from altering Richards' basic approach but advised him to "keep his bat nearer his pads." Richards never forgot the suggestion, making it infinitely difficult for bowlers, since, to drive a hole in his technique.

ISAAC Vivian Alexander Richards was born in a wooden house in St John's on 7 March, 1952. His lofty standards he imbibed from his father, a prison officer and cricketing all-rounder for the island. "He taught me dominance," he says, "the idea of 'well played' was not convincing to him." As for his gentleness, this he inherited from his mother and so ingrained is this trait in his personality that his answer to any provocation is infrequently with abuse or physical violence, but with temperate yet hardhitting methods. In the cricket field, it is inevitably with the bat, although quite recently he was noticed muttering at Bob Willis, when a bit of "aggro" took place at Old Trafford, laced as it was with an incredible offensive with the willow.

This quiet defiance he also demonstrated when deciding to take up cricket as a career. His father wanted him to emigrate to New York and settle for an office job which would pay him enough for night school. But without refusing the offer, he stuck to his inclination and no one will disagree that it was the right choice. It was, perhaps, based on the sure knowledge of his knack for the game — a conclusion he must have reached not merely from his showing in first class cricket, but also from the way he had performed in the makeshift circumstances of his boyhood. Referring to the one-against-one cricket he would play with his brother, Mervyn, in the dirt-yard behind their house when he was very young, Richards remarks: "We would try to keep the ball down because if you hit it over the fence you would collect six runs, but you would be out maan, because there were wild dogs waiting on the other side." Needless to say, he would emerge from the fray more successfully as he would even in larger company and a broader setting: "Everybody wanted a game and it was every man for himself. If a fielder ran a batsman out or caught a ball on one hop, you were out and he went into bat. It was a sweet game. You'd have upwards of 15 people round the bat, so you didn't take many chances."

RICHARDS' first class debut was for Leeward Island against Windward Island in 1971; in the same season he turned out for the Combined Islands in the Shell Shield. A year later he was "spotted" by Colin Cowdrey, who mentioned the lad in an article in The Cricketer and that paved the way for a certain Len Creed to rope him in for the Lansdowne Club in Bath for the following summer. This, as was to be expected, proved to be only a stepping stone; Somerset soon sensed a valuable asset in Richards and signed him up for the 1974 semester. And to this day he has remained loyally with this county. Somerset have the unique distinction of bearing in their ranks, at one time or the other, the three most distinguished batsmen of the present era—Greg Chappell, Vivian Richards and Sunil Gavaskar. But among them, the West Indian has, unarguably, rendered them the best service, notably in the one-day games. Thrice he has won the 'Gillette Man of the Match' award, an equal number of times he has picked up the 'Benson & Hedges Gold' award. Last year, with an innings of 117 in the Gillette Cup final and several timely efforts in the John Player Sunday league, he steered his side to first-ever victories in the two tourneys. In the Schweppes County Championship, his most remarkable essay erupted in 1977 when he accumulated 2,161 runs at an average of 65.48.

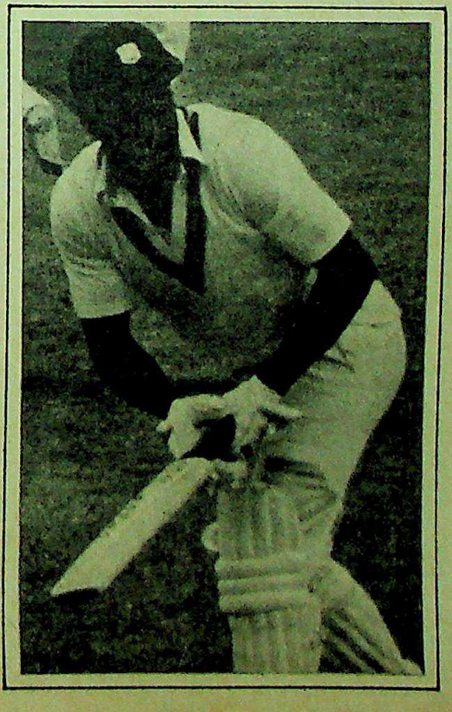
His performance for West Indies has been even more impressive. He set the ball rolling with an undefeated knock of 192 at the Ferozeshah Kotla in only his second test and, his display in the series overall, left no one in doubt about his future prospects. True, he was in some difficulty negotiating the terrifying propensities of Dennis Lillie and Jeff Thomson in Australia in 1975-76. But by the end of that confrontation had gained the measure of the threat, notching up almost two centuries in the ultimate encounter at Adelaide. So much so that Queensland extended to him a contract to play in the Sheffield Shield the next winter. Back home, he plundered three centuries against India in no more than four Tests. Admittedly, Syed Kimani's shoddy work behind the stumps contributed immensely towards the flourish, but in the periods when he was on top, Richards looked most permanent. Moreover, this gave way to a run-riot in England, where he posted 829 runs despite missing one of the five tests — the fourth highest aggregate in a series in the history of cricket. And contained in the havoc were three hundreds, including a top-score of 291 at The Oval. Indeed, in 1976, Richards had registered 1,710 runs for the calendar year—an all-time record which was later broken by Sunil Gavaskar.

AFTER only a couple of Tests against Bobby Simpson's Australians, the world of "establishment" cricket, perforce, lost this master-batsman to Kerry Packer and it was not until the Prudential Cup last year that he resurfaced on the conventional stage. But a word on his feats in World Series Cricket. The contests under its auspices, as is well known, were conspicuous for their low scores. Whether this was because of the unsuitability of the artificial wickets or because of the insurmountability of tackling genuine fast bowlers in floodlit conditions, Richards' pre-eminence remained unscathed. Versus the WSC Australians alone—and this represented, if not anything else, an international-class bowling attack—he hit up 1,786 runs in fourteen "super tests" spread over two seasons.

His return to the official West Indian fold was as riproaring, if not more so. A memorable unbeaten 138 in the Prudential Cup final against England last summer was his "gift" to the tournament and, apart from the several glorious strokes he executed in course of this innings, his parting shot—a towering improvised six to square leg off an attempted yorker from Chris Old—really set the seal on his genius. Six months later, unfortunately for Australia, he improved on this form and tormented the bowlers there no end. He was plagued by a thigh injury from the very beginning of the tour, but overcame the handicap to provide a murderous 153 at Melbourne and quite a swashbuckling 62 at Sydney against the hosts in the triangular one-day internationals. Even for the third competitors—England — there was no escape. An unconquered 85 at Brisbane making sure of that. And in the Tests, scores of 140, 96, 76 and 74 in as many outings, need no elaboration though it was not the number of runs he piled up, but the manner in which he got them that bespoke his class and calibre as a batsman. Never since that battering by Garfield Sobers in 1971-72, when he was still of tender age and lacking in experience has Dennis Lillie been treated the way he was in his last encounter with Richards. To go forward change your mind and square cut a man of Lillie's pace and control over "movement" is considered impossible. And that was not the only innovation to be witnessed; hobbling about, impaired in his running between the wickets, Richards was compelled to go for boundaries and as a result uncoiled many a stroke, which left the bowlers and the fieldsmen both leaden-footed and staring in disbelief.

NOW, on to this summer. After an unfamiliar bad patch in the Shell Shield games, Richards was by no means his vintage self in the matches leading up to the Tests against England. Indeed, his lack-lustre portrayal in the one-day internationals gave rise to much elation in the English camp. But came the first Test and the sparks began to fly all over again. At Trent Bridge he was the only batsman on either side to score runs in both innings. Then, in one of the most ruthless exhibitions to be seen in recent times, he blasted 149 in the second Test at Lord's and, in the Mecca itself, installed himself as "king". There followed a most savage onslaught on Willis at Old Trafford and the much advertised plan to just contain him had misfired totally.



It is obvious that Richards is able to "read" a bowler a split second earlier than most others. How does he achieve it? Rather simple, if one accepts his view: "Really, I concentrate only on the bowler's arm. I dont't care which way he runs in or if he bowls over or around the wicket, or the way he uses the crease or his feet. Nothing. Just the arm." An exceptional coordination of the eye and body movement, an ideal physique — 5ft 11 ins height, 13 st 5 lbs weight, muscular arms and a broad chest narrowing down to a 32-inch waist — are his attributes. But what really is the extent of his devastation? His Somerset colleague and former Cambridge University captain Peter Roebulk offers an assessment: "Viv can murder any bowling at any time, but he needs some spark or reason first. He'll always succeed on the big occasion, except perhaps when he is trying too hard, and he'll fail when it doesn't matter." In Test cricket at least Richards has known no failure. Only occasionally, less success.

AND what about the man? His ruggedly handsome face is blemished by scars on his left temple and cheek-bone — a damage inflicted when he tried to prevent a man from jumping a post office queue (he was hit by an iron pipe and broke his left little finger). But it takes nothing away from a cheerful and charming countenance. He is also modest and never ignorant about his debt to the past. Other than that he has a taste for fine clothes, likes speeding in expensive cars, enjoys jazz clubs and discotheques where he normally spends time till the early hours, sleeps till late in the mornings and, more often than not, avoids breakfast. But that gum chewing, lackadaisical walk up to the wicket, the bored look on his face while batting are highly deceptive indexes of his attitude; his seriousness is second to none.

Politics is not exactly Richards' cup of tea. But he never conceals his respect for Muhammad Ali and what this boxer stands for. Nor does he hide his militant pride in his colour and his people and, if the question ever arises, will probably refuse to play against a country having links with South Africa. He has never forgiven Yorkshire for the racist comments from the crowds and if he can help it, always puts his best foot forward against them. He loves Somerset, but remains extremely attached to Antigua. That is where his fiancee comes from and that is where he intends to settle down once his playing days are over. Antigua and Antiguans reciprocate this feeling. The little island is no longer an obscure speck in the world of cricket. It has slowly and surely asserted its importance in the Caribbean sporting circle, thanks to the dynamism of Roberts and Richards, especially the latter's. Next winter when England go to the West Indies, St John's will have the honour of staging its first-ever Test match.

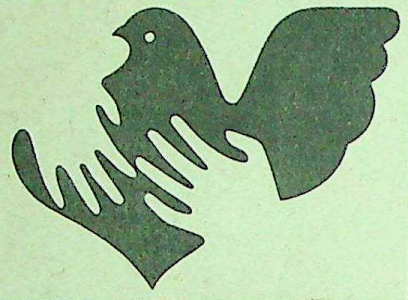
A precariously free Press

Civil Liberties



By A. G. NOORANI

THE concept of freedom of the Press commands ready acceptance but is only vaguely understood. Its implications come into sharp focus only in actual practice, especially when borderline cases arise. Some of the implications have been spelt out by the Supreme Court.

Unlike the US Constitution which lays down, in the First Amendment, that "Congress shall make no law...abridging the freedom of speech or of the press", the Constitution of India makes no such express provision. However, Article 19(1) (a) provides that "all citizens shall have the right to freedom of speech and expression" and the Supreme Court ruled in 1950 in Romesh Thapar's case that "there can be no doubt that freedom of speech and expression includes freedom of propagation of ideals, and that freedom is ensured by the freedom of circulation."

The court struck down the order of the Madras government which had banned the entry into the state of the weekly Crossroads. It upheld the view that liberty of circulation is as essential to Press freedom as the liberty of speech. In another case decided in 1950 the court ruled that imposition of pre-censorship on a journal is by itself a violation of the liberty of the Press.

Seven years later, however, the court upheld a Punjab Act empowering the State government, for a period not exceeding two months, to prohibit publication of "any matter relating to a particular subject". The court had in mind inflammatory publications in conditions of communal strife but, as Mr M. C. Setalvad remarked, "It was somewhat disheartening to see the court upholding the conferment of such a power though its exercise was left solely to the subjective determination of the Executive." It is an unfortunate ruling which, one hopes, will be revised some day.

In the Express Newspapers case the court ruled that no measure can be enacted which would have the effect of imposing a pre-censorship curtailing the circulation or restricting the choice of employment or unemployment in the editorial force." The court upheld the Working Journalists (Conditions of Service) and Miscellaneous Provisions Act, 1955 as a measure essentially for the benefit of working journalists which did not affect the freedom of the Press by reason of the greater financial burden it imposed on newspaper owners or otherwise.

Later, in the Sakal's case the court held unconstitutional the Newspaper (Price and Page) Act which regulated the number of pages and prices of newspapers. It rejected the argument that the act imposed reasonable restrictions on the business of publishing newspapers and fell within Article 19(2) (6) which enables the state to impose, in the interests of the general public, reasonable restrictions on the right to carry on a business. "It may well be within the power of the State to place in the interests of the general public, restriction upon the right of a citizen to carry on business but it is not open to the State to achieve this object by directly and immediately curtailing any other freedom of that citizen guaranteed by the Constitution and which is not susceptible of abridgement on the same grounds as are set out in Clause (6) of Article 19 (regarding a business). Therefore, the right of freedom of speech cannot be taken away with the object of placing restrictions on the business activities of a citizen." If the law interfered with the freedom of circulation the fact that "its object was to suppress monopolies and prevent unfair practices is of no assistance."

The last of the series is the Bennett Coleman case decided in 1972 in which the court, by a majority of 4:1, held the Import Policy for Newsprint 1972-73 void. Mr Justice K. K. Mathew dissented. Four features of the policy were questioned. First, no new edition of a newspaper could be started by a common ownership unit even within the authorised quota of newsprint. Secondly, there was a limitation on the maximum number of pages—ten. No adjustment was permitted between circulation and the pages so as to increase the pages. Thirdly, no inter-changeability was permitted between different papers of common ownership unit or different editions of the same paper. Fourthly, allowance of 20 per cent increase in page level up to a maximum of ten was given to newspapers with less than ten pages.

The issue was whether it all added up to newsprint control or newspaper control. Rationing of newsprint is newsprint control. But restriction after the quota is assigned could well be newspaper control. The majority held that "Government could not determine thus which newspaper should grow in page and circulation and which newspaper should grow only in circulation and not in pages. Freedom of press entitles newspapers to achieve any volume of circulation. Though requirements of newspapers as to page and circulation are both taken into consideration for fixing their quota, the newspapers should be thereafter left free to adjust their page number and circulation as they wish in accordance with the dictates of Article 19 (1) (a) of the Constitution."

Mr Justice Mathew dissented. He remarked: "A claim to enlarge the volume of speech by diminishing the circulation raises the problem of reconciling the citizen's right to unfettered exercise of speech in volume with the community's right to undiminished circulation. Both rights fall within the ambit of the concept of freedom of speech. I would prefer to give more weight to the community's claim here especially as I think that the claim to enlarge the volume of speech at the expense of circulation is not for exercising the freedom of speech guaranteed by article 19(1) (a) but for commercial advertisement for revenue which will not fall within the ambit of that sub-article."

One hopes the new Press Commission will recommend making freedom of the Press a fundamental right by itself instead of leaving it to be spelt out from the right to freedom of speech and expression. Press freedom is the right of the institution; free speech of the individual. A citizen, for instance, may not demand access to prisons. But have we not reached a stage where prisons should be thrown open to inspection by the Press subject to certain regulations?

LIVING

Slap-stick

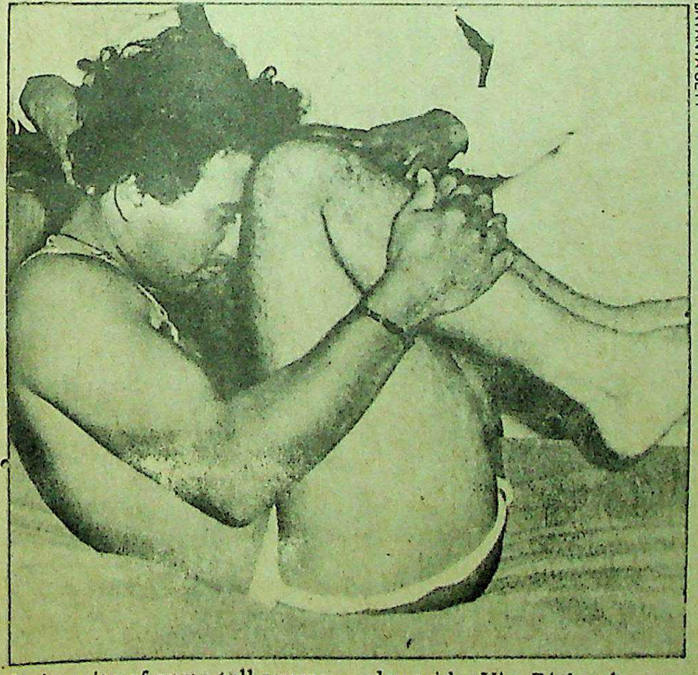
Professor Bhattacharya of BE College, near Calcutta had visitors at his first floor apartment recently. The time was around 8.30 pm and it was the professor's 10-year-old son, Sumit, who answered the knock on the front door. Three miscreants barged into the apartment while Sumit yelled, "Daddy, there is someone with a gun !" The professor was studying and his wife, Roma Bhattacharya, was engrossed in her needlework.

They received the visitors well enough, conceding their demand that no one should raise an alarm. But the hospitality of the Bhattacharyas was shortlived. Roma dashed forward, pushed aside her husband and planted herself between him and the man who was brandishing a revolver. Sumit looked fearfully as another man flourished his bhojali. And then Roma let fly a resounding slap at the man with the gun. Taking the cue from his mistress, the family dog pounced on the three visitors. The alarm had inadvertently been raised and the three "visitors" bolted. A slap in the face, if there ever was one.

Peaches on the beaches

Baina was once a lovely beach in the port town of Vasco da Gama; it is now Goa's single largest brothel with over 600 prostitutes doing brisk business. According to a subdivisional police officer, these prostitutes are the main identifiable source of income for Vasco da Gama's clothiers, cinema houses, bars and restaurants, hotels, cabs, chemists, doctors and, of all people, pujaris. So the authorities are turning a blind eye. And why not. They argue that there are times when 30 ship-loads of insatiable sailors invade Vasco da Gama; imagine the havoc that might be wrought if the good women of Baina were not there !

Sunil spins—a yarn



JAYANTA SETT

So in spite of some tall scores and a reasonably good season with Somerset, Sunil Gavaskar has decided against another summer in England. Not quite his brand of cricket it seems. Sunil had some regrets though: "I'm so disappointed I won't be playing alongside Viv Richards next season. That would have been a deadly combination !" And then, realising that he wasn't being modest and remembering his image, he quipped: "I'm talking about his off-spinners and my leg-spinners of course".

Phoney burial

Illustration /Ahi Bhusan Malik

Ever heard of a telephone being buried? Well, this is precisely what S. Srinivasan, a subscriber to the Delhi Telephones, has decided to do. Reason: his telephone, in spite of repeated requests for repair, has been "dead" for a long time and therefore an honourable burial is only befitting. The instrument, reports Saumitra Banerjee, will be buried within the premises of the Karol Bagh Telephone Exchange. And Srinivasan, having made all necessary arrangements, has also written an interesting letter to the general manager of Delhi Telephones. In it he has claimed that his telephone used to stop "breathing every now and then and this time it failed to revive".

Bachelor boy: not the way to stay

Rizk Ram created another stir in the Haryana Assembly recently. Earlier, this Congress (I) MLA from Sonepat had unravelled the Immortal Ploy (Sunday, 17 August) of Chief Minister Bhajan Lal. This time, visibly troubled by the growing incidence of rape in the country, he demanded legislation to make marriage compulsory for all young men of 24 and above. This, according to him, was the only way in which the problem of rape could be solved.

'Kiss-n-go'

Calcutta's traffic police have decided to encourage the "kiss-and-go" system. Yes, you read correctly: "kiss-and-go". This means that the office-going husbands who have cars will be expected to have their wives drop them to office every morning. Then wives can drive back home.

Joint commissioner of traffic, S. K. Ramachandran, who has just returned from abroad after studying traffic problems, apparently hit upon this idea and feels it to be the solution to the city's traffic problem which has reached a "point of no return". He argues that the idea is successful enough in the USA. Actually we are left speechless at the stupidity of this enterprise. Question: How many office-goers in Calcutta have cars ? Question: How many wives know how to drive?
Question: Anybody know the price of fuel ? Question: Is Calcutta being run by a Marxist government? Question: Why are such lunatic suggestions made?

Beginning August 31
This week the Sun, Mercury and Jupiter are all assembled in a single house. Saturn alone is in Virgo, Mars and Uranus are in Libra, Neptune is in Scorpio, Kethu is in Capricorn, Venus is in Gemini, Rahu alone is in Cancer. The moon will be moving through Taurus, Gemini and Cancer from Aries.

ARIES (March 21 — April 20) Guard against trickery and deception in money matters. You will incur medical expense. Your health needs attention. A new friendship may develop this week. You are advised to utilise your energy and initiative in your work. Success will depend on a vitally important decision which you will have to make by the end of the week. Be careful in your dealings with persons in authority. Good dates: 1,3,4, and 7. Lucky numbers: 2,3 and 7. Favourable direction: North TAURUS (April 21 — May 22) Your work provides you with hope and confidence initially. But in the end you will not be satisfied with the results of your efforts. You will be faced with some perplexing problems as a result of sudden, unexpected events which would be beyond your control. You are therefore advised to follow your hunches, especially in business matters. Be cautious and do not rely on speculative enterprise. Good dates: 2,4 and 31. Lucky numbers: 2,4 and 6. Favourable direction: South.

GEMINI (May 23 — June 21) Fortune will come your way this week. But you are advised to take care in business, legal and property matters. Dealings with elders should also be handled carefully. Your domestic life will be very peaceful. Take interest in the letters you receive and reply to them as they will be helpful to you later on. Do not be afraid to adopt novel ideas in business, but beware of arousing hostility through impulsive actions. This week is not favourable for romance. Good dates: 1,2,4 and 6. Lucky numbers: 1,3 and 5. Favourable direction: West.

CANCER (June 22 — July 22) The first three days of this week are bound to be cheerful as you will gain substantially in business. There are indications of success and happiness, especially with the help of younger people. Elders, on the other hand, may cause you anxiety. The time is good for attempting new schemes. New friends, fresh interests, successful changes and travel are foreseen. Some of your unfinished ventures are likely to materialise. Good dates: 2,3,5 and 6. Lucky numbers: 4,7 and 8. Favourable direction: South-east.

LEO (July 23 — August 22) You are indeed very swift and serious in your actions, yet you will suffer from an acute shortage of funds. You may have to go in for new loans. There may be other difficulties as well which you will have to face with faith, patience and self-confidence. Do not be dismayed by slow progress and indifferent health. Avoid dejection and that will help you to overcome your present problems. Good dates: 4,6 and 31. Lucky number 8. Favourable direction: North.

VIRGO (August 23 — September 22) Face good and evil with uprightness and wisdom. Your professional and social activities are well signified this week. Follow new business methods without any hesitation but at the same time exercise some caution. Your domestic life might be troubled by one or two awkward problems concerning womenfolk. Some unreasonable opposition to your plans is to be expected. Therefore think before taking the advice of an elder person or a member of the opposite sex. Good dates: 3,4 and 6. Lucky numbers: 3,6 and 9. Favourable direction: West.

LIBRA (September 23 — October 22) This is a lucky week for you. Your finances will increase, often unexpectedly, through speculation or secret means. Your social and professional affairs are well signified. Follow your intuitions in professional matters. Courtship and marriage are best deferred this week. Be careful of deception by a member of the opposite sex. Do not be afraid of or hesitant in adopting new professional methods as these will bring good returns in the future. Good dates: 1, 3, 6 and 31.Lucky numbers: 1, 4 and 6.Favourable direction: South-west.

SCORPIO (October 23 — November 21)A week full of tension. Your home front will not be as calm and peaceful as you think. Your servants or subordinates might betray you. Gradual improvement in financial matters, are expected. A journey is the answer to some of your delicate problems. At all costs, avoid controversy with your parents, partners or spouses. This is not a good week for speculation, gambling or sports.Good dates: 3, 4 and 5.Lucky numbers: 1, 3 and 10.Favourable direction: North.

SAGITTARIUS (November 22 — December 22) You will work restlessly this week and, as a result, succeed in gaining a contract which will be to your advantage. This week is also good for love, matrimonial and speculative affairs. An old friend will come to your rescue in a matter of great importance. Do not hesitate to take his help or advice. Take this opportunity to plan new ventures and try and finish incomplete jobs. You may have to cancel a journey at the last moment. Your social affairs are well signified.Good dates: 3, 5, 21 and 31.Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 7.Favourable direction: South-west.

CAPRICORN (December 23 — January 20) Substantial financial gains will outweigh your previous losses. But in matters relating to love and matrimony the greatest caution must be exercised. A letter from a distant place will bring you good tidings. Do not, at any costs, be complacent this week. Good dates: 2, 3, 4 and 6.Lucky numbers: 4, 7 and 9.Favourable direction: East.

AQUARIUS (January 21 — February 19) Your financial and business affairs make steady, though not exactly rapid, progress. Domestic life is also well signified. But do not let your domestic affairs interfere with your business or financial matters. Be careful in your dealings with seniors or those in authority as well as members of the opposite sex. Take the advice of friends in such crucial matters but the decision should eventually be yours.Good dates: 2, 4, 5 and 6.Lucky numbers: 3, 6 and 9.Favourable direction: South.

PISCES (February 20 — March 20) Good and steady progress in all your important affairs will earn you a lot of praise and appreciation from friends and relatives. Your domestic life may not be too satisfactory. womenfolk might create problems for you. The health of an elder member of the family may also cause anxiety. But be patient and do not hesitate in spending money as when necessary. Pay attention to service details.Good dates: 2, 4, 5 and 31.Lucky numbers: 4, 7 and 8.Favourable direction: West.

CALCUTTA: A Japanese tourist used karate and injured three people on S. N. Banerjee Road in Central Calcutta on Monday (4 August) evening after he had picked up a quarrel with a group. They had objected to the tourist taking photographs of some bathers at a roadside tap. A senior police official said on Tuesday (5 August) that two tourists were taking photographs of half a dozen people taking bath at the tap. A medical representative objected, saying that there were so many other objects of interest in the city. One of the tourists hit him in the face with a karate kick, and knocked off three of his teeth. When two others went to the rescue of the man they met with a similar fate. Then, a large group of people gathered and took the tourist to a police station. The second tourist made off in the melee. The police informed the Japanese consulate— The Statesman (C. P. BANGALORE: As the noisy debate on the violence in Dharwar District was going on Education Minister G. B. Shankara Rao dozed off for a few minutes. Mr M. C. Perumal (C-U) who was then attacking the Government for its inaction, pointed his finger at the sleeping Minister and shouted: "This is how the Government is sleeping". Mr Rao was woken up by his colleagues. Members had a hearty laugh and made several digs at him. Incidentally, Mr Rao comes from Dharwar District and is the Minister in charge of the district. Earlier, several members had wanted him to rush to the riot-torn areas and help bring the situation under control. His reaction was: "What should I do there? (Ladhhai war)"— Indian Express (Muthuraj. G., Chamaraja Nagar)

UJJAIN: The face of the vice-chahcellor of Vikram University was blackened by students of a local college. According to university sources, about 100 students of Madhav College yesterday (30 July) entered the office of the vice-chancellor, Mr P. N. Kavthekar, and blackened his face with the ink of a duplicating machine. By the time the police arrived on the scene, students had escaped. The students had been demanding the filling up of the post of college principal and other teaching staff—Times of India (Laxman Nihalchandani, New Delhi)

NEW DELHI: At a recent, informal lunch in New Delhi, a senior Union Cabinet Minister sat chatting to a group of journalists. The food was lavish. One of his chamchas ventured feebly, "Aajkal ye rape ke bare me kafi charcha ho raha hai." It was an unsavoury topic, especially when the food was delicious. But, in his inimitable style, the Union Minister retorted, "Ye sab bakwas hai. Rape to hazaro saal se ho raha hai, aur aakhir aurat to bhogne ki cheez hai." There was mild, approving laughter. Then the topic drifted. One of the women around began to talk about the food habits of her dog: "Jimmy to aajkal ek dam meat pasand nahi karta hai." Another replied half-seriously, "To chicken khilaiya." The Union Cabinet Minister was one of those to troop down to Baghpat in Western U. Game of the Month: A touch of class

There is a certain almost undefinable quality which some players clearly have and others equally clearly lack, commonly known as class. It is perhaps not so much the ability to achieve near perfection, as the ability to make it seem easy. It was the nonchalance with which Muhammad Ali made trained fighters look like inebriated gorillas which impressed the world of boxing so much, rather than his mere ability to duck a punch. Similarly in chess it is difficult enough to beat one of the best players in the world, but to do so as if giving a lesson to a talented 15-year-old is a clear demonstration of class.

I give the following game as an illustration. Note the simplicity and power of White's play, and particularly the total absence of threats. It is as if Black spends the entire game swinging into thin air only to be floored by his opponent's first punch. By the way, in case you have any doubts may I assure you that the player of the black pieces Yuri Balashov, is one of the strongest grand masters in the Soviet Union and, arguably, in the world.

White: W. Hübner. Black: Y. Balashov Rio de Janeiro 1979. English Opening

1. P—QB4, P—K4; 2. N—QB3, P—Q3; 3. P—Q4, White is willing to lose some time with his queen in order to gain space in the centre.

3. . . P x P; 4. Q x P, N—QB3; 5. Q—Q2, N—B3; 6. P—QN3, B—K3; 7. P—K4. To prevent the freeing . . . P—Q4.

14N—Q5! Positionally very strong. If ever the knight is taken White recaptures with the BP both increasing his advantage in space and opening up the possibility of applying pressure on the QB file.

14. . . N—B4; 15. P—QN4, N—R5; 16. Q—B2, N—K4; 17. N(2)—B4, B—Q2; 18. R—K1, P—QB3; 19. N—K3, N—N5; 20. R—N3. Preventing any possible invasion of his QB3 square and preparing one day to triple on the Q file.

20. . . Q—K2; 21. R—Q1, N x N; 22. B x N, B—N5; 23. R—Q2, P—KN4?! Becoming desperate for counterplay. White was threatening a gradual build-up on the QP with P—KR3, R(3)—Q3 and Q—Q1.

24. N—K2, B x N; 25. R x B, Q—B3; 26. R—Q2, B—B6; 27. P—KR3! Refuting Black's play with almost arrogant simplicity. With the back row weakness eliminated Black's counterplay fizzles out.

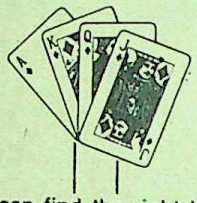
bridge



SEE if you can find the right lead on this hand, held by West in the Cavendish Invitation Pairs:

♠ 7 5 ♥ K J 10 5 ♦ J 4 2 ♣ 8 6 5 3

Both sides are vulnerable and the bidding has been:

SOUTH	WEST	NORTH	EAST
1 ♣	No	1 ♦	1 ♥
1 ♠	2 ♥	2 ♠	No
4 ♠	No	No	dble
No	No	No

The significant call is East's double of Four Spades. He cannot have much in the trump suit and cannot be confident of making any tricks in hearts, which have been supported. So the double must ask for an abnormal lead. Correct—a club. This was the full deal:

	♠ J 6 3 2 ♥ 6 2 ♦ K Q 5 ♣ A 9 7 2
♠ 7 5 ♥ K J 10 5 ♦ J 4 2 ♣ 8 6 5 3	N W E S	♠ 10 9 4 ♥ A 8 7 4 3 ♦ A 10 9 8 7 ♣ —
	♠ A K Q 8 ♥ Q 9 ♦ 6 3 ♣ K Q J 10 4

Manfield, West, led the 8 of clubs, indicating that his entry was in hearts. Woolsey ruffed and returned a low heart to the Queen and King. After another club ruff he took his two Aces, judging rightly that 500 would produce an excellent score. This result helped them to win the event, which carries the biggest cash prize in bridge.

Events at another table provided an ironical comparison. The bidding was the same, including the final double, but here Judy Radin led the King of hearts, expecting to hold the first trick and to decide on her next action after seeing the dummy. When her partner dropped the 3, she switched to a club. East ruffed and, instead of cashing both red Aces to ensure one down, returned a low heart. A surprised declarer won with the Queen and so made Four Hearts doubled.

ONE of Iceland's earliest inhabitants, the Arctic fox, is portrayed on a new 90-kronor stamp. It is believed to have been the only terrestrial mammal in the island when the first settlers arrived towards the end of the 8th century. Another recent stamp features the Icelandic dog, a descendant of dogs introduced by 9th century Norse colonists. Iceland is one of the countries whose stamps are listed and priced in the new Stanley Gibbons catalogue Scandinavia (150 pp, £6). This also includes the issues of the Danish West Indies before they were sold to the United States in 1916 and of the Faroe Islands, which have been issuing their own stamps only since 1975, although surcharged Danish stamps were used there during the British occupation of 1940-45. Useful features of the new catalogue include a priced list of Swedish stamp booklets issued since 1904 and an index to the designs of Swedish pictorial and portrait stamps. Among the rarest stamps are those issued in Finland in 1856, when the country was a Grand Duchy of the Tsarist empire. Their prices range up to £5,000 each. A few of the early Swedish stamps are almost as expensive.

STATE BEFORE PARTY

CONGRESS(I) MPs from Karnataka are very angry with Mr Pranab Mukherjee. The reason? The Minister is not allocating a steel plant immediately to Vijaynagar. At one point, so agitated were Mr Lakappa and a few other Congress(I) MPs that they rushed towards the Minister who holds temporary charge of the Steel and Mines portfolio during a calling attention motion in the Lok Sabha. They virtually gheraoed him on the floor of the house, demanding a steel plant there and then. It was quite unusual to see a Minister being treated in such a fashion by his own Partymen so openly. When Mr Mukherjee failed to quieten his Party colleagues, he left the house in a huff.

BUREAUCRAT-STHAN

MR JAGANNATH PAHADIA is behaving like an ostrich. He has no contact with his Partymen and no rapport with the bureaucracy also. Just after the Assembly elections this year when he was elected to lead the Rajasthan Legislature Party, he had promised to seek the cooperation of all sections of society. However, he took more than a month to negotiate a settlement with the striking sweepers of Jaipur. Besides, only three Ministers and five Deputy Ministers had been appointed till the time of writing. Even these Ministers do not have much work. And the bureaucrats are having a heyday as the Chief Minister is able to exercise little control over them.

ONE-UPMANSHIP

JOBS OF DISCORD

THERE are always two sides to a coin. So it may now seem to Sukhbans Kaur Bhinder, the parliamentarian-wife of the police commissioner of Delhi. As reported in this column earlier, the voters in her Lok Sabha constituency, Gurdaspur, were given the bounty of a recruitment drive of the Delhi Police after her husband became the capital's police chief. On 14 March a team of Delhi Police officers, comprising one deputy commissioner, one inspector and three head constables held interviews and selected some 300 new recruits for the Delhi Police from the Gurdaspur area. But while these 300 were satisfied, at least three times that number, who did not get jobs, were unhappy. This recruitment drive has now become a bone of contention in the district Congress (I) politics. It has been alleged that the recruitment drive was restricted to only three centres in the district—Gurdaspur, Dhariwal and Kanhuwan—because Mrs Bhinder's favourites were to be given Vidhan Sabha tickets from these three segments of her constituency.

OVERZEALOUS MOTHER

SOME of the prominent youth activists of the Congress(I) who are sympathetic to Maneka Gandhi say that her mother, Mrs Amteshwar Anand, is the biggest handicap in her bid to become the political successor to Sanjay Gandhi. Mrs Anand seems to be in too big a hurry, and both her haste and her coterie of friends are doing more harm than good to Maneka. They have indulged in pretty pernicious mudslinging against Rajiv Gandhi, Sonia Gandhi and V. C. Shukla. In the last week of July several rounds of meetings were held at Mrs Anand's residence at which some handpicked Delhi journalists were also present. One allegation that was circulated goes like this: "The fact that Rajiv Gandhi's wife Sonia holds a foreign passport has also discouraged fierce lobbying (for) his advent into politics, for years of experience have shown that (our) countrymen would never repose complete trust in a man whose wife is an out and out foreigner."

As the sun sets, it's time we turned to a very serious side of life: the question of taking it easy!

To make it easy for you to know when the sun has set and the time is ripe for some fun, HMT have fashioned: THE AFTER HOURS.

One look at them and you'll know the evening is wide open to possibilities. Because each watch has a very telling face–exuding that suppressed merriment, that party sparkle.

Ask for any watch from THE AFTER HOURS collection.

Available at all HMT watch showrooms and shops in variations suitable for all hands.

Ladies as well as gents.

Come. It's time you relaxed.

If you've the inclination, we've the time!

Judge and saviour

Why did police inspector Arkhit Behera treat the little child Nandi so barbarously ("Nandi's tale of torture," 31 August)? Justice Kunja Behari Panda took the right step by keeping the little girl in his custody and breaking the story of her plight. Had he not chanced upon Nandi, the little girl would have fallen into the cruel hands of other exploiters.
K. V. Satish, Gulbarga, Karnataka

A monarchy

I read "Our callous rulers" (24 August) by Chandra Shekhar. It is true that "now there is little difference between a democratic rule and a personalised one in our country." The indispensable element of a democracy, a strong opposition, has been completely lost. In fact, we are more a "constitutional monarchy in which the parliament is worthless" than "a secular socialist democratic republic."
Bishnu Prasad Dash, Cuttack

Mr Chandra Shekhar's article is moving. Double standards in public life are dangerous for a country. Thanks to the machinations of so-called democrats, Indian democracy is in peril. Our politicians' greed for power and office is almost inhuman.
Bhaskar, Hajipur, Bihar

Room enough

"His life was no song" (31 August) by Kishore Chatterjee is more of a comparison between the last days of Beethoven and Debabrata (George) Biswas. The author frequently uses the word 'dirty' to describe the room in which the uncrowned king of Rabindrasangeet lived. I had been to Georgeda'sone-room flat on Rashbehari Avenue a couple of times, but never found it dirty or suffocating, although it was stacked with books, files, medicines etc.
Pradip Choudhury, Durgapur

Dishonourable members

Congratulations for publishing Mr Arun Shourie's explanation to the speaker of the Lok Sabha in response to the contempt charge against him.("Who do legislators think they are?" 31 August) As far as insults to the dignity and honour of Parliament and legislatures are concerned, MPs and MLAs are the worst offenders. Switching loyalties, hurling abuses and coming to blows with each other, taking bribes and betraying voters' trust damages their reputation far more than any journalistic expose. Legislators do not deserve any privileges, unless they are true to their oaths.
E. P. Menon, Bangalore

Mr Shourie presented a correct picture of our legislators and did a grand job of bringing to light their actions and attitudes.
R. Ranjan, Asansol

The article is an eye-opener to all citizens of India who blindly cast their votes in elections.
M. K. Chatterji, Calcutta

Any worthy citizen of India who has read Mr Shourie's article in the Indian Express (28 July 1980) "A furore a day" would have been ashamed to learn about the disorderly conduct of our legislators. Instead of calling for a contempt notice against Mr Shourie, Mr Arif Mohammad Khan should reform fellow-legislators.
K. R. Krishnan, Bangalore

According to Harold Laski: "A House that is in a continuous frenzy of excitement is a House that is in a succession of crises; that is usually the index to the government in office that is on its way to the grave." Actually Parliamentary debates possess enormous importance. What is written and said about them helps the voter to form an opinion about his representatives.
M. Atyab Siddiqui, Delhi

The media deserve an encouraging pat on the back for exposing the comic behaviour of legislators. Instead, Parliamentarians charge the Press with "negative reporting."
J. M. Nair, Trichur, Kerala

Dirty game

If Calcutta soccer is always such a tense affair ("Calcutta's deadly football madness," 31 August) and if the crowds are so uncontrollable, what sense is there in organising matches at the cost of precious lives, time, money and energy?
Husain E. Beguwala, Bombay

I am surprised to see how fanatical Calcuttans can be about a game like soccer. Ironically, though many players of both Mohun Bagan and East Bengal change sides on the eve of every soccer season, the fans continue to blindly support their clubs.
Debasish Ray, Vanvihar, Orissa

Every right-thinking citizen would welcome the idea of a total ban on soccer in Calcutta at least for a couple of years. Or else, the three big clubs who are mainly responsible for this chaos should be banned from playing in Calcutta.
P. C. Bhattacharjee, Bhilai

I personally believe that Dilip Palit and Bidesh Bose are not chiefly responsible for the casualties at Eden Gardens on 16 August, as they have been alleged to be. It is the administration that is solely to blame, though it seldom takes responsibility for its failures and finds fault with others. Helmeted policemen at the ground were seen sitting idle, watching the game, while chaos prevailed. Also what use is there for the police if they cannot prevent spectators from entering the galleries with rods, bamboos, brickbats, crackers, iron chairs etc?
Shibaprasad Dey, Calcutta

What was the police doing when a major flare-up started at 3 pm in the western stands? Why were tickets for the big match given at the Mohan Bagan ground only? Why were gate numbers 12 and 13 shut when the violence broke our in the stadium?
Prabac Guha, Chabua, Assam

Problem of choice

ECONOMICS, in spite of how Dr Subramaniam Swamy views it (3 August), is and shall always be a matter of choices: as when a housewife decides whether to buy six onions and two cabbages or four cabbages and one onion with the same amount of money. Dr Swamy is being dishonest in separating choice from scarce resources by talking of economic policy as a problem of choices. Only later does he refer to this problem as one arising due to scarce resources. Economics is simply a question of how to make the best use of scarce resources.
A. K. Pandya, Pyongyang, South Korea

THE late President V.V. Giri was reported to have said at the Arundale birth centenary celebration at Madras on 15 December 1978 that corruption has become a common feature even among ministers and nothing could be done to check it at the government level. Corruption is rampant at all levels of the administration only because the politicians who are running it are corrupt.
Nazir Ahmed, Bangalore

The villains: a few

Your argument that had the Muslims conspired against the police, they would not have brought their children to the Idgah holds no water since I believe that all the 50,000 namazis cannot conspire against the police: only a handful of communal elements started the trouble.
G.Raghava Rao, Hyderabad

In your coverage of all riots, communal or otherwise, your conclusions have invariably differed from those of other newspapers and magazines. Are all others biased?
Arun K.Khattri, Varanasi.

Sheikh's hand

"A CRISIS in Kashmir" (17 August) by M. J. Akbar was timely and complete. One cannot deny that the Sheikh had some "share" in the crisis. His speech at Lal Chowk was a mere eyewash.
N. C. R. Purushothaman, Hyderabad

PLEASE refer to "The Sheikh and corruption" (17 August) in which you have made some observations about the alleged cases of corruption involving the Chief Minister of Jammu and Kashmir. You have also made some remarks about the Works Minister, Mr G. M. Shah, which can only be described as one-sided and unfortunate. To call Mr G. M. Shah "a disliked person" is a travesty of the facts. Mr Shah , no doubt, is a son-in-law of Sheikh sahib, but he is not in politics and in the Ministry because of that. He made his own contribution to the freedom struggle and has suffered imprisonment on many occasions for political causes. Everybody in Kashmir is aware of the sacrifices of Mr Shah and the high position he has held in the Party. As such it is unjust to make insinuations against him on the ground that he happens to be a son-in-law of Sheikh sahib. Mr Shah lives in his own house, which is adjacent to Sheikh sahib's.

Similarly the appointment of Mr Tariq Abdullah as Managing Director of the Tourism Corporation is no favour to him. He is a young man of promise, having spent years in the west, and having acquired experience in various walks of life. The State Tourism Corporation was in the red before his appointment and it was a burden on the exchequer. Ever since he assumed charge of it, he has turned it into a profit-earning organisation, which even his worst critics admit. In the process, no doubt, he had to get rid of some old deadwood and infuse fresh blood in the Corporation.

About the charges of corruption against Sheikh Mohammad Abdullah which you have made reference to on the basis of the alleged memorandum of Mirza Afzal Beg to the Prime Minister, these are the same charges about which much hullabaloo was sought to be made during the Janata regime. These were replied to by the Chief Minister and the central government was satisfied with his replies. To level these charges again will serve no purpose. They are only intended to be used as a political weapon.
A. G. Rather, Public Relations Officer, Government of Jammu and Kashmir, Calcutta

All men are brothers

I am religious Sikh. Guru Gobind Singh taught us: "Maans ki jaat sab eke pehchanbo." (Recognise the unity of the human race.) Muslims have a right to air their grievances, as any other Indian. Why should there be discrimination against anyone? Guru Nanak taught us: "Awal Allah noor upaya, kudrat ke saab bande; ek noor te saab jag upaya, kaun bhale ko mande." (First, God spread light, and everyone was born from nature. From one spot of light was created the universe. Who is good and who is bad?) The Moradabad tragedy was worse than Jalianwalla Bagh: while the latter was a case of firing on a political meeting, mostly of adults, the former was a case of firing on a peaceful religious congregation, which included a sizable number of innocent children.
Balindar Kaur Sohi, Jullundur Cantt., Punjab

After reading your story, I actually broke down, unable to check my tears—and not because I am a Muslim.
Ahmed Siraj Mohiuddin Farooqui, Parbhani, Maharashtra

In spite of the atrocities on them, Muslims were painted as the villains of Moradabad. The reasons, as you have rightly said, are history and Pakistan.
M.A.Aziz, Hyderabad

Most journalists reporting on Moradabad have written like PR men of the PAC—except you and Udayan Sharma in Ravivar. One famous journalist who went on a round of the city with the police was 'sorry' not to have witnessed any shooting. Another discovered 'hidden hands' behind the trouble. This is the state of Indian journalism.
Firoz Ashraf, Bombay

Picture of protest

Your cover picture of the Muslim youth ("Id: Day of Death," 24 August), with his blood-smeared face and clothes and the haunting stare of helplessness, is a stunningly eloquent protest against the communalism that subverts our law and order. It is also a sad commentary on the police's treatment of the docile.
Joseph John, Kottayam, Kerala

We Indians are destroying our rich social and cultural heritage by indulging in communal riots.
R.B.Chaudhuri, Bombay

We are proud to have journalists like Vijyendra Tyagi in a country where secularism is fast disappearing.
Hasibur Rahman Mallick, Calcutta

The report indicates how deftly the authorities can publicise a police-public clash as a communal riot.
P.K.Das, Varanasi

Your report and some other reports have blasted the myth that Muslims went to the Idgah armed and opened fire on the police.
M.A.Ahad, Bhubaneswar

The barbarous, violent police attacks on innocent Muslims should put every Indian to shame.
K.P.Andavan, Salem

Funnily, the country's ruling class has not reacted to the Moradabad incidents.
Amit Das, Alipurduar, West Bengal

The secretary of the city unit of the Congress(I) rightly condemned the government for its inability to protect innocent lives. Merely transferring officers cannot solve the problem. Where is the government that works?
K.K.Kaul, Delhi

My heartfelt thanks to those men of the BSF and the army for their excellent service
R. M. V. N. Ramakantha Rao, Bhubaneswar

That is him

Rich voice

Anil Grover's tribute to Mohammad Rafi "Abhi na jao chhorh kar" (17 August) was marvellous and worth preserving in a library. Rafi's voice saw many films through to the box-office.
V. Laxman Rao, Bhilai

The more one listens to Rafi's songs, the more one feels he is alive.
K. V. Udaya Shankar, Gauhati

Singers like Rafi come once in a millenium to delight weary mortals.

You who carry rations for half a km—imagine carrying grains across fifteen lakh kms.

Going to the ration shop and back every week; carrying grains for your family, may seem like quite a task. But compare this to what the Food Corporation of India does. FCI carries millions of tonnes of foodgrains, everyday throughout the length and breadth of the country. From the snowbound peaks of Ladakh to the coastal backwaters of Kerala, from the deserts of Rajasthan to the dense tropical forests of Mizoram.

In a country the size of a sub-continent, FCI's movement of grains maintains a balance between surplus food producing and other areas. Using 45,000 wagons FCI transports more than 1 crore bags of foodgrains every month by rail alone, to assure 650 million people of a regular supply. Roads and waterways are also used for the transportation of grains. For instance, 40,000 truck trips a year carry supplies for the state of Jammu and Kashmir alone.

The movement of foodgrains from where they are grown to where they are consumed, involves heavy transport expenses. Yet, irrespective of the distance covered, these grains are supplied at a fixed price to every distributing agency throughout the country. For instance, wheat from Ludhiana will be supplied to the distributing agency in Delhi, Imphal or Kanyakumari at the same fixed price. A quintal of wheat which costs FCI Rs. 161.05 is sold to distributing agencies for Rs. 130.00. The difference of Rs. 31.05 is absorbed by the Government to make foodgrains available to the consumer at a lower price. In other words, the consumer receives from the Government the subsidy of Rs. 31.05 through the Corporation. For all these various operations, what is spent on administrative overheads constitutes only 1% of the total cost.

FCI carries out every stage of these numerous activities with the utmost economy, in the best interest of both the farmer and the consumer.

The estimated Consumer Subsidy on wheat in 1980-81 (Per Quintal)

Price paid to farmer	117.00	Administrative overheads	1.71
Statutory and other charges like mandi purchase tax, mandi labour cost of gunny bags, temporary storage,etc. on which FCI has no control	20.64	Storage, handling, godown expenses, etc.	5.92
		Interest on loans	5.54
		Total cost incurred by FCI	161.05
Freight charges	10.24	Cost charged by FCI from distributing agencies	130.00
		CONSUMER SUBSIDY	31.05

The Government

We begin a new weekly column in which we will report how the government really works.

Commerce proposes

The trade deficit for this financial year is expected to be a heavy Rs 3,000 crores, and only a serious export-drive can help reduce this yawning gap. But the Union Cabinet is sitting lazily on a number of important proposals submitted by the Commerce Ministry over four months ago to accord special facilities to export-oriented units. One of the proposals relates to the supply of duty-free imported raw materials and capital goods in order to make our exports more competitive in the international market. Another proposal envisages clearance from MRTP strictures to expanding export-oriented units, so that managements do not have to run from pillar to post to get their permissions. Though exports have shown an increase in the first quarter of this financial year, 1980-81, they have fallen short of the target: partly due to the protectionist tendencies adopted by developed countries like the USA. The government of India obviously realises how important this problem is: the Prime Minister herself heads a committee on exports. Unfortunately, the first meeting of this committee is yet to take place.

Thank you, GoI

Sometimes the government does better publicity for a private sector firm than the latter can do for itself. This is what Haldor-Topsoe, the engineering consultant selected for the ammonia section of the Thal-Vaishet fertiliser project, discovered. Word had been sent to some newspaper offices that this Danish firm would brief the press in Delhi on September 18. But on the morning of September 18 someone from the Danish embassy rang up to say that the Haldor-Topsoe executive would not be meeting newsmen as scheduled. Well, why should he? His job had already been done by the government the previous day. A five-page explanation had been issued on behalf of the Petroleum, Chemicals and Fertiliser ministry about why Haldor-Topsoe and Pullmann-Kellogg (who had been made consultants for the ammonia plant at Hazira) had been chosen, overruling the earlier selection of C. F. Braun. The national newspapers had already printed the explanation, and there was nothing left for Haldor-Topsoe to do except silently thank the government.

Train to Varanasi

The state of the Indian railways, it seems, isn't as healthy as its public relations officers would like us to believe. And despite the fact that its Minister is Pandit Kamalapati Tripathi, the man who ran the trains on time during the Emergency. To begin with, the railways, whose functioning affects and reflects the state of the economy, carried three million tonnes less revenue earning traffic in the first five months of the current financial year (April to August) than it did in the corresponding period last year. Nor is that all. We learn that top railway officials are trying to keep the Railway Minister happy by either starting new trains for Varanasi, or diverting existing ones to touch that station. Varanasi is Mr Tripathi's hometown. Perhaps an indication of the state of the railways is available in the state of the Railway Board itself. Mr Menezes, the chairman, is on extension. Two members are on superannuation. A fourth is on sick leave. And a fifth is no longer alive.

Work to ageold rule

Eight months after coming to power, "the government that works" is making valiant efforts to show that it is serious about its election pledge. Since it is the bureaucracy which is the traditional unwilling horse two important steps have been taken to flog it to greater activity. The first step decreed by the Prime Minister is to set aside one day in the week as a "meeting-less day", the logic being that civil servants spend too much time discussing what they will do instead of actually doing it. Further, another first step: 22-27 September was an "arrear clearance week." But this is how our mandarins worked during this week. First came the circular from the PM to the various Ministers setting out the idea. The Ministers discussed the idea with their secretaries and additional secretaries. That, the innocent would have thought, meant the end of discussions and the start of work with a bang. But no. Not, for example, in the Home Ministry. There, an additional secretary called a meeting of joint secretaries and the latter naturally had to talk it over with the deputy secretaries. Thus were the first two days of the arrear clearance week spent in discussing the priorities.

However, a list of priorities was eventually drawn up. The first place on the list went to the grievances received from the public and pending with the PM's petition officer. The petition officer while forwarding to the respective Ministries the petitions received by the PM naturally keeps a note of them. Reminders from there are no good for anybody's career. Second on the list were all pending parliamentary assurances, like questions that have not been replied to. Third on the list came matters relating to communal harmony, complaints of atrocities on members of scheduled castes and tribes and public complaints against the police.

Painless Hindi

Rightly or wrongly the Janata government was considered to have a pro-Hindi bias. The present government, with the equal measure of support it draws from the north and the south, will probably consciously try to avoid that image; and nobody will try to construe the sending of parliamentary delegations round the world to assess the use of Hindi in GoI offices as actually doing something for Hindi. The inaction-in-action is also on display to anyone entering the Press Information Bureau office in Shastri Bhavan. Up front is a notice board which has traditionally carried announcements in English informing newsmen of coming events. But a new notice board has recently been installed at the top of which 'Press Information Bureau' has been inscribed in Hindi. Presumably it will carry announcements in Hindi. But the board has been left blank for over two months.

Important "stenographer"

The long awaited Assam talks were not without their share of mystery. At the request of the agitation leaders, no officials were participating. Despite the political nature of the discussions, no member of the political department of the home ministry was present; even Mr H. C. Sarin, adviser to the Assam governor, was kept out. But there was one senior officer who sat in on the talks: Mr S. P. Bagla, establishment officer in the home ministry with the rank of a joint secretary. Since it was known that officials would not participate in the talks, curious pressmen asked Mr Bagla on the opening day what he was doing inside the closed room. "I am attending it as a stenographer," was Mr Bagla's reply.

NEHRU AND THE MOUNTBATTENS

By RICHARD HOUGH

When Lord Mountbatten came to India to arrange a smooth transfer of power, the task seemed impossible. Mountbatten's great asset was his personal rapport with Jawaharlal Nehru built up in no small measure through the strong affection Lady Edwina and Nehru had for each other, a relationship which Mountbatten never grudged. Many details of the precise nature of that relationship, allegedly an "affair", have been published in the most recent (barely weeks-old) biography of India's last Viceroy and first Governor-General: Mountbatten, Hero of our Time (Weidenfeld and Nicolson, London, £8.50)

NOT long before he died, Mountbatten said, "You can divide my life into two. During the first part of my life I was an ordinary conventional naval officer, trying not to be different in the sense of being royal, trying not to show myself off as being rich and ostentatious—like always using a small car to drive to the dockyard instead of my Rolls-Royce.*Then we come to the period when I was pulled out and pushed one generation up. Dudley Pound, for instance, was twenty-four years older and was a post-captain while I was a two-striper. From that time everything was new for me, and most of it for the first time for anyone.

"A lot of people today still think I gave away India, but..."

MOUNTBATTEN was forty-six and still looked ridiculously youthful. One morning, he was interrupted with a message from Downing Street. Please come and see me—signed Clement Attlee. It was not the first of its kind. Recently, his advice had been sought over Burma and about "the mess caused there by the Governor," as Mountbatten himself expressed it.

This time India was the main item on the agenda. With Attlee was Sir Stafford Cripps, an expert on the subject, who had recently led a mission to Delhi which had very nearly pulled off an agreement for the transfer of power. "I had kept in touch with what was going on," said Mountbatten, "and I was able to produce reasonably intelligent answers. Suddenly I began to have suspicions. We were talking about Wavell, who was having a very difficult time. I said, 'You're not by any chance talking about me relieving him?' Attlee said, 'Yes, and I said, 'Not on your life. And I'll give you my reasons. First, Wavell is a very honourable man. He may be taciturn but he's first class and if he can't succeed, no one can.'

"This, and all other reasons were swept away, so I started making conditions. I must choose my own staff, and there'd be a lot of them, and I'd want Wavell's too, and everyone must be allowed cars and to bring their wives. I wanted 'Pug' Ismay. I wanted complete control of the Honours List at the end, with no queries. I wanted my old York aircraft back, fitted out just as I liked it. I wanted...."

Was Mountbatten teasing them? Did he know that all the conditions he was likely to ask would be met? We can assume that he did. Then he tried two tough ones. First, he demanded that he could have his present appointment to the 1st Cruiser Squadron back again when he had finished in India as Viceroy, the highest appointment any British citizen could hold. Attlee said yes. But Mountbatten insisted on Admiralty approval, now. So the First Lord (Lord Hall) and the First Sea Lord (Admiral Sir John Cunningham) were called to Number 10.

Hall agreed at once. "Hey, not so fast!" said the Admiral. "We had the gravest doubts about Dickie coming back after running SEAC, where he commanded fleets. It was only allowed after a lot of hesitation. But to come back after being Viceroy of India—absolutely out of the question."

There was a brief pause. Then Attlee spoke in his dry, sharp, even-toned voice. "I am not asking for your comments," he said to Cunningham. "I am giving you an order." After they left, there was another pause before Cripps spoke: he would gladly go as Mountbatten's Chief of Staff if that would help. Mountbatten thought this a terrible idea, and that it would be read by the Indians as confirmation that Mountbatten was a mere regal figurehead. "It's very good of you, sir. But that is too great an honour," said Mountbatten.

Years later, Mountbatten insisted that he was being relentlessly cornered. "I went on fighting." Next he brought up the King's name. He would have to discuss it with him. Attlee said he had already squared George VI, and that he thought it was a marvellous idea. But, argued Mountbatten, the King had not yet heard his arguments against his appointment. The meeting broke up with nothing decided except that Mountbatten would see the King at once.

Mountbatten reminded George VI that there were hundreds of princely and native states. The Government had treaty relations with them, the king had a special responsibility towards them. Then if there were civil war, and terrible massacres, the royal family would be directly associated, perhaps even held responsible for them, through himself, even if he was only a minor member of the royal family.

Mountbatten reported George VI as saying that it was precisely because of his rank that he approved, that the royal family still had a cachet in India, that Mountbatten should take a personal message from him to the princes.

Jinnah was as thin as a reed from the Ganges, narrow in face, his brown skin dry even in the hottest weather, his eyes bright and alert, missing nothing. He was a terrific dandy and displayed a wide range of perfectly cut suits, and a monocle completed the picture of some suntanned eccentric from a Michael Arlen novel.

Mountbatten: "You do know that the job is almost impossible?"

George VI: "It can be done."

Mountbatten: "Only by a miracle. And look how bad it will be for you and the family if I fail."

George VI: "Ah, but look how good if you succeed!"

"And that was that!" said Mountbatten. "I went back to Attlee and said I thought the King was quite wrong, and produced my trump card. I asked innocently if the Secretary of State for India was above the Viceroy, and was told yes, but that he was only a spokesman for the Cabinet.

"You mean I am going to have the Cabinet sitting on top of me all the time? This is ridiculous. The decisions must be mine and mine alone, on the spot."

Attlee replied, aghast, "But anything else would mean giving you plenipotentiary powers. We cannot possibly consider that."

Mountbatten claimed that at this point he rose from his chair. "For this relief, much thanks," he said, smiling.

"You don't mean you're going, Dickie?"

"I'm going all right. I'm going back to the navy."

With hardly a second's pause, Attlee said, "All right, you can have plenipotentiary powers."

A week after Mountbatten arrived in India, with a time limit of just fourteen months to hand over power, Nehru asked if by any chance Mountbatten had managed to get some special dispensation. Mountbatten said, "Yes, as a matter of fact I did. Why do you ask?" Nehru said, "Because you act entirely differently to any other Viceroy. You talk as if you are making the decisions."

Between the time when the news of the appointment was made public and Mountbatten's departure, his enemies were inclined to say he had taken on the task for its grandeur and pomp, ceremonial and uniforms, and for the historical record: the great-grandson of Queen Victoria, proclaimed first Empress of India, giving away "the brightest jewel," a "socialist" viscount behaving traitorously to his class.

The statistics were truly alarming. Mountbatten was charged with securing the political freedom within a unified state of some 400 million people (one in five of the earth's population), 250 million Hindus, 90 million Moslems, 6 million Sikhs, and the rest made up of numerous sects and Buddhists and Christians and over 500 independent princes and maharajahs. They spoke 23 languages and 200 dialects and were divided into some 3,000 castes, orginating in racial, tribal, occupational and territorial differences. In the past few years, millions had died of hunger and tens of thousands as a result of internecine riot. Some had fought against the Allies, many more had formed the main strength of Mountbatten's armies. Many princes and maharajahs did not welcome the end of British rule. The giant Congress Party, led by Nehru, wanted a united India within the Commonwealth. The Muslim leader, Mohammad Ali Jinnah, called out from the Muslim League for a separate Pakistan. The Muslims had been mainly loyal to Britain during the war, and had provided by far the greater number of troops. Congress helped to widen the division by opposing the war, and Nehru, Gandhi and some 60,000 of their followers were arrested. Nothing much seemed to have changed since 1921. Mountbatten was taking on the political commitment of a socialist Prime Minister, and would be recognized everywhere as the King's cousin and representative. Attlee himself "thought the odds were about six to four against success." Mountbatten's estimate of a thousand to one against seemed more realistic.

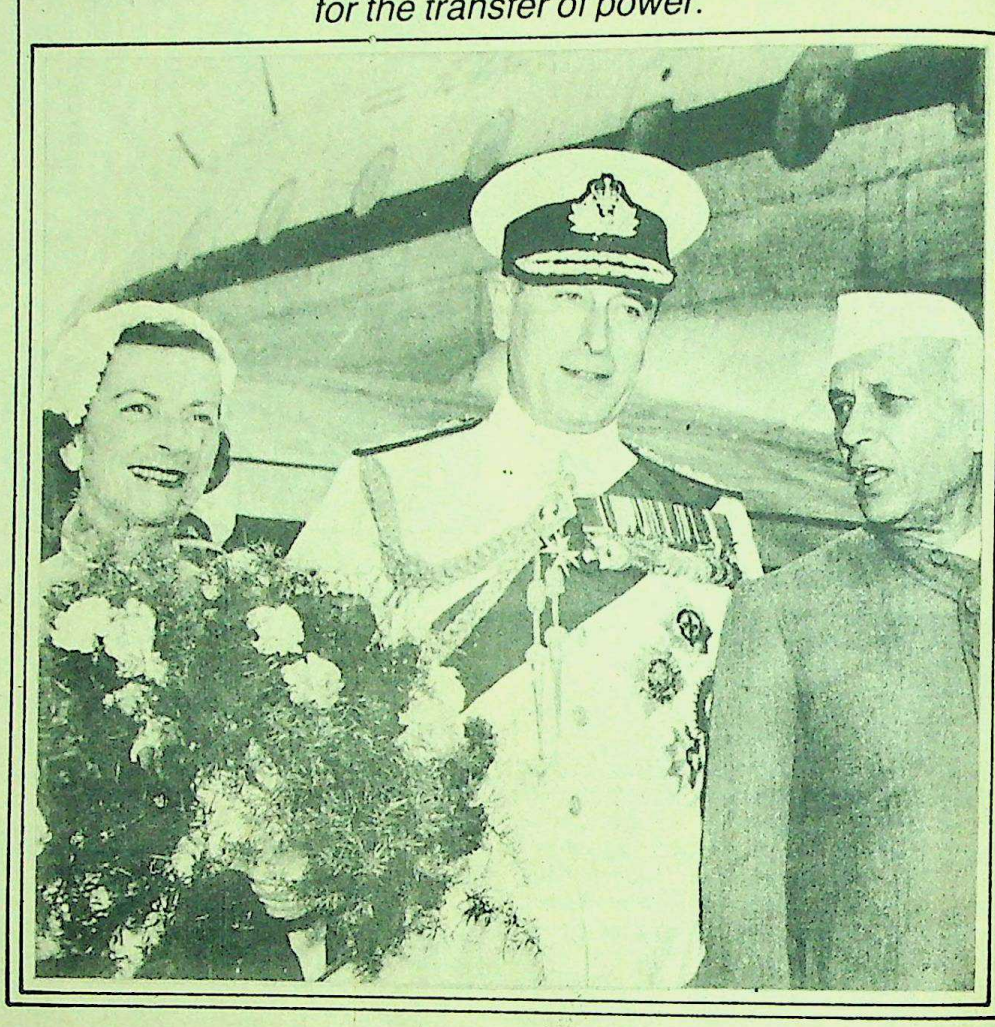
Mountbatten's York aircraft took off from Northolt airport in north-west London at first light on 20 March 1946. Besides Rear-Admiral the Viscount and Viscountess Mountbatten and their daughter Pamela, there were on board their personal servants, Mountbatten's senior ADC Lieutenant-Commander Peter Howes, who did so much of the hard work, and Captain 'Ronnie' Brockman, his private secretary and for so many years before and after, sharer of private jokes, whom Mountbatten always found congenial company for lighter moments.

As usual when Mountbatten travelled the luggage was prodigious in volume and quantity and even Edwina, normally the lightest of light travellers, was obliged as Vicereine to bring a wide range of possessions and clothes. As on her honeymoon (and this year marked their silver wedding), she brought with her much of her jewellery as well as a diamond tiara for the proclamation in Delhi. Then there were all the documents and the two-page definition of the terms of Mountbatten's mission, signed by the Prime Minister.

Mountbatten had laid down a gruelling timetable for the flight, which set the tempo he was evidently intending to sustain througout the mission, like the destroyer commander he was. Most of the rest of his staff had left the previous day, at Ismay's insistence, preferring a more relaxed flight, like the good (no, exceptional) army staff officer he was.

The relationship that developed between the beautiful 45-year-old Englishwoman of such notable wealth and aristocracy, and the English-educated Hindu barrister from Allahabad had the most profound effect on the negotiations for the transfer of power.



MOUNTBATTEN's plane, because of its tight timetable, arrived only a few hours later, and the sixty-three-year-old Field Marshal greeted his forty-six-year-old naval successor.

The next morning, Mountbatten and Edwina saw off the Wavells from the airport, an unusual and appreciated gesture, and returned to work. On 24 March, two years after Mountbatten had taken Mandalay, he and Edwina were sworn in as Viceroy and Vicereine, a function as grand as any swearing-in ceremony, but for this last time with the single purpose of granting political freedom to 400 million people instead of ruling them.

It was the nearest thing to a coronation, though mercifully briefer: trumpets sounding the prelude, the ADCs leading the Mountbattens, he solemn and noble in the pale blue robe of the Grand Master of the Star of India over the full dress admiral's uniform, and wearing the dark blue ribbon of the Garter above the dazzling array of Grand Crosses, orders and decorations; Edwina in gold brocade with her splendid tiara and more modest display of decorations. They moved to their thrones, cunningly lit red and gold with scarlet velvet hangings, and Sir Patrick Spens, the Lord Chief Justice of India administrated the oath..."I Louis Francis Albert Victor Nicholas Mountbatten..."

Then, with the prior knowledge of only a few members of his staff, Mountbatten delivered a brief address, an unprecedented step. "This is not a normal Viceroyalty on which I am embarking," Mountbatten began. "His Majesty's government are resolved to transfer power by June 1948...I am under no illusion about the difficulty of my task. I shall need the greatest goodwill of the greastest possible number, and I am asking India today for that goodwill..."

June 1948; fourteen months. For thirty years a means acceptable to all parties had been searched for. And now this young admiral told them the transfer would take place in fourteen months. The shock when the Indians first heard this could only have been more electric if he had added now that he had promised his family that he would be home in a year. But even his staff did not know that.

HE had spoken of goodwill, and it was the search for that goodwill that occupied Mountbatten's earliest days. "Everything, absolutely everything, was going to depend on personal relationships," said Mountbatten. "This I had known from the beginning. I knew Nehru, and there was plenty of goodwill there. We liked one another and Nehru had always been one for rank and titles—a great snob and pro-English, even if the English had put him in jail so often. He was marvellous to look at—wonderful, very tall and handsome. Above all, he and Edwina got on marvellously too. That was a great help."

In a country not at that time noted for the political influence of its women, the wives of those involved in the transfer negotiations played a strong part; and the leading role was, of course, played by Edwina herself, her leading man Jawaharlal Nehru, now widowed and lonely and needing a woman in his life.

Edwina charmed all the Indian leaders—and every Indian she met, for that matter, and they numbered thousands. Her blend of grace and authority, transparent kindness and interest in everyone she spoke to, her evident love of India and her people, played quite as big a part in the negotiations as Mountbatten himself in one formal and informal meeting after another.

Whether in some riot-and-strife-torn town, the bodies lying rotting in the streets among smashed glass and wrecked rickshaws and the litter of looting, with the temperature in the 110s and her hair soaking with sweat as she grieved or gave comfort; or in Viceroy House, surrounded by the glitter and riches of Imperial power, two hundred servants at her bidding, acting with ease and charm as hostess to her guests, the Vicereine was indeed the graceful empress of the last months of British power. Nothing was too much trouble for her; her patience and energy were inexhaustible, whether at home or at the numerous social occasions, from maharajahs' banquets to minor luncheon parties to which they would fly to all parts of India.

THE fact that a strong affair developed between her and Nehru, and so many people knew or suspected it, in no way diminished her standing. Rather the reverse; and the relationship that developed between the beautiful forty-five-year-old Englishwoman of such notable wealth and aristocracy, with a good stiffening of Jewish blood in her veins, and the English-educated Hindu barrister from Allahabad, leader of the Congress Party and thirteen years older than Edwina, had the most profound effect on the negotiations for the transfer of power.

Gandhi, too fell under Edwina's spell, and was soon calling her "my dear friend," although the nature of his love for her was utterly different from Nehru's. Gandhi was the first target of Mountbatten's "search for goodwill." With the Mahatma on his side, he would, as he defined it, "be half-way home." "We didn't talk any business at all at our first meeting," said Mountbatten. "It was just a personal chat. He was fascinated when I told him about my efforts to bring about a meeting between him and the Prince of Wales, when he was in prison in 1921. He talked about his early life, the development of his political beliefs and the non-violent independence movement. We were together alone for two hours, and when we came out, the waiting reporters thought we must have been solving the difficulties of the transfer. Actually, we hadn't mentioned them!"

But the one man who could drive home the bolt and secure the lock of united India was Jinnah. "Jinnah was the Muslim League," said Mountbatten. "He held the future of India in his hands. I tried the same technique with him, but it was almost impossible to warm him. He had only one dream, and that was a separate Muslim state." Jinnah was cold ("My God, he was cold!" Mountbatten would exclaim), arrogant, vain, inflexible—all the characteristics that make negotiation virtually impossible. Before a word could be said his appearance was sufficient to depress anyone attempting to negotiate with him. He was as thin as a reed from the Ganges, narrow in face, his brown skin dry even in the hottest weather, his eyes bright and alert, missing nothing. He was a terrific dandy and displayed a wide range of perfectly cut suits and a monocle completed the picture of some suntanned eccentric from a Michael Arlen novel. At morning meetings of Mountbatten's staff "the Dickie birds"—the subject of Jinnah was more often on the agenda than anyone else. In the end Mountbatten claimed to have thawed him. But everyone knew that the temperature change was that of one man's breath on a frosty dawn. Jinnah was seventy, in poor health, and destined to live little longer than a year.

"It was Jinnah, and the Muslim riots and massacres, that convinced me of two things soon after my arrival," Mountbatten said. "The first was that we had to be quick to find a solution. The second, that it was more important to be quick than to have an undivided India. Government was losing control. I decided that we had to be out not in fourteen months but in five months."

It was as if the subcontinent had been sown with politico-racial time-fused mines. As fast as Mountbatten and Edwina sped about the country defusing them, others were laid in their place. One of the worst problem areas was the North-West Frontier province. On 28 April, the Mountbattens flew to Peshawar. They were told that a crowd of Muslims, numbering around 75,000, was about to march on Government House, and that their mood was violent. Mountbatten agreed to meet and show himself to the demonstrators. At the last minute Edwina insisted on joining him in the car. The sound of chanting rising to crescendos, could be heard from a distance. The crowd was in a large park and its surrounding fields, stretching far into the distance. They were crying "Pakistan Zindabad!" over and over again, and waving the illegal green flags of Pakistan. Their imminent march was also illegal and certain to lead to violence.

The Mountbattens climbed up on to a railway embankment, both of them looking informal in khaki bush shirts, and waved to the nearest people in the crowd. The word of their presence spread like a tidal wave. Children were held up to see them, and the cries soon changed to "Mountbatten Zindabad!" No speech was possible. But their presence was enough. For nearly half an hour, they exchanged waves and smiles before leaving for lunch with the Governor. They learned later that the entire crowd had dispersed peacefully and were returning to their homes.

Edwina made a journey alone to the Punjab where communal rioting was bloodiest and thousands had already met death almost as horrible as those in the Japanese camps two years earlier. It was a harrowing experience, emotionally as well as physically, with temperatures up to 114

Nothing, it seemed, could tarnish the glitter and douse the happiness of August 15 - only perhaps the thought that at this moment the man who had done more than all of them put together to win India her freedom felt no call to rejoice, rather to mourn... "For Mahatma Gandhi there was only one place to be at this moment— in a noisome slum where he could bring a little peace and comfort, where he could fast for his people's sins, and where he could mourn the India, united as well as free, for which he had worked and prayed and schemed and dreamed."

degrees in the shade.

She could do little to ease the misery directly. The indirect influence of her dangerous and exhausting work was profound, however. As soon as she returned, grieved and distraught by what she had seen, Mountbatten sent her to recount her experiences to Nehru. Together the leader of the Congress Party and the most powerful man in India, and the exhausted Vicereine, grieved for Mother India. Then Mountbatten himself worked on Nehru, socialist Viceroy and admiral and socialist barrister and politician, friends with so much in common and certainly no jealousy on Mountbatten's side of Nehru's relationship with Edwina. On the contrary, he was proud of her role.

With every show of reluctance, Nehru agreed that the only way to communal peace and freedom for his country was to divide it.

Whatever other conclusions can be reached about this stage in Indian history, however the figures of the massacred before and after the transfer of power are read, there can be no denying that if freedom for India was to be granted in months and not years and partition was absolutely inevitable, then the Mountbattens between them did a marvellous dual job in putting together the new dual structures of powers in India.

Never in Mountbatten's career had Edwina's influence been more openliy evident. Only Mountbatten himself fully appreciated the extent of her support through a quarter century of marriage, guiding him through the tricky channels of those early days in the Mediterranean, from healing the injured pride of fellow officers, to charming captains and C-in-Cs; supporting him in those months at Combined Ops, dealing first with the affronted Keyes, the eccentric specialists and wild men that this HQ attracted and the hard men of the services who disapproved of Mountbatten and all his works; above all impressing Churchill with the depth and glitter of her mind so that the war leader always saw Mountbatten as one half of an unique team.

Nehru had capitulated. A great deal of choppy water lay ahead but they had clawed their way off the lee shore of catastrophe. "So there we were," said Mountbatten "We had all had dreams of a united India, handing over to a single government. Within weeks they were shattered and we had to make do with second best. But that was better than what I knew to be the alternative." By 3 June all seemed clear sailing. There had been last-minute hell from Jinnah and other problems. But now the Mountbatten Plan had been agreed; and on the same day that the leaders met, Attlee announced what he claimed as complete success to the House of Commons.

Four months earlier to the day, commenting on Mountbatten's appointment, the London Times predicted that if he brought with him no new initiative, no solution, it "may reinforce the determination of the Congress Party and the Muslim League to make no concessions to each other." And then under the threat of complete breakdown, there would be a decision "in favour of the claims of one side or the other." And now it had worked out exactly like that. India was to be partitioned and Jinnah had his Pakistan.

Nehru and Mountbatten were with so much in common, and certainly (there was) no jealousy on Mountbatten's side of Nehru's relationship with Edwina. On the contrary, he was proud of her role.

HINDU India formed the great central area of the subcontinent, and because of the approximate lines of religious population distribution, Pakistan was divided East and West without any linking corridor—the one concession Jinnah was forced to make. This was the broad outline but there were many ragged ends, such as the provinces of Punjab and Bengal and Kashmir. The legislative assemblies would deal with their future. The representatives of the Muslim districts and the others would vote separately in favour of partition or against it, a simple majority being decisive. If the vote favoured partition then a boundary commission would set up the frontier line. The North-West Frontier, Sind and British Baluchistan would have a referendum on whether or not to join the Constituent Assembly or form their own.

This was the essence of the Mountbatten plan. For all but a handful of veteran authorities on Indian politics, Jinnah was cold ("My God, he was cold." Mountbatten would exclaim), arrogant, vain, inflexible—all the characteristics which make negotiation virtually impossible.

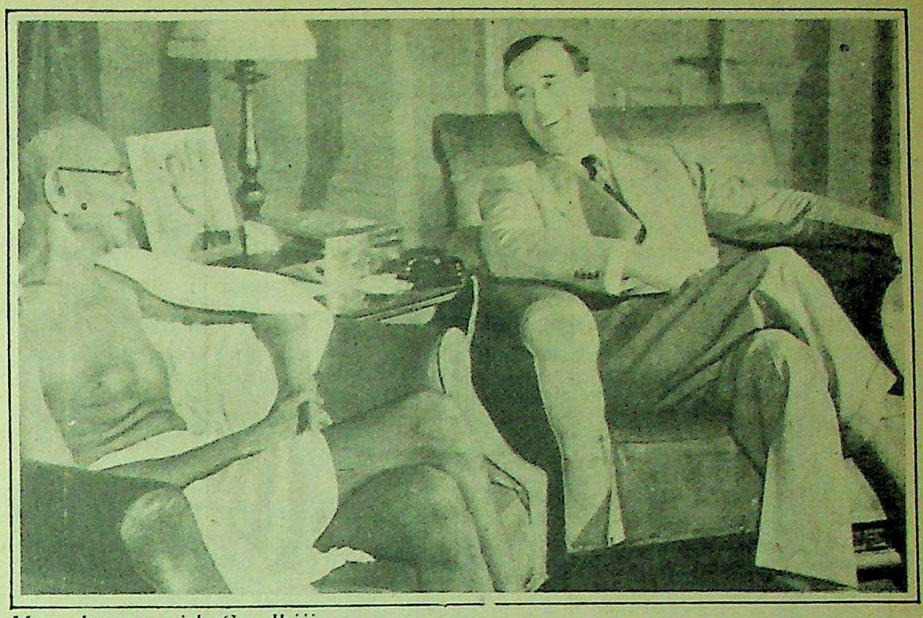
races, religions, frontiers, hates and loves objectors were certain to be blinded by the complexity of the whole business. That, and the speed and decisiveness with which agreement had been reached, were its chief strength. Its weaknesses were to manifest themselves over decades and generations to come.

But, for the present, there were few dissenting voices. Not only Attlee proclaimed that this was a success. Millions of Hindus and Muslims regarded it as a triumph, and outside India some informed opinion and nearly all uninformed opinion considered that the Mountbatten Plan was "a good thing." But, of necessity because of the selfimposed time factor, the surgeon had no opportunity of sharpening his knife and the incisions of partition were coarse, leaving millions on the wrong side of boundary lines, and leaving the nawabs and rajahs, khans and maharajahs, many ruling vast areas, in what Mountbatten truthfully described as "a pathetic situation."

They still had to be dealt with. "I knew some of them well, had played polo with them and they were my friends," said Mountbatten. "But these were only a few out of five hundred, some of them rulers of only a small town or a few square miles, others of vast wealth controlling huge and rich areas. I saw some of them separately, and then summoned a full-scale meeting of the Chamber of Princes and told them they had until 15 August to make up their minds whether they would remain independent or throw in their lot with one or other of the two new states." Some Mountbatten bullied, with others he used more subtle methods. "He could," commented one observer, "not only talk the hind leg off a donkey but also the throne from under a prince."



Mountbatten with Gandhiji

A tremendous amount of other work remained to be done. Mountbatten had a much-photographed calendar in his office with a ring round 15 August, and every day a date would be deleted as a further emphasis of the urgency. Friday 15 August 1947 was the most memorable day in Indian history, and one of the most significant in the mid-twentieth century. The world's greatest imperial power was handing over voluntarily and (with some exceptions) gladly, a great subcontinent and one in five of the world's population would now control its own destiny All over Pakistan and the new India, the speeches rang out and the new flags were unfurled. If anyone should question the goodwill that accompanied the exercise, an Indian or a Briton could point to the figure of the first Governor-General. for Mountbatten had been asked to stay on in this role in free India, and had agreed, though for a few months only. (He had hoped to be Governor-General of Pakistan, too, but Jinnah, who had been granted almost everything for which he had worked, would not have that).

The installation of Mountbatten as Governor-General, and now created an Earl, was as elaborate and stately as his installation as Viceroy barely five months earlier. Messages of goodwill from the world's rulers were read out, Mountbatten made a speech of friendship and gratitude, followed by that of Dr Rajendra Prasad in Hindi and then in English: "Let us gratefully acknowledge, while our achievement is in no small measure due to our own sufferings and sacrifices, it is also the result of world forces and events, and last though not least it is the consummation and fulfilment of the historic tradition and democratic ideals of the British race." That seemed to say it all.

Many more ceremonies and celebrations remained and nothing it seemed could tarnish the glitter and douse the happiness of that day—only perhaps the thought that at this moment the man who had done more than all of them put together to win India her freedom felt no call to rejoice, rather to mourn. "It was true that the country was free. But more important, it was also torn asunder and bleeding. For Mahatma Gandhi there was only one place to be at this moment—in a noisome slum where he could bring a little peace and comfort, where he could fast for his people's sins, and [illegible] mourn the India, united as well as free, for which he had worked and prayed and schemed and dreamed."

On the afternoon of 30 January 1948 Mountbatten received first the grave news that two men had been found with grenades in a crowd being addressed by Nehru, and that they were certainly intended for the Prime Minister. A few minutes later the news came over the car's radio that Mahatma had died. "To say I was appalled conveys nothing," said Mountbatten. "I was numbed and utterly terrified. His little pinched face looked serene in death when I went to his house, where a great crowd had already gathered. Someone in the crowd shouted, 'It was a Muslim that did it.' I immediately shouted back,'You're a fool. You know nothing. It was a Hindu.' I had no idea of course. Luckily I was right."

"No power in history," ran one Indian newspaper comment on these stirring days, but Great Britain would have conceded independence with such grace and no power but India would have so gracefully acknowledged the debt."

But there were other debts to be paid—the anguish and sufferings of some twelve million people forced to uproot themselves for fear of the future. Communal strife and frenzy on a scale never known before even in this great suffering land. No one has calculated accurately the number who were shot, burned, hacked, battered and tortured to death. Perhaps one million, perhaps two million died in the months following partition—certainly many more than British and imperial (including Indian) troops killed in World War I.

With fear and death there inevitably came famine. Edwina set up a United Council for Relief and Welfare. At one time, with the hysteria of mass murder now sweeping in to Delhi itself, many of her M[illegible] staff were murdered and Edwi[illegible] was [illegible] mask over her face, helping to move the corpses to the mortuary and then touring the hospitals tending the wounded and attempting to allay their fears. Delhi resembled a city of the dead, with no transport entering or leaving. Somehow, Gandhi appeared on the scene of horror, a frail little spindle-legged saint whom Churchill had once called a seditious Middle Temple lawyer now posing as a half-naked fakir.

In a few days it was his seventy-eighth birthday. "Send me only condo-lences," he said. "There is nothing but anguish in my heart. I cannot live while hatred and killing mar the atmosphere." He spoke, too, of the sufferings of the refugees. "I have heard that a convoy of Hindus and Sikhs 57 miles long is pouring into the Indian Union from West Punjab. It makes my brain reel to think how this can be. Such a happening is unparalleled in the history of the world and it makes me hang my head in shame." In the midst of these scenes of anarchy and death across the sub-continent, with Edwina working as desperately and effectively as she had during the liberation on South-East Asia, Mountbatten insisted that they should b[illegible] go home.

THE Mountbattens were in India again a week later. Edwina went straight back to her relief work. Over and above the deaths by violence thousands were dying from exposure in the November winds in refugee camps in the Punjab. Two events followed in swift succession, each marking symbolically the extremes under which the masses in India suffered. The first was the Silver Jubilee of the Maharaja of Jaipur, as grand and glitteringly ostentatious and extravagant an affair as ever occurred in the days of the British Raj. In this land of extremes, the scene in Jaipur contrasted grotesquely with those of riot, pillage, rape and murder that stalked the nation.

In one more desperate attempt to stem the flow of violence and bloodshed, in the New Year, Gandhi began a fast unto death and was soon so weak that he had to be carried to prayer meetings. Mountbatten visited him anxiously. Mahatma was just able to whisper. Roguishly he said, "It takes a fast to bring the mountain to Mahomet."

Then, on the afternoon of 30 January 1948, Mountbatten returned to Delhi from a visit to Madras. He arrived to receive first the grave news that two men had been found with grenades in a crowd being addressed by Nehru, and that they were certainly intended for the Prime Minister. A few minutes later the news came over the car's radio that shots had been fired at Gandhi and that he had been hit three times. Before a doctor could arrive Mahatma had died muttering, "Hey Rama!" "To say that I was appalled conveys nothing," said Mountbatten. "I was numbed and utterly terrified. His little pinched face looked serene in death when I went to his house, where a great crowd had already gathered.

"Somone in the crowd shouted, 'It was a Muslim that did it!' I immediately shouted back, 'You're a fool. You know nothing. It was a Hindu.'

"I had no idea, of course. How could I? But if it had been a Muslim, then civil war was inevitable and the carnage terrible. Luckily I was right. It was a Hindu fanatic."

Four months later, the term of Mountbatten's office expired and he and his family prepared to leave India. It was a parting of two friends and warm were the words, glittering the ceremonies, generous the gifts on both sides. Edwina in particular had forged a deeply loving relationship with the people to whom she had given so much of her time and energy and compassion.

Mountbatten was seen in the simple terms of a great and royal figure who had given them their freedom. The love for him endured all his life. In Britain when he was murdered 32 years later, there was a day of mourning. In India, mourning was ordered for two weeks, and the feeling ran even deeper among all classes includ-[illegible] who had grown up since the [illegible] British Raj.

'Edwina did not believe in being discreet'

By KHUSHWANT SINGH

I HAD a few encounters with the Mountbattens and was twice ticked off by Pandit Nehru for letting his rendezvous with the Countess get into the papers.

It was the winter of 1947-48. Krishna Menon was our High Commissioner in London; I his Public Relations man. Krishna, who could be unbelievably rude to most people, could also be unbelievably fawning towards people who mattered. He knew how enamoured the Nehrus and the Mountbattens were of each other and took great pains to cultivate the Earl and his Lady. He had a room set apart in India House with a copper plate bearing the legend "Countess Mountbatten of Burma". Since there was shortage of office space, I was put in that room with strict instructions to clear out at the slightest whisper of her Ladyship's arrival. She never graced it with her presence. Her husband, however, had to use it as a waiting room on one occasion. He had been misinformed about the time of a reception and turned up 15 minutes before he was expected. He liked making spectacular entries and was very much out of countenance when instead of being greeted by the High Commissioner and his aides (to the playing of national anthems and booming of gun salutes) he was escorted by a messenger to the office reserved for his wife. He was in the First Sea Lord's uniform, his chest ablaze with medals. He was in no mood to talk to me and brushed aside my attempts to engage him in conversation. Then I boldly asked him if the partition of India had not been a great blunder. He drew himself up to his regal height and replied as if he was addressing a vast multitude: "I do not care what people say about me today; I will be judged at the bar of history." The statement was undoubtedly true but lacking in the modesty one associated with Englishmen of the upper classes. The blue blood that coursed in Lord Louis' veins was almost entirely German not English. A few months later he got the chance to display himself in the manner that suited his temperament. This was at the Canadian Trade Fair at Toronto. For reasons which transpired later, he had asked the Indian High Commission in Ottawa (where I was then serving) to provide him with escort. It was a bright sunny morning, Lord Mountbatten was decked up in his shimmering, silver-white shark-skin uniform with gold epaulettes, gold and silver medals ablaze in the sunlight. He marched in front; four blacks (two of them including myself bearded and turbaned) behind him. Here was the last of the Viceroys of India with all that the British Empire had stood for in its sun-never-sets glory. Hallelujah!

At the first Independence Day celebrations

My encounters with Nehru and Edwina were of a different sort. I was one of a handful of officers to receive Panditji on a bitingly cold winter night at London airport. At Krishna Menon's prodding, I introduced myself to the Prime Minister and asked him if he had any instructions for me. "What, at this time of the night!" he snapped. "You can go home."

The next morning, I found a note on my table asking me to see the High Commissioner at once. "The old man is furious with you," Menon told me. "What have I done?" I pleaded. "Have you seen The Herald?" he asked and showed me a large photograph on the front page, depicting Panditji outside the Mountbatten's home, the door slightly ajar with Lady Mountbatten in her night gown. The caption read: "Lady Mountbatten's midnight visitor." Menon warned me to keep out of Panditji's sight for a couple of days.

Three days later there was yet another picture in another paper showing Panditji and Lady Mountbatten dining together in a Greek restaurant. This time there was a note from M. O. Mathai, saying that Panditji wanted to see me. I went to Claridges hotel, expecting the worst. I entered Panditji's room. He demanded: "Who are you?" I reintroduced myself. "What do you want?" he asked. "Sir, you sent for me. I am your press officer." He gave me a withering look and remarked: "You have strange notions of publicity."

It was not for me to tell him that I had nothing to do with those pictures and that he should have been more discreet. However, a couple of times I saw Countess Edwina with Panditji, I could guess that Edwina did not believe in being discreet and probably never gave Panditji a chance of being so. She took his hand in hers in front of people: it was as candid a gesture as it was affectionate. No more. Edwina had been known to have had many lovers—now named in Mountbatten's two biographies: Richard Hough's Mountbatten: Hero of our Time and Charles Smith's Fifty Years with Mountbatten. Amongst the lovers listed are a pianist, Paul Robson, the six-foot-seven-inch tall Negro singer, the Earl of Sefton and our own Panditji. According to the biographers, Lord Mountbatten, instead of feeling peeved as a cuckolded husband, actually clucked with pride at his wife's infidelities. As the holy book says, it is as difficult to know the ways of a man with a maid as it is to tell the ways of the eagle in the air, the way of a serpent on the rock and the way of a ship in the midst of the sea. But we can be pretty certain that the one price people in the public eye have to pay for their popularity is to deprive themselves of the right of leading private lives of their own. Every move they make is seen by thousands of people, every friendship exaggerated into an affair. I go along with Indira Gandhi when she dismisses L'affaire Nehru-Edwina as "ridiculous."

Let me cry for Moradabad

By SYED SHAHABUDDIN,MP

Kamal Sahai

I HAVE just returned from a second visit to Moradabad; just over a month after the tragedy on Id...I feel lost and helpless. Have hearts turned into stones? How can man be so insensitive to pain, to suffering, to a human tragedy of this extraordinary dimension? You see fear and terror writ large on the faces of the people; you notice suspicion and distrust; they open out their hearts and then ask you not to take notice, not to do anything about it, least they face more beatings, more repression, more breaking of bones—maybe death! You see rows of people in a hospital ward, each with a broken limb, broken by the police, deliberately, calculatedly, coldly, each telling more or less the same story, of police breaking into a house, arresting people, beating them up, throwing them into prison on false, trumped-up charges.

You hear of PAC looting shops and homes; you hear of PAC participating in an orgy of destruction; you hear of persons taken away and traceless; you hear of men and women who have turned mad with grief, of babies crying out for their missing fathers. You hear, till your senses refuse to take any more. And yet, since the authorities are against "them," they do not matter. And you know that it could be you, your children, your relations, your home, your shop, your place of worship, your mohalla—no matter who you are; what your status is, what your ideology is...

And there is so little you can do; yes, you can speak to the local authorities, to the Home Minister, to the Prime Minister; write to them. So what? Are they omniscient, omnipotent? How can they stem this tide of hate? How can they clear the air of this pollution? How can they take the bug out of the system?

In the darkness that has descended upon this unhappy city, I see no light in this encircling gloom, no hope of redemption. I feel as if the milk of human kindness has ceased to flow and the wells of human compassion have run dry. But have they?

The Jamshedpur tragedy of 1979, whose high point was the macabre roasting alive of a busload of women and children, was marked by a wave of sympathy for the victims, by objective and in-depth analyses by the media, by generous public response to relief operations. There was sanity, compassion, hope in the public response—as if the blood had not been let in vain. The Moradabad tragedy, in many ways a watershed in the history of communal violence, symptomatic and symbolic of complete alienation between the police and the Muslim community, has failed to stir the hearts of the nation, to generate any such wave of sympathy.

There is an eerie silence over the moral landscape, as if conscience has gone to sleep, as if the victims are not our flesh and blood, as if the bond of common nationhood has broken down.

Look at how the country reacted to the killing of the Chopra children. Look at how our jurists and intellectuals protested at the drowning of the known criminal Sundar. Look at how we reacted to the Baghpat incident. And then look at Moradabad.

Today, but for a few discordant voices—it is silence all around, acceptance of atrocities...The politician is silent; this is understandable; he has his constituency to look after. The Gandhi Peace Foundation is also silent; The Citizens for Democracy are silent, the Sarvodaya crowd is silent; Vinoba Bhave is silent, the civil liberty wallahs are silent; the intellectuals, the academicians, the jurists are silent; the students and the youth are silent. The believers in spiritualism, the fighters for human rights in Kampuchea and the liberation of Afghanistan are silent. There is no sense of outrage, no air of protest, no cry of repugnance, no rejection of brutality—why? Would Gandhi and JP have remained silent?

From the word go, the media presented a distorted picture—our great free press initially played into the hands of the local police and magistracy, the normal source of information in such situations. But how could the police and the magistracy tell the truth when they are a party and, by all indications, the guilty party. You can't ask them to incriminate themselves and not to fabricate lies, not to try to cover up their crime. Hence the barrage of concocted rumours competently broadcast by the mass media. Later, more lies, to sustain the original lie. The sin was compounded a thousand-fold—churned out day in and day out, intensifying the image sought to be projected, strengthening it, giving it a lip of its own, a momentum which takes it out with the world beyond.

"You see rows of people in a hospital ward, each with a broken limb, broken by the police, deliberately, calculatedly, coldly, each telling more or less the same story, of police breaking into a house, arresting people, beating them up, throwing them into prison on fake, trumped-up charges.

Yes, the propaganda was cleverly orchestrated, diabolically planned, but you must ask why it was lapped up by our discerning public, our elitist opinion makers. That is the important question.

Because the seeds fell on a fertile ground and overnight sprouted into a crop of certitude. The people behind the stories, the "objective" analysis, the "factual" reports, the "unbiased" comments, were inclined to believe it, because there is an undercurrent of suspicion, distrust, even hatred and contempt for the Muslim—the end-product of our history, our education and our politics.

EVEN the voices speaking up against the police atrocity are shy, half-hearted, apologetic. "We all know how terrible the police is but what can we do about him; we have to tolerate him." "The Muslim may indeed be a foreign agent but we ourselves are responsible for what he is." "He is a fanatic by birth and by faith; violence is his second nature, Arab money has gone to his head, a little chastening would have done him no harm, but the killing was not really necessary." "Tut, tut, we are not a violent people, why can't we change him by moral force?"

The image that has been projected is that the Muslim, unless he is contained and firmly handled and unless his nefarious conspiracies and designs are defeated, is just about to take over the country, with fire and sword, through simultaneous uprising in several parts of the country, with the help of Pakistani arms, Arab money and CIA agents. China must indeed be thankful that it is not brought in.

The public has come to believe not only that the Muslims of Moradabad had attacked the police at the Idgah and the police fired to save their lives, but that throughout Muslims have continued to snipe at the police from rooftops; that there shall be no peace until they are totally disarmed. The general public instinctively believes that "miscreants" means "Muslims"; that if firearms have been seized, they must be from Muslim hands; that if arms dumps have been discovered, they must be in Muslim homes; that if Muslims have been arrested, they must have done some wrong; that if their bones are broken, they must have begun the violence.

A responsible newspaper comes out with a screaming headline: "Moradabad has more arms than UK" and everybody believes it. And the national press merrily publishes stories of 163 PAC jawans killed in Moradabad; of 400 Home Guards missing in Aligarh, of the Moradabad kotwali razed to the ground by Muslim mobs; of Pakistani agents arrested and interrogated. Organiser, the RSS mouthpiece, gives a name to the Muslims—"armed rebels." No one protests. Girilal Jain, the respected doyen of Indian journalism, weaves a whole theory of the hidden hand around one single "fact"—which turns out to be a lie—and scores of letters applaud his objectivity and his great service to the nation in weaving this plot.

> There is an eerie silence over the moral landscape, as if conscience has gone to sleep, as if the victims are not our flesh and blood...The politician is silent...The Gandhi Peace Foundation is also silent; the Citizens for Democracy are silent; the Sarvodaya crowd is silent; Vinoba Bhave is silent, the civil libertywallahs are silent; the intellectuals, the academicians, the jurists are silent; the students and youth are silent. The believers in spiritualism, the fighters for human rights in Kampuchea and the liberation of Afghanistan are silent. Would Gandhi and JP have remained silent?

And what was that "fact?" That a shot was fired at the police from inside the Idgah. Let us examine how absurd this lie is—so absurd indeed that no one even mentions it now.

- No one heard a shot.
- No one saw a Muslim carry a firearm.
- No spent cartridge was found in the Idgah.
- No firearm was left behind in the stampede.
- No house in front of the Idgah has a bullet mark.
- No policeman received a bullet or a pellet injury.
- And why should the group which had planned to attack the police choose the Idgah and the Id day? And why should it begin its operations, so chivalrously, with brickbats?

You must ask what was the purpose of this conspiracy. You are told, to pressurise Mrs Gandhi on Afghanistan, on Assam, on Kashmir, to weaken and destabilise the country; to slow down its progress. And you nod your head in wise agreement.

That the BJP joins in this song and dance about the "foreign hand" and "deep conspiracy" is no wonder. After all, they are the self-appointed knights-errant of "national ism." But in Moradabad, about every Hindu I met believes it. There is perfect polarisation; there are no Congressites, no Jawaharites. Truly was I told by a respected citizen, a Hindu: "It is not the RSS but the RSS philosophy which is in the forefront."

But the fact is that out of 144 officially killed, 121 are Muslims; at least 75 per cent of the injured, of the 1,600 arrested, of the beaten up, are Muslims; nearly all shops looted, all houses searched or looted are Muslims'. And the arms. In four weeks, the police have seized only 200 firearms, mostly unlicensed, and only four of them are of foreign makes! And yet the Muslim in Moradabad is on the warpath!

> Let us examine how absurd is that "fact" that a shot was fired at the police from inside the Idgah.
> - No one heard a shot,
> - No one saw a Muslim carry a firearm.
> - No spent cartridge was found in the Idgah.
> - No firearm was left behind in the stampede.

IN a democratic society, peaceful protest against injustice is not only a right, it is a duty. Spontaneous protest took place throughout the country on the following Friday, 15 August; in a few places, they got out of hand and resulted in confrontation with the police and of course in massive reprisals. But can some isolated instances establish a pattern or design? Can it prove a nationwide conspiracy to attack the police?

By talking of conspiracies, so long as you do not name the parties to the conspiracy, you can keep everyone happy because everyone can identify it with his bete noire. The Muslim is happy that the government means the RSS; the Hindu is happy that the Muslim League is meant. The secularist is happy that the RSS-Jamaat-e-Islami linkage has been finally unearthed; the communist is happy that the CIA has been caught red-handed. And the government, our omnipotent sarkar which cannot make its writ run even in Delhi, promises to crush the conspirators and this strikes a responsive chord and the nation bursts into applause.

Of course, the government must keep everyone guessing and every one reasonably happy. You may whisper in private about the atrocities of the PAC, but condemn it, disarm it; no, how can you? They would rise in revolt. It does not matter if the ultimate result is the widening of the emotional gap, a setback to national integration. But who cares?

The bogies we raise divert national attention from the task of economic development, from diagnosing failures and taking remedial action. It generates an air of complacency and self-satisfaction, while 33 years after independence, 60 per cent of our people continue to live below the poverty line, like a sub-human species, devoid of dignity and hope.

Have the people become immune to violence, insensitive to human tragedy, neutral in the face of atrocities and massacre? It is not only that they begin to think that the Muslims of Moradabad, Aligarh, and Allahabad are getting what they deserve, and we need waste no tears over them. But with repeated exposure, they become callous, apathetic spectators who accept injustice and tolerate inhumanity, in this land which produced Buddha and Gandhi. Or maybe Gandhi alone understood us and tried to liberate us from ourselves. Perhaps we are a violent people, a hardened people, having lived through centuries of violence.

The real question is not how to save the Muslim community but how to save the nation from the undercurrent of hatred and violence which is consuming all our finer sensibilities. The real question is not what to do about Moradabad but how to save the country from this apathy to violence which will one day break it into pieces as surely as night follows the day.

Aren't we human beings before we are anything else? If there is any spark of humanity left in us, let us pool those little sparks to guide us through this moral wasteland. If we are still capable of tears, let us pool the tears we are yet to shed and then we shall see the tragedy in all its dimensions.

A POLICE force should never lose its temper; or become vindictive, it should be objective in its assessment in moments of crisis and firm and controlled in its responses, measured in the use of its power. But what do you say to a man with a gun when he favours a murderer, a looter, an arsonist. When lust and violence grip his being, he can never be your defender, the protector of your life and honour and property. What do you do with him?

What is Mrs Gandhi up to? Has she lost her grip, her will, or is she playing deliberately to the gallery of Hindu chauvinism? She is an astute politician and she knows which gallery to play to at which time. She is ruthless and amoral in her choice. She knows that when all else fails, when her government bogs down under the weight of its incompetence, when she defaults on delivery of the goods she has promised, she can divert attention and harsh criticism only by touching hidden subliminal chords in the dark recesses of the Indian soul. What better than a combination of the enemy knocking at the door and the fifth column operating within: so you have the deliberate policy of fomenting tension with the neighbours—this was foreseen—and now you have the 'rebellious' Muslim, a God-send indeed! Together they provide a beautiful and effective scenario for staying in power.

Mrs Gandhi wears many masks. The historian may well find it difficult to recognise or delineate her real face. Even the contemporaries have to ask at times, "Will the real Mrs Gandhi step out?" Her forte is crisis management. She has polished brinkmanship into a fine art. Power is to her an end in itself and for power she will sup with the devil and, if necessary, don a saffron garb. A month after Moradabad, ask who has benefitted most? Moradabad has dominated the headline for weeks—displacing economic crises, price rise, scarcity, breakdown of law and order, internal rivalries within the ruling party, the do-nothingness of administration, all forgotten or relegated to obscurity. Even Assam does not make headlines. What happened to the Gujarat agitation no one seems to remember. Mrs Gandhi has managed to wring the last drop of political juice from this tragedy.

The myth of population explosion

Economics and Policy

By SUBRAMANIAM SWAMY

THE other day, a young expert, arrived fresh from Delhi's Palam airport after a stint with the World Bank, told me, "I tell you, unless India cracks down on the population growth, there is no hope for our economic plans." I countered his revelation with another, "Unless India can control the monsoons, there is no hope for stable food production."

My expert friend was stunned. He argued with me that despite all the hocus-pocus on rain-making machines, monsoons cannot be controlled, and therefore the best alternative was a massive irrigation programme to remove the uncertainty of water supply that the monsoon represents. "Exactly!" I said triumphantly. Population growth in India cannot be controlled at will, despite all the hocus-pocus on sterilisation, IUCDs etc., but the best alternative was a massive boost in the production of essential commodities and services.

By now my expert friend's knees began to wobble and his lips to quiver. The brainwashing he had received about India's population growth in the air-conditioned comfort of the World Bank did not allow him to swallow something so radically different. Lest I cause further brain concussion, I departed from the scene.

It has always amazed me how India, a nation of such intelligent souls, accepts everything uncritically that the West dishes out in the form of articulated nonsense—to suit their imperialist designs. For years we believed that the English were unwilling rulers of India, and had come for our benefit! Our intellectuals are so completely captive even today that it embarrasses me if someone calls me an intellectual. Indian intellectuals merely articulate for a domestic setting concepts of the safed chamrha (white skin). No deviation from these concepts is permitted, but ingenuity and originality to sustain these concepts are lauded. For a free India we must build an intellectual base to demolish these concepts.

The "population problem" is one such Western concept that needs to be demolished. All talk of controlling drastically India's population is a conspiracy of white nations rooted in the fear that brown skins will swarm the world, greedily casting eyes on the uninhabited lands of Australia and Latin America.

Let me argue as an economist to sustain what I am saying in political terms. What is the most sophisticated economic argument for population control? Than we need resources to feed the population, which resources are scarce. A baby born requires resources in terms of hospitals, schools, colleges, factories, etc., to provide for that baby. If that baby was not born, we could use those resources to provide more for those already born. Hence population control.

Paradoxically, I agree with this reasoning! But the economist within me says that to prevent that baby from being born, I also require resources in terms of clinics, mobile vans, doctors, instruments, etc. So in terms of economic logic of using resources most efficiently, I must know which of the two alternatives requires more resources: to provide for the baby born or to prevent the baby from being born?

All my studies show that in the present conditions prevailing in the country, if it requires Rs X for the first alternative, then it requires Rs 2X (i.e. twice) for the second alternative. Good economics means making efficient choice between competing alternatives; therefore, to save resources, the government ought at present plan to provide for the baby born only.

However, I must add a number of qualifications to the above revolutionary theorem (which is embarrassingly similar to the old Marxist view).

Firstly, I am not advocating that more population is a good thing. I am merely saying that preventing births in the present context of our development will require more resources than providing for it.

Secondly, the cost ramifications of the two alternatives may change, say 10 years from now. It may indeed become cheaper to prevent a birth than to provide for it.

Thirdly, we still plunk for family planning on non-economic grounds. For example, continuous childbearing erodes the freedom of the woman. Or, a huge population may contribute to environmental pollution. But then we ought to honestly state so. I am for family planning, even if it means burning our resources, to liberate the Indian woman.

Slowly the non-economic arguments are seeping into the Indian consciousness. Therefore India's birth rates have come down over the last 70 years—from 47 per thousand to 35 per thousand. Family planning-walas want that decline to be even more. To them I say: "Your only hope is to bring out the Durga in every woman." But can the country afford that? We have experimented with one Durga recently with disastrous consequences.

'The haves thrive on the miseries of the have-nots'

By RANJIT SAU

ON the eve of the thirty-third anniversary of Independence Day, the hon'ble President of India in a nationwide broadcast said:

> The rising prices and increasing disparities, making the rich much richer and the poor still poorer, are widening the gulf between the few haves thriving on the miseries of the have-nots, and the deprived masses left with little hope of any better life in the foreseeable future.

This segment of the presidential speech seems to have three parts: first, the gulf between the few rich and the many poor is widening; second, the haves thrive on the miseries of the have-nots; and third, there is little hope of any better life for the deprived masses in the foreseeable future. The second proposition—the haves thrive on the miseries of the have-nots—is one of the most paradoxical iron laws of the economic life in India today.

A rich man's son hardly remains unemployed; a poor man's son rarely finds a job. Nothing succeeds like success: the winner takes it all, while only failure piles upon failure on the other side of the line. The prosperity of the few is built upon the poverty of many. The poorer you are, the worse are your prospects. Such is the vicious spiral of Indian economics.

The record of 30 years of planned economic development has a positive side: foodgrains production has gone up from 50 million tonnes in 1950 to some 130 million tonnes in 1980, that is, by 160 per cent; national income has risen by 175 per cent, and industrial output by 300 per cent, as against an 80 per cent growth in population. Our misery cannot therefore be ascribed wholly to demographic proclivity. The record has also a negative side: the number of people below the poverty line has increased; the backlog of unemployment has mounted day by day to reach the level of 20 million persons (in standardised units) in March 1978, and every year another six million persons are entering the labour force, with little chance of getting a meaningful occupation. According to the studies conducted by the Reserve Bank of India, the pattern of ownership distribution of assets among rural households has sharply deteriorated, while the top ten per cent has cornered the gains. The decinnial census and other independent surveys indicate a swelling of the ranks of impoverished agricultural labourers. The common man finds it increasingly difficult to make both ends meet; to the despair of the celebrated Engel's law the portion of the household budget spent on food items (mainly agricultural goods) is rising, leaving less and less for industrial goods, even though in official statistics the per capita national income has nearly doubled.

To be sure, the vicious spiral of economics also operates regionally. Some areas of the country, even though endowed with enormous natural resources, continue to lag behind those which had an early start. The Indian economy, as it were, harbours within itself a few metropolitan growth centres that get themselves supplied with provisions from 'colonial' hinterlands. Indeed, all this is not surprising; for this is precisely how the capitalist pattern of economic development works. A quantum of benefits do trickle down to the hinterland, but those again are cornered by a tiny minority and the vast masses languish in poverty. The history of several centuries and of many countries bears testimony for it.

The government does try to soften the rough edges of this inexorable process of development-and-underdevelopment. It offers relief measures in one form or another, whose apparent generosity varies in proportion with the deepening crisis. But it cannot stem the dialectic.

But, why is there this irony of economics? Why this cruel joke? Why can't we have a harmonious growth, where everybody gains? At any rate, how does somebody grow at the expense of somebody else?

For their material existence, human beings in a society produce, in interaction with nature, a set of goods and services every year; these are together called national income. A part of the national income is given out to workers for their maintenance; the remaining part is known as the surplus. Now, three parties—namely, the landlords, merchants and capitalists—lay their respective claims on this surplus; these are the three ruling classes who appropriate the surplus. Each tries to grab as much as it can. If national income is, say, Rs 100 crores, and Rs 60 crores is the subsistence requirement of the workers, then the surplus is Rs 40 crores which is shared by the three ruling classs. Should the merchant jack up his margin to get a bigger slice of the surplus, naturally the landlords and capitalists would feel the pinch. So they would also jump into the fray with larger claims. The conflict can be reconciled momentarily by enlarging the size of the surplus, which means a reduction in the workers' subsistence. This process goes on.

Over time the national income may rise, but the contending ruling classes manage to reduce their mutual tension by passing on the brunt to the common man. In other words, it is the immanent urge of the landlords, traders and capitalists to grab more and more, which takes the masses to the brink of starvation. A stage may be reached when the capitalist succeeds in establishing his class hegemony over the landlords and traders; then this acrimony among the ruling classes may cease, but that is a different matter.

In India, the landlords, traders and capitalists are almost equally powerful; so the competition among them is quite intense. Between them it is of course a friendly match, because none of them has to suffer at the end; they enjoy at our expense. The haves thrive on the miseries of the have-nots.

We do not know how the hon'ble President looks at it. We have only given our observations. But certainly the President has correctly enunciated a fundamental theorem on the Indian economy at the present stage.
Thank you, Mr President.

UP: The troubled heart of India

More than a hundred violent and restless days after Vishwanath Pratap Singh entered office, Uttar Pradesh is still looking for "the government that works." UDAYAN SHARMA reports.

CM Vishwanath Pratap Singh and Mrs Gandhi look at a map showing the state's flood-affected areas

When we reached Lucknow on 18 September the sky was overcast; the next morning it was pouring, and soon life was paralysed in Lucknow; even the trains were not leaving the picturesque Lucknow station. To compound the misery, a wildcat strike by power engineers in Kanpur had plunged most cities and towns of the state into darkness. The weather office said that the sudden deluge was due to a deep depression centring around Allahabad, which was moving northwards accompanied by stormy winds. If anyone was searching for a better allegory for the political situation in Uttar Pradesh today, it would be hard to find one. The present Chief Minister comes from Allahabad, and enough stormy winds have accompanied him in his hundred-odd days in power. His only achievement seems to be that he has made Ram Naresh Yadav into an unsuspected hero: people say that even Yadav's Janata government, which till then perhaps held the record of being the worst UP had ever had, seems to have been much better than Vishwanath Pratap Singh's.

In the middle of September, Chief Minister V.P.Singh had taken what seemed to his detractors to be a long-overdue step: he sent in a letter offering to resign to the Prime Minister. In fact, the Prime Minister must have come to know of his noble intentions from the agency teleprinter at her house, because Singh had submitted a copy of his letter to the Press even before it reached the PM. But this gesture paid off handsomely, as the PM told him to forget about resignation and continue his work. V. P. Singh clearly has a shrewd adviser. By taking the initiative and offering his resignation, he had clearly preempted dissidents in his Party who might go to the High Command to demand his resignation for the utter failure of government which UP is currently witnessing.

And it is not just a failure in tackling communal riots, or police atrocities. It was not V. P. Singh but Brahm Dutt who singlehandedly tackled the serious situation created by the power strike. Cities, already dimly lit, went completely dark. Industries were closed; both passenger and goods trains were cancelled on the important artery between Mughalsarai and Delhi via Kanpur and Tundla. While the state was facing a severe crisis, the Chief Minister was in Delhi (among other things, asking Rajiv Gandhi to join politics). He returned only on 21 September, and met a delegation of the strikers at his residence for next morning's front-page photographs. But what the newspapers did not report was that for almost two weeks the CM had found virtually no time for the accumulating files in his office, and was either in Delhi or spending long hours with his secretaries at suite number one of the state guest house at Mira Bai Marg.

Despite the official support of 306 of the 421 MLAs in the Assembly, V. P. Singh, the twelfth Chief Minister of India's most populous, and most politically sensitive state has not been able to get comfortably astride that bucking horse called administration. He was made CM by the late Sanjay Gandhi, partly because he was the younger brother of the father-in-law of Sanjay Singh, Sanjay Gandhi's most trusted friend in UP politics. Mrs Gandhi has stood firmly by V. P. Singh so far, not encouraging his detractors, and allowing him the opportunity to work without subversive pressure from his own Party. But despite this advantage, Singh has not been able to get a grip on his job. To begin with, his ministry is incomplete (this seems to be a chronic disease with the current set of Congress(I) governments). A team of 20, including ministers of state, is dismally trying to run the most difficult state in the country. And the lack of decisiveness on even crucial matters can be gauged from the fact that for the first time in the history of the UP Vidhan Sabha, a pro tem speaker had to conduct the business of the house for the first two weeks, as the treasury benches could not decide on a name for the new speaker. The upper house, the Vidhan Parishad, is even today being presided over by the pro tem chairman B. B. Singh Chandel.

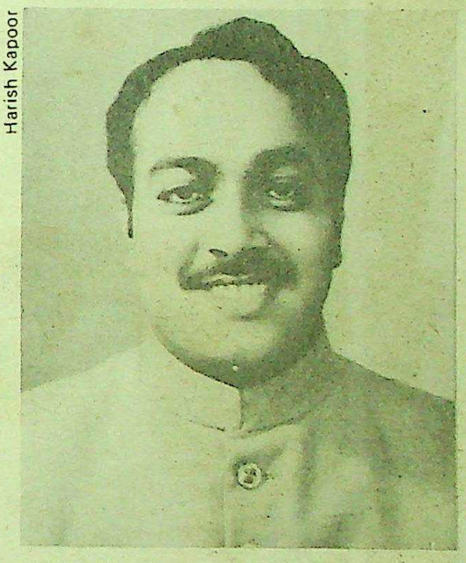
UP's students have been the banana peel of many a Chief Minister. Normally, there are two ministers of cabinet rank in the department of education; one looks after higher education, and the other is in charge of intermediate and primary education. In addition there is always a minister of state in charge of technical education and adult education. In the present government, there is only one minister of state for education, Mrs Swaroop Kumari Baxi, and she is expected to handle the full job. No wonder Allahabad University, which rarely if ever delayed its examinations, is yet to hold the examinations for the academic year 1978-79. A failure of the past government has been compounded by the present one.

Most universities have already seen police lathi charges this year as students express their dissatisfaction over administrative apathy—or use the absence of firm government to indulge themselves. While the Allahabad University has not held examinations, the Allahabad board which controls secondary and intermediate examinations in the state has had to order a record number of re-examinations in 15 subjects. This too is another first.

On 6 April, during President's Rule, which was the de facto rule of Sanjay Gandhi through the two C. P. N. Singhs (the older one was the governor; the younger one is now the minister for state for defence in Delhi), the district magistrate and district supply officer of Sultanpur seized 20,000 litres of diesel from a pump. It turned out that the owner of the pump was one of the pals of Sanjay Singh, who belongs to the adjoining Amethi district. In the end, the two officers found themselves transferred. Then, on 24 August, long after the new government took over, the town of Muzaffarnagar witnessed a unique sight. Members of a flying squad of the sales tax department were handcuffed and paraded through the town because they had seized a few trucks carrying contraband to a factory owned by a minister in the V. P. Singh government.

In yet another display of the arrogance of power, a Congress(I) MLA Shyam Lal Bajpai told the government on the floor of the Assembly that if they did not transfer the SP of Barabanki, he (the MLA) would personally break the SP's jaws. The officer was immediately transferred in order to keep his jaws in place. The district magistrate of Ballia is now on leave, after he had a quarrel with the well-known hijacker-MLA Bhola Pandey. He is now sitting in Lucknow and pleading with the authorities to transfer him out of Ballia as he is afraid to stay in the same place as Pandey.

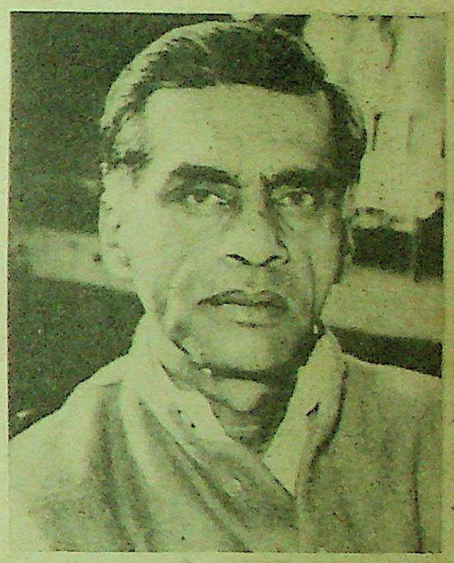


Harish Kapoor

Sanjay Singh

The Chief Minister has been making a show of honesty and efficiency by personally taking raiding parties to ration shops suspected of indulging in hoarding, etc. But the irony is that, a number of times he has reached the suspect's shop only to find the shopkeeper waiting for him with garlands! Obviously the news of the raid had been leaked out. The CM's efforts to curb corruption, in other words, are being sabotaged right under his nose. In some cases, officials of the government itself are diverting wheat to the blackmarket. Seasoned Lucknow-watchers admit that there is nothing new in financiers having links with politicians; C. B. Gupta used to make his fundgivers MPs and MLCs, and other politicians have obliged their moneyed friends in different ways. But rarely have things been as bad as this.

One of the major promises that brought the Congress(I) to power in UP was that they would restore law and order. The preceding Banarsi Das government was destroyed by the Narainpur outrage, but Narainpur seems comparatively mild compared to what has happened in Moradabad, Baghpat, Unnao, Banda, Barabanki. Even if one cannot expect the centre to dismiss the state government on these grounds, surely the police have given enough reason for V.P.Singh to hang his head in shame. The police have become a force of "encounters." The state police handouts have admitted that there have been more than 400 encounters with "criminals" in the past few months. True, there is often reason for the police to open fire on dacoits in the course of arresting them, or preventing dacoity. But such is the loss of credibility (more so, since theft and dacoity are not coming down) that people believe that the police are using the cover of the "encounter" to kill only those with whom they have some enmity. The CM defended his police force in the Assembly thus: "Mere haath khoon se lathpath hain, par khoonion ke khoon se lathpath hain (It is true my hands are bloody, but they are bloody with the blood of criminals)." There can't be many sections of the Indian Penal Code which allow such gory handling of the law and order situation.



Brahm Dutt

In an unprecedented case of corruption, one SP(Vigilance) of the UP government is said to have demanded a bribe from the SP of Barabanki. That itself may not be unusual, but the SP of Barabanki had secretly taped the entire discussion about the bribe and has offered the tapes to the CM.

One of the major reasons for the dissatisfaction in the administration is the large number of transfers that have been done under political pressure: the bureaucrat or the police officer has little hope of settling down in any place unless he is on the right side of the local Congress(I) bosses. Too many transfers took place during President's Rule, and now the elected government has continued this bad habit. In its first hundred days in power, at least 50 district magistrates have been shifted. Some of the transfers have been silly in the extreme. The municipal administrators and the DMs of the five most important towns in UP, Kanpur, Agra, Varanasi, Allahabad and the capital, Lucknow, have been changed more than once. Allahabad has seen three senior SPs in the past 100 days. The first SSP, Mr Sinha, was transferred after a month and a half of V. P. Singh becoming CM. His successor, Girish Bihari, was allowed to remain in Allahabad for just 40 hours, because of the enmity of one of V.P.Singh's secretaries. The present incumbent naturally keeps his fingers crossed. V. P. Singh, a namesake of the CM in Agra, had shown excellent work in Agra as SSP, averting many communal clashes by firm handling, but he was brought back from Agra (which is a sensitive city) soon after the Moradabad incidents and sent to the state CID headquarters at Lucknow; now, he has been sent because of his competence to Aligarh. In the last two months, Moradabad has had three DMs.

A large number of harijans have been appointed DMs; which is a very good thing of course: there are 18 today, which is a record. But too many harijans given such an important charge are being transferred within a fortnight. This is leading to the impression that harijans are not good administrators.

Lokpati Tripathi, health minister and son of Kamalapati Tripathi, is sarcastically called the minister for transfers as the maximum number of transfers have taken place in his department. The matter has become so serious, and the level of sifarish so irresponsible, that the Prime Minister herself has issued instructions that no transfer should be done or stopped at the recommendation of ruling Party MLAs. But the impact of her instructions has not yet seeped down. Curiously, while so many transfers have taken place, the one transfer for which 40,000 people went to jail in western UP (making this the largest satyagraha after independence in that region) did not take place: the transfer of the police from Baghpat.

When the question of development comes up, all that the state government is doing is repeating past promises made by the Ram Naresh Yadav and the Banarsi Das government, promises which they made but could not implement. The Yadav government had promised that they would set up four mini-cement plants; the Singh government, without worrying about copyright, is repeating that. Similarly, the promise of four thermal power plants at Azamgarh, Jhansi, Gonda and Dehra Dun was made by the Janata government, and the present government is talking about it as if this brainwave had just come to them. And though everyone is shouting about these projects from the rooftops, no budgetary provision has been made for their implementation.

One opposition MLA shouted in the debate on industry in the last session that all that the treasury benches seemed to be doing was repeating the name of Sanjay Gandhi. Were they unaware that Sanjay Gandhi had started industrial development programmes, for instance the Noida in Ghaziabad district near Delhi, or in Amethi? What was the great Sanjay sena doing to get these programmes implemented? In fact, what is the Sanjay sena doing?

Their leader is Sanjay Singh, son of the raja of Amethi. He still lives in feudal glory. Every morning a horse comes from the police lines to his doorstep at the spacious 19 Vikramaditya Marg and the Youth Congress(I) president then goes out riding, followed by a policeman on horseback for his protection. On the way, he might stop to give a crony an instruction or two. On 19 September, for instance, he rode into the state government colony on Park Road and his horse stopped outside flat number E3. The policeman was sent in to awaken Azad Kumar Kardam, the Youth Congress(I) leader and MLA from Agra. Kardam came out and spoke to Sanjay Singh, who was still seated on his horse; Singh gave him his instructions and rode off.

In Lucknow they refer to the 100 days of the V. P. Singh government as "Sau din sasur ke (100 days of the father-law)" this is a takeoff on popular Hindi film currently showing, Sau Din Saas ke (100 days of the mother-in-law). Sanjay Singh is the son-in-law of V. P. Singh's elder brother. The Youth Congress boys have indeed enjoyed more than their share of power. They entered Lucknow after winning their seats with a literal bang. A number of them simply walked into government houses which they fancied, threw the occupants' belongings out, and took possession. Sanjay Singh himself took a spacious bungalow at Vidhan Sabha Marg and only vacated it after a public hue and cry; he has now shifted to a less spacious but still big (for a first-term MLA, that is; houses are allotted by hirearchy and seniority) house. Many MLAs have also acquired government houses in their hometowns—which has more than its obvious temporary benefits, because tenancy laws in UP are liberal enough for some of the MLAs to retain possession after their terms are over. And these young MLAs have been in the forefront of using their influence to get officers transferred.

But their contribution to the government on the floor of the Assembly has been negligible. Initially, in the euphoria of victory, their lung-power was highly audible, but eventually even here they could not match the young opposition MLAs who have returned for their second terms. It is common knowledge that a number of people given the Congress(I) ticket had a criminal past. One Congress(I) MLA from Ballia, Bhaskar Pandey, still has a "history sheet" on the files of the local police. He has applied for a licence for 30 carbines, but the local police have objected to such a licence for such a large number of arms being given to a person with a known criminal record. Pandey's patronage, strangely enough, comes from Jagdish Tytler. Following the refusal to give a licence, the deputy SP of Ballia was transferred out.

Few Chief Ministers of UP have lasted very long, for the simple reason that the most populous state of the country also has the most number of problems. And an articulate, politically involved population. The communal problem is perhaps the most serious, but, as we have seen, that is not the only one that a UP Chief Minister has to face. Vishwanath Pratap Singh is only the last, and among the weakest leaders UP has had. By November he must win an Assembly seat to remain CM. Enough people within his own Party think that will be a difficult achievement.

Poor show

The 20-member UP Ministry under Vishwanath Pratap Singh can be faulted on two counts: it is unrepresentative of the whole state and has performed badly. Only seven of the state's 12 divisions, including the Chief Minister's home division, Allahabad, are represented in the Ministry. Allahabad has the largest representation of six ministers, followed by four each from Lucknow and Meerut divisions, two each from Bareilly and Garhwal divisions and one each from Gorakhpur and Varanasi divisions. Agra, Faizabad, Jhansi, Kumaon and the newly formed Moradabad division are unrepresented. The situation is ironic for Agra, which handsomely returned all Congress(I) candidates in the last Assembly poll. Even the group of MLAs from a particular division is not entirely representative: three of the six ministers from Allahabad division, the CM V. P. Singh, Jagdish Prasad and Amin Ansari, are from the Allahabad district.

On the floor of the legislature, the performance of only four ministers Brahm Dutt (Finance, Planning and Power), Lokpati Tripathi (Health), Ammar Rizvi (Parliamentary Affairs) and Balram Singh Yadav—has been noteworthy.

"Our IGP is doing a very good job"

After several days of trying, Udayan Sharma and Shubhabrata Bhattacharya finally caught up with the hardpressed Chief Minister of Uttar Pradesh, Mr V. P. Singh, at 10 pm on 22 September in the state guest house in Lucknow. The city looked embattled and isolated with power and communications disrupted by floods and industrial unrest. The CM defended his record and his government confidently on a wide range of issues.

CM Vishwanath Pratap Singh

Q: It is being said that you rely more on the bureaucracy than the politicians belonging to your Party. Any comments?

A: Perhaps few Chief Ministers have shaken up the bureaucracy as I have done in the past three months. There is perhaps no pride (in me) in saying that I have taken action against about a thousand officers in the last three months. I would not have mentioned this if you had not put the question. The number of suspensions and vigilance action too have been large. Even in the police, within two months 18 sub-inspectors, 16 head constables and 98 constables were suspended and action has been initiated against more than 900 policemen. Some people have the habit of insulting officers in front of a hundred people and the impression goes around that a particular CM is very tough on the bureaucracy. But I am different. This (the bureaucracy) is the instrument you have to take the help of to run the administration. If a bureaucrat is wrong then punish him. I have not spared anybody. For instance, when I detected bungling in sugar in Lucknow I not only put the guilty person behind bars under the P. D. Act but also suspended the area rationing officer and the inspector. It is not my job to go on inspections but if I have gone on an inspection and some hanky panky is detected then the person in charge has to be held responsible for it. There are officers also who have cooperated a lot in the last three months in tackling the administrative challenges. For instance, after the Emergency examinations were never held properly in this state. Now the examinations have taken place smoothly. Of course, I had to take a very stern attitude and post the police and the PAC outside examination centres and also order searches of examinees to ensure that no non-student entered the exam halls.

Q: We understand that the number of re-examinations ordered by the Allahabad Board this year has been rather high, in some 15 subjects or so.

A: No, re-examination was ordered in one subject only and that may be due to some previous decision—a decision taken in March or so. Secondly, floods were another major administrative challenge which we have faced and even the central board which came to study the floods has praised our alertness and our arrangements. When I was in the opposition and worked in the flood-affected areas, I realised what kind of bottlenecks arise. Soon after taking over, I ordered the disposal of relief funds with the district authorities and Rs 10 lakhs per district was vested in district magistrates so that they did not have to run to Lucknow for help in an emergency and relief could be distributed smoothly. They came to Lucknow only when these funds were finished and another sanction was given. By now some of the districts have distributed up to Rs 80 lakhs as relief. While we have punished some officers it has to be admitted that by and large the officers are doing well and you cannot just run them down.

Q: How do you view the law and order situation in your state?

A: Our data says that there has been a 14 per cent drop in the crime rate since we have come to power. You may say that this is government data. In that case take the data of the press: one and a half months back the press used to have so many items on rape in UP. Today you do not find them. So you must give us credit for stopping the rapes. No newspaper is publishing even one line saying that this government has succeeded in stopping rapes. I suggest you do some research. Leave out the Moradabad and other communal incidents. Pick up any newspaper of last year and scrutinise the number of crime reports in one month and then pick up one month's papers during our rule and check up on the crime figure. You will find a decline of 50 per cent. Last year there were so many cases of necklace snatching, of couples going on rickshaws being robbed, of dacoities. This year there are very few such cases. Of course, in a big state like UP there will always be some incidents but by and large things have improved.

Q: What concrete steps are you contemplating to tackle the explosive communal situation in your state and to restore the confidence of the minorities which has been shaken after the Moradabad incidents?

A: The flare-up in Moradabad was of course very sad but thereafter in almost every town there was an attempt (to create disturbances) and the pattern was almost the same: somewhere in some mosque a piece of pork meat would appear in the morning. Somebody would have placed it in the night and in the morning there would be a (tense) situation. The history of UP indicates that whenever there was trouble in Meerut, there was trouble in Agra but this time whenever there was trouble it was (locally) contained within a few days. The district authorities, and in some instances the minorities, for instance in Lucknow, were a big help, they held meetings and issued statements to maintain peace here. By governmental action—through the police or the army—I can only bind hands, not hearts. I know the limitations of government action in such matters and finally a binding of hearts has to come on the human plane.

Q: Why did you offer to resign?

A: One journalist had asked me that question after I resigned and I said that it was a continuation of the cabinet concept which I had initiated. Soon after I took over I said that for anything that went wrong in a district the DM and the SP will be held responsible. Then certainly I should own responsibility if something goes wrong with the province. Even over the radio soon after the (Moradabad) incidents had happened, I had owned up moral responsibility for the incidents. In the Assembly when I stood up to speak on the subject, the first sentence I said was that I have not come to give explanations but to seek punishment.

Q: There are too many complaints about the PAC. What steps are you taking to improve this force? Also why is it that whenever there are communal riots the confidence of the minorities is restored only after the PAC has been removed and the army or the BSF has been deployed?

A: Well, talking in very clear terms, the PAC is the only striking force that the state government has with it. But I would not like to blame the whole PAC as such or condemn it, because policing is a thankless job. A policeman's job is not simple, like that of the block development officer. So I would not condemn the whole PAC. But certainly I would say that the PAC has to be better trained. What has happened is that till the Congress regime quit in 1977 deployment the of PAC deployment units was about 40 per cent of the total force, that is while 40 per cent of the force used to be deployed (in active duty) the rest used to be rested or put through training. During the three years of Janata rule, the development of the PAC went up to 80 to 90 per cent as there was more trouble and the time needed for training was not available. Moreover, the units were overworked.

Q: But the PAC has been a source of trouble for the UP government even before the Janata regime. Take the fate of Kamalapati Tripathi in 1973, for instance.

A: It was, but it had also done fine work earlier. I know officers of the minority community who have served with the PAC and they are proud of the units. In the past the PAC was sent to Maharashtra to maintain law and order. And it had a very good reputation. It is a basic question of training the units properly. After all, the armymen, the BSF jawans, the PAC personnel and policemen—all are drawn from the same population. It is the same village or the same town that gives the men for these forces.

Q: It is being said that there was involvement of foreign money and arms in the recent communal disturbances in your state. What proof of foreign involvement do you have? Moreover, what information do you have about the arrest of a Pakistani spy in Agra?

A: You have seen my statements. I have hardly made any on this (foreign involvement). I have myself ordered a judicial enquiry into the causes and the sequence of the events in Moradabad. Therefore any comment from my side would not be fair. Moreover, facts at the moment have become associated with theories so it will be better for me not to comment. But at the same time, it is my duty to find out what happened. So I have ordered the enquiry.

Q: What about the Agra spy?

A: A Pakistani national has been arrested in Agra. He is a foreign national overstaying and that is all.

Q: There have been many killings due to police encounters in the last few months. What does your government have to say about this sudden spurt in the number of police encounters?

A: Immediately after assuming power we had decided on a dacoit-combing operation and, frankly speaking, the operation was enforced vigorously. The effectiveness of it I could judge from the comments made by the Chief Ministers of neighbouring states, Rajasthan and Madhya Pradesh. Jagannath Pahadia and Arjun Singh spoke to me separately but their comments were the same. They both told me that the dacoits of UP were running away to their states. I told both of them that all my actions will be of no use unless you take simultaneous action on their side of the border as well. As a result the IGPs of the three states met about a month back to coordinate their anti-dacoity actions. I need no more proof that our IGP is doing a very good job.

Q: While appreciating the role of your police in apprehending and weeding out dacoits, one must say that in the process an incident like the one at Baghpat also happened. Should you not issue clear guidelines to the police that having apprehended someone on the charge of being a dacoit, they should let the law take its own course?

A: That (instruction) we have already issued. But even on the Baghpat incident the opposition has not said that the deceased were not dacoits. I can show you the letters written by Charan Singh and Ram Naresh Yadav in which they have said, maybe they were bad characters. Even the opposition has not said that they were not criminals. None of them (those who were killed at Baghpat) had less than eight to nine criminal cases against them, including murders. But again there is a judicial enquiry on it and therefore except for saying that there is a criminal record for each of the three (deceased) I am not saying anything. But while saying that the police force has to be firm and effective, I certainly agree with you that it should not be brutal.

Q: The proximity of UP to Delhi makes it easier for central leaders to come here. I find that the union home minister Giani Zail Singh rushes to UP very often. He went to Baghpat with a parliamentary delegation, he rushed to Moradabad on 14 August. Did he inform the state government about his intention to visit these trouble spots?

A: Yes he personally spoke to me. There is no such clash between the state and the centre. After all the law and order situation and the integrity of the country are a unified concept.

Q: But law and order is a state subject. It is your prerogative. If the union home minister comes so often to your state does it not create confusion?

A: I think I do not suffer from such ego problems, so that when I have asked the centre to send me the army and the CRP, to the home minister I should say, "You do not come!" (laughs) You see the fallacy of the situation. Why will I not ask for his help and also guidance on the matter?

Q: Somebody told us in Lucknow that Giani Zail Singh does not inform you before he moves into your state.

A: No, every time he informs me. It is a different matter that his helicopter is faster and we could not reach Moradabad before him. But when I have asked for central forces what is wrong if he comes?

Q: A last question. You were in Delhi recently where you tried to persuade Rajiv Gandhi to enter politics when you met him with a delegation of your PCC (I) and AICC (I) office-bearers dealing with UP. Do you think that the state of your Party organisation is such that you should need an outsider like Rajiv Gandhi to lead it? Moreover Sanjay Gandhi had been a product of a political movement launched by your Party during the 33 months of Janata rule. What role did Rajiv Gandhi play in that movement?

A: I have met Rajiv earlier also and requested that he should consider entering politics and in case he does so he should consider contesting from UP. But during this particular visit I could not meet Rajiv because he was on his regular flights. So we met Indiraji and I presented to her the signatures of all the MLAs of UP (asking Rajiv Gandhi to join politics). Now, about Rajiv being an outsider in politics, how can he be an outsider when the whole Party wants him? He is an insider, and very much more of an insider than anybody else. Ask any common Congressman and have a referendum on the issue. You would find that 100 per cent will say, 'Yes, we want Rajiv.' If that is the feeling, he is not an outsider. He is right in the core of the Party.

Our wide, wide range: It's only 50% of our story.

Yes. It's true that Colour-Chem offers you a wide range of pigments and dyes. Which covers a complete spectrum of shades —from yellow to black—for every product line. And which covers a variety of properties and price levels as well. To meet all your requirements.

And, what's more, this range keeps growing wider.

Yet, this is only 50% of our story...

The other 50% is the fact that our products are the result of world-class technology. And every batch is rigorously tested before it comes to you. To help you get good results. Batch after batch.

What's more, when dealing with us you get the benefit of our reliable technical service. Whether it's a question of assisting you with formulations and colour matching. Or helping you solve some tricky technical problem that threatens to disrupt your production.

These are the two halves of our story. And they add up to one thing: if you're in the market for pigments and dyes, your best bet is Colour-Chem.

"This is a sasur-damaad government"

The sasur is the CM; the damaad is Sanjay Singh, president of the state Youth Congress(I). The most vociferous critic of Vishwanath Pratap Singh today is Mohan Singh, the young Lok Dal MLA who was the minister of state for industry in the Banarsi Das government. An original socialist, Mohan Singh has one singularly unique achievement: he, in a sense, caused the dismissal of his own government. It was Mohan Singh who first broke the story of the Narainpur outrage, and the centre used this as a handle to dismiss the Banarsi Das government. SHUBHABRATA BHATTACHARYA interviewed him in Lucknow.

Q How is this government worse than yours?

A: The Janata Party was composed of ghataks (factions), so if there were differences it was understandable. But the Congress(I) is a Party of ghulams—of people loyal to one leader, so why should there be lack of coordination? Take, for example, the divergent statements of ministers and other politicians connected with the government. Despite the well-known policy of Mrs Indira Gandhi on the states, the sugar and revenue minister of UP Yashpal Singh has demanded the division of the state into three parts. Both the CM and the finance minister of the state opposed the abolition of sales tax at the CMs' conference in Delhi on 16 and 17 September; but simultaneously UP's health minister Lokpati Tripathi announced in Varanasi that the state government had been considering for the past month and a half abolition of sales tax and its replacement by some sort of a production tax. Who should we believe? The CM has been announcing from the rooftops that his government has already received the money from the centre to set up four big fertiliser plants, but his industry minister told the Assembly on 15 September that he only hoped he got the money. Who should we believe?

It is a pity that before the Assembly elections this Party was speaking the language of the Muslim League, and now it is speaking the language of the RSS. Before the polls, Mrs Gandhi said that the minorities should not be crushed; now, when they are being crushed, she is saying that the minorities should not get emotional. At the Darul-uloom in Deoband, before the elections, Mrs Gandhi had welcomed foreign funds for the Islamic university at Moradabad; today her home minister Zail Singh and CM Vishwanath Pratap Singh are saying that foreign funds are the root cause of the Moradabad incidents. What should we believe?

Speaking at the Rakshabandhan ceremony at Nagpur, RSS chief Balasaheb Deoras said that the Provincial Armed Constabulary (PAC) in UP should not be demoralised. In the UP Assembly during a debate, Congress(I) youth leader Sanjay Singh and parliamentary minister Ammar Rizvi too pleaded with the government that the PAC should not be demoralised. Four days after they had pleaded in this fashion, the PAC again had to be removed from riot-torn Aligarh and the army and BSF had to be called in. If the PAC really is a secular and efficient force then why does the state government have to remove it from riot-hit areas? Worse, nobody in the Congress(I) can raise his voice. The ruling Party MLA of Moradabad Hafiz Mohammad Siddique was humiliated by the local authorities, but no one in Lucknow thought of pulling up the administration for doing this.

Q:You have alleged that the new government has no programme. How do you substantiate your charge?

A: We had initiated two main schemes: antyodaya and food-for-work. The first has been scrapped, and the government does not have enough foodgrains to implement the second. The government has failed this year to build up a buffer stock of wheat because the procurement price was lower than the market rate. The government has admitted in the Assembly that this year's procurement is ten lakh metric tonnes less than last year's. Moreover, 50 per cent of the state's revenue comes from the agricultural sector. The CM has claimed that as the rains this year have been good, the crop too would be good. But in many parts the rains have been excessive, causing floods. Moreover, four districts in western UP are facing a shortage of water: Moradabad, Badaun, Muzaffarnagar and Rampur. On he other hand, floods have ravaged the central and eastern districts. Fertiliser prices have gone up by 38 per cent. The supply of power to the agricultural sector is poor. The kharif and the sugarcane crops have done poorly. So where is the cause for optimism? The coming year will be full of hardships.

And while the resources of the state have been dwindling, the administrative costs have been shooting up. The common man's tax-paying capacity has declined, and there is no new avenue for collection of additional tax. Our government had taken stiff measures to curb tax evasion and blackmarketing. We had handcuffed the offenders. But today, the sales tax authorities are themselves being handcuffed and paraded on the streets! Three officers of the sales tax flying squad were going on their normal beat on 24 August at Muzaffarnagar. They caught three truckloads of contraband which belonged to a mini steel factory, Rainbow Steel, which is owned by Vidya Bhushan, the minister for forests. Instead of being rewarded, the sales tax officers were handcuffed and paraded on the streets! The maximum sales tax revenue comes from the western districts of UP, and after this incident, no officer is willing to stick his neck out in this area—and the state's coffers are being denied legitimate funds.

This government is run by a coterie; it is a sasur-damaad (father-in-law-son-in-law) government. Sanjay Singh, the president of the state Youth Congress(I) is married to the daughter of V.P.Singh's elder brother. Sanjay Singh's father Dhananjay Singh, the former raja of Amethi, is the president of the UP Kshatriya Mahasabha. Unfortunately even the rajputwad of this coterie benefits only the rich rajputs, and does not percolate down to the common rajput who tills the land.

Joyoti Basu and Promode Dasgupta at a CPI(M) rally in Calcutta

CPI(M): Bodyweight, 100kgs; strength, 0?

Marxists look into the mirror and are not happy

Calcutta: Three years of power, and what is the result? To find out, the members of the CPI(M) state committee in West Bengal held a closed-door, four day session in September. Discussion was frank, and a secret document made available to us through our sources confirms that a strong section of the local leadership was not in a very happy mood.

Some leaders maintained that the Party had gained tremendously: expanding its base, strengthening its mass organisations, and even making inroads into the state machinery—the police, for instance. But many others were not so optimistic. They thought that the CPI(M) today had become like a gaddiwala—its bodyweight might be an obese 100 kilograms, but its strength was nil: the Party had lost its fighting spirit, and that might be suicidal. These leaders alleged that the Party today was full of opportunists (the inimitable Bengali word dhandabaaj was used), and even some senior cadres had become more interested in favours from the government than the cause of the oppressed. It was such degeneration, they pointed out, which had led to the Congress Party's downfall. A Marxist Party like the CPI(M), they alleged, had become a victim of the bourgeois parliamentary system—and even suggested that the Party leave the government to restore its credibility and stop the rot.

However, the majority in the committee supported the leadership of both the Party and the government. The leadership admitted some weaknesses, and promised to rectify them, but asserted that continuance in the government would still help the Party to create a revolutionary situation in eastern India.

The organisation report submitted by the state secretariat to the state committee members shows that the CPI(M) has reasons to be happy with its performance on a few crucial fronts. The total membership of the Party now stands at 67,043 (of which 16,868 are candidate-members). But the report admitted that a large number of the older workers had not renewed their membership, though no specific figure of how many such cases there were was given. According to the report, "nearly 40 per cent of the membership" is new and "they have joined the Party since 1977": that is, after the Party came to power.

The most spectacular growth (and commendable too, in Marxist terms) has been among the farmers. (See box for these and other specific figures.) Its second most successful effort has been among women, though the present membership is still way short of the Party target of 7.25 lakhs. Among trade unions too, the Party has grown appreciably.

On the other hand, there has been a sharp decline on the student and youth fronts. The Students Federation of India has lost in about 70 per cent of the college union elections in both urban and rural areas to the Chhatra Parishad of the Congress (I). The SFI's membership has also gone down to nearly half in the last three years. Even among the poor, the SFI has been losing ground at a rapid rate. In Calcutta, which is dominated by the middle and the lower middle class, the SFI's strength has come down from 17,196 members in 1978 to 9,247 today. In 24-Parganas, the industrial and agricultural district which surrounds Calcutta, membership has come down from 51,004 to 16,500. In 1979, the CPI(M)'s youth wing, the Democratic Youth Federation (DYF) had a membership of 510,184; today it is 220,788—despite the fact that the Party's target for 1980 was 7.5 lakhs.

The secretariat posed some vital questions in its organisational report. We quote: "We must not forget for a moment that the reactionary forces are not sitting idle. Authoritarian forces are active. Disruption is being sought to be created by vested interests against our Party and the Left Front government. A communist Party must continuously prepare itself to meet their offensive. Have we been able to change the correlation of class forces as we wanted? With the present opportunities and possibilities we can quickly expand and consolidate the Party, but have we been able to do it? These questions have to be dealt with seriously."

Some members of the state committee said that the secretariat should have been more explicit in admitting mistakes. They demanded that the degeneration of Party cadres should be accepted as a fact, and erring members should be severely warned. The Party leaders explained that fears of a bad Press prevented them from taking stern action against cadres.

But even this restrained organisational report admits: "The functioning in the district and local centres of the Party is not up to expectation. Party circulars are not properly attended to, and all district committees do not reply to them. Most of the leading cadres at the district, local and branch level are bogged down by too many jobs, and others are entrusted with administrative functions. District committee members and MLAs are given jobs in too many committees. Local leaders are bogged down with panchayat and municipal activities. Hence the work of the Party organisation is being neglected at all levels. This is a serious weakness.

"Nearly 40 per cent of the membership consists of newcomers who have joined the Party after 1977. They have not been given even elementary Party education. Branch secretaries are not trained, and for an expanding organisation this is a must. A plenum resolution stated that oral propaganda, and speeches in general body meetings should play a big role in educating the branch members and secretaries. But this is not always done nowadays. Thus the political level of the Party cadres cannot be raised to the extent that they can cope with the present complicated situation.

"Due to the lack of politicisation of the Party and the masses, the rate of growth of our Party and mass influence has not increased up to expectations. Though the recent panchayat by-elections are not criteria for judging our strength and influence, we still have to think seriously over it. In the last parliamentary elections also we have seen that the increase of the Congress vote is greater than the increase of our vote in industrial, city, as well as some rural areas.

"The failure to instil the spirit of collective functioning among the leading cadres at all levels has been the root cause of personalised functioning of panchayat pradhans, panchayat samitis and the zilla parishad sabhapatis. In many areas the people have not been involved in panchayat work despite repeated directions to this effect from above...There is no doubt about our big achievements in governmental and panchayat activities—but at the same time we should realise that some of our comrades fall prey to bureaucratic tendencies, corrupt practices and other bourgeoisie vices when they function in the present administrative and panchayat apparatus...There are instances of breach of Party discipline. But this is not a general feature of our Party life; these are all exceptions, due to the lack of understanding of political significance of maintaining Party norms and discipline. New recruits have not been trained in the elementary rules of the Party.

"Above all, the basic weakness lies in the fact that there is inadequate realisation in the Party, especially among the leading cadres in the districts, about the special responsibility on our Party, which is running the state government. A Party running a government should have new tactics and methods to solve the people's problems and tackle the issues. How to behave with the people—all this has to be learnt anew, keeping in mind that we are running the government."

Will the CPI(M) in West Bengal be able to rectify these mistakes, which, as this story shows, it is already aware of? Meanwhile, it is faced with a problem about which no one is talking very much, but which can affect the Party seriously. The strong man of the Party, Promode Dasgupta, is 70 years old and in bad health; Chief Minister Jyoti Basu is 67 and suffers from high blood pressure. There is no one else at the moment who can provide the strong and disciplined leadership which alone can rescue the Party.

BY-ELECTIONS

Congress(I) goes on trial

Delhi: The Congress(I) will face its first major popularity test after the May-June Assembly elections, in what will virtually be a mini general election around November-December. The Election Commission has announced its plans to hold several by-elections around that time. As many as four Congress(I) Chief Ministers are not MLAs, which they must become to remain CMs. They are Abdul Rehman Antulay (Maharashtra), Jagannath Pahadia (Rajasthan), Janaki Ballabh Patnaik (Orissa) and Vishwanath Pratap Singh (Uttar Pradesh).

Altogether 19 Lok Sabha seats, 36 Vidhan Sabha seats, spread over 12 states, and one Rajya Sabha seat are vacant. Besides, the Metropolitan Council and the Municipal Corporation of Delhi, which were dissolved after the Congress(I) came to power, are yet to have their elections. The total number of by-elections, due to be held, including those to the Legislative Councils of some states, is at present 204. Strangely, the Representation of the People Act, the law which governs the elections, is silent on the time-limit within which a by-election must be held after a seat falls vacant. This naturally provides any ruling Party the opportunity to keep on postponing the elections till such time as is politically suitable for it.

Of the 19 vacancies in the Lok Sabha, five are from UP: three have been caused by deaths (Sanjay Gandhi from Amethi, Aziz Imam from Mirzapur and Mifiryar Khan from Bareilly); two are due to resignations (Vishwanath Pratap Singh from Allahabad and Hemvati Nandan Bahuguna from Tehri Garhwal); and the Serampore seat in West Bengal became vacant with the death of Mr Dinen Bhattacharya of the CPI(M). Twelve seats are vacant from Assam along with a single seat from Meghalaya (elections will not be held here till the agitation is resolved). The vacancy in the Rajya Sabha occurred when Delhi's Khurshid Alam Khan retired and could not be replaced since there is no Metropolitan Council in the capital which forms the electoral college for this seat.

Interestingly, only one of the five MPs who became Chief Ministers has resigned his seat. Normally, a member vacates his seat in the Lok Sabha only after he has won the by-election in the Vidhan Sabha. It is believed that Vishwanath Pratap Singh vacated the Allahabad seat because a section of the Congress(I) leadership wants Rajiv Gandhi to enter Parliament from the Allahabad constituency.

Of the 36 vacant Vidhan Sabha seats, six are from West Bengal, five from UP, four from Bihar, three from Haryana, two each from Maharashtra, Madhya Pradesh, Karnataka, Meghalaya, Orissa, Assam, Gujarat and Tripura and one each from Andhra Pradesh and Manipur. Besides, there is a possibility of two more Assembly seats falling vacant—one in Karnataka and another in Nagaland—in case the Supreme Court upholds the High Court judgments setting aside the two elections. The appeal in the Madhya Pradesh High Court against the election of the Union Civil Supplies Minister Vidya Charan Shukla from the Mahasamund Lok Sabha constituency, is pending before the Supreme Court.

The Union Territory of Delhi is now without any representative body. The Delhi administration has been made into a virtual pocket organisation of the Lt Governor, Mr Jagmohan, and is being run under the guidance of men handpicked by the late Sanjay Gandhi: Police Commissioner Pritam Singh Bhinder, Municipal Commissioner J. N. Singh, New Delhi Municipal Committee president P .N. Behl and Delhi Development Authority vice-chairman V. S. Ailwadi. There are others like Arjun Das, the motor-mechanic friend of Sanjay Gandhi and the youth Congress(I) leader, Manoharlal Khurana, who is on the managing board of the super-bazars.

The ruling party expects the economic situation to improve rapidly by November with a record kharif crop in October and acting as a damper on prices. By then the communal tensions in UP will, hopefully, also have subsided. But will memories continue to remain as short as they have been in the past?

For Rugby addicts

Calcutta: Rugby is a game played by men with peculiarly shaped balls. These immortal words of William Webb Ellis, the founder of modern rugby, were prominently displayed in a poster at the Calcutta Cricket and Football Club (CCFC) which played host to the recently concluded All India and South Asia Rugby Tournament which was won by LMOB (the Lamartiniere Old Boys'). This levity, apart, the 55-year-old tournament (held alternatively in Calcutta and Bombay) was conducted this year with meticulous planning and attention by a small group of enthusiastic men led by CCFC vice-president R. A. W. Thomas and S. M. Osman

For Calcuttans, the dying embers of interest in the game were rekindled once again as 12 teams of rugged men "scrummaged" into the fray oblivious of broken noses, black eyes and laundry bills. There are not many rugby players in the country today. For it is not a game that comes naturally.

But last week at the CCFC these doleful prognostications seemed out of place as avid rugger addicts rubbed shoulders with hundreds of curious uninvited spectators who watched the proceedings and were thrilled

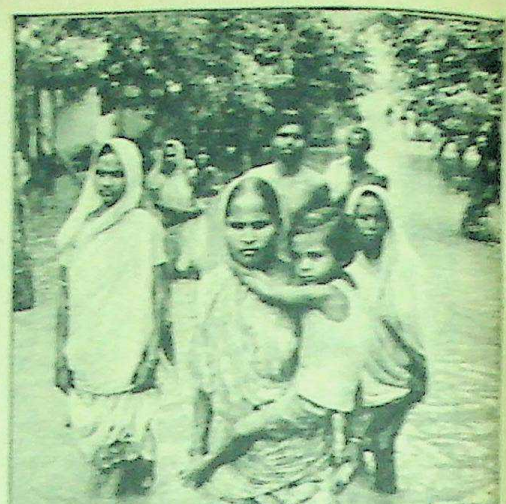
FLOODS

Another havoc

Bhubaneswar: "We are marooned. Everything around us has gone under water; only the jail, the police station and the hospital have been spared. Rush help." The frantic signal was radioed by the circle inspector of police from Gunupur, a prosperous sub-divisional town (pop: 15,000) in south Orissa at precisely 3.31 am on Thursday, 18 September. Only 30 minutes before he shouted the message Bansadhara river had breached its embankment and cascaded into the town. Fed by incessant rain in the delta area, the river had been swelling for the past 48 hours. It reached the protective embankment at 3 pm on Wednesday, spilled over at 11 in the night and finally swept the embankment itself four hours later. The town remained under 10 to 14 feet of water for the next eight hours.

Just as the government was preparing to organise relief to Gunupur, distress calls flowed in from Kashinagar, another sub-divisional town in south Orissa. The same Bansadhara river had surged into that town also. Chief Minister J. B. Patnaik tried to reach Gunupur by an air force helicopter on Friday but returned to Bhubaneswar from midway because of bad weather. When he finally made it to Gunupur in a larger chopper sent from the Kalaikunda air base in West Bengal on Saturday, a hostile crowd received him with brickbats. There was a mad scramble for food as the helicopter touched down. The people there had eaten nothing for two days and started pelting stones at the helicopter when they found that it had not brought enough provisions.

To add chaos to the confusion, the power supply in entire Orissa collapsed. The Hirakud hydel station suddenly stopped generation with the Mahanadi flood waters seeping into the cables; the Balimela power station had gone out of commission a couple of days earlier; and the Talcher thermal plant also broke down. Barring the Rourkela Steel Plant all industries were shut down. Even Raj Bhavan, the state secretariat and hospitals in Bhubaneswar had to do without power.



Fortunately Bansadhara subsided as fast it had risen. But Mahanadi and its tributaries fed by discharges from the Hirakud reservoir and the Naraj barrage, continued to inundate new areas. By 24 September, large areas of Cuttack, Puri, Koraput, Ganjam, Kalahandi, Bolangir, Sambalpur, Phulbani and Dhenkanal—nine of Orissa's 13 districts—had been flooded. The official death toll mounted to 320; some 3.4 million people were turned destitutes; and about 850,000 acres of standing crop was lost.

The first major relief operation could, however, start only on 21 September morning, three days after the flash flood had struck the Orissa coast, with the IAF airdropping some 12,000 kgs of food and medicine at Gunupur. Bad weather restricted the operation to just one sortie on that day and Air Commodore M. M. Sinha, conducting the operation, said that Gunupur did not appear to be inhabited. "Not a soul, not a house." That is how he described the place.

The exact nature and extent of the damages are yet to be ascertained. Most of the flooded coastal areas remain inaccessible. With most roads breached and telegraph poles uprooted all down the line, it is the ubiquitous transistor which is providing the only communication link to the marooned millions.

FRUSTRATION

BARC's harassed scientists

Bombay: A top scientist at the Bhabha Atomic Research Centre (BARC) Dr R. Y. Deshpande has sent an "emotional and melodramatic" letter of resignation to Mr Homi Sethna, which says that the distraught scientist would prefer retirement to working at BARC, and will be joining the Aurobindo Ashram. Mr Sethna is said to be perturbed. He called the scientist for a chat but nothing is known about whether the ashram will be richer and the BARC poorer.

Deshpande (50) was head of the technical physics division of BARC, and the immediate provocation for his despair was the way in which his claim for promotion to the top post of scientific officer was bypassed. In BARC the grades are something like: SD-SC-SCD-FC-FD-FE-FF and FG, the last being the highest. Usually a committee, consisting of representatives of the physics, chemistry, biology and engineering units of the Directorate of Atomic Energy (DAE) as well as secretaries attached to the Atomic Energy Ministry are supposed to meet to choose who is to be promoted to a top post. But this year nothing of the sort happened. Neither the heads of the units nor the two outside members of the DAE, namely the secretaries, were there. The coterie that sat in judgment rejected the claims of two top scientists. The other was Dr Ramani, who is head of the division of Desalination and Effluent Engineering (DEED). According to the talk prevailing in BARC, where there has been outright disgust at the methods of promotion for some years now, the two top scientists have been discriminated against because they dared to make observations about the working conditions at BARC which angered the establishment. Dr Ramani, it is said, had repeatedly highlighted the need for a verbal policy to rehabilitate frustrated scientists.

Mr Deshpande is well-known for having made the thermo wax chambers used in Bhaskara and Rohini (the Indian satellite) and these worked well for screening components. He has also made mass spectometers. The DAE had wanted to import Rs one crore worth of these spectometers for heavy water plants, but Mr Deshpande objected, saying he could deliver them. He was overruled and imports were ordered. And then he was victimised when his claim for the highest grade was denied. This is not the first time that a meritorious first grade scientist has been humiliated, said one infuriated scientist to this correspondent.

There have been scores of examples, but those punished have generally been too small a fry to find a place in the newspapers. Now the same policy has affected another well-known scientist, Dr P. V. Iyengar, who was given a show cause notice to explain why he had accepted a gift of Rs 5,000 from the Kerala government. The Kerala government had given awards to outstanding scientists from Kerala and Dr Iyengar, who was earlier a recipient of the Padma Bushan and the Bhatnagar Award, was also honoured. It is understood that the Home Ministry has now cleared the acceptance of the award, but the pettiness which it showed has created great animosity towards the ruling clique in BARC.

Last year the Indian Council of Agricultural Research (ICAR) had honoured Mr S. H. Patil for discovering a mutant of groundnut for the biology division of BARC. But his own superiors at BARC treated him so shabbily that the scientific officers' association had to take up his case. When Patil went to Delhi to receive the award, instead of granting him leave to do so, the department cut his earned leave. They said he was going on social duty and not official duty. One of Dr P. V. Iyengar's colleagues, Dr S. E. Kannan, was also treated in a similar manner. He was chargesheeted and censored for writing to a professor at the University of Illinois, USA, and accused of having violated the rule of applying for jobs abroad. Dr Kannan contested this accusation and asked that the matter be referred to the Home Ministry, but that was not done.

The treatment to Deshpande and Ramani has further aggravated the situation between the rank-and-file scientists and the scientist managers. The latter have refused to give information even on such matters as the precise framework of rules and regulations governing the terms of employment of scientists, seniority lists and the promotion norms. In fact, requests from the BARC Officers' Association (BARCOA) to draw up guidelines for transfer of scientists from one field to another was termed interference in the management's prerogatives. In January 1980, BARCOA had written to the Prime Minister drawing her attention to "the ascendancy of bureaucrats and the absence of 'rule of law' in promotions prevailing at BARC." They had said that in order to administer by the civil service rules, the scientist managers had to take the help of the functionaries. And this was then used by the bureaucrats to acquire undue control over the working scientists. Their trick was to suggest to the scientist managers that all their decisions in personnel matters, however unfair or arbitrary, could be legitimised by appropriate manipulation of the rules. The fact that this frequently involved violation of those very rules of their selective or discriminatory applications was no problem, since most scientists, including the scientist managers, were unfamiliar with the intricacies of the rules and could not effectively defend themselves.

Occasionally, when in certain cases these rules could not be used as a stick, additional rules were drafted and enforced. The fact that it was often done without due authority was not noticed, again because of the ignorance and even distaste among most scientists for legal detail. In the case of the DAE, when the illegitimacy of all this was pointed out, the sensitive nature of the department was freely cited to justify such actions. "There was thus no restraint of the scientific ethic or the rule of law. Any demands for the rule of law, such as those made by the association repeatedly, were invariably met with the threat of using more civil service rules for disciplining scientists. In this task the bureaucratic functionaries used the enormous prestige of the DAE to recruit the help of such agencies as the Central Vigilance Commission and the Union Public Service Commission who upheld even the most perverse charges made by the administration against the scientists. At the same time, bureaucrats guilty of even serious offences went scot-free. In this process the scientist managers slowly became totally dependent on their bureaucratic allies. The latter became more powerful than most senior scientists."

Mrs Gandhi received this letter in January but she has not bothered to talk to the complainants. Her oft-repeated concern for science and technology had raised enormous hopes among scientists and the scientific community. But these hopes have been frustrated by the disregard for vital issues that affects the morale of honest scientists wanting to contribute their services to the nation.

BIHAR

Students fight for their right to cheat

Patna: Any student caught cheating in an examination in Bihar can face imprisonment upto three years and/or a fine of Rs 5,000. That is the revolutionary content of an ordinance passed by the Bihar government in early September. No other state has had the courage to officially challenge so boldly a malpractice which seems to have become endemic. But if Chief Minister Jagannath Mishra was under any illusions that the law he has pushed through has actually stopped cheating, they were quickly dispelled. In fact, the students of Bihar have virtually launched what can only be called a pro-cheating agitation, with the support of not merely opposition leaders but also with the help of those Congress(I) leaders who have been demanding the resignation of Dr Mishra.

Magadh university, which was holding its intermediate examinations even while Patna was passing its anti-cheating law, witnessed unprecedented scenes of violence against the teachers who were acting as invigilators. As many as 12 teachers, including a lady, were attacked in the first five days of the examination. The assaults began from the very first day, 9 September. Bindeshwari Prasad Singh of H. D. Jain College, Arrah, was attacked viciously by students armed with iron rods while he was returning home after completing the day's invigilation. His skull was broken, and he went into a coma for 96 hours at the Patna Medical College Hospital before being flown to the All India Medical Institute in Delhi, where he is still struggling for his life.

Bombs were thrown by angry students at many places. At many "disturbed" centres in Patna and Arrah, teachers refused to do invigilation duty for fear of their lives: they were replaced by home guards and government clerks. When the protests from teachers became too loud, the government was forced to postpone the examinations scheduled for September 15 and 16. And during those two days, arrangements were made to provide teachers with the police assistance. Police have been posted on the campuses—with the right to search pockets for hidden weapons. (This, incidentally, has created a furore among the women.)

Acording to the ordinance, cheating becomes a cognisable offence. Magistrates on duty have been made co-centre superintendents. Provision has been made for an on-the-spot trial, by an officer above the rank of DSP. Teachers conniving in cheating can be jailed for three months to two years. Invigilators have been declared public servants (Lok Sewaks), and any obstruction to their work can result in two years' imprisonment.

As examination centres begin to look like battlefields, the pro and anti-cheating debate is raging all over Bihar. "How can the police, the most corrupt section of the administration, launch a war against cheating?" asks one examinee. Others point out that if the police seriously started to deal with cheating, they would simply not have the time for any other work.

Different political Parties have criticised this ordinance, seeing behind it a conspiracy to "break teacher-student unity", and thus prevent any chance of a 1974-type movement ever happening again. The young BJP MLA Lalmuni Choubey told this correspondent angrily, "Karpoori Thakur's prohibition ordinance resulted in the growth of an illegal trade in liquor, leading to deaths due to consumption of poisonous liquor. This ordinance too will have the opposite effect from its intention—it has already led to assualts on teachers, and it will result in an increase in cheating." Even from his own party, Dr Mishra gets no peace. In an open letter to the CM, Vidyakar Kavi, a senior dissident in the Congress(I), has attacked the ordinance, saying that it is even more harsh than the ordinance against blackmarketeers and hoarders.

NAXALITES

MGR talks, police shoots

Madras: Naxalites willing to reform can ring up 22345 or 422222 in Madras city for a chat with Tamil Nadu Chief Minister M. G. Ramachandran. The offer to hold 'frank discussions' with the Naxalites was made by MGR in mid-September after some top police officers concluded that the morale of the Naxalites in the state had gone down considerably. But this offer has apparently not been a temptation enough. None of the top-ranking Naxalites have talked to the CM yet. However, MGR, incorrigible optimist that he is, thinks that the 'response has been encouraging.'

At the same time, the police hunt continues, guided by Walter Davaram, an ambitious and strong-willed DIG. A major drive to flush out the extremists was launched in the first week of August following the death of three policemen in a bomb blast near Tirupattur. A police posse had arrested the Naxalites, bound them hand and foot and bundled them in a car. A few minutes later, a countrymade bomb exploded, killing inspector Palanisamy, two constables and a Naxalite. Two other Naxalites, who had been in the car, died in hospital a few hours later.

The police then started combing operations in "Naxalite-infested" areas of Tirupattur and Dharmapuri. The operations will continue throughout October, despite MGR's offer to hold dialogues. There have been reports, meanwhile, of deaths of "prominent" Naxalites in police custody. Two "notorious Naxalites", Subramanium and Shanmugham, were shot dead by the police in a village near Tirupattur on 11 September in the early hours of the morning.

For more than seven weeks, DIG Davaram and his colleagues have been combing the hilly terrains of Yelagiri on the border of Karnataka and Andhra Pradesh. The combing operations start around two in the morning as dozens of policemen armed with rifles, torches, binoculars and hurricane lamps negotiate hilly terrain, and look into caves and other possible hiding places.

Curiously, journalists who visit Tirupattur come back with interesting stories. T. N. Gopalan of the Indian Express who was in Tirupattur on 15 September was assaulted in broad daylight by a "Naxalite" a few yards away from the police station. "I had spent nearly half an hour with the police and I was going towards my lodge. A self-proclaimed Naxalite kicked me and warned me not to write anything about them," recalled Gopalan.

It is not only in Tirupattur and Dharampuri that the police are intensifying the drive against Naxalites. Lawyers, too, who have defended the extremists in the past have been rounded up. P. V. Bhaktavatsalam, a Tirupattur lawyer, arrested on 16 August, has been refused bail. Bhaktavatsalam, the brain behind the organisation for civil and democratic rights, had demanded that the state government should provide relief to the members of the families of the three suspected Naxalites who had died in the car blast near Tirupattur. He had said: "They were not held guilty by any court and they are entitled to compensation."

A few days later, V. Chokalingam, the printer and publisher of Makkal Seighi (People's News), a daily with a small circulation, was arrested for publishing "seditious" articles. Then came a more sensational arrest. K. V. Sankaran, president of the Advocates Association, who had attended a Madras city meeting of the civil and democratic rights organisation in his "individual capacity," was arrested on 1 September. Sankaran who had defended several alleged extremists in the past was accused of having said that "only by doing away with the police could the government be toppled."

It is believed that more "vigorous" steps against the Naxalites will follow. According to a police spokesman Interpol would be asked to investigate the flow of foreign money and arms to the Naxalites. Efforts are also being made to check the infiltration of Naxalites into the police force during recruitment. For the first time in police history the background of the candidates is being checked thoroughly by the intelligence department.

OBSESSIONS

Testing the venom

Kozhikode: Velayudhan sat like a man possessed in the glass chamber. Around him were 31 cobras, three vipers and 11 kraits. But the 33-year-old class four employee of the Kerala State Electricity Board was firm in his determination to become the world's first man to live for more than 75 days with his "45 venomous friends." He was bitten four times since he entered the glass chamber on 17 August, and the fourth time it nearly cost him his life. That was on the 19th day. Feeling giddy, he was removed to an intensive care unit and given a 120 ml anti-venom injection. After 61 hours he felt better again and re-entered the glass cage ignoring the advice of Dr Warrier, who was constantly monitoring his physical condition. As a form of appeasement, the young adventurer gave a letter to the organisers signed by him and his wife which stated that if anything untoward happened, the responsibility would be his.

The yagna catapulted Velayudhan to fame, bringing him a substantial amount of money. Till the 26th day of the snake yagna, more than two lakh people had filed past the glass cage, paying a rupee each, to watch the spectacle. The corporation of Kozhikode took 32p per rupee as entertainment tax while the herpetologist took 60 per cent of the takings.

The organisers of the yagna had wanted to get the feat of endurance recorded in the Guiness Book of World Records but Velayudhan failed them. On 16 September, he abandoned his efforts.

Velayudhan's snake yagna has inspired others to undertake similar feats. Within a space of one month the stage has been set for two more yagnas—in Cochin and Coimbatore. In Cochin, Dr Tommy Joseph, the managing director of the Tomman Joseph Memorial Institute in Idukki district which specialises in snake studies, is planning a similar feat of endurance. Either Dr Joseph or his younger brother William Thomas, will try to stay in the snake cage for 120 days with 122 snakes starting on 2 October. The second yagna is being planned by Parthasarathy, who had earlier bettered his own record for walking backwards (this record is yet to be recognised by Guiness, who must be more responsible than anything else for such 'achievements').

Capital flight

Trivandrum: The customs officer asked the routine question: "Are you carrying any Indian currency with you?" Two bearded Sikhs, Santosh, 35, and Gurumukh Singh, 30, who had turned up at the counter on Friday, 5 September to be cleared for the flight to Colombo leaving Trivandrum in another 30 minutes said they had about Rs 620 in Indian currency between them. To which the officer replied that an individual is entitled to carry only Rs 20. When Santosh asked what they should do, the officer said curtly: "It's your headache". But on second thoughts, the officer said they could deposit their excess money with a friend or acquaintance and even leave the counter and go out to the lounge to do this.

First, the two Sikhs tried their luck at the State Bank of Travancore counter. The bank refused their deposits because it dealt with foreign exchange only. The two men scanned the crowd for somebody whom they could trust with the money. There was none. Time ticked away, and in desperation they returned to the customs counter to plead with the officer for permission to carry the money. The officer refused, and, predictably, asked them to try once more: "Surely, you will find someone you know outside."

And once more Santosh and Gurumukh failed. In sheer anger and frustration, they turned up at the customs counter, pulled out the currency notes from their pockets and tore them up, one at a time, with the rest of the passengers staring at them in surprise. "We think, we can go in now," Gurumukh said triumphantly—only to be disappointed. By now a couple of policemen who had been summoned by the customs officer had started picking up the torn pieces of the currency notes. "Tearing currency notes is against the law," the police told Santosh and Gurumukh and led them to the nearest police station. After some time, the police, apparently moved by their plight, decided to let them off with a warning.

Moral: You can't win.

Just be good

President Jimmy Carter loves his brother Billy but not the embarrassment the younger brother has been causing him regarding the Libyan deals. And to prevent another 'Billygate' Jimmy Carter has drawn up a set of guidelines or "advices" as he calls them, not only for naughty Billy but also for some of his relatives who might sometimes wish to step out of line. And to give his set of rules some semblance of respectability, he has asked government employees to abide by them. They will, however, have no legal authority and will not be binding on future Presidents. The President's rules were being drawn up, according to senior White House officials, because "most people in government simply need some indication of what they should or should not do."

Working relationship

Did the Polish workers' strike have any effect on Big Brother Moscow who was apparently not only watching the developments but also helping the Polish Communist leaders in the negotiations with the workers? It did. The Russians were worried that their workers too would be affected by the same virus. So western broadcasts were jammed. But then such an event could not be ignored. Many Russians living in European Russia came to know of the strike and the subsequent victory of the Polish workers. In a frontpage article on 15 September, the Pravda urged Soviet industrial officials, by way of warning, to heed workers' complaints in order to preserve the "unity of the Soviet society and the solidarity of the people around the Party." But it is certain that the Soviet Union will not allow its workers so much leeway as the Polish Party did although the conditions are similar: there are inefficiencies, shortages and bottlenecks. The Pravda article, however, projected an optimistic picture: it was all praise for the Soviet Communist Party which had created an atmosphere where "free, conscientious toilers could happily work together."

UPI

On Deng Road

UPI

"If you need food, get Zhao Ziyang," cried Chinese peasants, about ten years ago. And with good reason. Zhao Ziyang, the new Chinese Premier, is known to be an economic wizard—for the way he transformed the economy of his native Szechuan province. A rich landlord's son, Zhao's talents were recently recognised by his powerful mentor, Deng Xiaoping. Hence his appointment. With Zhao at the helm now, China shall follow the capitalist line, and begin the march to economic advancement under the guidance of superior technocrats.

Some opposition

Filipino dictator Ferdinand Marcos is as incorrigible as ever—even after being confronted by what is shaping up to be his greatest threat: the broadest and strongest-ever opposition combine of 72 opponents and eight political Parties. The opposition front, which christened itself the "National Convenant for Freedom", passed a resolution on 29 August—the 84th anniversary of the "Cry of Balintawak" when Andres Bonifacio plotted to overthrow the Spanish colonialists—demanding an end to the eight-year martial law. The occasion was symbolic, for, among other things, the oppositionists protested against American bases in the Philippines. For one thing, opposing the USA makes little sense if the Philppines must guard against Soviet designs in Vietnam and Cambodia. Marcos' opponents also argue, hopefully, that if the country is to be saved from economic chaos, martial law and Marcos must go. "This is the last-ditch effort," they also warn, "to head off a bloody confrontation."

Briefly

Lollipops

If you are boss of a junta and have just taken over your country, what is among the first things that you should do? Ask General Kenan Evren, latest head of state of Turkey after yet another coup in that country. On September 14, using the carrot and the stick with the simple-mindedness which only the worst army officers can achieve, he announced a 70% pay rise for workers, and "postponed" all strikes "till further notice."

Aid?

In 1979, the USA (which has an old, justified but no longer relevant reputation for generosity) spent more on potted plants for homes (5 billion dollars) than on aid for the Third World (4.6 billion dollars). And opinion polls say that four out of five Americans still want a further cut in the amount of aid. In the late 1960s, the USA gave 0.4% of its GNP to the Third World; only France, Australia, Belgium and Holland gave a bigger share. Last year, the USA was giving just 0.19%—and only Italy among the developed, democratic nations was giving less! Traditionally, most US aid has been given under bilateral agreements with nations. Last year, 40% of all bilateral aid by the US went to Egypt and Israel as reward for signing the Camp David agreement.

New era?

Among the Islamic communities celebrating the arrival of the 15th century according to the hijri is the large Muslim community of central Asia living under the conglomerate entity known as the USSR. Communist Moscow, perhaps in an effort to improve its face with the Muslim world, allowed an international Islamic conference in Tashkent between September 9 and 12. More than 70 countries attended. However, no unanimous resolutions could be passed.

Oppression

The latest target of the Iranian Islamic fundamentalists is the small community of Baha'is. Seven of them were executed as spies in the town of Yazdi in September; in August nine members of the Baha'i National Spiritual Assembly were arrested. The 450,000 adherents of this faith in Iran are believers of Baha'ullah, who appeared in Iran and preached the unity of all religions. The Baha'is are pro-Shah and refused to vote in the referendum making Iran an Islamic state.

Rekha Chakraborty (46) learnt the trade from her mother 27 years ago. And Rekha's knack of reproducing originals on mat with threads of many colours is uncanny. (The photographs here show the original portrait of Uttam Kumar which appeared in an issue of Anandalok and Rekha's embroidered reproduction of the same.) She has exhibited in Bombay, Delhi, Madras and at home in Calcutta. But she refuses to sell her work. However, at a recent exhibition in Salt Lake, Calcutta, Rekha put up four items for sale. Her decision surprised many of her admirers. But Rekha had her reasons: she was trying to raise funds for Rekha Chitram—an embroidery school which she is opening on 1 October this year.

Shooting star

Director M. S. Sathyu is on to his next venture—Bhoomi—a bilingual film (in Hindi and Kannada). The film is about a young IAS officer's efforts to combat drought in Bidar, and the problems he faces in helping the drought-stricken people despite all political pressures. And guess who the actress is? Young and pretty Lavlin. This is her first venture and, as Lavlin says, "I think I have got a very good break. The film gives me good opportunity to express myself." She thinks very highly of director Sathyu. "He is a brilliant director who understands what he is doing and tries to bring out the best in the actors and actresses," she says. And what does she intend to do in the future? Said Lavlin: "I don't want to act in just any film, especially the run-of-the-mill films. I would like to choose my films instead of going totally commercial. Say, films with a specific purpose." She is off to a good start too. "I have received offers from a number of major producers and directors and I have been received very well in the industry." But about the industry itself she has many reservations. Said Lavlin: "It is a rat race, and I personally do not intend to get into it. But I'd definitely love to work in good films and maybe devote my life to acting." Lavlin has blossomed into a very good photographer too, with initial help from superstar friend Raghu Rai. In fact her first exhibition of photographs is scheduled to open in Delhi at the Art Heritage gallery from 2 October and will continue till 15 October.

RAGHU RAI

The visionary

"I wanted to be more than anybody else." And it seemed a reasonable explanation for Siddharth Kak's involvement, first with management, then with ghost-voicing and film-acting and now with journalism. In his quest to "be more than anybody else," Siddharth first came into the news by winning the Made for Each Other contest with his wife, Geeta. That was years ago. He returned to a quiet life, while Geeta went on to make a tremendous impact on the screen with her performance in Garam Hawa. But the irrepressible Siddharth has surfaced again, this time with a quarterly journal on films. The first two issues of his Cinema Vision bear enough evidence that this is an attempt at serious film journalism. Cinema Vision has been well received. Even the British Film Institute gushed: "(Cinema Vision is) without doubt the most important and informative Indian film magazine ever."

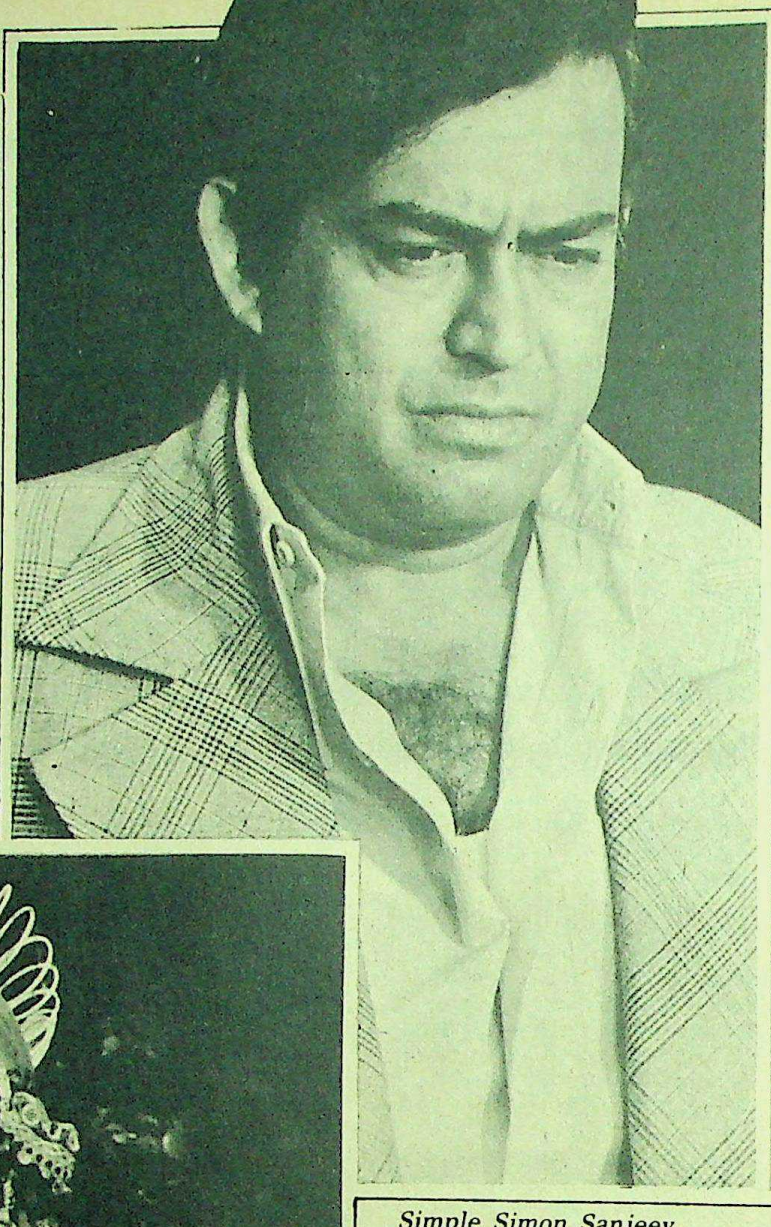
KHAS BAAT

IT'S no use putting it down to merely Rishi Kapoor's illness. One must admit that Raj Kiran is really good. Or else why would people praise his performance and say he scored over Rishi in Karz in spite of his small role as compared with Chintu's? And now Raj is getting films by the dozen. Recently Yash Chopra signed him for a film which will also launch a pretty, fresh female face. Much can be said of Raj, in spite of his tactless ways. The boy clearly nursed a Chintu-complex as he can never forget how Chintu along with Dimple Kapadia, broke all previous box-office records in Bobby. At that time Raj Kiran (also trying to be an RK!) was being groomed by B. R. Ishara for Kaagaz ki Nao with newcomer Sarika. The film flopped and Raj Kiran was pushed into oblivion. This happened six years ago. Now Raj is very much on his own and doing well too.



Raju Upadhyay

SPEAKING of Raj Kiran's tactless ways, remember the time when he was shooting for Karz and told anyone who cared to listen that he had a strong infatuation for a woman older than himself, Simi, his co-star in the film. He declared that he loved her poise, her class and what not. Well, news even went around that he was trying to woo the lady long after the film was complete and released. Nothing wrong with that except that Raj's raised many eyebrows among the filmi crowd.

THAT Jayshree T is madly in love—over the past so many years—with Sanjeev Kumar is well known. But must she advertise the fact that her dream-man must be simple, have a strong sense of humour, must be fat and round for that is what makes men large-hearted and kind—characteristics typical of Sanjeev, who is known as Simple Simon Sanjeev! Jayshree T even manages to look like Hema Malini with the clever touches of make-up, just to attract Sanjeev (since he is still nursing a big Hema-hangover) but getting nowhere closer to Sanjeev than an empty tiffin-carrier.

AFTER Moushumi declared in her typical style that she has so many sarees that she has to give them away, readers and friends have been playing all kinds of practical jokes on her. And she seems to enjoy being made a laughing-stock! Doesn't she realise that her sarees are no big deal, even if she wanted to give them away free? Yes, if it were Raakhee announcing an annual sale of her sarees things would have been different. There will be a stampede near her house or wherever she chooses to sack them!

WONDER if the Dimple-Rajesh reunion has put an end to the acrimonious battle that had begun when Dimple made the headlines by declaring that she was treated very cruelly by Rajesh Khanna. Rajesh had in turn laid bare her two-year-old affair with Vijayendra Ghatge, which she must have indulged in just to reassure herself of her youth and beauty. At the time of writing the two are closeted in their room at Aashirwad with a do-not-disturb order. Not even phone calls. So it is a happily-ever-after ending after all!

AS RATI will be making it big in Bombay, her brother hopes to strike gold in Madras. He's soon going to get hitched to a Tamil girl. "Tamil films mean a lot of hard work, Telugu films mean a lot of money, and Hindi films mean a lot of talk," says Rati's father Roop Agnihotri. Rati seems to agree with him. But then Hindi films also mean plenty of money, isn't it?

PREETHA'S maiden film Thenir about the plight of tea estate workers is almost complete. She's considered to be one of the brightest newcomers to hit the Tamil screen. It's believed that she'll soon make a film for Bhagyaraj, the successful actor-director.

RUMOURS are afloat that Shoba's mother Prema Menon is packing off to Singapore where a couple of her relatives, including an uncle, are settled. Her features in a popular Tamil weekly about her daughter are coming to an end. As expected the lady has gone out of her way to make innumerable slanderous comments about Balu Mahendra. But did she ever think that by doing so she was giving her daughter a bad name? In one of the features, she spoke at length of Shoba coming home sozzled. Shoba's co-stars as well as directors swear that she would not even touch the mildest wine. When Balu glanced through the writings, he asked a friend to convey a little message to Prema: "Write any damn thing about myself, but spare your daughter. Don't spoil her name further. Don't circulate cheap rumours about her."

BHOLI BHAALI Shoma Anand was hauled over the coals by director I. V. Sasi. That was Pramod Chakravarthy's version. Chakravarthy had commissioned Sasi to make Patita. a Hindi version of Sasi's all-time hit Her Nights. The film was originally designed as a quickie but it took more than a year to complete. Pramod says that it was all Sasi's fault: Sasi not only went around pinching Shoma you know where on the sets but also suggested that he'd make her a big star in Kerala if she could render "fayour". Shoma did one Malayalam film for Sasi where she played the second lead to Seema. Arattu flopped badly and Shoma gave up hopes of making it big in Kerala. Things started worsening after Arattu according to Chakravarthy. He accuses Sasi of terrorising Shoma, and of blowing up money on hard drinking. Sasi has repudiated all the allegations. Chakravarthy had no guts to make a simple realistic film and that was the beginning of a serious misunderstanding, accuses Sasi. And then, of course, this business of Shoma's forehead caused a great deal of trouble. Sasi and his cameraman thought that Shoma's forehead was terribly ugly. They wanted her to do her hair in such a way that a part of her forehead would be covered. But Chakravarthy vetoed their idea. As things stand now, Patita has been largely re-shot and the advertisements just don't mention Sasi's name.

Rati Agnihotri

AN AMERICAN hitchhiker who showed up in a couple of Tamil films, including Kaali had a hectic time in a city hotel where she was said to be distributing favours rather liberally. The situation became so "alarming" that the hotel management asked her to leave. A number of up-coming actors tried to have a nice time with the girl but she was a bit wary of the film crowd. "They promise you the moon, but once the passion has faded, they forget all the sweet promises," she told one of them. She didn't mind flirting with a "still" photographer. But she alienated him after she went through his pictures. "How much do you get for these pictures?" she asked him. He named a figure. "Ugh," said the girl, "if you were taking pictures in America, you'd be making a fortune." "Maybe," shot back the photographer, "but do you think that you would make millions in America?"

EXCITING things are happening in Rati Agnihotri's house. Brother Raakesh is going to set up a couple of fast food shops in Madras city. The emphasis will be on exotic snacks and he has plans to open up a chain of such shops all over the South in the course of the next three years. Disco music will be a permanent feature of his shops. Surely he has the young crowd in mind.

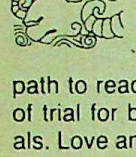
Beginning 5 October
This week the Sun, Jupiter and Saturn are in Virgo, Mercury and Uranus are in Libra, Mars and Neptune are in Scorpio, Ketu alone is in Capricorn, Rahu is in Cancer, Venus is the only planet in Leo. The Moon will be moving through Virgo, Libra and Scorpio from Leo.



ARIES (March 21—April 20) You may have to take a loan to meet urgent expenses this week. You are advised to pursue a new path to reach your goal. This is a period of trial for businessmen and professionals. Love and matrimonial affairs are well signified. Your domestic front will also be calm and a source of happiness. There will be a marked improvement in your financial condition. Avoid disputes and speculative ventures. Good dates: 7, 8 and 10. Lucky numbers: 1,3 and 10. Favourable direction: South-east.

TAURUS (April 21—May 22) You will be faced with severe competition in your business or personal life. This should be met with patience and courage. You are advised to consult elderly friends and relatives. Progress will be slow in professional matters. A valuable friendship will develop. Take care while investing money. Look after your health which is bound to cause some anxiety. Try and use your initiative in business matters. Good dates: 6, 8 and 11. Lucky numbers: 1, 3 and 10. Favourable directions : North and East.

GEMINI (May 23 — June 21) There is a threat to your professional life this week. You are advised not to allow any member of the opposite sex to interfere with your professional work. A new friendship will provide you with a lot of confidence. Differences among partners are foreseen. Be on your guard against deceit. Avoid getting into disputes and arguments. Financially, however,this is a very good week for you. You are advised not to take too many risks. Keep a watch on your health. Good dates: 6,9 and 10. Lucky numbers: 1,3 and 10. Favourable directions: North and East.

CANCER (June 22 — July 22) You will make progress this week. Your financial condition will show a marked improvement. But you should be careful not to neglect your domestic front. Take particular care while dealing with the women of your family. Do not undertake journeys this week. Avoid extravagance. You will be required to take hasty decisions and are advised to exercise tact and discretion in this matter. Keep up your correspondence with friends. Good dates: 5, 6 and 9. Lucky numbers: 3, 6 and 9. Favourable directions: West and South.

LEO (July 23 — August 22) You need plenty of rest and peace of mind this week. The results of your activities in the last few weeks have not been commensurate with your efforts. Do not let this dampen your spirits. In reality you are very close to your goal. Stand your ground and do not give in. There will be good news for you in the weeks to come. Your friends will stand by you and give you confidence. You need not worry about pending court matters and debts. Good dates: 8, 9 and 10. Lucky numbers: 1, 3 and 6. Favourable directions: West and North.

VIRGO (August 23 — September 22) Despite some initial trouble this is a happy week for you. You will gain through property or legal matters or at least have the opportunity to do so. You are advised not to take undue risks. Concentrate on your plans for the future. Your domestic front may cause you some anxiety. Do not get into disputes with elders. A good week for romance and matrimonial affairs. Good dates: 7, 9 and 11. Lucky numbers: 4, 7 and 8. Favourable direction: South.

LIBRA (September 23 — October 22) You will face hurdles in your path this week. In spite of your efforts you will feel disappointed. Your health will also cause you anxiety. Be careful in your dealings with elders or those in authority. Pay attention to service details. Avoid speculative ventures. Try and meet your problems with patience. Businessmen are advised to guard against deception. A letter from an old friend or distant relative will, however, bring some good tidings. Keep an eye on your expenses. Good dates: 8, 10 and 11. Lucky numbers: 1, 2 and 9. Favourable direction: West.

SCORPIO (October 23 — November 21) You will make good and steady progress throughout this week. You will get the chance to gain through a secret matter or association. Your business will show signs of improvement. You are advised to guard against extravagance and over-optimism. Lovers, however, are likely to face new hurdles. Elders will stand in your way. The domestic front will not be too happy. Good dates: 5, 6 and 9. Lucky numbers: 1, 3 and 4. Favourable direction: South-west.

SAGITTARIUS (November 22 — December 22) An old friend will render you good service this week. New interests will contribute to your happiness. Your financial condition will improve. But you are advised to conserve your resources. Medical expenditure is likely in your family. This is a good time for love and matrimonial affairs. But do not neglect your business or professional interests. You may have to undertake a short journey. Good dates: 7, 9 and 11. Lucky numbers: 2, 5 and 9. Favourable direction: South-east.

CAPRICORN (December 23 — January 20) Your associates will cause problems for you this week. They will indulge in false allegations and criticisms. But you need not worry about your domestic front. Things will move quite smoothly there. However, be careful in your dealings with your spouse or elders in the family. Do not get into controversies. This is not the right time for major changes. Love affairs are well signified. Good dates: 9, 10 and 11. Lucky numbers: 3, 6 and 9. Favourable direction: West.

AQUARIUS (January 21 — February 19) Many pleasant surprises are in store for you this week. It is also a good time for courtship and marriage. Care is advised in professional matters. You are also advised not to spoil your chances by impulsive decisions. Secret matters will progress well. You will get the opportunity to make appreciable and vital changes. Avoid legal matters and complications. A good time for romance. Good dates: 5, 6 and 7. Lucky numbers: 2, 6 and 11. Favourable direction: North.

PISCES (February 20 — March 20) This is a quiet week for you. You will make steady but not spectacular progress in all fields. You will get the opportunity to meet old friends and relatives who will be of great help to you in the weeks ahead. Pay attention to family matters. Keep up your correspondence with business or professional associates. Look after your health and be careful in your dealings with members of the opposite sex. Good dates: 5, 6 and 9. Lucky numbers: 4, 7 and 8. Favourable direction: East.

KANPUR: Some 'dead' persons have also expressed their desire to take part in the liquor auctions this year and for this they had applied for the issue of solvency certificates from the Tehsil office. The 'dead' persons had submitted their applications along with the receipt of the payment of water tax and house tax of the Kanpur Nagar Mahapalika and their applications were duly verified by the oath commissioners and the notaries. The Kanpur Tehsil office had received about 150 odd applications for the issue of solvency certificates. But on physical verification, some surprising facts came to light. According to official sources, in some cases it was found that the applicant had died about six years ago and there was no property left in his name. In some other cases the addresses given in the applications were found fake. The district authorities were contemplating legal action against about two dozen such cases—National Herald (Anil Kumar, Fatehgarh, UP)

TIRUCHI: Trains are not supposed to wait for late comers but student leaders seem to have other ideas. This morning (2 September) the Nagore Thanjavur passenger steamed out of Ammapet but the chain in some of the bogies was pulled by students of a private college at Poondi and the train came to a halt. When the train crew wanted to know the reason for stopping the train, they were informed by the students that their leader Dinakaran missed the train at Ammapet. The train suffered a detention of about 45 minutes before Dinakaran boarded the train—Indian Express (Arulraj, Madras)

NEW DELHI: Two brothers, Abdul Haq and Riaz Shahid, separated during the 1947 turmoil, have found each other again after 33 years. The two brothers who lived in Sham Chaurasi village in Hoshiarpur district, were migrating to Pakistan with their parents when Abdul Haq was lost. Riaz Shahid made frantic but futile efforts to trace him. Then, by chance a Pakistani visitor met Abdul Haq now a barber in Aurangabad (Maharashtra). Abdul Haq mentioned to him the name of his brother, Riaz Shahid. Could he not be the same person as the Mayor of Faisalabad the visitor wondered. On return he found that this was so and had it confirmed through photographs obtained through the Embassy. Abdul Haq has now left for Pakistan, where he would meet his brother, old mother and other relatives, says a Pakistan Embassy release—The Hindustan Times (Gurinder Singh Mann, New Delhi)

MORADABAD: The Central Reserve Police force first shot a person though inadvertently and then provided blood to save his life. The person Mohammad Taufeek was found by the CRP men in a serious condition from a house in the Asalatpura locality last week. The CRP men had entered the house for a search after they were fired upon from the house. The fire was returned in which Taufeek is believed to have been hit. In the hospital where Taufeek had been admitted he had been fighting for life for want of blood. Having come to know of it 40 jawans of the CRP were sent to hospital for offering the needed blood for Taufeek. Finally the blood of Naik Sant Narain was found matching with that of Taufeek. The Naik donated his blood to save Taufeek's life—Northern India Patrika (Ajai Mehrotra, Allahabad)

ERNAKULAM: A lady overseer, Sosamma, was locked up in her National Highway office at the Bannerji Road for over three hours on Friday (5 September). Reason: she was a bit late in coming out of the office which was closed at 4 p.m. That the office was to have functioned till 5.30 p.m. was another matter. As she was to leave the office she found all the exits locked. Frightened she cried aloud to attract the attention of other office leavers in the same multistoreyed building. However, they found the lock unbreakable. Some of them contacted the police officers. But they were in the midst of a conference at the Collectorate. After much discussions the Ernakulam Central Police Station got the permission to break open the door. And they did it with a bang. As the harassed lady came out by eight in the night the Executive Engineer was also there. After some persuasion arrangements were made to drop her at her residence near Perumbavoor. Moral: leave the office as early as possible, lest you be locked up—Indian Express (K. Aravindakshan, Trivandrum)

RAIPUR: Alekhandas, a private candidate for M.A.(sociology) of Ravi Shankar University, who could not appear for the examination this year on account of illness, had a pleasant surprise to get his mark sheet showing that he had secured 187 out of a total of 400 marks and hence declared successful—The Times of India (Surya Deo, Patna)

Europa Cup Final

The Europa Cup, chess' equivalent of the European Cup, does not attract quite so much attention as its football equivalent, but certainly lacks none of the excitement. The final played between the Soviet champions, Burevestnik of Moscow, and the Dutch, Volmac of Rotterdam, promised to be a rather one-sided affair; a sort of Nottingham Forest versus the part-timers of somewhere-or-other who have a couple of good players but the goalkeeper is a part-time dentist and the left back runs a hairdressing salon etc., the Dutch being on paper at any rate heavily outgunned. The strength of the Moscow team could be gauged from the fact that they named ex-world champion Vassily Smyslov as their reserve for the first round. In the event the match very nearly produced a major upset, the Russians (continuing the football metaphor) only winning in extra time after scoring a last minute equaliser. Undoubted hero of the Dutch effort was their young European Champion Van der Viel who produced two sparkling wins against strong grandmasters. Barely 21, he already plays with the authority of a seasoned grandmaster and is clearly the most promising young Dutch player to emerge since Jan Timman.

I give his first-round game in which he demolishes a very strong and experienced opponent.

White: Rasuvajev (Moscow). Black: Van der Viel (Rotterdam).

READERS often cast doubt on good plays attributed to well-known players. Nothing is more boring, I agree, than to see a standard brilliancy reported as though it had been achieved recently by some friend of the writer. It is a trap into which I never fall deliberately. But sometimes it is difficult not to be sceptical. See what you think of this deal, reported by Le Bridgeur in a feature called 'The best deals of the month.'

Dealer, South. Game all.

	♠ 6 ♥ A K 4 3 ♦ 8 7 2 ♣ A 7 6 5 4
♠ Q 10 2 ♥ Q J 9 8 7 ♦ K 10 5 ♣ 9 8	N W E S	♠ K 9 8 7 ♥ 10 6 5 ♦ Q 4 ♣ Q J 10 2
	♠ A J 5 4 3 ♥ 2 ♦ A J 9 6 3 ♣ K 3

South plays in Five Diamonds and West leads the Queen of hearts. In preference to making a frontal attack on the diamonds, South cashes the side winners and ruffs two spades and one heart, to arrive at this position:

	♠ — ♥ 4 ♦ 8 ♣ 6 5 4
♠ Q 10 2 ♥ J 9 ♦ K 10 5 ♣ —	N W E S	♠ K ♥ — ♦ Q 4 ♣ Q J
	♠ J ♥ — ♦ A J 9 6 ♣ —

South leads the Jack of spades, and the defence seems to have no chance to make more than two tricks. If West discards, declarer ruffs and leads a heart from dummy. East may ruff high, but South loses only to ♦ K and ♦ 10. If West ruffs the spade with ♦ 10, again he makes only one more trick.

But study the possible effect of ruffing ♠ J with the diamond King and exiting with a heart. East does best to discard a club. South ruffs and thinking that ♦ 10 must be on his right, leads ♦ J from AJ9. East wins and promotes his partner's trumps.

A leading French player, Daniel Versini, remarks that he made this super play of the King of diamonds at the table.

stamps

Medieval coins are featured on four new stamps from the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg. One of them (above) is a silver grosso portraying Count John of Luxembourg, who in 1310 succeeded his father-in-law as King of Bohemia. After a long career as a royal mercenary, King John became blind but earned a niche in English history by fighting on the French side and dying gallantly at Crécy in 1346. There appears to be no contemporary evidence for the picturesque tradition that the Black Prince picked up the dead king's shield and claimed for himself its device of three ostrich plumes and the motto Ich Dien. The grosso is exceptional among 14th century coins in having a lifelike portrait of the monarch. Its English equivalent was the silver fourpence, which was known as the groat from its French contemporary the gros tournois, first minted at Tours about 1260. It was Edward III, the victor of Crécy, who made the groat a regular feature of the English coinage, though it had been issued briefly by his grandfather, Edward I.

YC(I) CIVIL WARS

On 13 September Maneka Gandhi came briefly into public focus again, after a long time, when she came out of 1, Safdarjung Road (the PM's residence) to calm the frayed tempers of an angry crowd of about 500 Youth Congress(I) activists. But this story is not really about Maneka, it is about the growing frictions in the Youth Congress(I) after Sanjay's death. A tree-planting ceremony had been organised by one of the general secretaries of the Delhi Pradesh Youth Congress(I), Satish Yadav, at Uttamnagar in rural Delhi on 13 September. The Union Minister for Agriculture Rao Birendra Singh, the Haryana Power Minister Mehr Singh Rathi, the Delhi Pradesh Congress(I) chief H. K. L. Bhagat, the Delhi Youth Congress(I) president Jagdish Tytler, the MP from outer Delhi Sajjan Kumar, and the Youth Congress(I) general secretary Sarvjit Singh were all invitees. While Mr Tytler was enjoying himself in Paris (that was where he had gone), and could therefore be excused for not turning up in the less salubrious environment of rural Delhi, none of the other VIPs turned up either to honour the memory of Mr Sanjay Gandhi. An angry Mr Yadav, who must have told all his followers that he would make all the VIPs turn up, loaded his workers into trucks and drove straight to the PM's house to protest. The truth soon came. Two Youth Congress(I) office-bearers, Rati Ram and Shadi Ram, had sent telegrams to all these invitees saying that the function had been cancelled (both of them are close lieutenants of Jagdish Tytler). Apparently this is the schoolboyish prank level to which politics has sunk in the noble city of Delhi.

COSTLY ERROR

Maneka Gandhi seems to have missed a golden opportunity to remain in the limelight. Just after her husband's death, we were told, Mrs Gandhi asked Maneka if she would like to be her official hostess, just as Mrs Gandhi was Pandit Nehru's. This was one way, Mrs Gandhi must have thought, to keep Maneka occupied after the grievous loss of her husband. Initially, Maneka was enthusiastic, but then someone gave her some poor advice and she refused the job of a "maidservant" If only Maneka had realised how powerful even a "maidservant" with access to a Prime Minister can be! Whatever the reason, Maneka missed her chance. It is also said that relations between the two daughters-in-law of the PM's household have become terrible, with the rise to power of Rajiv Gandhi.

WHISPER CAMPAIGN

A whisper campaign has been started against Foreign Minister P. V. Narasimha Rao. It is reliably learnt that Pandit Kamalapati Tripathi, Narayan Dutt Tiwari and Mir Qasim have been telling people in Delhi, including the Prime Minister that it will be better to send him to Hyderabad as the Chief Minister of Andhra Pradesh. The whisper campaign has been started at the behest of Dr Channa Reddy. It seems that Channa Reddy wants Narasimha Rao to be out of Delhi in case he is brought to the centre after being removed from the chief ministership of Andhra. That will ensure that Channa Reddy will be the seniormost Andhra leader at the centre. Moreover, if he is replaced by a senior man like Narasimha Rao at Hyderabad, it will also be a saving grace for Channa Reddy. It may be recalled that at one stage Narasimha Rao was a powerful AICC general secretary in the undivided Congress and he had been entrusted with the task of overseeing the ouster of P. R. Das Munshi and the installation of Ambika Soni as the Youth Congress chief in 1975. Narasimha Rao was quite popular as a general secretary and was entrusted with the task of drafting the Congress(I) mani esto before the Lok Sabha elections in January. His elevation to the powerful position of foreign minister must have irked his opponents in central politics and understandably they have now become natural allies of Channa Reddy.

FLYING HIGH

With a heavy heart, we return our attention to the chronicles of P. C. Sethi. It seems that this unique Minister of ours hits the headlines each time he boards an aircraft. This time it was not a puny state government plane, but a big, big jetliner of the Kuwait Airways. To begin from the beginning: Mr Sethi left on 16 September for a marathon tour to Kuwait, Rome, Tripoli, London, Geneva, Zurich and Baghdad, accompanied by his wife. There is nothing wrong in a Minister going abroad; they go all the time. There is nothing wrong in a Minister's wife going with him, although wives do not accompany Ministers all the time. But what has raised eyebrows is that Mr Sethi has broken tradition by choosing not to fly Air India, our national carrier.

Normally any representative of the government whose expenses are being met out of the public exchequer travels by Air India unless the airline does not fly to the particular city he or she has to visit. But Mr Sethi took an 'open' ticket from Air India, which entitles him to fly by any airline which has a reciprocal arrangement with Air India. And his first lap was done by Kuwait Airways, despite the fact that Air India flies there. Why was the rule broken for Mr Sethi? And why does Kuwait figure twice in Mr Sethi's itinerary, once while going and the other while coming back?

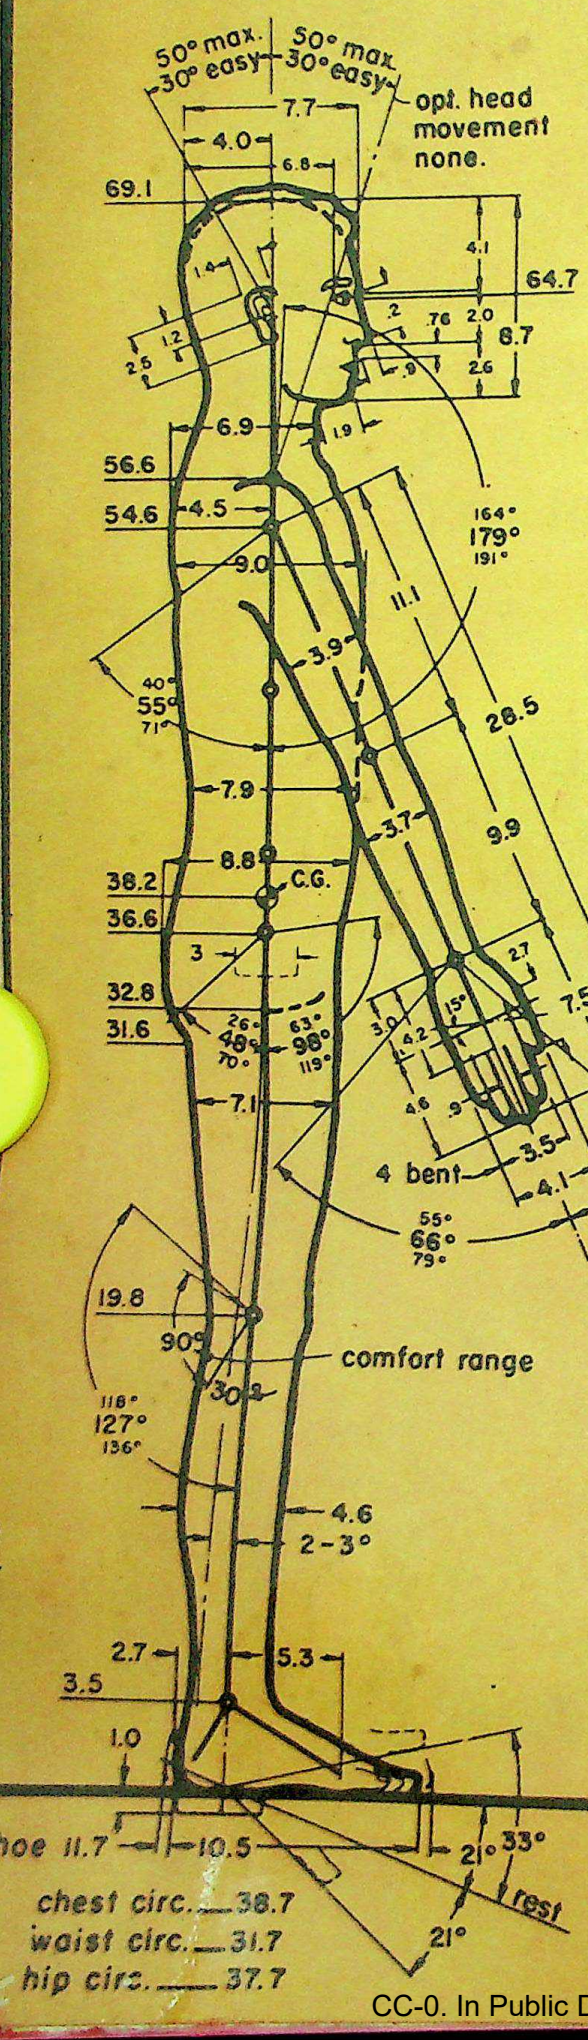
Dinesh explores comfort levels in men's wear.



Any good tailor can guide you to the latest styles.

It takes a pioneer to revolutionize fabric making, however.

We blended our experience and expertise in textile technology with the latest in anthropometry (the study of human measurements and comfort thresholds), and colour psychology.

The result is a brand new 'science' of making fabrics that make fashion comfortable.

Fashion ecology. It makes designs and weaves borrowed from abroad obsolete because they don't suit comfort thresholds in the tropics.

The weaves are now specially developed to keep your body temperature even and comfortable.

The blends and weights are matched to user needs. (In fact, it prompted us to create Trion, a tropicalised multi-fibre range of suitings.)

The fall, crease retention and durability are tested in on-going user trials.

The designs are muted according to the reigning fashion mood. Lilliputian checks. Hushed colour/weave effects. Subdued surface patterns: hints of herringbone, stripes, whipcords.

The feel and choice are so exclusive, taking to fashion ecology will come naturally.

Like fish to water.

Dettol keeps your world germ-free

... when treating cuts and wounds

The soil, the water, the very air around us are all teeming with millions of germs and bacteria, some of which can cause dangerous diseases. Normally, the human skin acts as a shield to keep these dangerous germs from entering our bodies.

Occasionally, we cut or hurt ourselves. When this happens, the skin is broken and a chink appears in the body's shield. Germs seize this opportunity to invade the body. That is when you need Dettol.

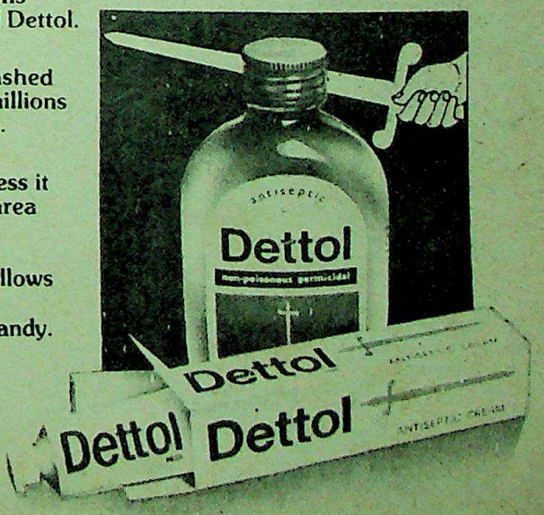
Dettol for cuts and scrapes

Even the smallest cut or scrape should be immediately washed and cleaned with a lotion of Dettol Liquid in water. Dettol kills millions of germs on contact to disinfect the area around the broken skin.

Dettol for dressing wounds

Sometimes when the cut or wound is deep, you need to dress it to keep it from getting septic. First wash and clean the affected area with a lotion of Dettol Liquid in water. Then use soothing, non-staining Dettol Antiseptic Cream to dress the wound. Dettol Antiseptic Cream ensures longer-lasting germicidal action and allows to heal naturally.

Always keep Dettol Liquid and Dettol Antiseptic Cream handy. And keep your world germ-free.



Dettol protects

SUNDAY VOLUME 9. ISSUE 13 RS 2 AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION

September 13, 1981

Bihar chief minister Dr Jagannath Mishra's 14-year-old son informs anxious, waiting ministers about the cabinet reshuffle. Dr Mishra ignores a judge's strictures and withdraws a case against himself. Under the CM's "tolerant" gaze a Congress(I) MLA attacks a church and loots its belongings. And nobody in Patna dare question either the CM's or his family's authority. SUNDAY publishes another story of misrule. Page 12

Eleven steps to IMF temple

India, a founder-member of the International Monetary Fund (IMF), can draw, from the Fund, upto eight billion dollars as loan on the basis of its contribution. However, New Delhi has preferred to apply for five billion dollars (Rs 4,500 crores)—but this is the largest loan ever considered by the IMF board.

The loan application will be formally discussed at the board meeting in October. By then, the terms and conditions would have been finalised. A team from the finance ministry, under the leadership of Mr R. N. Malhotra, economic affairs secretary, is leaving Delhi for Washington on 19 September for the purpose. Mr Narasimhan, who should have joined as finance secretary by now, has stayed back in Washington to participate in these discussions. Mr Venkataraman, finance minister, who is going to the Bahamas to attend the Commonwealth finance ministers' conference, will visit Washington either on his outward journey or on his return to talk to the IMF officials who are preparing a brief for the board meeting.

The central cabinet has already given its general approval to the conditions, which are still a closely-guarded secret, tagged to the availability of loan. But it will depend on the team how much ground, if any, it can retrieve during the discussions at Washington. The conditions grouped under eleven points are: 1. Ceiling on deficit financing; 2. Tighter control on money supply; 3. Removal or liberalisation of price controls so that domestic prices are determined by market forces (this would serve as an incentive for higher investment and larger production in the private sector); 4. Removal of administered prices in the public sector so that the need for budgetary support to loss-making undertakings goes down; 5. Revision of power tariffs so that the investments in the power sector get a reasonable return; 6. Measures towards conserving energy; 7. Removal of subsidiaries to the extent possible; 8. More incentives for higher investment in the public sector—a review of the country's internal investment programme; 9. Tax reforms and better tax administration so that tax revenues go up; 10. Improvement in the performance of infrastructural facilities so that production in the core sectors of the economy, including agriculture, goes up (this is meant to reduce the foreign exchange imbalance); and 11. Measures to step up imports (the formation of the Export-Import Bank should help).

The IMF has not asked for the devaluation of the rupee because of its political implications and also because of the tie-up of the rupee to a basket of currencies which virtually gives it a floating exchange rate.

The conditions dictated to New Delhi are in addition to a IMF questionnaire running into some 45 pages seeking information on all vital sectors of India's economy, including the budgetary data for the centre, the states and union territories.

Some of the information furnished to the IMF is not available even to MPs because it is classified. One such question is on oil: "Please provide data on import, output, consumption and year-end stocks (both for fiscal and calendar year) for crude oil and different petroleum products (including kerosene, fuel oil, furnace oil, gasoline, diesel and naptha) for five year period... Please provide projections for 1982 and 1983... Please provide data on production from Bombay High oilfields as well as onshore oilfields in 1977, 1978, 1979, 1980 and 1981 (estimates)... Please provide a summary of the measures that are currently in effect to conserve petroleum and to encourage the substitution of other energy sources such as coal."

The question on industry is indeed comprehensive. "Please provide a note on the current situation in the major industries in terms of output, stocks of finished, changes in capacity and the rate of capacity utilisation... Please provide data on the output of public sector enterprises (for five years)... Please describe the principal production control regulations governing major industries and the changes in these regulations during five years and their rationale."

There are hordes of questions on agriculture. "Please list the changes made during 1978, 1979 and 1980 in the domestic procurement system for foodgrains including procurement prices and the public distribution system. Please provide details of the Food For Work programme and the progress of the programme since its inception in 1979. In particular, please indicate amounts and types of foodgrains distributed, nature of public works undertaken... Please give data on unit costs of the foodgrain procurement, storage, and issue operations, showing how these have changed owing to, a) the increased size of the buffer stock, b) wastage because of inadequate storage facilities, and c) changes in pricing and distribution policy."

For reasons best known to it, the IMF has also asked: "Please furnish the following information with respect to the Additional Emoluments (Compulsory Deposit) Act and the Compulsory Deposit Scheme (Income Tax Payers) Act by revising and updating the answer to question given earlier: A) Disaggregated data on cumulated deposits under the separate facilities of these acts in 1978-1979; 1980-81 and 1981-82; B) A schedule of repayment of principal and interests for 1978-79 and 1979-80 and 1980-81 and 1981-82; C) A quantitative assessment of the addditional amount of compulsory deposits that would have been collected in the past two years, and an estimate for 1980-81 and 1981-82 if the CDS on one half of additional DA had not been abolished; D) A quantitative assessment of the effect in 1978-79, 1979-80, 1980-81 and 1981-82 of the changes, introduced in the budget for 1978-79 in the required deposit for tax payers in various income categories; and E) A note on any other major changes in the scheme since 1978-79, such as changes in the interest rate paid on deposits, changes in the method of repayment etc."

India's foreign exchange revenues now stand around Rs 3,600 crores. With an expenditure of Rs 150 crores a month on imports, it has no escape from borrowing from the Fund which, to quote a finance ministry official, "is behaving worse than a bank." Self-reliance and swadeshi could take the country out of the helpless position it is in, but the elitist and ad hoc approach of Mrs Gandhi's government will necessitate a bigger and bigger begging bowl every year.

Some of the information given to the IMF is not available even to MPs because it is classified. One such question is oil... According to a finance ministry official, the IMF is behaving worse than a bank

Revealing

In his otherwise beautifully clueless cover story, The lonely life of a cabaret dancer (16 August), Mr Pritish Nandy has mentioned an aunt of mine who frequents seedy north Calcutta theatres in order to glimpse snatches (sic) of female nudity in the hope that she will one day be exposed to the real thing. This is correct. However, there is something he does not mention. About a month back, my poor aunt suffered a serious trauma. Sitting there, surrounded by devilled eggs and vegetable chops, she saw something stark naked prancing around on the stage. Imagine her horror when she recognised the person who was billed as that night's 'sexpot-of-sin' as none other than old Mr Nandy's emaciated uncle!

At the time of writing, my aunt has eloped with this ersatz and lives a life of sin of her own with him.
Mukul Sharma, Calcutta

The cover story was informative; thanks to Mr Nandy.
T. K. Pattnaik, Calcutta

Mr Nandy's article was sheer poetry.
Prasanna Kumar Mohanty, Bhubaneswar

Titillating and informative; thank you, Mr Nandy.
Syed Humayun Siraj, Bangalore

Fortunately, Mr Nandy is not one of those sex-starved people who satisfy their lust by patronising cabaret shows; he has probed into the life of cabaret dancers and given us a heart-rending story.
Surinder Pal, New Delhi

The way Mr Nandy's cover story was presented, it may not have attracted the serious readers' attention; but the article by itself was quite revealing.
Shefalee Sengupta, Katihar (Bihar)

Pritish Nandy has succeeded in arousing sympathy for the hapless cabaret girls.
Shirsanka Ghosh, Calcutta

It is a pity that cabaret girls are looked down upon by the very people who ogle at them on the dance floors.
R. B. Thapa, Sonamura (Tripura)

It was very disheartening to learn that most cabaret dancers took to their profession merely to earn a livelihood.
Biswajit Roy, Dehra Dun

It seems that only Miss J is unhappy with her profession; she is best advised to come to terms with life and her surroundings.
Sanjay Kumar Mandal, Burdwan

No one can deny the popularity of cabaret in our country and it is time that it is recognised and respected as a profession.
P. Nagender Reddy, Aurangabad

It was a pleasure to read the cover story; I wonder why we have only female cabaret dancers; why can't men perform in the nude or semi-nude for the benefit of female audiences?
Shailesh Kumar Koachgaway, Pathardih (Bihar)

My Nandy's article was disjointed, unimaginative and full of digressions.
Kiran Raivadera, Calcutta

While appreciating the cover story I cannot help observing that the photographs with it were both unnecessary and disgusting.
Samarendranath Mohapatra, Puri

The loneliness of a cabaret dancer's life could have been conveyed without the help of revealing photographs.
Mona Bose, Kharagpur

The cover story was merely an excuse to publish yet another series of semi-nude photographs.
Amit Kumar Sen, Calcutta

One has to think twice before buying SUNDAY these days.
Waheed Siddiqui, Rani Unchegaon (Maharashtra)

In my opinion, SUNDAY is the best national weekly; it is a pity that it has gone wayward.
Omprakash G. Methi, Gondia (Maharashtra)

Cabaret is nothing short of vulgarity and SUNDAY should have nothing to do with it or its exponents.
Syed Hamidul Haque, Chaibasa

I was disappointed with the cover story; it was dull, to say the least.
Biswajit Sen Gupta, Jalpaiguri

Mr Nandy had nothing new to tell us about cabaret dancers and the photographs with his article were stale. What a bore.
M. K. Harish, Cannanore (Kerala)

The hawker folded the 16 August issue of SUNDAY before handing it to me.
Sunil Bikas Banerjee, Sodepur (West Bengal)

SUNDAY is trying to compete with Playboy and Penthouse; as for Mr Nandy's cover story, the less said the better.
Subhas Chandra Mishra, Vanivihar (Orissa)

Mr Nandy was at it again; but this time he could not draw his readers' sympathy either for himself or for cabaret dancers.
Sandip Sanyal, Cuttack

Mugshots of cabaret dancers would have been enough to illustrate the point which Mr Nandy has tried to make.
Radhakrishna Khatavkar, Bangalore

Hyderabad riots: a biased view

Before reading Syed Majeedul Hasan's Communal killers take over Hyderabad (9 August) I was under the impression that SUNDAY believes in the truth; but now I am convinced that the magazine follows an anti-Hindu policy.
K. Rajagopalan, Hyderabad

I wonder why Mr Hasan failed to mention even a single Majlis leader in his report. He also chose to overlook the fact that nowadays in Hyderabad the Muslims assemble in mosques to plan riots.
G. P. Reddy, Hyderabad

Mr Hasan has failed to give a balanced account of the communal riots in Hyderabad. While referring to the RSS and the Arya Samaj he has made no mention of the Majlis leaders who delivered highly communal and provocative speeches after the jumma prayers in the month of ramzaan.
Dinesh Chandra Sharma, Hyderabad

Mr Hasan should know that the playing of drums and trumpets is part of the Bonalu festival; it isn't meant to hurt the feelings of any particular community. He should also realise that by tracing the history and popularity of the Majlis-e-Ittehaad-ul-Muslimeen (MIM) he cannot wash away the sins of this organisation.
Prakash Joshi, Sibsagar

I was shocked by the report. Many Hindus lost their lives as well; Mr Hasan should have mentioned at least some of them.
Syed Iqbal, Secunderabad

It is wrong to say that Mr Vandemataram Ramachandra Rao as chairman of the AP Official Languages Commission had threatened to "throw out the Muslim employees from government offices if they did not pass the Telugu language tests soon." Mr Rao made a sincere effort to replace English with Telugu in the state and was of the opinion that disciplinary action should be taken against those government employees who did not use Telugu in official correspondence.

A Swamy for harijans

If Tamil Nadu conversions: a vote against Hindu society (16 August) is any indication then Dr Subramaniam Swamy has certainly changed his political views. Gone are the days when he behaved like a Hindu chauvinist; he is now a seasoned politician with a secular and pragmatic outlook. Self-criticism is no mean achievement and Dr Swamy should be praised for his article directed against a society to which he belongs.

In my opinion, the harijans of Tamil Nadu had no choice but to convert to Islam; the talk about Arab petro-dollars and coercion playing a dominant role in the conversions can hardly be believed. The rot has set into Hindu society and we need people like Dr Swamy (not Vajpayee and Madhok) to stem it.
Bimalendu S. Dutta Roy, Cuttack

Dr Swamy's was a brilliant and perceptive report; thank God we have at least one politician who can call a spade a spade.
Rizwana Akhtar, Cuttack

Thanks to Dr Swamy for his brilliant article.
Maswood Akhtar Rahi, Rourkela

Congratulations to Dr Swamy for exploding the myth that the conversions in Tamil Nadu were procured and that social discrimination against harijans played no part whatsoever.
Md Abdar Ali Gazi, South Akhratala (West Bengal)

Dr Swamy deserves to be thanked for his unbiased attempt to find the cause behind the conversions. The caste Hindus have given nothing to the harijans. Why shouldn't the harijans embrace another faith which promises them peace if nothing else?
Gautam Talukdar, Pecharthal (Tripura)

I cannot understand why the conversions have become such a sensitive issue; surely the harijans of Tamil Nadu have not renounced their citizenship.
Manjur Ahmad, Udarbond (Assam)

The politicians who never bothered about the atrocities against harijans in the past are now making a beeline for Meenakshipuram.
Syed Muthahar Saquaf, Trichy

It is obvious that Islam promises a better life to the harijans. What a shame for us Hindus.
Prafulla Kumar Patsani, Puri

The Special report by Dr Swamy was excellent.
John L. Lobo, Bombay

It is heartening to know that an ex-RSS man has ruled out the theory of foreign money and force playing an important part in the conversions. If nothing else, the caste Hindus should now atone for their sins against harijans.
M. Hafizullah Khan, Bhopal

Dr Swamy's article exposed the disease which has been eating into the very core of our society.
Bapi Chakraborty, Calcutta

It would be appreciated if more articles like the one by Dr Swamy are published in future; only then will the caste Hindus change their attitude towards harijans. As for the conversions, I am convinced that the harijans have embraced Islam to take revenge on the caste Hindus who they now regard as kafirs.
Krishna Samaddar, Delhi

Life has become more meaningful for the harijans of Meenakshipuram; why is this being considered intolerable?
Md Parvez Siddique, Calcutta

When harijans were murdered, their huts burned and womenfolk humiliated in Belchi and Pipra, where were the Swamys and the Vajpayees? When a harijan MLA from Andhra Pradesh was thrown out of Mantralaya temple by a brahmin priest why did the Shankaracharyas not shed tears? Why this sudden concern for harijans from all and sundry?
Rajan Cherian, Hyderabad

Dr Swamy has failed to provide concrete reasons for the conversions. His article was replete with self-praise; he has made an attempt to portray himself as the saviour of the downtrodden. Far from doing anything in the past to better the lot of the scheduled castes, Dr Swamy now wonders whether "the whole country is up for purchase." He conveniently forgets that it is he who has been purchased by foreign education; the poor man did not know that there were so many people living in misery in India.
Ashok S. Savanur, Solapur

Both the Hindus and the Muslims have exploited the harijans in the past; I see no sense in the recent conversions.
Baidya Nath Mandi, Kharagpur

Good news

SUNDAY would have done great service to the country by reporting on journalist Olga Tellis' petition filed in the Supreme Court to restrain the Bombay civic authorities from evicting pavement dwellers in that city. The national dailies have hardly done justice to this news: only a few inches of 'valuable' space have been spard for Ms Tellis.
A. W. M. Shafquat Aligarh

It is heartening to learn that a journalist from the house which publishes SUNDAY has challenged the government of Maharashtra: obviously, Olga Tellis is not satisfied with mere reporting on injustices.
A. S. Raman, Lucknow

Misplaced fires

The information about the Central Bank of India building under Must our cities burn? (16 August) was incorrect. To begin with, the building caught fire in the early hours of 3 January 1974 and not as reported. Further, the building is situated on Calcutta's Netaji Subhas Road, not on BBD Bagh.
T. C. Katrack, Calcutta

The Shantinath Silk Mill in Surat was not gutted; the photograph on page 19 showed the damage done to the mill when an illegally-constructed, three-storeyed building collapsed on it.
Y. J. Vasavada, Navasari

Misleading report

Anil Saari has unnecessarily dragged my name into his report, There were no conversions in Kanpur on 15 August (30 August). Indeed, there were no conversions in Kanpur on 15 August; so the question of my presence does not arise. I strongly believe that religion is purely a personal matter and should never be mixed up with politics.
Arif Mohammad Khan, MP, New Delhi

It is surprising that a magazine like SUNDAY has published a thoroughly misleading report by Anil Saari. To put the record straight, we, the undersigned, spent 15 August with Mr Arif Mohammad Khan, MP; together we attended many functions in different parts of Kanpur. And nowhere did anything happen which could be described as conversions. What was conspicuous was the fact that the harijans had joined the others to celebrate independence day. As for the congregation at Nanarao Park, we would like to point out that barely fifty people had assembled there, not 5,000 as reported.
Bhudhar Narain Mishra, MLA, and Rajendra Prasad Mishra, city Youth Congress (I) president, Kanpur

We apologise for the error.—Editor

Utkal: above board

Tooshar Pandit's reply to the letter from Mr R. K. Rout, vice-chancellor of Utkal University, was childish. He seems to have no concrete evidence to prove his allegations against Utkal University.
Deboo Patnaik, Bhubaneswar

I am sure that Mr Pandiit has made a mistake in listing Utkal University among the ten other universities which, he claims, are involved in the degree racket.
S. K. Mohanty, Sindri (Bihar)

Effective and shameful

People like Hitler and Idi Amin did figure on the covers of widely-circulated international magazines, but no one ever tried to glorify them or their deeds. Anil Saari is an exception; his cover story, Did Ranga Kill? (19 July), was shameful. Worse of course was some of the readers' response to the report (Opinion, 16 August). It is clear that Mr Saari has succeeded in mobilising some support for a criminal. What a shame.

COVER STORY

The Exotic Ruling Family of Bihar

Power has not gone to Dr Jagannath Mishra's head, it has only gone to his family, report TOOSHAR PANDIT and TIRTHANKAR GHOSH.

One of the most pervasive sounds in the house of Dr Jagannath Mishra is the sound of bells tinkling. This is the sound of devotion to the gods, the sound of bells during a puja. Dr Jagannath Mishra, the chief minister of Bihar is a very religious man. He prays to the gods constantly to bring him and his family health, wealth and happiness; he wears half a dozen rings on the fingers to ward off all evils. And the gods have been kind. They have made him the boss of Bihar—a state of being which may not be necessarily very good for the health, but certainly fetches enough wealth and happiness.

Bihar: second only to the vast Uttar Pradesh in the number of MPs sent to the Lok Sabha; the richest state in the country in terms of raw materials, resources, and the poorest state in terms of the living standards of the people. Therefore a state classically ready for corruption, exploitation. A state where gun-toting dacoits run the coalfields, and other kinds of dacoits loot in other ways; a state where corruption no longer arouses any comment. A state in which there is a city called Bhagalpur, where as everyone now knows, the police gouged out the eyes of suspects with needle and acid in order to curb crime. Under the chief ministership of Dr Mishra. Who calmly weathered the national storm that arose, and now has withdrawn the suspension of all the police officers involved. In other words, not one of the policemen has been punished for the Bhagalpur blindings.

Under the chief ministership of Dr Jagannath Mishra, law is an unimportant encumbrance, and order is only what Dr Mishra and his cronies define it to be. How can there be respect for law under a CM who makes one of his closest advisers and ministers a man called Sadanand Singh who openly protects a murderous dacoit called Sudama Mandal, a dacoit whom the police had been searching for (SUNDAY, 21 December 1980)? How can there be respect for law in a state where the CM withdraws a case against himself despite the judge having clearly implied that to do so would be a travesty of justice (see box on the Patna Urban Cooperative Bank case, page 18)? And on top of it, Dr Mishra has brought in nepotism and casteism to a degree that even weary Bihar cannot find a parallel to. Key positions have gone to his relatives (see box, page 14), choice contracts have gone to his brothers (see box, page 14) and any glimpse into a Who's Who of those who really run the state would reveal a surprising proportion of people belonging to the caste that Dr Mishra comes from—the Maithili Brahmins.

Son Manish: display of power

Dr Jagannath Mishra comes from a rich and influential family in Saharsa. His father, Rabinandan Mishra alone owned over 2,000 acres of land in Baluabazar. Of his five sons, two joined politics: L.N. Mishra of course gained national prominence before dying in a controversial bomb blast, and then younger brother Jagannath Mishra, till then a teacher in a university stepped in to fill the vacuum. The Mishras are still monarchs at Baluabazar, though the land ceiling act may have reduced the amount of land they control. Incidentally, whatever love Dr Mishra may profess for the poor landless agricultural workers of Bihar when making speeches, that love is not visible when the Mishras pay the daily labour who work on their land. Despite Rs five a day being declared the minimum wage, there are many working in the Mishra farms who are rarely paid more than Rs two a day. And there are many who have to toil in these farms as bonded labour for the rest of their lives because of a loan.

Three brothers, Shyam, Mrityunjoy and Kamal, look after the family property, and, also, execute lucrative government contracts. Baluabazar is next to the famous Kosi river, and the multi-million rupee Kosi river project has been a boon not only to the people at large but to the Mishras in particular. An Estimates Committee of the Bihar Assembly found in early 1973 that a large number of the contracts for this project had gone either to the Mishras or their nominees: among the major beneficiaries were two Mishra brothers, Shyam Narayan and Kamal Narayan. First it was obviously L.N. Mishra's influence that was bringing in the lolly, and then in the early Seventies, Dr Jagannath Mishra too became a powerful man in Bihar. In all the governments that Dr Mishra has been in since 1972, either as cabinet minister or chief minister, he has never let go of the irrigation and power portfolio. It is an interesting affection for that particular job: after all, the contracts for projects like the one at Kosi go out from there.

After Dr Mishra became chief minister this time around, one of his brothers Mrityunjoy, was made a director of the Bihar State Co-operative Marketing Union (BISCOMAUN). When the Bihar Rashtrabhasha Parishad was reconstituted this year, one of the country's foremost protagonists of Hindi, Mr Gangasaran Singh, was dropped and among the new blood inducted was Jainath Jha, who just happens to be Dr Mishra's father-in-law. Dr Mishra has placed a blood relative even in a key post of the Bihar Pradesh Congress Committee—the secretary, Sudhir Mishra.

Even 14-year-old Manish, the young son of Dr Mishra, is enjoying the zamindari of Bihar that has descended on the family. He can often be seen being chauffeur-driven around Patna—with the official flag flying on the car; only chief ministers are entitled to that privilege, not their sons. Indeed, when Dr Mishra reshuffled the portfolios of his ministers on 26 August, it was Manish whocame into the drawing room crowded with anxious ministers wanting to know what their new jobs would be, and handed them the information about what his daddy had done.

Such is the common belief that everything that happens to the Mishra family is tainted with nepotism, that there was a serious controversy even when Dr Mishra's daughter came second in her BA economics honours examinations this year. Sangeeta Mishra sat for her examinations this year at Patna University, but long before the examinations the president, Mr Anil Kumar Sharma, and Mr Premchandra Sinha, the secretary of the university's students' union had predicted that she was going to do very well indeed in her examinations. On what basis were they making this allegation? They said that the examiners and the papersetters for that year were all indebted to Dr Mishra. For instance, the moderator, Prof. Chakradhar Singh, not only came from Dr Mishra's area but had also sat on numerous boards and committees thanks to Dr Mishra. Today he is not only director of the state-funded L.N. Mishra Academy for Economic Development but also a member of the state planning commission. Another examiner, Bansidhar Sinha, had been appointed member of the state electricity board by Dr Mishra when he first became the CM in 1975.

Even more serious was the charge that the university was bending its rules in order to please the chief minister. The practice in Patna University has been to get at least three of the six honours papers set by people from universities outside Bihar, and they also examine the answer sheets. This year this laudable practice was not followed. Why?

In July, Sharma was arrested on some unspecified charges. It was August before he got out on bail. By then the results had been announced. The chief minister's daughter had indeed done very well in her examinations: she had come second (immediately the whisper went round that Dr Mishra had deliberately asked the examiners not to make her first as then the rigging would become too obvious). Equally interesting was the fact that all the relatives and well-wishers of the key people in charge of the examinations had done well too Tongues started wagging; pressure began to build. Finally the vice-chancellor gave in by announcing the appointment of a committee to probe into this year's examination. This story does not make Dr Mishra guilty, nor does it prove that his daughter did not do well on her own merits: what it does convey is the mood of Bihar, where people are quite willing to believe that their chief minister would stoop so low without a qualm. Indeed, there are people who even believe that Dr Mishra got his own doctorate a bit unfairly, but that's another story. Certainly Dr Mishra has done a great deal for his old teacher who guided him in his thesis, Dr Hargovind Singh. He was first made member of the Bihar Public Service Commission, then vice-chancellor of Magadh University. Dr Mishra actually issued an ordinance when he wanted to make Dr Singh director of the A. N. Singh institute in Patna, because Dr Singh did not qualify for that post. The ordinance kicked up a great deal of controversy, so Dr Mishra made Singh a member of the Legislative Council instead.

Dr Mishra: of rings and relatives

Today, Dr Mishra runs Bihar singlehandedly, virtually as a fiefdom, not tolerating much discussion or debate. The reshuffle was an indication that he had begun to hear the growing cries of dissident charges; but he also was sending out the message that he wasn't finished yet.

Not merely the corruption (the stories give enough evidence of that) and nepotism, but administrative incompetence is taking its toll. The worst example was the government's handling of the Biharsharif riots (SUNDAY 24 May 1981): an obviously angry Mrs Gandhi had to personally fly down from Delhi and use her authority and popularity to restore calm. The chief minister of Bihar was fiddling while Biharsharif burnt.

It is believed that Dr Mishra survives only because of Mrs Gandhi's reluctance to change her chief ministers until they have been given enough time to either prove themselves or commit suicide. Dr Mishra is one of those travelling towards the second option.

All in the family

Here are some of Dr Mishra's relatives in key positions:

■Chandradhar Jha: The CM's brother-in-law. Appointed chief executive officer of the Bihar Khadi Board. Despite objections from the finance department, the chief minister downgraded the post to appoint Mr Jha. During the 1977 elections, Mr Jha was charged for keeping ballot papers in his house.

■ Bhavnath Mishra: Uncle-in-law. Appointed managing director of the Bihar Land Development Bank. The post is normally meant for a senior IAS officer which Mr Mishra is not.

■Jainath Mishra: Father-in-law. Made chairman of the Bihar Rashtra Bhasa Parishad after the noted Hindi litterateur and former Rajya Sabha MP, Mr Ganga Saran Singh, was removed.

■Shiv Shankar Mishra: Cousin. Appointed executive engineer, PWD, Patna. In 1972-73, he was the sub-divisional engineer, of the river valley project in Nirmali (see box).

■S. K.Jha: Relative. Brought to Patna as civil surgeon. Dr Raj Kumar Prasad, a harijan, was removed from his post before the expiry of his term to facilitate the coming in of Dr Jha.

Shyam Mishra: the contract bagger

■M. K. Jha: Relative. Appointed IG (Intelligence). Not only has Mr Jha been appointed to a top post but his wife has been appointed as deputy chairman of the social welfare board.

■Mrityunjoy Mishra: Brother. Elected member of Biscomaun (a cooperative marketing board) and the Bihar State Financial Corporation.

■S. N. Dubey: Son-in-law of B. K. Dubey, former secretary to Dr Mishra in 1975. Nominated as IAS this year although he was in a private organisation. He has been given rank of joint secretary and brought in on a prize post in the Public Enterprises Bureau.

■Jagtanand Jha: Relative. Now director of public relations. In 1978, Mr Jha was the director of public relations. Prima facie cases of corruption were established against him by the vigilance department and he was granted anticipatory bail. After Dr Mishra became the chief minister, Mr Jha as reappointed to his old post.

How the Mishra family cornered Kosi contracts

□ This committee has found that most of the contracts from this project (the Kosi project) have been awarded to members of the Mishra family or their nominees from Balua Bazar, Saharsa.

□ The contract for a guide bundh (embankment) was given to Mr Kripanath Mishra (Dr Mishra's cousin—uncle's son) of Balua Bazar, Saharsa.

□ M/S Associated Engineering was awarded some contracts for the project. Among the firm's owners is Kamal Narain Mishra, brother of the Dr Jagannath Mishra (Dr Mishra was then the irrigation minister).

□ A member of the same family, Sudhir Kumar Mishra was given a contract in the irrigation project. His brother, Mr Sushil Chandra Mishra, is the superintending engineer of the project and another member of the same family, Mr Shiv Shankar Mishra, is the sub-divisional engineer, Nirmali.

□ Mr Shiv Shankar Mishra (a member of the Mishra family) was transferred to Nirmali (a sub-division in the project area) as SDO from Sarsi where he had served only for six months. Even now Shiv Shankar Mishra is in the Nirmali sub-division where every year crores of rupees are spent on flood prevention.

□ Mr B. N. Mishra (a distant relative of Dr Mishra) took over charge as the personal assistant to Mr Dinesh Prasad Verma, the then superintending engineer of Saharsa. It is significant that on 11 May 1973 when handing over charge of the Raghopur sub-division (which has four parts) Mr Mishra only handed over charge of three. He did not hand over charge of Karjain division where a link channel is being constructed, the contract for which has been awarded to Mr Kamal Narain Mishra.

□ M/S Associated Engineering was paid a higher amount of money than another contractor, Mr Ravindra Kumar, for an identical job. Both the contractors working at adjacent sites. The payment of money shows that M/S Associated Engineering where Mr Kamal Narayan Mishra has considerable interests was favoured.

Attack on a church

Sixteen September, 1980. Motihari. What happened that day best describes the nature of the Jagannath Mishra government.

The residents of Chatauni mohalla were getting ready for another drab day in their ordinary lives. The Protestant church was quiet; in the small adjoining building Mr and Mrs Vinod Stephen had woken up. Mr Stephen looked after the Navjivan primary school and the Navjivan Kushtha Sevashrama established by the church. The church had started the leprosy centre in 1978 and the school in 1979.

Suddenly at seven in the morning a gang of hoodlums, led by Congress(I) MLA Rai Harishankar, attacked the locality. They looted the few articles in the school and centre premises, cleared out the inhabitants, did not spare even Mrs Stephen, and occupied the premises. Later, they put up a huge signboard announcing that the place had now become the Dr Jagannath Mishra Mahavidyalay.

At Janmashtami immersion: Mishras are religious people

Till today, justice has not been done to the missionaries who were summarily thrown out. Local Christians have written several letters to the CM, but there has been no response: one of the letters, sent on 15 October 1980 was from Mr Abashlom Masih, president of the Christian churches of north Bihar, West Champaran. Politicians have pointed out to the CM that this was gross injustice, but he has not bothered.

Today the Dr Mishra Mahavidyalay has about 100 students, and 34 teachers have also been appointed. The buildings of the leprosy centre and the school are now student hostels. And the police of course has refused even to register the first information report lodged by Mr Vinod Stephen.

Why did Dr Mishra want to go to Nepal?

There are many reasons why a person sweltering in the hot winds of Patna might want to go to Nepal in the month of May. The weather in Nepal is super, the sightseeing excellent, and for those so inclined Kathmandu offers the only casino in the world where you can gamble in Indian rupees. These are good enough reasons for you and me: but why should a chief minister of Bihar suddenly want to go to Nepal, and without telling the government of India about it? Not only that, why should he want to use his state plane to go there—and specifically demand that the plane not be stopped at Kathmandu but go directly to his final destination, Janakpur?

We have obtained a copy of the message sent by Mr S.K. Chakraverty, deputy resident commissioner at Delhi's Bihar Bhavan (a kind of ambassador for Bihar in Delhi), to Mr K.M. Thakur, secretary to the Bihar chief minister in Patna, on 11 May 1981. The message is numbered 1171/RC. This is what it says: "This refers to Shri Indukant Mishra additional private secretary to chief minister's talk on telephone with me regarding chief minister's visit to Janakpur (in Nepal). Shri Mishra informed me that chief minister would like to fly to Janakpur on state plane on 12th May by 7.45 am from Darbhanga. Shri Mishra wanted me to get the clearance from DGCA for the flight and also to make arrangement for three cars and breakfast and lunch for 15 people courtesy Nepalese embassy. The matter was taken up with Shri V.N. Kapoor, DDG DGCA. He was not agreeable to direct flight to Janakpur and suggested flight route Patna-Kathmandu-Janakpur-Patna. DGCA however agreed to direct landing at Janakpur but when they contacted DGCA Kathmandu the latter did not agree and so it is finally decided that flight plan will be Patna-Kathmandu-Janakpur-Kathmandu-Patna.

"Embassy of Nepal in New Delhi has passed on the message to Kathmandu for making arrangements for three cars and breakfast and lunch etc for 15 persons at Janakpur. Embassy of Nepal confirmed the arrangement at Janakpur. However due to the flight plan approved which involves flight to Kathmandu, Embassy of Nepal is anxious to know whether state government planes would land at Kathmandu and then Janakpur or at Sitamarhi. District magistrate Darbhanga to please inform chief minister. Message ends."

In other words: Dr Jagannath Mishra, UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow straight on to Janakpur, where he has some relatives, and completely avoid Kathmandu, which is where any passenger flying into Nepal has to land normally, since Kathmandu is the only international airport in Nepal with customs facilities etc. Why was Dr Mishra so insistent upon avoiding Kathmandu? It should hardly have mattered, in the normal course. Even after getting the message quoted above, Dr Mishra's secretary got in touch with the Nepal embassy in Delhi again to see whether it was possible to fly directly to Janakpur. But the Nepalese government, which happily agreed to provide breakfast, lunch and three cars, insisted that the chief minister's plane touch down at Kathmandu. And rather than conforming to this formality, Dr Mishra, who was so keen to go to Nepal on private work in his state plane, preferred to cancel the trip. Was he afraid that officials just might search his plane in Kathmandu and find something embarrassing? In the meanwhile, our ministry of external affairs had also got to know about the incident, and sought an explanation from Dr Mishra for this unusual behaviour. The reply they got was lame. Dr Mishra said that all this had been done by his secretary, who had been indiscreet, without his knowledge.

"Where is there no corruption?"

JAGANNATH MISHRA tells SUNDAY

The interview was fixed for 8.15 pm on 26 August at the chief minister's residence. "But he is flexible when it comes to timings," we were told by his press adviser, D. D. Sinha, who has worked as a journalist in The Indian Nation and as a PRO in TISCO. Flexible the chief minister was. The interview began after 9 p.m.

Dr Jagannath Mishra's office is in a large room in his residence at 2, Circular Road. Near the door is a framed quotation from his party chief, Mrs Indira Gandhi: "Needs of the many must prevail over those of the few."

Behind his desk is a huge fireplace, now unused. Over the fireplace is a portrait of Dr Mishra's eldest brother and former union railway minister, the late Lalit Narayan Mishra. In front of the fireplace is a low table with three telephones—two green and one black. Beside the table is a TV set. On all four walls of the airconditioned room are photographs of gods and goddesses—Lakshmi, Saraswati, Durga and Shiva. The room is lit by two powerful table-lamps. Prominently displayed on the table are two framed photographs—one of Mrs Gandhi and Sanjay Gandhi sharing food, and the other of Mrs Gandhi garlanding the portrait of Lalit Narayan Mishra. There are very few papers or files on the table, but there are three paperweights with Ashoka emblems. Dr Mishra walks in with a couple of ministers in tow, all discussing the reshuffle.

He is wearing a milk-white kurta and dhoti and a check Jawahar coat. After he dismisses the ministers and the officers crowding the room, the interview begins:

Q. How did you come into politics?

A: I was first in university politics and became a member of the university senate and syndicate in 1966, when I was a teacher in Bihar University. I contested the election to the Bihar Legislative Council in 1968. I have been very involved in politics. In 1972, I contested the Assembly elections.

Q: Were you a Congress candidate in 1968?

A: No. I was an independent candidate but the Congress supported me. The Congress did not put up any candidate. My opponent was a CPI-sponsored candidate, P. N. Mehta.

Q: Did your family own a lot of land?

A: Yes. We were landed people and zamindars.

Q: Can we say that you come from a fairly affluent family?

A: Yes, of course.

Q: How much land do you have now?

A: My father had 2,000 acres. Now we have land up to the ceiling limit. My elder brother (L. N. Mishra) sold most of our land to finance his politics.

Q: What do your other brothers do? Do they look after the land?

A: Yes.

Q: Do your brothers stay in Balua Bazar?

A: One brother, Mrityunjoy Narayan Mishra, just older than me, is in Saharsa. He too is in the Congress (I).

Q: Is he, incidentally, the director of three government-sponsored organisations?

A: He is the member of only two organisations—Biscomaun (Bihar state marketing cooperative union) and the Bihar Financial Corporation.

Q: In May 1974, you had made a statement that you wanted to leave politics. Why did you say so?

A: Due to circumstances. I am an university man. I am a teacher. I joined active politics not by choice but was forced to do so by circumstances. I still have an interest in academics and maintain links with the university. I am still guiding my students for their Ph.D. degrees: nine students have got Ph.Ds under my guidance. Even today I am guiding some students in Muzaffarpur and Patna.

Q: How do you find time to teach?

A: Somehow, I make time.

Q: Talking about Ph.Ds, we have been told that your Ph.D. thesis was written by someone else. Dr Hargovind Singh's name often comes

The

On 16 March, 32 dissident Congress (I) MLAs presented a memorandum to Mrs Gandhi. The reason: they wanted a change of leadership in the state. Dr Mishra, they said, had become synonymous with corruption, nepotism, inefficiency and was ruining the name of the Congress (I). Though Mrs Gandhi gave them a patient hearing, she was firm on one point: they should not air their views in public. SUNDAY has, however, managed to get a copy of the memorandum excerpts from which we reproduce below.

□The entire ministry was chosen by him. The executive of the legislature party and the office-bearers are all on his side. The speaker and the chairman of the Assembly were chosen without consulting the members of the legislature party. This is the party members' constitutional right. Further, the legislature party does not discuss questions of principle or matters of the state.

□The same is the case with [illegible] cabinet. The chief minister hold[illegible] the major portfolios. The cabinet lacks foresight. The common people have a low regard for most of the ministers. There are, however, a few active ministers but the chief minister does not trust them. The chief minister takes a personal in-up in this regard. Could you please clarify?

A: I got my Ph.D in 1964 when I had nothing to do with politics. The allegation (that Dr Singh wrote my thesis) is unwarranted. I have been with the university for 15 years. As others have done their research, I did mine. It is an accident that I am in politics. My academic career cannot be lowered by this mean politics.

Q: But was Dr Hargovind Singh, at any time, your teacher?

A: He was my teacher in MA and my research guide.

Q: There are quite a few other stories doing the rounds. One is that Singh helped you, and you rewarded him by getting him elected as a MLC. We have been told that you promulgated an ordinance to make him the director of an institute.

A: These are all absurd stories.

Q: Do you find it difficult to be both a CM and a family man?

A: I manage somehow or the other.

Q: How many children do you have?

A: Six.

Q: Do you manage to pay much attention to them?

A: My wife looks after them.

Q: Your eldest son is...

A: Sanjib. He is doing his first year BSc in Delhi, after doing an year's engineering course in Bangalore. My second and third sons are Manish and Animesh. They are both in school in Patna.

Q: And your daughters?

A: One of them is married. One has just passed her BA (Honours) and the other has passed her Matric.

Q: Coming to your daughter, there seems to be a lot of controversy about a statement made by the Patna University Students Union president...

A: Shouldn't a politician's children study? These comments are very mean and bad.

Q: The VC has said there will be an enquiry into this year's examinations. Is this related to the controversy over your daughter's coming second in the BA (Honours) examinations?

A: No.

Q: It is even being said that actually your daughter came first in the university and you ordered that she be placed second, to avoid the impression that her marks had been rigged. Is this true?

A: (Laughing). Why should I do that? I don't know where she studies or what she does.

Q: She must have received some help and guidance from you in her studies?

A: No, not from me. My wife is also an economics honours graduate. She passed her BA (Honours) in 1964. In fact, my whole family is into economics. My elder brother, Mr L. N. Mishra, was also an economist.

Q: Do you find Bihar a difficult state to administer?

A: The state is politically difficult to run. It is a most challenging job. Poverty and backwardness are the main challenges.

Q: What are Bihar's special problems?

A: Bihar has remained poor although it has tremendous natural resources.

Q: How do you explain the fact that although Bihar has over 40 per cent of the country's resources, it is among the poorest states in the country?

A: Because there is a lack of determination and strong political action.

Q: Do you think that the situation has improved since you took over?

A: It is improving. And I have every hope that this will continue.

Q: Everyone hears a lot about corruption in Bihar. We have heard about corruption from some of your ministers.

A: Where is there no corruption? Corruption is a part of national life, and it is all over the country. If somebody says this only about Bihar, it is wrong and unfair. What about the other states? In Bihar, there have been no scandals in the past one year. In the last year, there has not been a single instance of a scandal that the combined opposition has been able to put up in the House. I don't see where the corruption is. You cannot go on hearsay.

I don't know what a dissident is

Q: A case that is often cited as an example of corruption, in which your name figures prominently, is the Patna Urban Bank case.

A: That was an absurd and politically motivated case. It was I who had ordered the prosecution in 1976-77. If I was involved why should I do so?

Q: Will your government take a stern view if corruption charges against anyone are substantiated?

A: That we have already taken—43 engineers have been suspended on corruption charges. Bihar is the first state where ministers have to submit details about their assets and liabilities. Bihar is the only state where Lokayuktas have been established which have the jurisdiction to go into details of any allegations against any ministers. Now it is upto the people. I have challenged the opposition parties in the Assembly to come forward with any charges of corruption against any minister...

Q: Some of your partymen have submitted a memorandum to Mrs Gandhi against you.

A: I don't know.

Q: There are dissidents, aren't there?

A: There are no dissidents. It is only in newspapers that you read about dissidents. I don't know what a dissident is. (For me) there is only one party and one leader: Mrs Indira Gandhi. The people have not voted us (to power): they all voted for Mrs Indira Gandhi. It is not physically possible for her to run all the states personally and so somebody else is running the states. Who, indeed, is Jagannath Mishra? He is just her loyal soldier.

Q: Do you still enjoy the confidence of Mrs Gandhi?

A: Without that I can't continue even for a minute. Why should I? It is her party. The people have voted for her. Only if I enjoy her confidence I can continue. If not, I must go. After all, the people have voted for Indira Gandhi and nobody else. Not Jagannath Mishra, or anybody. I enjoy the confidence of the electorate as long as I enjoy the confidence of Indira Gandhi.

Q: You are wearing a number of rings. Is there any significance of those rings?

A: It is the individual's faith.

Q: Do you believe in astrology?

A: I believe in God.

Q: And the rings...

A: (Laughs)...

□Incapable people have been chosen to head boards, corporations and committees. Persons who have in the past Lok Sabha and Assembly elections worked against the Congress have been made directors of boards. The chief minister has made his own candidates presidents, vice-presidents and members of the Zilla Parishads. Some who had been suspended by the AICC(I) have been given posts of presidents and vice-presidents of the Zilla Parishads.

□Corruption is rampant in the government. Transfers, postings, etc. are openly bought and sold. High-ups in the government and the services are involved. The law and order situation in the state is bad. Loots, dacoities, murders are everyday happenings in buses and trains. The CM has made money the basis of politics in the state. Money is collected for various purposes (presumably for the party) but no accounts are maintained. The party elected Dr Jagannath Mishra as the chief minister so that he would work for the good of the state and party. Unfortunately, he has misused his powers to strengthen his caucus and enhance his image.

The CM who declared himself 'Not guilty'

In 1971, Mr Nawal Kishore Sinha MLA, founded the Patna Urban Cooperative Bank (PUCB) and became its chairman. The bank needed funds and Mr Sinha thought that his friend Dr Jagannath Mishra, who had found a place in Abdul Ghafoor's cabinet as the minister for power, irrigation and cooperation could help. He was right. The government invested Rs 100,000 in the bank by purchasing its shares; the State Cooperative Bank advanced a loan of Rs 600,000; and several state government undertakings, like the Bihar State Electricity Board, the Agricultural Marketing Board and the Agro-Industries Corporation opened accounts with the PUCB.

The bank however fell foul with the Reserve Bank of India almost the day it was born. Three years later, in 1974, the RBI ordered an examination of the bank's accounts and discovered that all its transactions had not been according to the rules. In one instance, the PUCB had advanced a loan of Rs 15,000 to Mr Krishna Singh, a friend of Dr Mishra, on his pledging Patna's Gandhi Maidan (a public property where political rallies are normally held) and the Patna railway junction, as security.

Expectedly, the RBI prescribed legal action against top bank officials: the chairman Nawal Kishore Sinha, the secretary K. P. Gupta, the manager S. A. Haideri, and the PA to the chairman A. K. Singh. It even asked for the liquidation of the bank. Following this, the state government asked its vigilance and the cooperative departments to look into the affairs of the bank. Their inquiries also proved that some of the bank's transactions had, indeed, been irregular. The then chief minister, Mr Ghafoor, ordered the prosecution of the bank officials.

The cooperative department appointed a special prosecutor and a FIR was drawn up. But, curiously, no case was filed. In May 1975, when Dr Mishra became the chief minister, one of the first attacks he faced in the Assembly from the opposition was over his involvment in the Urban Bank. Members demanded an investigation and the CM finally relented: the Assembly's Estimates Committee would go into the matter. The committee, in its report, advised also that some PUCB officials be prosecuted against. The state government did prosecute the bank officials, but spared Nawal Kishore Sinha.

The vigilance department, however, insisted that Nawal Kishore Sinha too be prosecuted. It was then that the IG (vigilance) Mr Ambika Prasad Sinha was suddenly transferred. However, in March 1977, as the state came under the President's Rule, the Governor, Mr Jagannath Kaushal brought back Mr A. P. Sinha to his former post, and he promptly started criminal cases against Nawal Kishore Sinha. In the course of the investigations, Mr K. P. Gupta, the PUCB secretary, turned approver and stated that Nawal Kishore Sinha had withdrawn Rs 500,000 from the PUCB for Dr Mishra and the amount had been deposited in Dr Mishra's account at the Central Bank of India, Dak Bungalow Road, Patna. Dr Mishra was thus implicated in the case (case no 9 dated 1 February 1978, court of chief judicial magistrate, Patna).

Dr Mishra, then moved the Patna High Court for anticipatory bail. Rejecting application, Mr Justice Uday Sinha observed on 13 February 1978: "The petitioner (Dr Mishra) was chief minister of the state and should have been a more responsible person. His conduct should have been, like Caesar's wife, above suspicion...If a lenient view of the matter is taken the conduct of the petitioner will be a Magna Carta to the entire services in the state. If the chief minister can take bribe, why should not other members of the services?...

With villagers : plea of 'not guilty'

Judge: "The case against the petitioner (Dr Mishra) has not been instituted out of political vendetta."

Dr Mishra: "It has" (claiming which, he withdrew the case against himself!)

I do not see how a chief minister can set an example of integrity to the civil services." He also observed: "It is obvious that the petitioner was providing a cover to corruption by shielding Nawal Kishore Sinha."

Dr Mishra then moved the Supreme Court for bail and got it on 20 February 1978. But the court stipulated that "the petitioner will be enlarged on bail furnishing his own bond and of two sureties of Rs 50,000 to the chief judicial magistrate, Patna." Meanwhile, the vigilance department formally presented charges against Dr Mishra and others before the chief judicial magistrate (CJM) Patna and the hearings began on 21 November '79. The case however, was prolonged as both the defence and the prosecution asked for successive adjournments (in all, the case was adjourned on 13 occasions). Commenting on this, the CJM said on 25 September 1980. "It is unfortunate that such an important case in which ex-chief minister who is now the chief minister of the state is an accused for the offence under sections 420, 466, 471, 109, 120B IPC and under section 5(2) of Prevention of Corruption Act read with section 5(1) (a) (b), and (c) of the Prevention of Corruption Act is being neglected by the state and no prosecutor is provided to work on behalf of the state... It is really a mockery of prosecution in the circumstances in which it is being pursued."

Ever since he became chief minister again, in 1980, Dr Mishra had been trying hard to get the case withdrawn. The reason he advanced was that the case was politically motivated—disregarding the fact that the prosecution was actually ordered when Dr Mishra himself was a cabinet minister. The IG (vigilance), Mr A. P. Sinha, however was reluctant to withdraw the case. On his retirement on 1 June 1980, Mr Sudhist Narayan Sinha became the IG (vigilance). He, too, was unwilling to oblige the CM. Mr Sinha was, therefore, transferred to the innocuous post of the chairman of the police building construction corporation. It was clearly a punishment transfer for Mr Sudhist Sinha. He was replaced by a more pliable Mr Shivaji Prasad Singh.

The rest was a formality. Mr Singh, on assuming office, recommended the withdrawal of the case; he said he too believed that it was "politically motivated." And this despite the fact that Justice Uday Sinha of Patna High Court had specifically said that "the case against the petitioner (Dr Mishra) has not been instituted out of political vendetta." Only recently the Bihar government formally dropped the charges against the bank officials. Everyone, therefore, escaped.

How a CM is corrupted

By ABDUL GHAFOOR, former chief minister of Bihar

It is a peculiar thing. The moment you are sworn in as chief minister, you are surrounded by hordes of people whom you have never seen before. They carry garlands and they proclaim earnestly and loudly that they are your friends. The truth is, they are not.

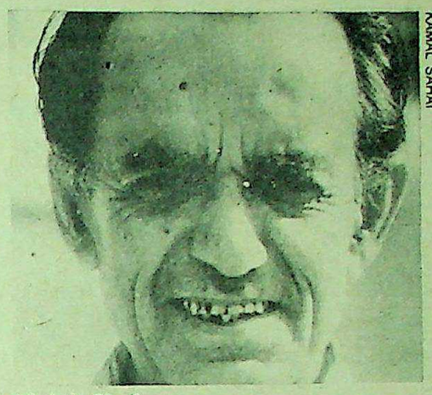
These people are the flatterers who will flock around you as long as you are in power—and not a day longer. They are the hangers-on, the chamchas. Being human, one tends to get carried away rather easily by their protestations of friendship and, the temptation that they signify. After some time one gets so used to their presence that it becomes difficult to live without them.

Your real friends, the people who really care for you, fade out. Only their pride prevents them from coming to your aid, even if they can see that you are being misled. However, although they remain aloof, they remain eager for details about their onetime friend and are keen to see whether he still remembers them or not. Meanwhile, the chief minister, surrounded by the inevitable band of flatterers, has very little time for this loyal band of old friends. As time passes, the gap between the chief minister and his true comrades widens and soon a time approaches when there is no one he can turn to for help.

During my own tenure as chief minister, not many people dared offer me bribes. The same week I assumed office I made it clear to my partymen that I would not oblige anyone who came to me with requests for favours, unless it concerned them or their close relatives. This was the only concession I made,

In this context I cannot help recalling an incident which shows how a chief minister, despite the best intentions, can be made use of. When I was in power it was brought to my notice that a certain police official had amassed a vast fortune. It was obvious that he could not have done so unless he was taking bribes, so I accordingly ordered his suspension.

The police official in question then tried every means possible to get the suspension order revoked. Sometimes he would arrange it so that a mutual acquaintance was seated next to me on a flight so as to plead his case. Another time, I faced a unique situation during a by-election that I was contesting. The suspended official visited my constituency and persuaded all voters belonging to his caste to demand the withdrawal of his suspension order as the price for their support. Even this did not work, so he tried getting the ear of some important partymen in order to plead his case. Finally, one of the MLAs from my party visited me in my chamber and said that the marriage of his only sister had been arranged with the brother of the suspended police officer. He added that the marriage would only be solemnised if I revoked the suspension order. This move, he explained, would save him paying a dowry.



KAMAL SAHAI

Abdul Ghafoor

I felt genuinely sorry for the MLA and told him that I would rescind the order if it helped him. As he was leaving the room, I told him that I wanted to be completely convinced that the marriage had been settled before I actually withdrew the order. Accordingly, he showed up a couple of days later with a wedding invitation and this set my conscience at rest.

Sometime later, a former chairman of the Bihar Legislative Council came to visit me and while we were talking he picked up the invitation. He jumped up from his seat immediately and blurted out "Ghafoor Sahab, what are you up to?" I was nonplussed till he explained that the MLA in question did not have a sister.

So for the moment, I kept the wedding card and my order aside. After a few days the MLA came to me to find out what I had done about the suspension order. There were some other people in my room. I sent them out and bolted the door. Now the MLA was alone in the room with me. I took out the card and my order. I told him I was going to call the IG to find out if the card was genuine. As soon as I picked up my telephone to call the IG, the MLA fell down at my feet asking me to forgive him

Here is another example. This involves the present Bihar chief minister, Dr Jagannath Mishra, himself. He was then the minister of irrigation and electricity in my cabinet. One day he brought a note on which was scribbled a name: Nawal Kishore Sinha. He wanted Mr Sinha to be appointed chairman of the Tubewell Corporation. Knowing Mr Sinha's antecedents I told Dr Mishra that the choice of Mr Sinha would be most inappropriate. But as Dr Mishra insisted and as it was his first request to me, I yielded. Later events, however, proved how right I was about Mr Sinha, whose name figured prominently in a series of scandals.

Dr Mishra has acquired the knack of selecting corrupt officers.

No regime can claim to have been wholly free from corruption: not even mine. One can assume K. B. Sahay's regime (a former chief minister of Bihar from 1963-67 who had to face an inquiry commission on corruption charges) as a landmark, for that was when corruption became institutionalised; now it is even respectable. Everyone in the state knows that no work can be done without paying a bribe—whether it is in the secretariat or in the offices. Ministers openly take money for transfers and postings. Bribes are prevalent in every department. A small example will illustrate this. A road near the CM's Patna residence, was recently constructed. It is officially repaired every year-not once but thrice a year. About two and a half months ago, I saw repair work going on and the road is still in a very bad shape. Obviously, the money spent on it must be going into someone's pocket.

In the PWD, for example, it is an admitted fact that more than 50 per cent of the money is diverted towards 'non-building.' What I mean is that a lot of money sweetens the palms of engineers and the contract-awarding authorities. Thus it is not without reason that people complain that the ministers are corrupt.

It is generally believed that the recent reshuffle in the cabinet is to muffle the criticism about corruption as it came in the wake of consistent complaints by many about the corruption of the ministers. But can a leopard change its spots? Can the reshuffle cure the ministers? The persons are the same and their habits will remain with them. Now a stage has been reached where palliatives are not likely to work. And frankly, I doubt whether there is anyone in Bihar who can set things right.

Dr Mishra is young and a comparative newcomer to politics. I had warned him of chamchas and I had advised him to encourage honest officers. But it seems that my advice has fallen on deaf ears. I am sorry to say that Dr Mishra has acquired the knack of selecting and picking up corrupt officers to run his departments. And so we are saddled with a corrupt ministry, a corrupt administration and a corrupt people.

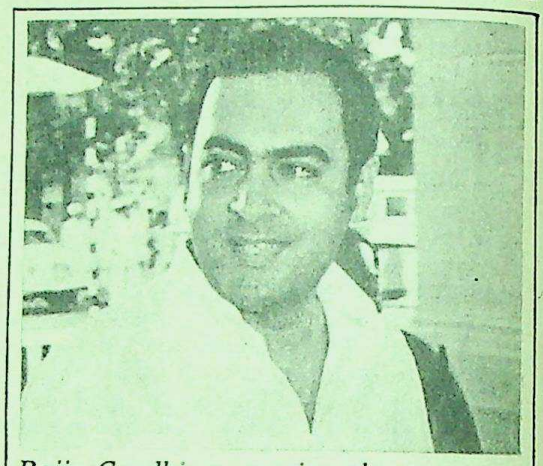
Will Rajiv Gandhi be education minister?

From our Delhi bureau

Till the moment of writing, no final decision had been taken on whether Rajiv Gandhi will officially join the government or not, though the education ministry was being considered seriously as the job for him. One important reason for this was that Rajiv Gandhi could then take direct charge of the Asian Games, and use his influence and abilities to stave off what could so easily become a disaster. After all, if the Asian Games flops India will lose more than money; it will lose face.



Rajiv Gandhi: a sporting chance

Indoor stadium being constructed for the Asian Games

Problem: The chequered career of the Asian Games project seems once more to have taken a turn towards disaster—and there is no longer either time or scope for excuses. Wanted: A leader, with a team which can provide the muscle and the management needed to rescue what could be the biggest flop we have ever known.
Bright Idea: Get Rajiv Gandhi.

Two separate lines on two separate graphs seem, curiously, to be heading towards each other: the downward curve charting the fiasco of the Asian Games project, and the upward curve tracing the rise of Rajiv Gandhi's importance in national affairs. With hardly a year now to go before the Asian Games are due to start, as basic a thing as the architect's designing of the stadium roof has been found to be faulty. It will be, by any standards, a tough job to get everything ready in time—even with sections of the Games being parcelled off to other cities (Calcutta is likely to get some football, for instance). And Rajiv Gandhi has now reached a point in his political career where he must raise his public profile, where he must manage a show successfully to provide evidence to the people that he too can get things done—to run an Asian Games which works, if you like. Therefore: he could become the education minister (without cabinet status), and devote himself totally to the Games (they come technically under the education ministry) leaving other aspects of the job to his co-minister and elderly relative Mrs Sheila Kaul (the Congress(I) MP from Lucknow), who is now minister of state for education.

So many birds would be killed with that one stone. Rajiv Gandhi would begin to acquire experience with the bureaucracy, he would formally enter government—this would be ideal 'management trainee' spell obligatory for the larger tasks he surely has in mind for himself. Not only that, management of the Asian Games sounds like a good reason to enter the government: in any case, it sounds better than untramelled nepotism.

The Asian Games for 1982 were awarded to Delhi during Mrs Gandhi's first long spell as Prime Minister. But the decision came during her "evil days"—in 1976, during the Emergency. Ill fortune dogged that decision. The Janata came to power, and forgot that something like the Asian Games had been assured to the rest of Asia. Then in 1979, an organising committee was set up under Vijay Kumar Malhotra, and he submitted contingency plans keeping in mind the lack of time and resources. He visualised minimum construction and maximum renovation of existing facilities and infrastructure.

But then Morarji Desai fell, and in came Charan Singh's government, and the Prime Minister of rural India immediately denounced the Games as an extravagance. If work on the Asian Games did not come to a complete full stop, at least a very heavy semi colon was placed on progress.

Then we saw Mrs Gandhi's victory. V.K.Malhotra a BJP leader, was sacked. A site for extensive construction was selected at Rai in Haryana after the personal intervention of Sanjay Gandhi. Land was earmarked for various projects; tenders were floated. Sanjay Gandhi died.

Now Vidya Charan Shukla entered the scene; he became chairman of the special organising committee. Tenders were awarded. Suddenly people seemed to realise that there was not much time left. And by now the Games were demanding not merely sports complexes but, according to the new managers, new roads and a whole infrastructure of hotels and hostels. The plans were burgeoning at an alarming rate, and since everyone was in a hurry, money was disappearing at an even more alarming rate. (Things have come to such a pass that Mrs Gandhi herself, who has been such a votary of the Games, recently admitted publicly that if she had to take a decision on the Games all over again, she would now say no. But then the commitment had been made and it would have to be met.)

But before Shukla could really become effective, he fell out of favour: he lost both his ministry and his managership of the Games. Buta Singh took over. Buta Singh had had some experience in sports, having been president of the Amateur Athletics Federation, and he understood sports well enough to appreciate the complexity of the requirements. The pace of work was speeded up. But how fast could it go? And what was to be done about the enormous problems—almost havoc—that the constructions were causing? What more can one say than state that Delhi began to look like Calcutta, with all the digging going on. All the hurry at the initial stage was also extracting its price. Designs were found to be faulty; according to some insiders even flyovers are not reaching precisely where they were meant to reach. The authorities arbitrarily began uprooting the capital's beautiful trees before an uproar halted the massacre of greenery. The swamps created by the digging have become mosquito breeding grounds; there are strange diseases now sweeping the city. Delhi is paying a heavy price for the luxury of the Games.

Then came a stunning blow which jolted everyone. It was discovered that the design of the roofs of the indoor stadium and the indoor swimming pool were faulty, due to mistakes made by the architect. A consultant was flown in from London, and he suggested major structural changes in the roof. The government can barely afford the additional expense and the extra time. And this stadium is the heart of the Games.

The time had clearly come for something drastic. In addition to all this, the opposition—particularly the Lok Dal, and even more particularly the eloquent George Fernandes—had been waging a sustained campaign against the Asian Games, calling it a vast waste of money and resources (like cement, steel etc). There was little doubt that large sums of money were being spent: the final cost could go up to Rs 1,100 crores, according to some estimates of overall expenditure. If, on top of this, the Games are a fiasco it will severely damage the credibility of Mrs Gandhi's government. It will be labeled a government which spends rather than works.

The final decision may not be so much in Mrs Gandhi's hands as in Rajiv Gandhi's. Even after his election to the Lok Sabha he has preferred to take what is (purely comparatively) a back seat. He has a little more than three years before the next national elections to the Lok Sabha, and presumably he would like to inform the country about his worth within this period. It will be a bit of a gamble for him—but then his mother did not reach where she is by sitting in a corner.

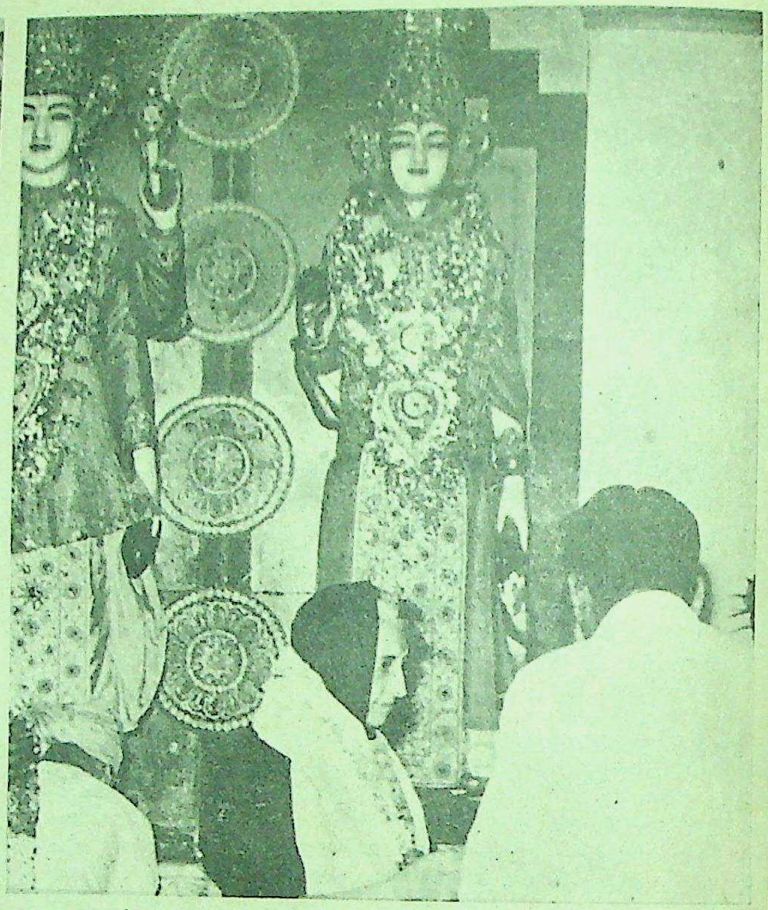
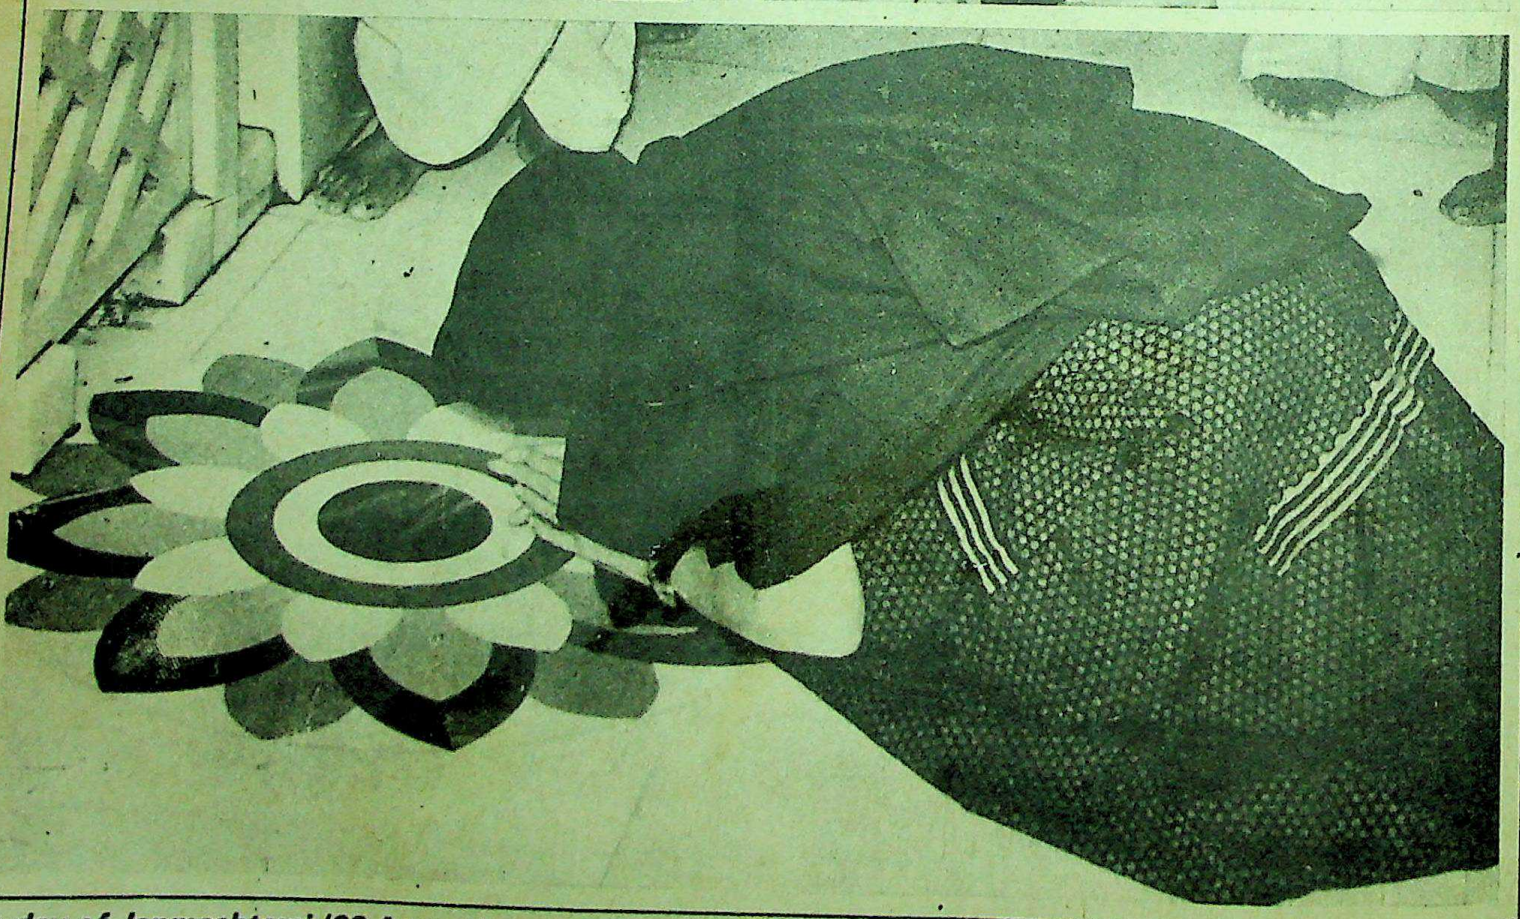
PM worships Lord Krishna





The day of Janmashtami (23 August) saw a VIP visitor at Delhi's Birla Mandir—or, to use its formal name, the Lakshmi Narayan Mandir. Prime Minister Mrs Indira Gandhi came early in the morning, wearing the lovely ghagra of the Mathura region. It was a quiet visit, but photographer Virendra Pravakar of the Hindustan Times was there to take these photographs.

The curious case of the Muslim who became a Hindu

On 30 August a 24-year-old Muslim, claiming to be grandson of the Nawab of Chhatari, became a Hindu at a highly-publicised ceremony in Delhi attended by senior representatives of the RSS, BJP and Arya Samaj. A day later there was much embarrassment when it was discovered that he was no legitimate relation of the Nawab. ANIL SAARI met him in Delhi and the Chhataris in Aligarh to report.

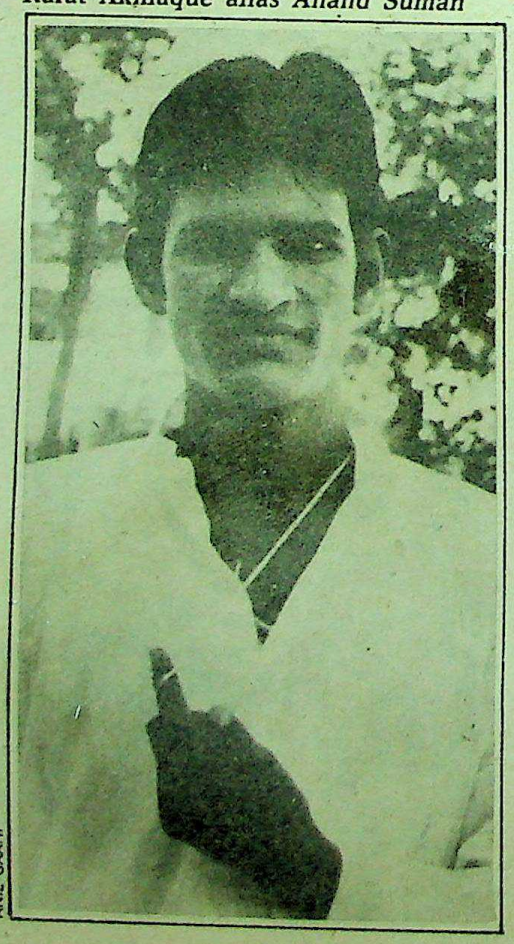
The RSS, the BJP, the Akhand Bharat movement, the Arya Samaj, and orthodox Hinduism in general won a new protagonist on Sunday 30 August. That was the day on which a 24-year-old man called Dr Rafat Akhlaque, a registered homeopath, not only became a Hindu but also swore to become a pracharak of the Hindu religion and the RSS. He was converted at the Arya Samaj Mandir in Kirti Nagar, New Delhi in front of a thousand-odd people. Among the notables there were Mahashay Dharam Pal, well-known leader of the Arya Samaj, Mr K. Narendra, the better known editor of the daily Pratap, and a couple of local BJP leaders. Five hundred people had been invited to witness the conversion; more than twice the number came—the prasad distributed by the new Hindu fell short. Rafat Akhlaque's new name became Dr Anand Suman.

Dr Suman's new mission in life, he told this correspondent in an interview, was clear: "I will go back to the people and reconvert all those who became Muslims, along with my ancestor, during the time of Bahadur Shah Zafar."

And he has strong views on politics too: "I will support the BJP and make Shri Atal Behari Vajpayee the Prime Minister," he says. How exactly will he do that, which so many others have tried to do and failed? "I want to challenge the political parties which think they can survive on Muslim vote-banks. This is no longer possible. Up to now the Hindu was divided; I will unite them." And after he brings about the unity Shri Vajpayee will become Prime Minister (until then, presumably, Mrs Gandhi is safe).

However, more logical is the fact that Akhlaque, or Suman, had an unhappy childhood largely because of the licentious behaviour of his father, Dr K. Akhlaque, who died in 1980. This overactive doctor had five wives, and this turned his son off against both his father and the religion which permitted more than one wife. More dramatic was that one of Anand Suman's mothers was quite young. He was sent to boarding school at an early age, and has lived most of his life in hostels. His father was a successful doctor in Sambhal, and later the son emulated his father and became a doctor of homeopathy himself. It was during his student days that he came in touch with Mr Manphool Singh Diwakar, an RSS leader of Sambhal (in Moradabad district)—Diwakar, in fact, was a tutor to Suman's younger sister. However Diwakar taught Rafat alias Anand Suman a love for the RSS: "The Sangh (RSS) is the only organisation which works for the nation."

Rafat Akhlaque alias Anand Suman



ANIL SAARI

But it was not his conversion on 30 August which created as much sensation as Dr Suman's claim that he was a grandson of the Nawab of Chhatari and a former-member of the Students Islamic Movement (an offshoot of the Jamaat-e-Islami). He claimed that he had been turned off the Students Islamic Movement (of which he claimed to have been president) after they swore at a secret conclave in Hyderabad to create an Islamic republic in India.

One of the most distinguished families of UP, the house of the Nawab of Chhatari, Said-ul-Mulk Colonel Hafiz Nawab Sir Ahmad Said Khan, was waiting in August for a new member to join the family: one of the young brides in the house was expecting. But before she gave birth to a healthy girl, the Chhatari household found itself saddled with another "member" of the family. That was when Dr Rafat Akhlaque, or Dr Anand Suman, claimed that he was the grandson of the 39-year-old Nawab of Chhatari. (Chhatrai is an estate in Bulandshahr district where the family owns farms, they were once the zamindars.)

The Nawab of Chhatari is no ordinary nawab or 'rajwada', and Sir Ahmad Said Khan's family is so well known in political, educational and social circles that no legitimate grandson can suddenly emerge: all the children of the family are known to a large circle of people. The Nawab's family itself considers the whole thing to be a joke. The Nawab's third son, Ibne Said Khan, waving his hands delicately around his eyes, told us in Aligarh on 2 September, "Duniya mein tamashey hote rahte hain. Ek yeh bhi tamasha tha (Life is full of tamashas and jokes; this is one more of them). We are four brothers and by God's grace all of us are alive. No son of the Nawab Saheb is dead. The name Akhlaque does not run in our family. The Nawab Saheb uses 'Said' and his name is Ahmed

Said Khan. 'Said' is attached to the names of all the children of our family. This boy may be originally thakur by caste like us, but that does not make him one of us. I only wish to stress that he is not a member of my family. He is not my son, he is not my nephew, and he is not my brother." At the same time he insisted again and again that neither he nor any other member of the family had any comment to make about Dr Rafat Akhlaque's conversion to Hinduism, or to his motive in claiming to be a grandson of the Nawab of Chhatari.

Similarly, the president of the Students Islamic Movement, a youth wing of the Jamaat-e-Islami Hind, Dr M. Zaki Kirmani denied on 31 August that Dr Rafat Akhlaque was ever president of the Students Islamic Movement. Sources close to the Jamaat told this correspondent that they had never heard of Dr Akhlaque before. They also pointed out that the SIM was not founded in 1977, as claimed by Dr Rafat Akhlaque, but in 1974 at Aligarh.

Even a BJP luminary in Delhi seemed embarrassed by the controversy created by Dr Rafat Akhlaque's claim to the Chhatari family. Insisting that his name should not be mentioned, he confessed that too much had been made of this conversion to Hinduism. Nor did he have anything to say about the boy's claim to the Nawab of Chhatari's family beyond saying that Dr Rafat Akhlaque had said he was being disowned because of property quarrels. Dr Akhlaque or Anand Suman himself could not be contacted on 2 September when we wanted to talk with him once again and ask about the Chhatari family's denial of any relationship with him.

Dr Rafat Akhlaque's family comes from Shekoopur, in Bulandshahr district. His father had once taken a shop on rent at Chhatari from the Nawab's family, and ran a clinic there. It was not very successful, and he moved to Sambhal where h had more luck as a medical practioner. A munshi of the Nawab's household told us that they had learnt that the boy's mother was a pathan and not a rajput (thakur), but there was hardly any contact between the Chhatari family and the Akhlaques after the latter had moved to Sambhal.

Mr Ibne Said Khan, the Nawab's son who looks after the family estate, said that Dr Rafat Akhlaque claimed that his family had become Muslims during the time of the Mughal emperor Bahadur Shah Zafar. The Chhatari family, on the other hand, "became Muslims at the time of Jehangir, who was secular, mind you. I am saying Jehangir was secular because his mother was a Hindu (Jodha Bai) and his first wife was also a Hindu rajput. Now there is a very long gap between Jehangir and Bahadur Shah Zafar. But I do want to say once again that I am not saying anything about Dr Rafat Akhlaque's change of faith. That is his personal choice. A person has the right to join the fold of any religion. We have

Ahmed Said Khan: Nawab of Chhatari

.e Said Khan: third son of the Nawab absolutely nothing to do with that, and have no comments to make on it. All I am saying is that he is not a member of my family."

Since the 93-year-old Nawab is quite hard of hearing now, it was difficult for us to talk to him but the entire Chhatari family is at a loss to explain why Dr Rafat Akhlaque has tried to embarrass them by claiming to be the Nawab's grandson. Sombody in the household observed that it could be a case of fantasy born out of frustration. Of the Nawab's four sons, two are at Aligarh—Mr Ibne Said Khan, 59, and Mr Anwar Said Khan, 44. The eldest son, Mr Rahat Said Khan, 62, has long been settled in Pakistan. And the fourth brother, Mr Farhat Said Khan, 60, retired as sales manager at TISCO and lives presently in Calcutta. The family has three branches. The Nawab's own family is sunni Muslim. A second branch is shia Muslim, and the third is the thakur Hindu family of Barauli-Kashipur. Family members at Aligarh say that the ties between the three branches are still alive, and marraiges in one branch are attended by members of the other branches.

Sir-Ahmad Said Khan, Nawab of Chhatari, has been chancellor of the Aligarh Muslim University since 1965. Prior to that, he was the AMU's pro-chancellor for 15 years. In 1937, he became chief minister of UP, and he has twice been governor of the province in pre-Independence days. After Independence, he was in the Rajya Sabha for two terms. Thanks to Pandit Nehru. Sir Ahmad has had an important career in public life, according to sources outside the family in Aligarh. He was one of those who was instrumental in bringing Hyderabad into the Union of India. He served two terms as Prime Minister of the Nizam of Hyderabad—from 1941 to 1946 and again in 1947. During his second term he incurred the displeasure of the communal Muslims at Hyderabad who were rallying under the banner of the Ittehadul Muslemeen. Led by Mr Kasim Rizvi, the Muslemeen, according to friends of the Chhatari family, were in favour of merging Hyderabad with Pakistan, which Sir Ahmad Said Khan opposed. Sir Ahmad had to flee from Hyderabad by air, and the air-lift was arranged by Nawab Halim Jung.

It is, however, alleged by some people that the boy's father, the late Dr K Akhlaque, might be the bastard child of one of the many women inhabiting the Nawab's mansions at Chhatari and Aligarh. During our interview with Dr Anand Suman the venom with which he spoke against the Nawab of Chhatari—"The estate has been built on the oppression of people," he shouted—suggested a deep bitterness against the Chhatari family.

Inconsistency, certainly is not a flaw in Dr Anand Suman's personality. He says he was once a militant Muslim; he talks now like a militant, extremist Hindu, convinced that in Akhand Bharat "Every person in India should be a Hindu first of all or he will have to go. I don't want kattar (bigoted) Muslims to stay here. I don't want them to stay here and sing songs in praise of Pakistan. I want to wipe out all that is against Hinduism and Bharat Mata." Wiping out ideological and theological opponents is obviously a particular passion with him, no matter which side he may be on.

As the propagator of the new faith, he has plans to set up a platform under the aegis of the BJP's youth wing; he wants to start a Yuva Kranti Parishad which ought to bring to the land once again the revolution of the range that Gandhi achieved, though Dr Anand Suman is quick to add that he is "not a supporter of Gandhi."

Why did he choose the name Anand Suman? He explained: "'Anand' was chosen by the Arya Samaj leaders and 'Suman' is the name of a girl I was in love with from class one to class ten. She was in class ten when she died. She was a Hindu girl from Sambhal. She also studied at Naini Tal. We had decided to marry. We had decided that either one of us could convert in order to get married, it did not matter who would. When she was in class ten she died. On her death I promised myself that I would never marry anyone else."

"It is absurd to say that harijans are becoming Muslims because of foreign money"

By H. N. Bahuguna

There is a lot of stupid talk going on about conversions; a lot of gossip-mongering is distorting the whole matter. Even the press, occasionally, participates in this. For example, one newspaper came out with the story that the Shahi Imam of Delhi's Jama Masjid had converted one Delhi family to Islam. The Imam had to immediately issue a contradiction: he said quite vehemently that he had never done any such thing. I know that nothing of this sort happened in the Jama Masjid.

The conversions that have become such big—perhaps disproportionately big—news recently are shaking Hindu society. If they can shake Hindu society enough to end the follies that exist in it, I shall be very happy. My views are clear, and I enunciated them recently to some harijans who came to see me. I told them that if they honestly believed in Islam, if they honestly believed that the preachings of Islam were better, then they should accept Islam whatever the reactions might be. But if they were going to Islam only because they were being persecuted by the upper castes, or because of injustices that were inherent in the Hindu system, then it was not sufficient reason for them to change their faith. If they were unhappy with the Hindu system they should try and change that system, improve that system; but leaving it would not be a solution, because they too were part of the system.

The conversions have been the result of economic and social tensions, of deprivation and insult that have left the scheduled castes totally disillusioned. Like a very sick man who has begun to lose his confidence in his regular doctor, they feel that a change of doctors would cure them. They are going to Islam now, but one wonders if they are aware that in India, unfortunately, Islam too is affected by the caste factor. The Sheikhs, Syeds, Qureshis, Ansaris, Idrisis—they may not be officially divided into castes, but they behave like castes. Often, they don't even inter-marry. Very few people are aware of this. It is, indeed, awful that this should be so because the caste system is the very antithesis of what Islam stands for. But that has been the impact of India on Islam. The tragedy is that Islam has been affected by a bad factor of Hindu society: caste.

I am opposed to the caste system. I am opposed to untouchability. The fact that we have not been able to eradicate these problems is not only a failure of government but also—perhaps principally—a failure of society. Conversions, therefore, are not going to solve this social problem.

Nevertheless, all these stories which are being spread about the involvement of money in conversions are quite irrelevant. There is no use trying to say that harijans are becoming Muslims because of the allurement of money. It is even more absurd to say that they are being influenced by foreign money. How much foreign money can come in? And harijans are not insignificant in number. The whole treasury of Saudi Arabia will not be sufficient to maintain all the harijan families for all their lives. But we have all sorts of people making statements of this nature, even people high up in government. Home minister Giani Zail Singh makes one statement in Madras, and when someone challenges this statement, a home ministry spokesman "clarifies" that the particular statement was never made...

Though conversions may create tension, may provoke discussion and debate and cause leaders of Hindu society a bit of worry, they are not a solution for the real problems of harijans. However, Hindus must understand that they are the guilty party. The Arya Samaj now says that it will only work for the abolition of untouchability and discrimination. Very good, but why weren't they working for it earlier? However, let them start even now; I shall be very happy.

The Shankaracharya says that conversions must be banned by law. I can challenge the Shankaracharya on this: there can be no legal ban on conversions in our country. The Adi Shankaracharya (the first Shankaracharya) converted every Buddhist back to Hinduism. How can the present Shankaracharya say that conversion must be stopped by law? They are, after all, inheritors of this tradition. I agree that conversion by fraud is bad, conversion by allurement is bad. But the question is, who will be the judge? Is it not a fact that converted Muslims have said that they were not allowed to sit in buses as long as they were harijans, but were allowed to do so when they became Muslims? It is social disability, social persecution, that has driven them to this kind of extreme step. I am more than sure that, given goodwill and good sense, Hindu society will not have to face such ordeals. But today, we are paying the price for our sins; let us not abuse others.

Jyoti Basu: no confrontation with the centre

Will the Durga puja season, the traditional festive time of West Bengal, be the occasion for the centre to dismiss the Left Front government in that state? The proposition is attractive enough—the newspapers in West Bengal close down for a four-day period during the pujas and the people are too involved in the festivities to think of politics. At least one section of the Congress(I) leadership in the state, led by the union commerce and steel minister, Mr Pranab Mukherjee, is understood to be pressing for the immediate dismissal of the CPI(M)-led government of Mr Jyoti Basu. But Mrs Gandhi has not as yet made up her mind.

The main hurdle in Mrs Gandhi rushing to a decision regarding the fate of the West Bengal government is the state of her own party's organisation in the state. The central leadership feels that the faction-ridden Congress(I) in West Bengal is at present not in a position to provide an effective opposition to the Left Front. The main emphasis in the recent reorganisation of the party's state unit has been on promoting non-controversial old faces. The choice of Mr Ananda Gopal Mukherjee, the Lok Sabha member from Asansol (he was among the only four Congress (I) winners in West Bengal) was prompted by the fact that he had the image of being an old party hand, dating back to the days of Mr Atulya Ghosh. Both the general secretaries appointed with Mr Mukherjee, Mr Santosh Roy and Mr Motahar Hossain, too, are old faces in the party. Mr Mukherjee had been a trusted man of the central leadership for quite some time in the past. A seasoned trade unionist from the Asansol belt, he was appointed in-charge of the Delhi state INTUC affairs soon after the 1980 elections. He solved the disputes in the state INTUC to the satisfaction of the central Congress(I) leadership and for a long time he was regarded a dark horse in West Bengal affairs as well. The back seat given to youngsters like Mr Subrata Mukherjee and Mr Soumen Mitra, the two rival youth leaders in the state, is being interpreted as an indication that the central leadership would like to project a "traditional" image in West Bengal.

While Mr Pranab Mukherjee has for a long time, been advocating the dismissal of the government of Mr Jyoti Basu, his arch rival, Mr Abul Barkat Ataul Ghani Khan Chowdhury, the union energy minister, has been advocating a diametrically opposite line. This, perhaps, is symbolic of the sharp differences in the West Bengal Congress(I) leadership. Mr Ghani Khan Chowdhury would like the centre to allow the Left Front government to run its full term in office, till May 1982. He does not favour immediate elections in the state. According to the scheme put forward by his group, President's Rule should be imposed on West Bengal after the term of the present government is over. The scheme envisages a President's Rule in the state for around a year after the government's term has finished and the holding of elections, based on revised electoral rolls, thereafter. The main charge of the Congress(I) against the Left Front government being that it has "indoctrinated" the officials and "rigged" the electoral rolls. The scheme envisages remedy for both. Mr Ghani Khan Chowdhury is believed to have told the central leadership that it should not consider a major change in the bureaucracy because the officials will be on the side of the party in power—and after the imposition of the President's Rule, the ruling party at the centre certainly wields power.

There is yet another proposal before the central leadership, but the authors of the scheme being close friends of the former West Bengal chief minister, Mr Siddhartha Shankar Ray (who has so far failed to regain Mrs Gandhi's favours), it may not be taken too seriously. According to this school, the Congress(I) should realise that since in any case it cannot win the Assembly elections next year, it should allow the CPI(M)-led front to continue in office till the normal end of its tenure. Not only that, even after losing the elections, the Congress(I) should allow the next term of the Left Front in office to pass off peacefully.

The theory is that by remaining the ruling party in the state for two terms continuously, the CPI(M) is bound to suffer such an erosion in its credibility that it will commit permanent suicide. This scheme is too far-fetched, quite obviously.

The Congress(I) has been approached by two prominent former party-men in the past few months for admission, but in both cases the response from Mrs Gandhi has been lukewarm. Mr Siddhartha Shankar Ray has been close to Mr Rajiv Gandhi even in the days when Mr Gandhi was not in politics. Mr Ray's house in Delhi was among the few houses Mr Gandhi used to visit in the political circuit before joining politics. But that has not helped Mr Ray to gain an entry into the Congress(I) because Mrs Gandhi is yet to forgive him for his volte-face after the 1977 election defeat. After having been one of her principal advisers in the matter of declaration of Emergency, Mr Ray became a principal Indira-Sanjay baiter after the poll defeat. That scar will be difficult for him to disguise. Otherwise, Mr Ray is perhaps the best choice for the Congress(I) to project as the chief ministerial candidate in the state.

The other person who did not find it easy going with Mrs Gandhi was Mr Priya Ranjan Dasmunsi. However, he is now reconciled to being in the opposition and has approached the CPI(M) for an alliance in the state elections.

Whether Mrs Gandhi will dismiss the Left Front government during the pujas, as advised by a section of her partymen, will largely depend on the choice of Governor for West Bengal. The present incumbent, Mr Tribhuvan Narain Singh, has been told he has to go. But his successor has not been chosen, till the moment of writing. Mrs Gandhi would prefer Mr Mohanlal Sukhadia, the veteran Rajasthan leader. But Mr Sukhadia, who is a Lok Sabha member, is not too willing to leave active politics. At one stage the name of Haryana's former strongman, Mr Bansi Lal was also considered. But Mr Bansi Lal, too, was unwilling to leave active Delhi politics. The one card the CPI(M) has is Assam: The Congress(I) is keen to get CPI(M) support for a Congress(I) government in Assam. Will a fresh term for Anwara Taimur in Assam be the price of Mr Jyoti Basu's continuance in office?

... And how the CPI(M) wants to combat Delhi during President's Rule

BARUN SENGUPTA finds out

Ever since Mrs Gandhi came to power in 1980, one fear that has ruled the Left Front is of being summarily removed from power. Had the CPI(M) had any idea that supporting Charan Singh would have led to Mrs Gandhi's return, it would never have helped topple Morarji Desai. In fact, even one day before the election results, pragmatic leaders like Mr Promode Dasgupta, the WB party general secretary, openly stated that no single party could possibly get an absolute majority. It was generally held that a coalition government with the CPI(M) as a major constituent would be formed at the centre. Instead along came Mrs Gandhi, the lady who had been PM in 1971-72.

The CPI(M) leaders took three important decisions straightaway: first, they would avoid any major confrontation with Mrs Gandhi: neither would they indulge in provoking the centre nor would they join a coalition front against Mrs Gandhi; second, they would support Mrs Gandhi on all possible national and international issues without major compromises; and third, they would step up the process of strengthening their power base, specially in the rural areas of West Bengal, Kerala, and Tripura so that the party could absorb a violent attack from a hostile Congress.

The CPI(M) is, theoretically, a revolutionary party. But it has not participated in revolutionary politics since 1971; even during the Emergency it preferred to keep a low profile.

After 1980, the CPI(M) began a two-pronged strategy: talk with Delhi, and build quietly a solid rural base. The CPI(M) has few illusions about the violence that could take place later. So, in fact, it is preparing itself to use violence if the need arises. The party is strengthening an underground organisation, and is, in fact, collecting arms.

West Bengal's CPI(M) leaders are confident that though Mrs Gandhi might succeed in toppling the Kerala Left Democratic Front ministry by instigating inter-party squabbles, he will not be able to use that method in West Bengal. The CPI(M) is definite that the West Bengal government can only be removed from power by force. And they also know that the Assam problem has bought them time.

The CPI(M) has consolidated its position through elections to the panchayats, the municipalities and educational institutions at a pace never seen during the Janata regime. It has also placed its supporters in government offices and the police force. In addition, leftists are trying to win over the large body of state government employees by increasing their wages and benefits.

There has been a price: an increase in the state's expenditure. Funds originally allotted for long term development projects like irrigation, agricultural development and construction of roads are now being channelised to meet the demands of increased wages. Since 1977, the CPI(M) has concentrated its efforts to raise the standard of living in the rural areas by freely distributing food and money through its various projects like "Operation Barga", the Food for Work programme and other relief measures. However, over the past one-and-a-half years, the relief measures have not been restricted to the rural areas alone: the urban population has also benefitted from the CPI(M)'s largesse. Writers and artists are now being financially aided by the Left Front government. This is being done with the primary motive of building across-the-board support. The CPI(M) is confident that the recipients of the benefits will vote for the party in future elections, or equally important, be voluble supporters in the cities.

Within the party, however, there seems to be a conflict of opinion between Mr Promode Dasgupta, and Mr Jyoti Basu. While Mr Dasgupta feels that the party should become more militant to counter the centre's moves using mass meetings, processions, strikes and bandhs, Mr Basu feels a softer line is adequate for the moment. The chief minister thinks that militancy can only worsen the law and order situation and give the centre another excuse to act against the government.

Mr Basu is definite that Mrs Gandhi will not allow the CPI(M) to participate freely in the coming elections. For the moment, Mr Basu is content with remaining in power as long as he can without provoking the centre too much: but the quiet preparation goes on for the future.

The Government

Infighting in sugar lobby

The union minister for agriculture, Rao Birendra Singh, is in a fix: he does not know whether to accede to the demand of VasantdadaPatil,the Congress(I) general secretary and the president of the National Federation of Cooperative Sugar Factories that the cases launched against five cooperative sugar factories by the government be withdrawn or to proceed with the cases as demanded by Vikhe Patil, a prominent MP from Maharashtra and a stalwart in cooperatives. The prosecution was launched by the Janata government and in 1979, the CBI was asked to start investigations against five sugar cooperative factories—three in Maharashtra and one each in Andhra Pradesh and Tamil Nadu. The CBI investigations revealed that all the factories had wilfully defaulted in the distribution of 80% of the free sale sugar quota allotted to them. Vasantdada Patil is very keen that the case against at least one of the sugar cooperatives, with which he is closely associated, be dropped and had even approached the union home minister Zail Singh, but drew a complete blank. He has now sought the intervention of Rao Birendra Singh. Vikhe Patil, on the other hand, has threatened that if the cases are dropped he would launch an agitation. Will the agriculture minister sort out the issue?

Promoting Manipur—for whom?

Peculiar are the ways of the Manipur government. Recently, the state government was given a grant of Rs 10 lakhs by the Planning Commission for the development of tourism in the state. As it is, this amount is not sufficient for infrastructural work. But to make matters worse, the administration decided to arbitrarily take away Rs 1.75 lakhs from this amount and set up a publicity unit in Delhi "to build up the image of ministers." There are a number of bills pending with the tourism department, which is now engaged in building a tourist lodge in Imphal. Could not the money be better utilised?

Small-scale units held at ransom

The government has changed the existing nomenclature of 37 items reserved for manufacture in the small-scale sector. Within the item of confectionery, chocolate and chocolate preparations were earlier exclusively manufactured by the small scale units. But no longer. For, by changing the definition, the government has allowed organised large scale industries to enter this field. Over the years, in this manner, more and more large industrial concerns have managed to get backdoor entries to manufacture items reserved for the small-scale sector. While large industrial concerns have often benefitted by collusion with certain small-scale units, it is also true that many small-scale units are being held at ransom by large units by withholding and repeatedly defaulting on payments. A few years ago, there was talk of introducing comprehensive legislation to protect the interests of the small-scale sector, but by all indications, it will be a long while before such legislation is introduced.

'High-rail' robbery?

The Indian Railways could be nailed for many crimes, but there's a new one for the list: instead of carrying coal to consumers who have booked it, the railways have started using the coal meant for some other consumer to run its steam engines. This is just like a truck owner who has been hired to carry diesel to gas pumps, using up the diesel to run his fleet of trucks. No truck owner does this for the simple reason that he would be sued by the contracting party. But the Railways have taken care of this eventuality by a careful choice of its victims. It has left unidisturbed the coal that is meant for the major coal consumers, namely the power stations, cement plants and other large industries. It gobbles up only the coal which has been booked by small-scale industries, which are not powerful enough to take on a big outfit like the Railways. When asked how much coal has been 'hijacked' in this fashion, the official reply is: "No figures are maintained separately on this subject." Naturally.

Scheme to revive sick industries defeated

The central government has recently asked public financial institutions to reduce interest rates under the soft loan scheme for modernisation programme in five sick industries—textiles, sugar, cement, engineering and jute—from 12.5% to 8.1%. But, the conditions attached to it are such, that it may defeat the objective of reviving the sick industries. One condition is that the reduced interest rates will only apply if, according to the financial institutions, the units concerned are capable of early recovery and revival. In other words, the grant of loans on easy terms is left purely to the discretion of these institutions. Even the public sector National Textile Corporation (NTC) which is to nurse back to health 103 textile units under its charge, falls under this condition. Besides, the NTC has also been charged with the task of producing cheaper cloth for the poorer sections. In the face of this, should not NTC get loans at cheaper interest rates? Higher interest rates will increase NTC's losses.

How Delhi spies on Kashmir politicians

By UDAYAN SHARMA

It is hardly a surprise that Delhi keeps an eye on the states, or that it keeps a slightly more watchful eye on the states run by opposition parties, or that it is most vigilant about what happens in the very sensitive state of Jammu and Kashmir—or, for that matter, that this is true irrespective of whether Mrs Indira Gandhi is in power or Mr Morarji Desai. But who are the eyes and the ears of the centre in the states? The general belief is that intelligence agencies run by the centre perform this role, and this general belief is generally right—but this is not the full truth. Along with the Intelligence Bureau (IB), the centre has other agencies and sources too. And Delhi's need to know extends over a wide area—from potential saboteurs on or across the borders, to internal saboteurs whose ambitions may be to topple governments in the Assembly or Parliament.

The IB's state unit is called the Subsidiary Intelligence Bureau (SIB). The SIBs are normally located in the state capitals, but not necessarily in all the state capitals. For example, the SIB in Madras controls, in addition to Tamil Nadu, Kerala and Andhra Pradesh too. Normally the head of the SIB is of the rank of DIG, the only exception being West Bengal: the SIB in Calcutta is headed by a person of the rank of IG, or joint director. This, incidentally, is not because the centre feels especially threatened by the presence of a leftist government in West Bengal, but because of the sensitive and potentially explosive nature of the eastern sector which the SIB in Calcutta has to handle. One post of joint director in Kohima has been created to help monitor the east, but even then it is one of the toughest assignments in the country.

Not that the SIB in Calcutta ignores the CPI(M); it keeps a close tab on all the leftists. Before the CPI(M) joined the government in 1967, the SIB used to work in close cooperation with the state's Special Branch, but now doubt has crept in because the Special Branch has been infiltrated by sympathisers and supporters of the leftists. The paradox here is that the top and middle level officials of the SIB in Calcutta are generally on deputation from the state government, so one wonders how pure is the pristine purity of the SIB here, or how it can really be maintained.

Contrary to any misconceptions, the IB and the SIB is not really flush with secret funds which it can disburse lavishly. In fact, its officials are often handicapped by poor facilities, particularly at the district level, where they have to keep a strict distance from the local police. As a result they have to use public transport and cannot avail themselves of the comforts that the thana can add to their lives. Usually, IB operatives keep a low profile: at least that is what they are supposed to do.

There is also a branch of the external affairs ministry, headed by a senior IPS official, in Calcutta, which is meant to concentrate on activities across the border, but uses its spare time to take a look at the left parties.

Sheikh Abdullah: watched by the SIB

But what is more interesting is the centre's penetration of the state Special Branch in West Bengal, through a group of officers who have been taken into the confidence of the IB. This "penetration" has become "necessary" only after the entry of the CPI(M) into government, and the resulting conflict between Congress and Marxist interests. In any case, this has been a very successful operation, and no one in the state knows who Delhi's real men are in the Special Branch.

The much-and-often-unnecessarily-maligned RAW also functions in Calcutta. But the grapevine says that RAW is going to be bypassed by a new outfit now being set up in Calcutta by a former top policeman whose efficiency has been often tested and proved in the past.

But these are all official agencies. Delhi keeps in touch with what is happening in West Bengal through other channels as well. For instance, people in the business and trading communities who generally have to keep their noses close to the ground in order to survive in their businesses (some of them have become expert double agents, supplying information both to the state and the central governments). One of the worst sources of information about West Bengal is the state unit of the Congress(I) which, technically and legally, should be the best source. But if Mrs Gandhi only depended on her party to give her information about West Bengal, she would learn nothing about the state and everything about which faction of the Congress(I) was doing what wrong where.

Tamil Nadu is one state which, contrary once again to popular conception, has given the centre the least amount of trouble. In fact, the Tamil regional parties seem to vie with each other to publicly support and secretly help whichever party is in power in the centre. And as one intelligence source put it, "The DMK and the AIADMK are capable of supporting anyone in Delhi."

Obviously, the state watched most closely, taken most seriously, is Jammu and Kashmir. The SIB in Srinagar is headed by a deputy director of the DIG rank. He has two assistant directors, one in Srinagar and the other in Jammu. Information from this state is fed to the special desk at the headquarters in Delhi, controlled by one deputy director (rank of DIG) and one assistant director, who process the information and send it on to the director through a joint director.

Thanks to the all-too-keen interest Pakistan and China take not only in Kashmir but also in its politicians and their financial welfare, the state demands some very special attention from our intelligence services. Therefore, RAW, CBI, Special Branch, army intelligence and BSF intelligence are all active in this state. It is now well known that even the Governor plays a part in helping to gather information and brief the Prime Minister: he uses the SIB to get the most accurate possible picture of what is happening, so that his reports to the centre are not a mere formality. And of course tapping phones is part of the approved process of intelligence gathering.

The hardcore, disciplined Jamaat-e-Islami may consider itself to be ideologically foolproof, and its members impervious to either guile or inducement, but it is heavily infiltrated. As has been Lone's People's Conference. Indeed, the situation has become such that every political activist seems to be suspecting the other.

Some of the unofficial sources used by intelligence agencies are surprising. For instance, civilian officers in private and public industries. But the main task of infiltrating the various political groups is done by the SIB. The opponents of Maulvi Farooq (Bakara Party) claim that he was broken and made a tool of the centre during his arrest in the mid-Sixties. Whenever Delhi needs someone to raise a confrontation with the Sheikh, out is brought the Maulvi. He has been on the best of terms with the centre through all the shifts in power. He was supporting Mrs Gandhi till March 1977. And then he became the favourite politician of Mr Morarji Desai, who even dined at the Maulvi's house while PM. And now he is Mr Rajiv Gandhi's man in Kashmir.

It is also said—with what degree of veracity is difficult to prove—that the most successful operation of the SIB in the valley was the way in which a member of the family of Mirza Afzal Beg (once the alter ego of the Sheikh) was made a source of all that happened in the National Conference inner circles. Later when the Sheikh was made chief minister and Afzal Beg too became a powerful minister, this person tried to cut off his links with the intelligence officer: eventually the matter was resolved with the officer being transferred to Delhi. It is also alleged that later Mirza Afzal Beg himself fell into a trap laid by the intelligence officers. He began believing that he could replace the Sheikh with the help of Delhi—and he was encouraged in such a belief. Many observers believe—once again such a belief can hardly be substantiated since no written documents vouch for such things—that the Sheikh-Mirza Afzal Beg controversy was carefully engineered.

Mirza Afzal Beg: misled by Delhi

The most powerful intelligence agency in Kashmir maybe the IB, but certainly the most active is RAW. However, it is to the IB that one of the most spectacular intelligence successes must be credited. Mr S. N. Mathur, who later bacame the director of IB, was the DDIB in Srinagar in 1971. To him goes the credit of the 1971 plane hijacking operation, in which an Indian plane was hijacked to Pakistan. Pakistan whooped with joy over this "defection," India stopped overflights across her airspace, and suddenly Pakistan realised it had been tricked by a double agent. This double agent Qureshi was used superbly. According to many people, the SIB really became a crack unit in Srinagar after Mr Mathur's tenure there. Its reporting on Kashmir politics is extremely good. Domestic servants of important politicians are one good source of information about the whereabouts and meetings and 'what was said.' The hardcore, disciplined (supposedly) Jamaat-e-Islami may consider itself to be ideologically foolproof, and its members impervious to either guile or inducement, but it is heavily infiltrated. As has been Lone's People's Conference. Indeed, the situation has become such that every political activist seems to be suspecting the other.

Of course the international intelligence agencies are all too eager to find out ways and means of operating in this highly sensitive region. The Soviets, like the Americans, are active too, but are said to be a little more successful. According to one source, Maqbool Butt, chief of the Jammu and Kashmir Liberation Front, who is now awaiting hanging in Tihar jail, was nabbed after a tip-off by the Russians.

GAS TROUBLE— Un-Comparable Disease

The Incomparable Remedy—GASTRO

The root cause of most of the diseases you suffer from is GAS TROUBLE.

In case you are suffering from any disease right now, please carefully compare the symptoms of such disease with the symptoms of GAS TROUBLE enumerated hereunder. If you are convinced that the root cause for your problems also is GASTROUBLE, please be assured that there is no need for fear, disappointment or anxiety over your condition. Please use GASTRO and experience fast and full relief from your troubles. It is only natural with human beings to wish to enjoy life with body and mind as much as possible and as long as possible. Hence this advice.

Most of those who suffer from the disease, commonly known as "gas trouble" are not aware of two very important aspects of this ailment. They are not aware that gas trouble gives rise to a host of other serious diseases. Most of the sufferers also do not know what to do about the complaint. Consequently such people lead unhappy and restless lives without eating proper food. Thus they slowly fall into the deep pit of ill health. We invite such people to read through the following paragraphs containing basic details about the disease. No doubt they will be immensely benefited by this knowledge.

When the digestive power called "Jadharangni" gets weakened, the food does not get digested properly and in time. Such semi-digested food ferments inside the stomach and produces foul gases. These gases in turn cause belching, chest pain and other severe uneasiness. These conditions are the main symptoms of gas trouble. Also, when the body is exposed to sun or fire, chewing or smoking are indulged in and when food items like chillies, asafoetida, tamarind, onion, liquor, tea, coffee, butter milk, curd, root vegitables, peas, dry fish etc. are excessively consumed disregarding the nature of the constitution of the person concerned, excessive bile juice is produced in the stomach. This juice causes pain and buring sensation in the upper abdomen and chest. Belching with sour, bitter, fermenting and undigested taste is experienced. This gas gets stagnated in the upper abdomen causing chillness, fever, giddiness etc. The decayed bile juice then enters the intestines and bowels. This produces a gas that travels like electricity. As this gas spreads to the brain, chest, heart etc. with electric speed, the patient feels giddiness, unconsciousness and pain around the heart. Again, the excreta and gas which accumulate in the bowels get heated because of pressure and the gas travels through intestines creating giddiness, unconsciousness, chest pain and similar conditions. All these conditions are collectively called GAS TROUBLE.

OTHER COMPLAINTS DUE TO GAS TROUBLE

Excessive generation of foul gases in the abdomen fills the stomach and creates a feeling of heaviness even when very light food is taken. Low and loud sounds from different parts of the stomach, burning sensation, feeling of disturbance as though from pin pricks, acute biting sensation inside the stomach, feeling as though water moves inside the stomach, emanating gas attacking the region of chest and gnawing pain, constriction the throat, movement of gas up and down with noise, movement of bowels either loose or in the shape of tape or clay, discharge of phlegm (Kapha), tendency to pass motion frequently, burning and itching inside the anus, frequent excessive and discoloured urination, belching with bitter taste, inclination to eat frequently, physical weakness inspite of taking nutritious food, lack of appetite, excessive appetite, cough, nausea, vomitting and pricking sensation in limbs. Piercing pain in the stomach, feeling of being bitten by ants or traversed by insects, feeling of lightness in the chest, increase in heart beats, accumulation of gas in the stomach after hard work, feeling of intoxication, severe pain in different parts of the head, deterioration in eye sight, burning sensation in the eyes, watering from the eyes, reduced or blocked hearing, humming in the ears, bad dreams (experience of many people show that majority of gastric patients have sleep filled with bad dreams), intolerence to noise, desire to lie down always, panting while walking, frequent presence of phlegm in the throat, profuse saliva in the tongue, fungus in the tongue, noxious odour in the mouth, loss of sleep, headache, cold, sneezing, constipation, pains in joints, insatiable thirst, bloodlessness, aversion to work, lack of thinking power, desire to be alone, failure of memory, lack of determination, inability to control passion, bad temper. There are innumerable people, suffering from such miserable symptoms. These sumptoms may manifest singly or in combination, permanently or temporarily. According to Ayurveda all complaints arise from the imbalance of TRIDOSHAS (Vatam, Pittam, Kapham). Of these, the first, vatam is most important. Gas trouble is related to this dosha. When obstructed gas is released from the body through any of the outlets, the patient feels relief. It is clear from this that undue accumulation of gas in the abdomen and its obstructed release are the root causes of all the above symptoms.

GASTRO—The REMEDY

There are single remedies for single complaints. There are also combination of remedies of particular complaints. Some specific remedies are there for a combination of complaints. Gastro is a specific remedy for all the symptoms and conditions arising out of gas trouble. Those who do not know that diseases are caused by the increase and decrease of the vital assets of the body (vata, pitta, kapha) may find it difficult to believe that one medicine can cure several complaints and such persons cannot be blamed for that. They can only be advised to try GASTRO and satisfy themselves. If you are a gastric patient do not be under the impression for a moment that it cannot be cured. The truth is contrary to that belief and GASTRO is an example. As you do not know that there are resistance powers in your system, similarly Gastro has the inherent capability and medicinal properties in it to cure gastric complaints and allied diseases. The Ayurvedic teachers of yore have prescribed invaluable ingredients to prepare medicines for the unfailing cure of such diseases, restoration of lost or damaged physical energy and strength and maintenance of the health of mind and body and replacement and rectification of the wear and tear of the human body occasioned by time and age.

Gastro is an excellent medicine prepared after studying and analysing the old teachings in relation to the present day requirement and changed conditions and you will get convinced from the steady improvement noticed in the physical conditions enumerated above, when you begin to use "Gastro" specially manufactured by us, due to the undisputed efficacy of the product. But it should be said that trust without work and work without trust are equally meaningless. Your anxiety to get rid of your illness is established when you repeatedly read this with the intention of throughly grasping the points discussed in it. All of us want to be happy mentally and physically throughout our lives. When gastric patients locate the root cause of their complaint they will have the impression that they have discovered a gold mine in their own garden.

GASTRO is an Ayurvedic patent medicine in powder form packed in bottles of 240 gms. under DRUG LICENCE No. 47-25-D-78. The retail price is not to exceed Rs. 24-70 (Twenty-four and paise seventy only)

HEALTHCARE

Mysterious disease strikes Delhi

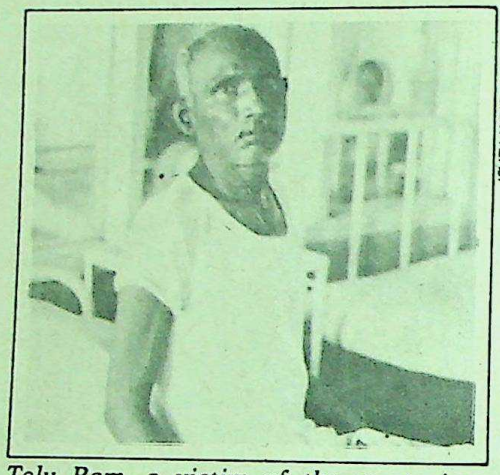
Be careful if you have had conjunctivitis

New Delhi: Close on the heels of the conjunctivitis epidemic in the capital, comes an even deadlier foe: a hitherto unknown disease which paralyses—and even kills—its victims. The outbreak of this polio-like disease was detected in mid-July. In fact, statistics indicate a close relationship between this strange disease and conjunctivitis. Thus far, very little is known about this disease except that it attacks adults—knows no social or economic distinctions, does not believe in sexual discrimination, usually gives a day or two's notice—and renders useless any one or all four of a person's limbs. Over 200 people have been admitted to the city's major hospitals with this frightening disease. Two of them have already died, at the time of writing, and the total number of people affected might run into thousands.

"I had this redness and pain in the eyes (conjunctivitis) and two weeks after being cured, I suddenly felt feverish one night. The next morning my left leg went weak and the muscles had a fluttering sensation, like a bird flutters when you catch hold of it by the feet. Then a dull pain set in and my leg went numb. After a few hours the same thing happened to my other leg and gradually my hands too—they felt as hard and immobile as ice—that's when I was taken to hospital," said Telu Ram (45), a sweeper with the municipal corporation of Delhi and a patient at the Dr Ram Manohar Lohia Hospital. Other accounts are more or less similar, the common factor being a two-week-old history of conjunctivitis, pain in the limb or limbs, and then paralysis. In the more severe cases, the chances of the paralysis remaining permanent are high. As for the rest, some have been able to fight the disease and have recovered completely, while others, showing signs of improvement, are normally discharged from hospital with instructions to visit for periodic check-ups. The mystery, however, remains unsolved. The nature and origin of the disease are unknown (an article in Neurology India dated 1964 being the only instance of a disease similar to this, being cited), medical opinion differs on the methods of treatment. Further, the duration of paralysis is, at best, a matter of speculation.

"Frankly, I am intrigued," says Dr G. K. Ahuja, associate professor of neurology at the All-India Institute of Medical Sciences (AIIMS), who has not been giving his patients any drugs. Painkillers in extreme cases, and physiotherapy, is all that the patients are being given at the AIIMS. Of the 20 patients admitted since mid-July, 10 have been discharged. "Though none of them had completely recovered, we expect them to be normal after a few periodic visits," explains Dr Ahuja. Polyradiculopathy is what they call it at the AIIMS. In simpler terms, "it is a non-specific response of the nervous system to a virus, conjunctivitis, in this case, and not a specific virus by itself."

Dr P. B. Mazumdar, the medical superintendent of the Dr Ram Manohar Lohia (RML) Hospital, an experienced neurologist, feels otherwise. "It is a disease stimulating polio, possibly a virus, though not any one of the three recognised strains of poliomyelitis viruses; the major difference being that polio normally attacks children. This new disease is being seen in adults only and there appears to be some sort of a relationship with conjunctivitis," he explains. The RML hospital, being bigger than the AIIMS, has been able to admit 50 patients, 30 of them were discharged after showing signs of improvement. "We have been giving our patients a cortisone preparation and vitamin B-complex," states Dr M. P. Dubey, head of the department of medicine at the hospital, who is as baffled by the strange disease as his colleagues in the medical profession.



DEBASISH CHATTERJI

Telu Ram, a victim of the mysterious disease

At the Safdarjang Hospital, one of the largest in Delhi, the authorities were apparently unaware of this new disease and were not able to furnish any data. Surprisingly enough, the National Institute of Communicable Diseases in Delhi, seemed to be blissfully unaware of the outbreak of this disease even a few days after reports appeared in the newspapers. A complacent Dr M. Dutta, deputy director of epidemiology, confessed, "We are still collecting facts and are unable to give any data at the moment," despite the fact that the disease broke out over a month ago. His ignorance was further displayed when he said, "So far we have checked medical records for polio-like diseases at a few hospitals and the incidence seems to be the same as in other months this year and in corresponding months in previous years."

Newspaper reports, often misleading and inaccurate, have already created a scare among literate sections of Delhi's populace. Many doctors in the city relate how they have had to reassure frightened patients (and even perfectly healthy people) that they had some minor ailment, easily identifiable and easily curable, and not this strange new disease. To avoid this disease, one has to avoid conjunctivitis—most of us know how to, by now. Beyond that nothing else is known. Consolation may be derived from the fact that as yet this paralytic disease is nowhere near attaining epidemic proportions. But if you have had a recent attack of conjunctivitis, you had best keep your fingers crossed.

Khushwant's mail watched

New Delhi: The government in Delhi has been intercepting the postal mail of not only its known opponents, which might be expected, but also of some of its most famous supporters. Number 72 on the list of those whose mail was being intercepted (before a furore in the Lok Sabha ended it) was none other than Mr Khushwant Singh, the former editor of the The Illustrated Weekly of India and present editor of The Hindustan Times, who has consistently supported Mrs Gandhi through the Emergency, and then through the more trying Janata raj. In fact, the reward for such support came when Prime Minister Mrs Gandhi nominated him a Member of Parliament. One reason for such action might be that the "Sanjay group", which is, to put it mildly, in the doghouse these days. Indeed, one of the most prominent and powerful members of this group, Akbar Ahmed (an MLA in Uttar Pradesh) even went through the ignominy of receiving a disciplinary letter from his party chief. Who could have imagined that this would be the fate of one of Sanjay Gandhi's closest friends?

Libya's Gaddafi hits out at the USA

London: On 1 September Libya's Col Gaddafi threatened to attack US bases in the Mediterranean. It was a brave—if impossible—threat. But he is carrying on his one-nation war against a Reaganite America to a point where the Middle East would explode. The most dramatic battle in this war occurred on 26 August when two Libyan airforce jets were shot down over the Gulf of Sidra. Americans said that two of their F-14 Tomcat fighters were attacked by two Libyan SU-22s over international waters and the Americans shot back the Libyan jets in retaliation. However, the Libyans maintained that eight F-14s had threatened the two SU-22s in Libyan airspace and that one Tomcat was destroyed. What casts doubt about the American claim is the apparent foolishness of the Libyans in despatching two comparatively low performance aircraft to tackle the Sixth Fleet, a part of Task Force 60, which consists of two aircraft carriers (the Nimitz and the Forrestal with 100 planes each), four frigates, four cruisers, four destroyers and two destroyer escorts. It has come to be known now, that the American decision to organise a major naval exercise in the disputed waters was taken with the unanimous consent of President Reagan and his senior advisors.

Americans claim that during the first two days of the exercise, there were several intrusions by Libyan fighters. At 7 pm Libyan time, on the third day, Pentagon says, two F-14 planes spotted two Libyan SU-22 jets at a distance of 30 to 40 miles, on their cockpit radars. The SU-22s passed under the US jets and one of them fired an Atoll missile, which has a range of upto four miles, from a distance of less than two miles. It missed. The Americans fired back with Sidewinder missiles that hit both the aircrafts. The pilot of one of them was seen to eject, but no parachute was noticed from the other.

The new stipulation worked out after eight years of sluggish negotiations at the Law of the Sea Conferences, which has not been ratified yet, provides coastal states with a 12-mile territorial sea and a 200-mile 'exclusive economic zone' within which they have the sovereign rights to natural resources. But the movement of ships, aircraft and submarines belonging to other states cannot be resisted in any way. So, the US fleet was well within its rights, 60 miles from the Libyan coast.

But some questions remain. Did the Libyans really fire first? There is no evidence barring the American version to prove this. If they did, were they, by any chance, goaded into doing so? Finally, why did the US planes, having avoided the Libyan missile and given their superior speed and manoeuverability, not simply fly off? The exultation shown by members of the Nimitz crew when television cameras visited them in the Bay of Naples, a couple of days after the outbreak of hostilities, gave the impression that the Americans were celebrating some kind of a victory. Said David McLintock, a former US Navy pilot who had served in the Gulf of Sidra, on American TV soon after the incident, that provoking the Libyans into an attack has been a regular feature of previous operations.

Libya's Col Gaddafi is regarded in Washington as "the most dangerous man in the world" and the seeds of the recent air clash was planted 12 months ago when President Carter, worried about the hostages in Iran, ordered the Sixth Fleet to steer clear of controversy. The US Navy, which has staged its "war games" in the Gulf of Sidra area at least four times in the past seven summers, considered this as quite unacceptable. Some time early this spring, according to the Pentagon, the commander of the Sixth Fleet, vice admiral William Bowden, sought permission to ignore the Carter directive. The matter being sensitive, the idea was formally put to the National Security Council. The meeting took place in June. In July, William Bowden was given the permission to proceed with the manoeuveres and briefed about the confrontation risks.

President Reagan's hatred for Col Gaddafi is "well known." Indeed, his best ally in the Arab world, President Sadat of Egypt, calls Gaddafi "a madman." Other Arab regimes are less critical but admit to his "eccentricity." He came to power after a revolution in 1969, and almost immediately, succeeded in ousting the American and British bases in his country, and in obtaining more favourable terms from the American and other oil companies stationed in Libya. Ever since, with his Islamic fundamentalism and revolutionary ideals, he has been a thorn in the flesh of the West. In fact, he now maintains that the Americans propose to "invade" his country, and promises to defend the country as well as the Gulf, even if this means "a third world war."

On assuming power, the Reagan administration lost little time in adopting a tougher attitude. There has been widespread speculation in the American media about the CIA planning a coup in Libya, and even preparing to assassinate Gaddafi. These reports have been stoutly denied by the White House, but the concern expressed by some leading senators, suggests that the matter cannot be totally ignored.

US-Libyan relation is at a breaking point. Over the years, American support for Israel has formed the basis of growing hostility between Washington and Tripoli, and expanding purchases of Soviet arms by Libya have caused increasing alarm in the United States. Another irritant has been Gaddafi's campaign of killing Libyan dissidents exiled in Europe and America. The thread snapped as it were, when Libya intervened with arms in the civil war in neighbouring Chad.

As for the Soviet reaction, looked upon as crucial and watched with great interest in the West, a Tass release villified the US military operations and bases abroad, but offered no sympathy to Gaddafi. Interestingly in Europe, despite the happiness at the Americans' rejection of Gaddafi's excessive claims to Mediterranean waters, there are distinct qualms about President Reagan flexing his military muscle. West Germany, in particular, views the episode as yet another case of the Reagan preference for "cowboy action" rather than intelligent calm.

COURT ATTIRE

The law clerk in her blue jeans

New Delhi: The bespectacled man behind the reception counter at the Supreme Court was at sea when we asked him where the advocate L. C. Goyal could be found. He was also a bit indifferent. The moment we said that the advocate's clerk was Adesh Lata Jaspal, the confused look disappeared. And so did the indifference. "Oh, you mean, the girl in the jeans? Chamber No 39," he replied, his face lighting up in that dark reception room.

Chamber 39. Ms Jaspal was not there, but everyone knew where the girl in the blue jeans (who had become an overnight celebrity, even internationally, when Chief Justice Y. V. Chandrachud asked her on 19 August not to come to court in jeans) was: Court No. Five.

Outside the court room, dressed in flowing black robes over starched white saris and with equally starched looks were two women advocates whom we asked for the whereabouts of that elusive lady in the blue jeans. "Why do you want to see her?" shot up one eyebrow. "You press people are disgusting. You want to make a mountain of a molehill. The Chief Justice was right, there is such a thing as a decent dress, and jeans are not a decent dress for the court...and she was wearing flowers in her hair and dangling earings..."

Inside the court, it was much as it would have been the day Ms Jaspal wore her un-wanted jeans (the make of the jeans is Wanted and it is suprising that the advertising whiz kids have not asked Ms Jaspal to model for them although she has had a couple of film offers). The Chief Justice was behind the bench. Ms Jaspal (21), sat quietly nibbling her pencil, wearing a steel grey salwar-kameez.

Ms Jaspal thinks this is much ado about nothing: "Why, I have been to court so often in jeans. Usually I wear those small tops, but that day it was a pink kurta with full sleeves..."

SONDEEP SHANKAR

Ms Jaspal in her blue jeans

At this point in the conversation (we were sitting in the canteen opposite the Supreme Court) Mr Goyal interrupted us: "Perhaps the Chief Justice did not mean jeans as such. After all the army officers wear khaki jeans, in the navy they wear blue jeans... Jeans is just the name of the cloth. What the Chief Justice probably meant was that the jeans were tight-fitting..."

"Were they?" we asked Ms Jaspal.

"Yes," she said demurely. "But jeans are always tight-fitting..."

There are no Supreme Court rules as such about court etiquette and clothes. But the bar council has a set of rules. The proper dress in court is white blouse or shirt and black coat. Convention, however, has it that a white sari with a white blouse is the standard dress for women advocates.

According to Mr Goyal, the court marshal called him after his case was over and asked him who the lady sitting next to him was. Later, the Chief Justice, according to Mr Goyal, asked him to tell his private secretary and clerk that saris were still available in the market, and that a sari was the proper dress.

But Mr Goyal and Ms Jaspal, who began to work with him in 1980, did not leave the matter at that. Ms Jaspal wanted to know whether the Chief Justice was "making a suggestion or giving a directive." "If he was making a suggestion, she would wear a suit, but if it was a directive, she would like to file a writ, this is what I told the CJ," said Mr Goyal.

Later, when the latter went to see the Chief Justice in his chambers, he told her that he was only making a suggestion and that it did not look very "nice" if advocates and clerks wore jeans to court. Ms Jaspal said, "He told me that since I was a student of law I should come in a sober dress, at least in court..."

Ms Jaspal has certainly put away the jeans for the moment, at least to court. Her mother does not allow her to wear them there. But they have not been put away for good. She wears them to the law centre where she is contesting the elections for secretary of the students union. It is certainly making hay while the sun shines. Banners have appeared all over: "Jeans vs Court" and the contestant is referred to as J-bomb.

IRAN

Shocking assassinations

Teheran: "It is possible that we will be killed tonight by someone, but we (would) have lived for Islam..." The man who said this in an interview to SUNDAY (1 February) was laid to rest at Tehran's Behesht Zahra cemetery on 31 August this year. He had been killed by an incendiary bomb; his face was burnt beyond recognition—only from the marks on his teeth was he identified as the former Prime Minister and the newly-elected President of Iran, Mohammed Ali Rajai (48). Also killed by the very same bomb was Mr Rajai's trusted friend and Iran's Prime Minister, Mohammad Javad Bahonar (47).

Two months ago a bomb planted at the headquarters of the Islamic Republican Party had claimed over 70 important political lives; stunned and angry, Ayatollah Khomeini had asked: "Who are they? Are they human beings or savage beasts who dare not show themselves? Who are they who send other people's children to carry out sabotage?" These questions were obviously rhetorical; the world knew that ousted President Abolhassan Bani-Sadr had called his supporters out into the streets to show Khomeini that he wasn't a spent force in Iran. But if the mullahs were confident on the streets, they had every reason to be apprehensive of what would probably happen in future; for Bani-Sadr had escaped from Iran and had taken with him a dreaded leader of the leftist guerillas, Massoud Radjavi (32).

When Bani-Sadr surfaced in France he set up the National Council of Resistance, appointing Radjavi as its leader. It was a marriage of convenience: the left merging its cause with the moderates'.

"The Ayatollah's regime has the ability to mobilise but it cannot organise the people," said Radjavi in an interview to a French daily, La Croix, a few days before Iran lost both its Prime Minister and President in the bomb blast. Outlining his strategy to oust the religious dictatorship of the Ayatollah, Radjavi said: "Eighty per cent of the people are against Khomeini but they are frightened by the executions.....Our objective is a general insurrection." He claimed that on 24 July, the day Mr Rajai was elected President, his terrorists had carried out 190 armed operations all over the country. The signs were ominous; but the mullahs paid no heed. Understandably, Radjavi has a very poor opinion of the security arrangements in Iran: "Bani-Sadr and I left Iran right under the nose and beards of the mullahs."

Radjavi and his mujahideens would probably be the deciding factor in Bani-Sadr's longrange war against Islamic fundamentalism in Iran. Their loyalty to the exiled leader can be judged from the fact that it was only after Bani-Sadr's sacking as President that they took up arms against the Ayatollah's regime. The real basis of the Radjavi-Bani-Sadr alliance is, of course, the hatred for religious dictatorship which "destroys the right to think."

"I know that now in Paris there are elements opposed to the Islamic revolution," said Ayatollah Khomeini at the funeral of Mohammed Ali Rajai and Javad Banohar. What he chose not to disclose is the fact that the very same elements in Paris have posed the most serious threat to his regime and created a political vacuum in Iran.

FOREIGN STUDENTS

Khomeini hates leftists

New Delhi: What appears to have become a civil war in Iran is spilling over to India as well. On 27 August, 185 students belonging to the leftist People's Mujahideen Organisation of Iran (PMOI) began a six-day hunger strike outside the UN office in New Delhi in protest against the executions of leftists by the Khomeini government after former President Bani-Sadr left for France on 19 July. It did not take more than a day for the pro-Khomeini students to react: at 6 am on 29 August, while the hunger strikers were asleep, they attacked them with screw-drivers, knives and bicycle chains, seriously injuring 21 of them who were later removed to hospital.

There were, till the beginning of last year, over 7,000 Iranian students in India. Many of them were called back after the Iranian government passed a law requiring all those who had graduated to return home and to go to the battle-front. But there are thousands who have yet to return and they belong to different factions, ranging from pro-Khomeini fundamentalists to the Marxist-Leninists and the Kurds. Those who resorted to violence on 29 August belonged to the Union of Iranian Students' Islamic Associations, a wing of the ruling Islamic Republican Party; their victims were supporters of Massoud Radjavi, the leader of the National Council of Resistance recently set up by Bani-Sadr to remove the Ayatollah's formidable regime

In 1978 it was much the same fervour; but the enemy then was the Shah and the hero was Ayatollah Khomeini. The cloth masks they wore then were black; today they are appropriately red. There is another significant difference this time: the demonstrators do not march to the Iranian embassy (they don't accept it as their mission anyway). Said one of the students: "It is too dangerous. The police are inside the building and they will shoot us. We don't mind dying, but not here. In Iran, yes, for our cause." Ironically, this student was also one of those who had marched for the Ayatollah two years ago. "We supported Khomeini because he was the head of all groups," said another student. "But the last two years have shown that Khomeini's slogans are hollow." This student believes that the release of the American hostages was a trade off for the $2.7 billion given to Iran and for the Talbot deal for automobile production in that country.

The leftists are conspicuous in their red masks. They don't consider Khomeini a true Muslim. "He has a reactionary understanding of Islam," they claim. Islam should not be forced down the throat, says one of them. They fear that the Indian government might deport them in order to keep the Ayatollah happy and the flow of Iranian oil to India steady. (During the Shah's regime the Indian government had planned to deport a number of Iranian students to their country where they would have faced a firing squad; eventually they were packed off to France.) But as long as they remain in India the street wars will probably continue.

Does government want to check black money?

Bombay: Tax officials claim that the latest hawala raids have caused panic in the stock exchanges. Many hawala agents have come forward to "confess." Officials also say that zeroing in on the hawala agents is a time-consuming process and requires checking, ferreting out information, following it up with clues that are very skimpy. A diary found, for instance, has entries written in code or mere numbers which have to be deciphered. They normally deny everything and the courts take their side because there is no concrete evidence. Thus, finding the culprits is an unending process.

More than a question of logistics, the issue is a lack of political will, since a government that really wants to track down culprits can do so. Everyone knows what is being sold in black and white. Right behind the income-tax offices on Queen's Road is a string of buildings on New Marine Lines where every flat is sold on black money transactions. The tax department can make a start from there.

The capriciousness with which the hawala subject was handled belied the serious repercussions on the country's economy. As the well-known tax consultant and advocate Y. P. Trivedi said, the sophistication and ingenuity of the Indian business community, made the American mafia look like kids. Nowhere in the world have businessmen complete hold over the economy as in India.

The present hawala raids started about eight months ago when a pretty, young stenographer fell out with her boss who was in the hawala business on a small scale. One thing led to another and the tax sleuths uncovered hawala transactions valued at Rs 40 crores. Hawala is primarily a commercial word in Marwari, Hindi and Gujarati and means literally "transfer." The commercial connotation is "bogus transaction" or "bogus entry." Principally, there are two types of hawalas: purchase and sale hawala and money/loan hawala. And the one who gives a bogus bill is called a hawalawallah. Mr Trivedi recounts that he once cross-examined such a person. That man told him quite blandly, "I can give you a bill for anything, even for an elephant. If you want a bill for having bought a Boeing (aircraft) I can give you one for that too. After all I only have to make a bill, I don't have to give you the item." This is the ingenuity of a hawala transaction. In the case of purchase and sale hawala, if one wants to inflate purchases and deflate sales, the hawalawallahs show fictitious sales, purchases or expenditures made by an intermediary who was paid through account payee cheques. Later the intermediary returns the money in cash which becomes black money. When profits are high, one can "buy" losses this way, which means one can convert white money into black, making India the only country in the world where you can "buy" losses.

There are a large number of hawala agents in the city and they are necessary for people who deal in commodities where super profits exist: in polyester, filament yarn, cement, steel, dyes and chemicals, pharmaceuticals, textile, machinery and spares and foodgrains. These agents are generally nondescript.

Hawala is born of the needs of the tax evader and black money holder. For everything one does in the country today, one needs black money. For instance, even transferring a tenancy right which is against the law, fetches a fancy premium. Purchase of flats is paid for in black to the tune of 80 per cent and despite raids, some months ago on estate agents and chartered accountants, flats continue to be sold at a ratio of 80:20.

The question uppermost in every citizen's mind is whether the government is sincerely interested in reducing the evils of black money. For instance, we are told of raids on filmstars, businessmen and others. In 1980 the income-tax department conducted 3,746 searches on various premises and cash and valuables worth Rs 19.25 crores were seized. Between 1 April and August this year, there were 758 searches and Rs 10.76 crores were seized. And this as everyone knows is the tip of the iceberg. The raids hardly have any effect. Each case taken to court lasts at least five years and assessment takes equally long. And, meanwhile, black money continues to be made by the hour.

How a government is playing with human lives

Lucknow: Mr Mohan Singh, Lok Dal MLA and the party's chief whip, lashed out at the UP ministry of health, especially its officers, in the last Assembly session for succumbing to graft. Till the time of writing no inquiry against the department has been instituted.

According to Mr Singh, the ministry of health invited tenders for the purchase of ayurvedic, allopathic and homeopathic medical kit bags to the tune of Rs one crore and 68 lakhs. According to the conditions of the tender, only those firms which possess licenses for production and sale of medicines could put in their bids. Among the firms which submitted the tenders, the lowest was given by M/S A.B.L. Research of Hapur, UP. Also taking part in the tender were three Delhi firms: among them was the firm which had quoted the highest, the Delhi State Small Scale Industrial Corporation (DSSSIC). The DSSSIC does not possess the necessary license for the production or sale of medicines. The two other Delhi firms came to know that they would not qualify for the tenders because of their high rates so they withdrew in favour of DSSSIC. But not before they had pressurised the joint director (health) of UP, Mr R. P. Dass. According to Mr Mohan Singh, Mr Dass was made to accept the tender of the DSSSIC for a 'consideration.' What the two other Delhi firms would do was supply the DSSSIC with the medical kits which in turn would be sold to the government. The order for the purchase was given to DSSSIC despite protests from the deputy director of the UP industries directorate who is a member of the purchase committee. It is interesting to note that the DSSSIC were to supply both ayurvedic and allopathic medicines. This is illegal.

The purchase committee had decided before passing the orders, that the 12 drugs which were to be supplied with the medical bags should undergo a sample test to prove their genuineness. The medicines were sent to the government test house in Lucknow which found five of the 12 medicines, spurious. The joint director, Mr Dass, then sent the medicines to the drug inspector asking him to have them tested at two private test houses: the Shri Ram test house and the Analytical Testing Corporation. The drug inspector raised objections saying that sections 23, 24 and 25 of the Drug Act did not permit him to have the medicines tested at private testing houses. Soon after the drug controller changed the order and had the medicines sent to two government test houses: the government Analysis Centre at Lucknow and the National Test House at Calcutta. The reports from the government test houses were the same: five of the samples were spurious. Despite the reports from the government test houses, the UP health ministry went ahead with its purchase. Till the time of writing, Rs. 80 lakhs have already been spent for the purchase. The state government, it seems, is bent on playing with human lives that are going to be treated with spurious drugs.

DRUGS: A PASSAGE THROUGH INDIA

MADHU JAIN reports how drugs produced in the Golden Crescent make their way West through India, along with local consignments

It was an innocuous pile of fork lift tyres lying around in open crates at Frankfurt airport. While unloading, one of the tyres fell on the ground and developed a hair-line fracture. Within seconds narcotics squad dogs rushed to the tyre and began to bark. The game was up.

The Germans immediately warned the American customs: the tyres had been airlifted from New Delhi and were headed for New York. And when four men turned up to "take delivery of the merchandise," the police were ready. There were 300 grams of the finest hashish in each one of the "made in India" tyres. In all, 100kgs of hashish were found. This was only one of the consignments.

Meanwhile, the Germans had also warned the Directorate of Revenue Intelligence (DRI) in New Delhi. The airway bill was found and the men at the Delhi end, including a young Stephanian, were arrested. One of the Indians of Jama Masjid area who had been involved in rubberising the tyres flew to the United States to testify against the four men who had been arrested. They were sentenced to no less than 15 years' imprisonment each on the evidence of this Indian. But the Indians in Delhi, though arrested were soon out on bail and have yet to be sentenced. (Hence, no names.)

For narcotics, it has become more than a passage to India. It is a passage through India. This country is becoming a very important transit point for drugs, a clearing house into which come opium-based drugs like morphine and heroin from the infamous Golden Triangle: Laos, Burma and Thailand, and, the Golden Crescent: Afghanistan, Iran and Pakistan, and then out again to the West, this time suitably white-washed.

An Indian, or even a foreigner, with Delhi or Bombay as his embarkation point, is not likely to be searched by European customs officials as thoroughly as someone flying directly from Bangkok or Kathmandu into Europe. It costs about Rs 5,000 to hire a courier to take out the drugs in, say, a guitar. For harder drugs like heroin, a courier can he paid anything upto Rs 10,000.

India is a very convenient cauldron for drugs. Drugs find their way into this country from the Golden Triangle either through Burma to Imphal and then goes to Bombay or Delhi—and finally to the West. Drugs too come in from Nepal which has a 1,800 kilometre border with India. Drugs are now pouring in from the Crescent, where the poppy fields are flourishing in the absence of control by the governments and drug traffickers are literally making the best of a bad situation.

There are other equally important reasons why more and more drugs from the Crescent are coming into India. After the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, the land route which was used to carry the drugs to Europe (the other route was by air) became useless. (Even the Turkish guest workers who carried drugs to Germany were caught.) Moreover, less heroin is being produced in the Triangle after recent droughts. Indian airports, consequently, have become more popular and less dangerous take-off points. Again, narcotics from the Golden Triangle, until a couple of years ago, used to find its way to Hong Kong where Western syndicates would swoop down to collect their consignments. But the severe penalties for both drug users (abusers is more appropriate) and traffickers were effective deterrents. The death penalty in countries like Burma and Thailand and even Turkey scared away many smugglers. The Midnight Express certainly does not stop in India.

India's importance as a transit point increased because it is considered a "soft" place. In India, a distinction is made between drug abusers and traffickers: the former get about a year in jail or less; while the sentence for possession of narcotics is upto seven years but seldom more than three years is given. The fines are ridiculously low—seldom over Rs 30,000 for traffickers.

But what is even more tempting for the dope smugglers is the fact that it is very easy to get a bail order in India. If you have money, the right connections and an ample amount of grey cells, India is the ideal place for a drug trafficker to operate from. There is an Israeli drug trafficker who has been in Delhi for several years. This tough-looking former commando has a house in Vasant Vihar. He conveniently arranges to get arrested on a bailable offence—a few grammes of opium "found" on him are enough—and then bribes court officials not to bring his case forward. Since he is on bail, he can't leave the country, even though his travel documents are no longer valid. Business continues as usual, normally from a hotel off Connaught Circus.

Easy bail and the lenient anti-trafficking laws are not only attractions for the drug traffickers but also for the drug addicts. India has become a perfect haven for drug addicts and "pushers" because drugs are cheap and easily available. And even more important is the fact that the police often look the other way for a small amount of money or for other "favours" if the "junkie" is female and white. Nor is getting a false passport a difficult matter. There are many printing presses turning out perfect passports which can be had for a price.

There is an intricate narcotics network in India which is rapidly getting more efficient, sophisticated and deadly. It involves not only the peddler on the streets in the notorious Paharganj area in Delhi but also a millionaire smuggler in Bombay who has excellent connections among some very influential people. (The police know who he is but have no proof because he never carries more than a gram of heroin or any other drug on him and is too clever by half.) In between are scores of other people—hippies, junkies, pimps, customs and police officials, doctors, lawyers, travel agents and exporters and importers. The millionaire, who lives near Napean Sea Road, has an obliging mother-in-law in west Delhi who often stores the "merchandise" for him. Unfortunately, on a recent raid on her house the police only discovered that irritating one gram of heroin—probably a sample. Only this man's alleged Delhi associate, Kishore Deb Mukherjee who lives in Karol Bagh, was arrested and convicted abroad in 1978 for possession of heroin, hashish and cocaine.

The network runs deep and wide and its tentacles have spread even into jails. Last year an Italian model was flown out of India by the Italian embassy after a two-year spell in an Agra jail. She had been caught with some morphine and was sentenced to jail. But once there, this model, who lives in Munich, continued to get her regular supply of morphine. She had to prostitute herself to inmates and jail officials to earn money for the drugs. When she entered the jail she was a beautiful girl of 22. When she left she looked twice her age: her face had become bloated and ugly.

Tihar jail has recently become infamous for drug trafficking within its walls. One of the doctors who has treated some of the drug addicts there told this correspondent that it was obvious that the addicts were regularly getting their supplies. "If they weren't, they would be violent and desperate... you can't imagine how desperately their bodies need the drugs. If you touch the stomach of a morphine addict, who has been off the drug for some time, it is as if an animal is kicking from within. But the ones I saw were quiet..." So if toothpastes, soaps and cakes get in, so do drugs. Even the CBI director, G. S. Bawa, grudgingly admits this. Some people say that the Mafia is behind the scene, pulling the strings. But police and customs officials in India do not believe this—despite the fact that one of the Mafia's hired killers, Ilyas, an Egyptian, was deported from India in February after he spent several months in Delhi trying to kill Walter Harrisson, a taxi driver who witnessed many of the narcotics transactions. Most officials believe that the big bosses—the ones behind the scenes—are Indians who use the hippies and junkies as buyers, pushers or couriers.

Smugglers have merely diversified. They have added narcotics to the list of commodities they trade in. The arithmetic is simple and stunning. One kilogramme of hashish costs Rs 2,000 in India. In the United States, it fetches as much as Rs 32,000. Hashish oil costs 150,000 dollars per kilo and morphine which can be bought for Rs 30,000 a kilo sells for 700,000 dollars.

A DRUG ADDICT'S PARADISE

It was supposed to have been akin to the legendary Shangrila. A lush, tropical green visage. A home for exiled monks, from Kampuchea, Vietnam and Tibet. And an atmosphere of peace and tranquility, ideal for meditation. Disturbed only by the distant hum of DTC buses plying on Mehrauli Road.

But, inside it was more akin to hell. The Buddhist Youth Hostel at Ashoka Vihar, in Delhi, a kilometre away from Qutub Minar, was a paradise all right—a paradise for drug addicts. There were a dozen drug addicts from West Europe in various stages on the journey to 'chemical-nirvana' when we entered the derelict, evil-smelling canteen at one end of the hallowed ground reserved for the Buddhists. Pandit Nehru had originally supported the idea for a centre of world Buddhist fellowship here. But it was for a nirvana of a very different kind indeed.

Two of the "junkies," stared blankly at the ceiling. The rest sat huddled over a chess board. These people must once have been the beautiful flower children. They had withered. Not one of them could have weighed much more than a 100 pounds. One of them had every inch of his chest and arms tattooed with snakes and dragons. There was even a cherubic German blonde in her teens with the baby fat barely off her cheeks. But the pink from her cheeks had vanished. When she smiled, she was metamorphosed into an old woman: there were hardly any teeth, those left were charcoal black. She was far on the morphine trail.

As soon as our photographer took out his camera, the glazed looks disappeared. The hippies (or whoever they were) descended on him like hawks. "No pictures," they snarled. The French girl who had taken us to this hostel tugged at my sari in quiet desperation and said, "It is time to go... these people are dangerous. They will even kill..."

People have disappeared from here. And nobody has been the wiser for it. A few years ago a drug addict died of an overdose and he was cremated before anyone could identify him. The police don't enter this little Eden of drug addicts. The lodge might not have diplomatic immunity, but it has something which might even be better—religious immunity.

The police only enter when called—for instance when there are violent fights and drunken brawls. Some plainclothesmen also hang around in the hostel and they all tell, with that unmaskable glee of a voyeur, of the naughty goings-on in the hostel: orgies, and white women bathing out in the open. (The farmers of Mehrauli have protested to the police about this because they feel that this has a corrupting influence on their families.) The wonder is that while the officials in the "field" know all about this youth hostel, the information has not made its way to the bosses on top. Recently, however, a senior police official has come to know that since the mid-70's this hostel has been turned into a den of iniquity.

The junkies, on the day we visited the hostel, may have been in a foul mood because they now have to find a new hideout: there was a notice outside the office of the lodge's secretary which said that everyone would have to leave by the end of August. Where else could they find a place so secure?

The secretary, a rather forlorn-looking Cambodian monk who left his country in 1972 (he was in Pune until last year), was quite perplexed when we wanted to talk to him. What he saw around him certainly wasn't Buddhism. "There is no Buddhist activity here. People who used to give us money now ask us if this place has become a night club. They think that the cups and plates and cupboards they donate will go to the hippies. They wonder where the monks have gone."

The monk, who looked as miserable as a captain forced to go down with the ship, was quite ready to return to Cambodia, in spite of the communists. There used to be a head monk who used to go round the hostel with a stick each night asking the "guests" to pay the customary Rs four a night. But ever since he went to the United States last year, even this has stopped. The lodge has even found a mention in a special guide book for the wandering youth published in, of all places, Poland.

But these evicted "guests" need not worry too much. They can quite easily disappear into that vast underworld of the drug addict in Delhi. Convenient little guest houses off Connaught Circus or the seedy hotels in Paharganj provide refuge for the drug addict in Delhi. There are, of course, the religious centres in the country. Godmen sprout in India as easily as that fleur de mal—the poppy. Cannabis grows wild in places like Manali, and the drug addicts flock to these places, like a herd. Some remain there for a decade or more. Goa and Nepal are the most populated, but Benaras, Hardwar, and Manali are getting equally crowded.

in the United States. Since the prices are considerably lower in Europe, the hard drugs end up in the United States.

The prices become surreal when it comes to heroin. A kilo of heroin can make a smuggler a millionaire overnight. One kilogram of heroin in today's narcotics-hungry market sells in wholesale, for almost 300,000 dollars. But the dope kings are very greedy and have found ways of adulterating drugs and increasing their profits. Thousand grammes of heroin diluted at 90% purity will fetch only 300,000 dollars. But when diluted further, that kg goes a very long way indeed. For example, it would produce 2,000 grammes at 45% purity.

This is one of the reasons dope kingpins tend, increasingly, to get the opium processed in the source countries rather than take it out in its unprocessed forms. Perhaps, this is why as many as five illegal morphine factories have been discovered in the last six months in South India. Over two and a half kg of morphine have been seized from clandestine factories. Says Mr G. S. Bawa: "Smugglers no longer find it convenient to take out unprocessed opium. So it is being refined here. More and more morphine factories are being discovered in the opium-growing areas... We recover about five tonnes of illicit opium a year. Now if detection is only 25%, as it is in the case of other crimes there would be 25 tonnes of illicit opium being produced each year."

India produces 800 tonnes of illicit opium annually. It used to be 1,200 tonnes until last year, but the world market was glutted when Australia began to export opium—as did Turkey when it resumed its cultivation of opium.

There are 54,000 hectares under opium cultivation in India, spread over Madhya Pradesh, Rajasthan and Uttar Pradesh, on which work about 22 million farmers. The opium production which extends over nearly 75,000 villages, is controlled by the Central Narcotics Bureau. Opium smuggled out from these opium-fields is barely enough for local consumption according to Mr Bawa. In fact, a lot of opium from Pakistan filters through Punjab, where it sells for about Rs 2,000 per kg. Punjab has traditionally been the land of opium-eaters. And still is. Landlords often add a bit of opium in the tea of the agricultural labourers so that they work longer. Some of the opium has also found its way, in cargo boats, to Ceylon and to Mauritius. The two governments have in fact complained to India about some of the illegal opium entering their shores.

Some illicit morphine factories have been discovered in Ghazipur and Banaras. The latest was found in Shahdara on the outskirts of Delhi when 550 gms of fine quality opium and 10 kgs of opium solution prepared for the extraction of morphine, 8.5 kgs of opium, chemicals and equipment needed for making morphine were discovered. Interestingly enough, one of the arrested, Jeetu, was a dismissed employee of the Ghazipur opium factory—as is the case in many of the people employed in the clandestine laboratories. An African drug addict we met also claimed that there were quite a few morphine laboratories in and around Mehrauli.

Forms of cocaine: precious commodity

No heroin factory has as yet been found. But one of the foreign narcotics experts in India believes that one is bound to be found within the year in an opium-producing area in India.

"India really is a haven. You have all the natural products, skilled chemists, and large areas where the arms of the law have no access to. A deadly combination. It could be in Neemuch, Amritsar, UP or anywhere." Many heroin labs have been found in Afghanistan where the Pakistani chemists have been busy making heroin. (Pakistan is also a major source for heroin from West Asia.)

For illegal morphine manufacturers, India offers another advantage—some of the chemicals needed for making heroin is easily available. In western countries, firms which use acetic anhydride, the essential chemical needed to produce heroin have to account for it. In India it is found lying unattended, in synthetic textile factories. It is also used in cough mixtures and in aspirins.

There is yet another dangerous trend emerging. According to Mr R. M. Singh, who looks after narcotics cell in the CBI, "Pharmaceutical laboratories are illegally diverting morphine. For instance, the Government Opium and Alkaloid Works Factory in Ghazipur generally gives morphine ampoules to doctors and to pharmacies. In Hathras, near Aligarh, a private firm was authorised by them to get morphine sulphate and to make morphine ampoules...but, they sold two bottles of 500 grammes each to a smuggler. These people were arrested on 22 May this year near the Ashoka hotel."

It is obvious that narcotics officials—of the CBI, the DRI or in various state police forces—have become more active. One of the DRI men told this correspondent that Mrs Gandhi had sent a circular asking the narcotics officials to become more vigilant. But it is not clear whether there is more drug trafficking and abuse in India or whether the narcotics officials have just become tougher. Police officials complain that our laws are too lenient.

"Our judges are fairly lenient to western drug addicts. They do not realise the gravity of the problem," a police officer said. Moreover, the narcotics officials or even the customs officials cannot investigate or arrest drug traffickers. They have to turn to the police—even though they are the ones who are supposed to stop drug offenders.

"In our country even murder is a bailable offence, let alone drug trafficking," said a frustrated official complaining about the laxity of the laws. Nor are the customs officials at Indian airports vigilant enough.

And the problem is becoming all the more serious since Indians, especially the younger ones, are increasingly becoming drug addicts. College students, the unemployed and the sons of affluent fathers are now taking to drugs. Even heroin and cocaine—the latter mostly in Bombay because it is more expensive and fashionable. "We are on the road to the psychotropic substances. LSD, amphetamine, all these are available here, only they are now becoming more popular. And the possibility of Indians taking to morphine and heroin is there," says R. M. Singh.

Sadly enough, some of the Indians begin on drugs while in school. There is the well-known case of Ravindra Singh who died of an overdose of a morphine injection at the age of 21 in 1978. In his book, I was a Drug Addict, brought out by his father, Brigadier Gyan Singh, Ravindra Singh writes that he started on charas (hashish) while in the eighth class at Mayo College in Ajmer. He went on to harder drugs. And, finally to heroin and morphine when he met some addicts in India and Nepal. His case is not uncommon. There are many cases of public school boys becoming drug addicts while still at school and their going on to LSD or morphine or even heroin.

Mr Bawa blames the hippie girls for this: "The psychological lure of the fair skin is getting them entrenched...especially the young Indians. It is the liberated hippie women who are at fault." Some police officials believe that the drug addicts make friends with rich, young students from public schools. Once they get them 'hooked' they keep on fleecing them for money.

Occasionally, one sees an emaciated young Indian lying outside the CBI office in Ramakrishnapuram. A former student of a public school in Delhi (where he started taking drugs), the son of a rich father this boy, in his early 20s has been turned out of the house and lies languishing in front of the building occasionally trading information for a whiff of confiscated cocaine. The police officials don't give him more than a few years to live. In fact, many consider it to be a very optimistic estimate. ■

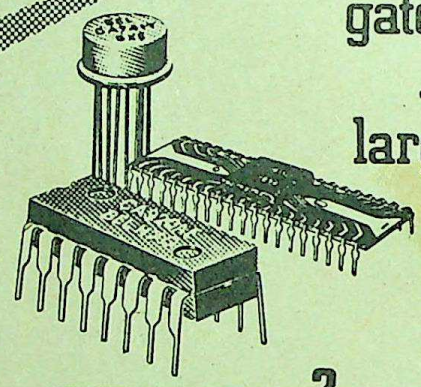
BEL ENTERS LSI ERA IN ICs

Computer-aided design, microlithography, and Ion Implantation, Metal and Silicon gate technology



-leading to large scale integration.

Soon, BEL will bring you LOVAG, C^2L, and SOS ICs.

Since BEL pioneered commercial production of ICs in this country, the technology has become more advanced ICs have now become more complex and much smaller in size Thanks to the computer-aided design and other modern facilities, BEL could easily transcend to the new innovations in IC technology

The new generation of IC technology calls for more sophisticated techniques and testing parameters BEL has now equipped itself with sophisticated facilities such as microlithography and Ion Implantation — which will enable BEL to produce microprocessors and other large scale ICs And BEL has the capability to provide the most critical component for digital watches, the LSIs

With these latest additions to bipolar and CMOS ICs, BEL is in the process of enlarging its current product range in ICs At several stages of development are: BEL 7000 AM/FM radio IC, designed to give 1 watt power at 6V, type BEL 7001 for tape recorder applications, telephone dialler IC and PCM CODEC ICs and a number of new generation ICs.

The driving force behind BEL's leadership thrust has been its components capability. BEL's unique in-depth expertise in IC technology is only too well matched by its achievements in other component areas: receiving valves, transmitting tubes, X-ray tubes, cathode ray tubes, TV picture tubes, microwave tubes, passive vacuum devices, display devices, hybrid microcircuits, printed circuit boards, precision crystal filters and ceramic capacitors.

These technological triumphs notwithstanding, it is BEL's state-of-the-art systems capability, as evidenced by its sophisticated systems and equipment that keeps India on the electronics map of the world.

Celluloid scare

Polish filmmaker Krzysztof Zanussi sent the shivers to Washington while shooting his latest film From a far country, a cinematographic record of Poland during the last 50 years. "I was shooting the scene of the Soviet liberation of Krakow in 1945," said Zanussi. "I used a lot of Polish tanks. An American satellite passing overhead relayed the scene of the tanks moving towards Krakow and the Americans thought that the Russians had invaded Poland. There was absolute panic." Zanussi later went on television to explain that the whole thing was make-believe.

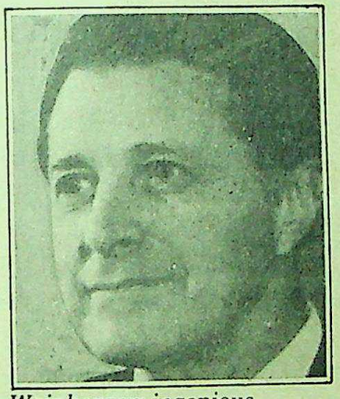
Weinberger's 'red book'



Weinberger: ingenious

US defence secretary Caspar Weinberger has come up with a novel idea: releasing in book form what has so far been regarded as highly confidential data on Kremlin's nuclear and conventional arsenal. Mr Weinberger hopes that this book will help America's European allies to "appreciate the Soviet threat." According to his assistant in the Pentagon, Richard Perle, it would mean "the most massive declassification of previously secret material in our history." In the Pentagon the proposed book is being referred to as 'Caspar Weinberger's little red book.' But the CIA and the Pentagon's intelligence chiefs have not yet agreed to allow publication of "overhead photographs"—the ones taken from American spy satellites and reconnaissance aircraft. They argue that such photographs would reveal too much about the quality and scope of American information-gathering techniques.

Great expectation

The news that Ching-Ching, a Chinese panda now in the London zoo, may be pregnant has caused a great deal of excitement throughout the world. Ching-Ching was artificially inseminated with the sperm of a male panda when, after three years of close observation, it was found to be going through its 'fertility period' (in a panda this period lasts not more than three days).

Mother-son feud

Former Prime Minister of Sri Lanka Mrs Sirimavo Bandaranaike feels that her 32-year-old-son Anura ("a young man in a bit of a hurry") is trying to replace her as leader of the opposition Sri Lanka Freedom Party. Mrs Bandaranaike has been deprived of her civic rights for seven years by a Presidential commission for alleged misuse of power. Anura Bandaranaike claims that his mother is trying to impose her choice of Parliamentary candidates for the next elections; he has also accused his married sister, Chandrika Kumaratunga, of playing a "Sanjay Gandhi-like role" in helping Mrs Bandaranaike. "My daughter is helping me in my work because I have to have someone helping me. My son is not helping me," replies the mother to her son's allegations.

Britain's only school for butlers teaches the 'Jeeves-in-training' how to turn down passes from sex-starved wives of American tycoons. Those who pass out from Mr Ivor Spencer's School for Butlers after a six-month grind are in great demand in Houston and New York; and prospective employers in the USA insist that applicants must be trained in the art of repelling the sexual advances of high-society women with utmost tact and courtesy.

THE RISE OF THE JATS

Along with the decline of the Mughal empire in India, the Rajputs too slowly but steadily faded out from the national scene. The Jats, Marathas and the Sikhs filled the vacuum: they consolidated their strength and emerged as powerful political forces. The Jat chiefs, Badan Singh and Suraj Mal, displayed spectacular courage and enough intelligence to not merely build an empire but also to keep it. K. NATWAR SINGH, our ambassador in Pakistan, in his book, Maharaja Suraj Mal, 1707-1763 recreates a comparatively little known but vital chapter in Indian history. This is the concluding extract from his book.

Suraj Mal: Early campaigns

The decline of the Mughal empire also initiated the decline and eclipse of the great Rajput houses of Mewar, Marwar and Amber. Rajasthan became 'a zoological garden with the barrier of the cage thrown down... the fiercest animal passions raged throughtout the land, redeemed only now and then by individual instances of devotion and chivalry...' For three centuries the Rajputs had won the respect and gratitude of the people of India. The high virtues of courage, good character and honour were associated with them. By the eighteenth century they were a played-out race, steadily but surely falling into the background of national life.

No outside power could compete with the death wish of the Rajputs.

Portrait of Maharaja Suraj Mal

'The houses of Jaipur and Jodhpur vied with each other to destroy themselves. There was no crime a Rajput would not commit for the sake of land. Father killed son and son murdered father. Women of the noblest rank gave poison to their trusting kinsmen. None, not even the highest born descendant of the God Rama, shrank from buying the aid of an alien plunderer to decide domestic contests.' No amount of glossing over this deplorable state of affairs can hide the reality. The Almighty inflicted on a long-suffering people wholly unworthy rulers.

The sad sunset years of Rajput fortunes coincided with a Maratha, Jat and Sikh dawn. In Rajasthan the chronic inter-state and inter-clan rivalries wholly preoccupied Rajput chiefs. As time went by the Marathas and the Jats began to have much say in their affairs.

During the 1720s and 1730s the Bharatpur Jats were treading cautiously and Badan Singh was not the man to rock the boat. He was content with not doing anything spectacular or dramatic, and we hear little about them. Badan Singh and Suraj Mal gave every day of their lives to consolidating their position at home. Not only Soghar but other Jat chiefs who came in their way were eliminated without hesitation, with a firm and decisive hand. Up to the invasion of Nadir Shah they kept out of the way of the rulers at Delhi, busy with their grand buildings and gardens and enriching themselves. No excess which would attract attention at Delhi was committed. Survival in the initial years was all that mattered.

Badan Singh amply justified the confidence Raja Jai Singh placed in him. He maintained cordial and respectful relations with the Jaipur ruler. Each year he visited Jaipur, where Jai Singh, not the most considerate of men, extended every courtesy to the Sinsinwar and treated him like a Raja. The suburb of Jaipur where Badan Singh stayed was named Badanpura. This close link between the two did not go unnoticed and benefited Badan Singh and Suraj Mal in their dealings with troublesome Jat chiefs not belonging to the Sinsinwar clan. The patronage of Amber had its uses.

When Peshwa Baji Rao visited Jaipur in 1736, Jai Singh held a big durbar in his honour. Badan Singh could not attend, but Suraj Mal represented him. The young man was welcomed like a prince by Jai Singh. The durbar was not an unqualified success. The Peshwa's manners left much to be desired and caused aristocratic eyebrows to be raised. At Jaipur Mughal ceremonial and etiquette were strictly if not joyously observed. During the durbar Jai Singh, noticing the condescending attitude of the Peshwa, asked Baji Rao why he did not treat him as he did the Raja of Udaipur. Baji Rao's crushing reply was, 'The Raja of Udaipur is equal in rank and status with my own king, Sahu Maharaj, who had never considered the Musalman Padishah of Delhi as his sovereign, while you are nothing but a Mughal mansabdar.' It needed some nerve to say this as Baji Rao was keen to enlist Jai Singh's support to obtain from Delhi the subadari of the province of Malwa. Baji Rao did not stop there. He added injury to insult. He puffed his hukka and blew the smoke in the face of his host. Laws of hospitality forbade Jai Singh from creating a scene which would have only made an already nasty situation worse.

When Jai Singh introduced Suraj Mal to the Maratha, Baji Rao made disparaging remarks about Suraj Mal's humble origins. The young Sinsinwar kept calm and responded with a dignified silence. But his guardian, Thakur Shardul Singh of Halena, could not contain himself and returned the compliment by reminding the Peshwa of Shivaji's humbler origins. The first Jat-Maratha encounter was not a happy one.

Badan Singh kept himself aloof from the Amber-Maratha and Maratha-Mughal exchanges. Like the Rajputs, the Jats, while recognising the emperor as their sovereign, raised not a finger when Nadir Shah invaded Delhi in 1739. But they took full advantage by making inroads into Mughal territory in the disarray following that invasion.

As their hold over their own people and territories tightened and as their wealth increased they began to flex their muscles, but guardedly. 'The fame of Suraj Mal's capacity for leadership and tough fighting qualities of his troops spread rapidly and there came repeated solicitations for his sword from the highest in the land.'

The first excursion that Suraj Mal made outside the Jat country was in May 1745 when he led a Jat contingent under emperor Muhammad Shah in his expedition against Ali Muhammed Rohilla, and 'fought creditably in that campaign'. In the next year he helped the Governor of Aligarh, Fatah Ali Khan, to regain his estate from Asad Khan Khananzad. At Chandaus, Suraj Mal routed the forces of Asad, who was killed in the battle. The exploits of Suraj Mal in this campaign and in the following two are described in colourful detail by Sudan in Sujan Charitra. From the Chandaus battle Suraj Mal returned with a fair amount of cash and had made himself beloved of his Jat brethren in the Aligarh area.

When Jai Singh Sawai died in 1743 Badan Singh lost a patron. Jai Singh had ruled for forty-four years. The first half of his long reign was a saga of success and achievement and during it he built the pink city of Jaipur and the famous observatories at Delhi and Jaipur; but his later record was devoid of glory or success. He failed against the Marathas. After failing to keep them out of Malwa, and inducing the emperor to make a complete surrender to them in 1736 Jai Singh returned, to his own state and gave himself to sexual excess. He always had a weakness for alcohol and now the habitual 'use of aphrodisiacs to stimulate his failing powers entirely ruined his health, till at last he died of a loathsome disease on 21 September 1743. Three wives and countless concubines committed sati.'

His death was followed by the customary fratricidal war between his sons, Ishwari Singh and Madho Singh. Madho Singh's mother hailed from Udaipur and the Rana of Mewar successfully used his influence and authority to get formidable support for his nephew. The Marathas vacillated and finally backed Madho Singh as did the rulers of Jodhpur, Bundi and Kotah. Only the Bharatpur Sinsinwars stood by Ishwari Singh, honouring their pledge to Jai Singh. Badan Singh, without the accident of noble birth, possessed the qualities which are associated with it. Ishwari Singh inherited all his father's vices. Virtue he had none. At the time of Ahmed Shah

Thakur Badan Singh

Abdali's first invasion he had run away from Manupur in March 1747. Even his wives had chided him for his cowardice. Aware of the weak character of Ishwari, Thakur Badan Singh asked Suraj Mal to proceed to Jaipur to help him. Suraj Mal left Kuhmer with 10,000 hand-picked cavalrymen, 2,000 troopers and 2,000 spear-bearers. His contingent consisted of Jats, Gujars, Ahirs, Meenas, Rajputs and Musalmans. Ishwari Singh received Suraj Mal with honour due to an equal. The Jaipur forces were led by Shiv Singh. With Suraj Mal were his uncles and cousins, Sukhram Singh, Gokalram Singh, Sahaj Ram Singh and others.

The armies of Ishwari Singh and Madho Singh met on 21 August 1748 at Bagru, eighteen miles south-west of Jaipur. The monsoon was not quite over and the ground on the second day drenched both sides.

On the face of it the contest was unequal. Ishwari Singh's opponents outnumbered him seven to one. Madho Singh had an impressive array of famous names on his side, Malhar Rao Holkar, Gangadhar Tatiya, the Rana of Mewar, the ruler of Jodhpur and the Rajas of Bundi and Kotah. With Ishwari Singh was only the little-known Suraj Mal. What Suraj Mal lacked in numbers was made up by the quality of his troops; well-trained, adequately paid and ably led. There was no central coordinating agency on Madho Singh's side. He was in no position to give orders to his allies who were all senior to him and did not take kindly to any form of discipline.

Kanwar Shiv Singh, the chief of Sikar, led the van. Suraj Mal was posted in the centre and Ishwari Singh commanded the rear. The artillery duel on the first day ended indecisively. The advantage on the second day was with Madho Singh. On the second day Ishwari Singh lost his commander-in-chief, the valiant Sikar chief, and he appointed Suraj Mal to lead the harawal (van) on the third day. A furious and mighty battle raged throughout the day. Then the Maratha chief, Malhar Rao, sent Gangadhar Tantiya with a strong detachment to surprise the rear of Raja Ishwari Singh. Gangadhar marched undetected and fell upon Sardar Singh Naruka of Uniara, one of Jai Singh's more able commanders. He threw the rear division into confusion and pressed vigorously upon the artillery posted in the centre. The gunners were cut down and the cannon spiked; defeat stared Ishwari Singh in the face. In sheer desperation he asked Suraj Mal, his last hope, to challenge Gangadhar. The young Sinsinwar obeyed without a moment's pause and delivered a flank charge upon the advancing army. A grim struggle between the half-victorious Marathas and the stubborn Jats lasted two hours. At last Gangadhar was halted and pushed back. Suraj Mal, restoring the broken rear and leaving Sardar Singh Uniara in command there, returned to the van to fight on the other front. In that supreme hour of peril he fought with Keltron makes an integrated art of electronics...

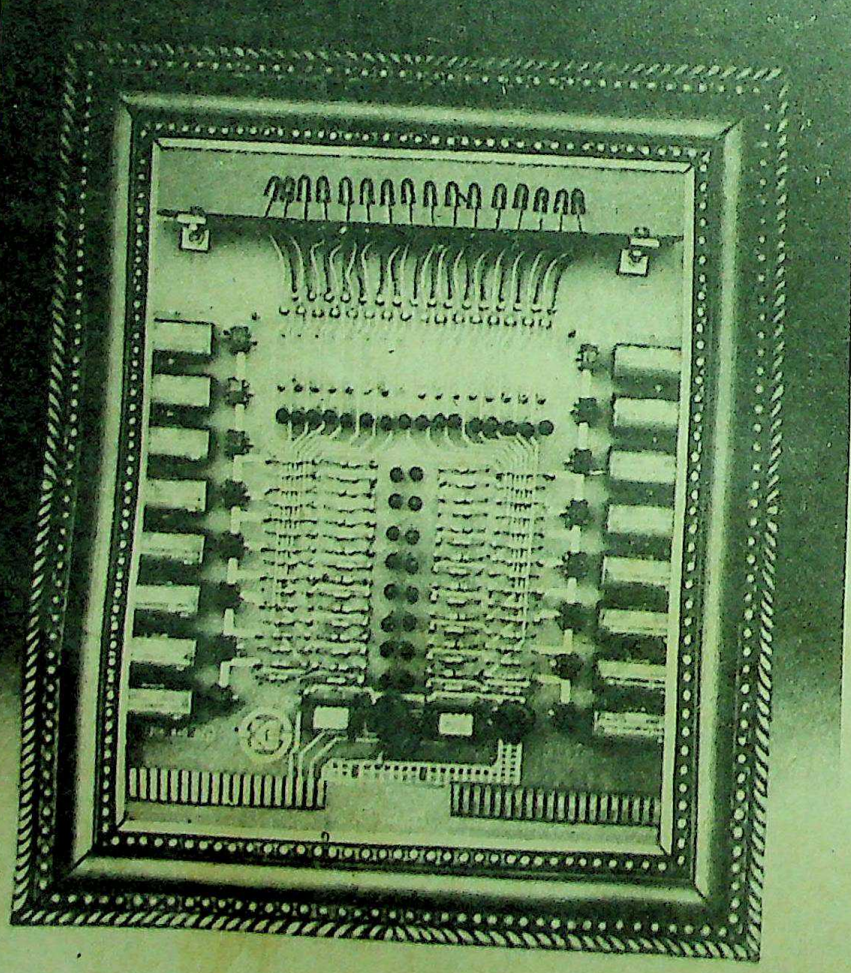
...where raw materials build components; components grow into equipments; and equipments grow into systems.



From the development of raw materials to the custom building of highly advanced systems, Keltron's activities encompass a wide spectrum of electronics.

In 7 years Keltron has raised a multi-layered superstructure incorporating the latest technologies. Developing, through the Materials Development Centre of ER & DC managed by Keltron, special materials such as silver paste, photo resist and liquid crystals for use in the electronics industry. Manufacturing, in factories spread all over Kerala, active and passive components, a wide range of equipments and sophisticated systems including those based on microprocessor technology.

In the process Keltron has built up a full spectrum of capabilities relating to a vertically integrated scope of supply, a range of application areas and a sequential chain of operations.

Keltron's capability is also directed towards larger societal goals. Pioneering employment programmes for women and for the physically handicapped. Taking industrialisation to the very heart of Kerala to generate more employment opportunities in the rural areas. And building up a relevant industrial infrastructure with feeder units within the State for total self-reliance.

Keltron. The first name in State Electronics Corporations is also the last word in electronics capability. With unmatched innovative ability. And link-ups with the world's leading names in electronics technology like Sprague and Controle Bailey.

superhuman valour, 'killing', says a contemporary chronicler, 'fifty and wounding one hundred and eight of the enemy with his own hands'. Then night fell and the combatants parted to tend the wounded and cremate the dead and get ready for the morrow. Suraj Mal's valour saved the day and made him well-known.

A graphic account of the battle of Bagru is given by Sudan in Sujan Charitra and also by the Bundi bard, who had the distinction of being Raja Suraj Mal's namesake. He wrote:

'The Jatni did not in vain bear the pain of travel,
The issue of her womb was Suraj Mal,
The scourge of enemies, and well-wisher of Amber,
Turning back the Jat began,
to fight Malhar in the van,
Holkar was the shadow (night) and the Sun: (Suraj)
the two champions well matched in conflict.'

Within a few months of Bagru, providence offered Suraj Mal another opportunity to prove his strength and enhance his fame and power.

On 21 June 1749, the Jodhpur ruler Maharaja Abhay Singh died. He combined an uncontrollable temper with an alarming weakness for opium. As subedar of Gujarat he had not distinguished himself. On his death he was succeeded by his son Ram Singh. The young man's joy was shortlived. His maternal uncle Bakht Singh threw his turban in the ring. Ram Singh turned for help to Ishwari Singh of Amber. Emperor Ahmed Shah backed Bakht Singh and in November sent Mir Bakshi Salabat Jung with a force of 18,000 men to help him. The Mir Bakshi decided to proceed to Ajmer not by the well-established Delhi-Agra road, but via Mewat, which was under the Jat Raja. The plan was for Salabat to retake from the Jats portions of territory captured by them in his suba of Agra and Mathura. After dealing with the Jats the Mir Bakshi was to proceed to Ajmer and unite with the forces of Bakht Singh.

The Mir Bakshi's progress was leisurely. He first stopped at Patuadi for ten days. Thereafter he ravaged Mewat and captured the mud fort of Nimrana in the Jat kingdom. This minor success made the Mir Bakshi overconfident and he haughtily dismissed an emissary from Suraj Mal and decided to teach Suraj Mal a lesson. Ajmer and Jodhpur were for the time being forgotten. Suraj Mal held his hand. He was watching and waiting. When the Mir Bakshi got to Sarai Sobhachand, the Jats descended on him. Suraj Mal with a mobile force of 6,000 surrounded the Mughals on New Year's Day 1750. Suraj Mal had with him important Jat chiefs. Sudan in Sujan Charitra mentions Gokla and his brother Surat Ram Singh. The latter led a mounted troop of 1,500, while Balram Singh had 1,000 troopers. Suraj Mal's brother Pratap Singh led 500 horsemen. The Mir Bakshi was surrounded on all sides. He asked Delhi for reinforcements. They arrived too late. Retreat was blocked by the Jats, 'their mounted matchlock men closed in small bodies and discharged volleys upon the confused Muslim troopers without dismounting. Such a mobile force as Suraj Mal's mounted matchlockmen could hardly be brought to the grapple in the darkness of night.' The Jats charged with speed and determination causing many deaths. Among those killed were two important Mughal commanders; Ali Rustum Khan and Hakim Khan. Salabat Khan was now at the mercy of Suraj Mal.

After three days Salabat thought discretion the better part of valour and sued for peace. Suraj Mal did not wish to have the blood of an imperial Umra on his hands and graciously accepted the peace offer. This was an act of statesmanship; he was winning and he made no move to provoke further the Mir Bakshi or arouse suspicion at Delhi. The Bakshi had earlier demanded over twenty million rupees from Raja Badan Singh for the few villages which the Jats had taken. These, the Bakshi alleged, were a part of his jagir. The money demanded was out of all proportion to the value of these villages and Badan Singh had no intention whatsoever of paying even a tenth of the sum. Suraj Mal asked his very young son Jawahar Singh to conduct the peace negotiations with the Bakshi. This was the young prince's debut as a soldier-emissary. He conducted himself to the entire satisfaction of his father and grandfather, and gave no indication of the bellicosity which in years ahead was to cause much heartache and bloodshed.

The Mir Bakshi accepted the term on which the Jats would agree to peace:

i) The imperial government would promise not to cut down pipal trees;

ii) nor hinder the worship of that tree;

iii) not to offer any insult or injury to the Hindu temples in the region;

iv) Suraj Mal would collect fifteen lakh rupees from the Rajputs as the revenue of the province of Ajmer and pay it into the imperial exchequer, provided the Mir Bakshi did not proceed beyond Narnol...

The Jat gains were considerable. Victory over an Amir-ul-Umara was not an everyday event. Salabat Jung should have known better than to antagonise the one power that alone could have protected his subah of Agra. This success gave Suraj Mal and the Jats new confidence. It proved their military potential. The terms of the treaty were a public recognition of the Bharatpur rulers' superior position in Braj Mandal, justifying their title of Braj Raj. Lastly this victory gave the Sinsinwars undisputed leadership of all Jats. At the age of 43, Suraj Mal was the coming man in Hindustan. With the death of Nizzam-ul-Mulk in 1748 there was no one to match his military strength, diplomatic skill, administrative ability and soundness of political judgement or his understanding of the temper of the times.

Moushumi in a still from Yun Bhee Hota Hai

When even a puny-sized Kiran Vairale who is very confident of her looks, snorts in disgust at Padmini Kohlapure's looks and says that she herself has better looks than her, the latter's confidence gets badly shaken. To add to her eternal pimple problem, she has this newly-sprouted double chin and a tendency to become fat, all of which depress her very much indeed. With Christie O'Neil and Rati Agnihotri looking so slim and pretty at Dev's party it is hardly surprising that Padmini was visibly disturbed.

What's wrong with Chintu Rishi Kapoor? Where is that bubbly youthfulness which endeared him to the entire young crowd, since his Bobby days? Like Rajesh Khanna before him, whose popularity was at its peak just before his marriage and lessened immediately after it, the same tragic fate seems to have affected Rishi whose status may not have been as great as Rajesh's before his marriage but at least he wasn't as obscure as he is today. In fact you hear more of Neetu than him.

Looks like Moushumi Chatterji's career is really jinxed. When her film Daasi was about to be released there was a spate of publicity announcing the revolution it was going to cause in her future. But the other actress in the film, Rekha, managed to share equal if not more plaudits with her, and her hopes dwindled. Then with the exit of Parveen Babi, during her spell of illness, Moushumi had quietly bagged Babi's role in Manmohan Desai's Desh Premee and thought she would suddenly shoot up when she did this prestigious hit-maker's film. But Parveen is back again with a bang and the whole industry is agog wooing her back into the fold so Moushumi is out in the cold once again. And that is not all. There was a lovely role for her in Nagi Reddy's next film with a host of stars led by Rakhee and Sanjeev, and she was sure that being Nagi Reddy's favourite heroine, this film with its plum role would help her win the accolades. Unfortunately, she was coolly replaced by Deepti Naval. Now if that isn't a jinx, what is?

Why is poor Tina being made the scapegoat in the family feud: Sunjay versus Sunil Dutt? Whatever happens between father and son is not her fault. Sunil did not take her in either of his productions. That is enough to put two and two together and say that he is showing his hatred for her because he doesn't want to encourage her relationship with his son. After the financial burden Sunil had to face to fight Nargis' inevitable fate, it is fair that he should work out success-spinning films. If he wants more successful stars like Smita Patil and Padmini Kohlapure in his productions, then why should anyone mind? Outside calculations are doing their best to see that relations are completely wrecked between Sunil and Tina.

A close friend of Manoj's had once remarked to me that for all his success as an actor, Manoj Kumar has zero individual star-power. Which means, in simple words, he is simply not a matinee idol, in spite of all those money-spinners he is bringing out and managing to make while every other multi-star-filmmaker has failed miserably. This person also tells me that Manoj Kumar does not have a single fan who asks for a fan-photograph of him. Yet the same people flock to see his films by the millions.

Now that Mahesh Bhatt has openly begun saying uncomplimentary things about the poor girl Parveen, (I say she's poor because he has his wife and child to go back to and she has no one!) guess who he is cottoning after? Old girl Shabana of course. Shabana has known him for a long time now, in a very platonic relationship.

Parveen is back and how!

With the box-office success of Bhagyaraj's Vidium Varai Kathiru, karate fifth degree black-belt holder RVT Mani is now hanging on to the industry with the film Kiaiai. But the moustachio is far from a happy man. Just at a time when he wants to give up playing the thug and prove himself as a "character actor," the grapevine says that two offers to play the role of a psychiatrist and a sanyasi have fallen through, and Balu Mahendra is seriously considering signing Mani up for a tough policeman's role.

Smita Patil's success in Chakra has sent a whole lot of new faces scuttling to the studios aspiring for "rustic roles." "I can't understand though why directors keep harping on Suhasini all the time instead of trying us out," said an indignant Kalpana, who like most others cannot see that she made the mistake young Suhasini has not. She has shown directors too much of her anatomy in too short a time, and so put herself in a position where she is considered only for the sexier roles.

Urmila: climbing the ladder in the Malayalam industry

Saritha in Those Seven Days

With his late night drunken sprees becoming more and more frequent, Pratap is once again the butt of stale one-liners, like, "why did Prathap take a ladder to to the drinks party?" Answer "because he heard that the Kudos to Dasari Narayan Rao whose Premabhishekam is doing brisk business here. While his contemporaries have so far been content to talk about artiste-upliftment, Dasari has managed to do something concrete instead. An institution, Dasari Educational Trust, with a revolving fund of Rs five lakhs has been set up for the promotion of education to the children of artistes.

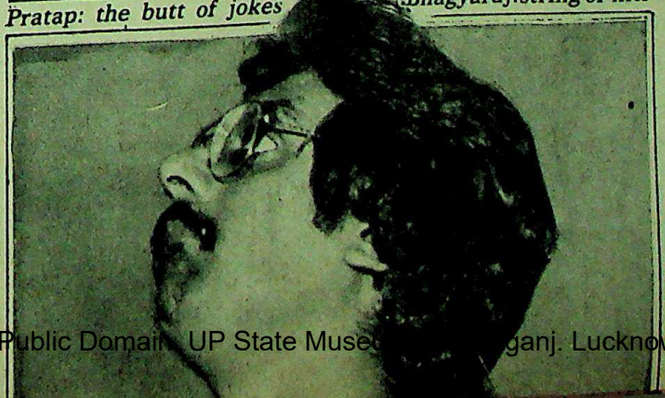
Bhagyaraj: string of hits

Pratap: the butt of jokes



The box office may not be kind to thirty-year old Girish Kasaravalli but the award selecting panels certainly are. Remember Ghatashraddha his first feature film in 1978 that bagged awards for the best music (Karanth), the best child artiste (Ajit Kumar) and the Dada Saheb Phalke award? Now his Mooru Darigalu—the story of a sensitive college girl, Nirmala, creditably played by Kannada producer-director V. Krishna Swamy's daughter Sriranga—appears to be on its way to similar acclaim, having already captured four Karnataka state awards. "I can only put down its box-office failure to faulty distribution," says Girish.

Actress Roopa seems to be coming out on top. She is quick to talk shop about a large family (referring to the industry of course), equate Kamal with her northern hero Sanjeev Kumar, and discuss Povel Blay. (Much later did it transpire that the movie in question is nothing but the Goldie Hawn starrer Foul Play). Says Roopa: "As much as I admire her (Goldie's) acting, I will never be branded like her: a sex symbol. I'll continue to wear a saree and insist on the big difference between glamour and sex-appeal."

"Which mordern man wants to look at something as drab as the saree anymore?" asks Supriya who showed off her ample flab in Plagaripa Banathale. The self-styled glamour queen appears to have permanently discarded the saree to wear over-tight sweaters and micro-minis from the mordern wardrobe she's been boasting about. The ploy seems to have worked though, and she has been chosen to play the lead in Sisirathil a Malayalam version of My Fair Lady in which the fair lady ultimately turns into a glamorous dancer.

INTRODUCING

The New Prestige

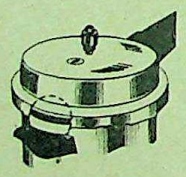
Gasket Release System

Patent pending

A unique Gasket Release System makes it the safest pressure cooker you can buy

100% safe

When food clogs the weight valve, excess pressure builds up inside your pressure cooker. The safety of your cooker then depends upon the safety plug only. But what if your plug is spurious? You never know . . . . . because you can't tell a spurious from a genuine safety plug.



That is why we developed The New Prestige with total safety built into its basic design. Its unique Gasket Release System ensures the absolute safety of your pressure cooker under any conditions by making the safety plug unnecessary.

How the unique Gasket Release System makes The New Prestige 100% safe

When more pressure than necessary builds up, the unique Gasket Release System built into the lid enables the rubber gasket inside to stretch out and release the excess steam downwards, safely and gently. There is no eruption. No mess.

The system is so reliable that it never fails to work. Even with a spurious or old rubber gasket, with a spurious safety plug, with the most careless handling . . . . it works! Always. To give you a pressurecooker you can rely upon for utmost safety.

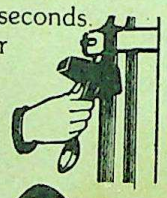
The New Prestige is more convenient

Once the gasket lets off the steam, push it back in and your cooker is ready for use again . . . in seconds. As the safety plug is never needed you don't ever need to replace or worry about it.



The New Prestige is much more durable

As pressure never reaches dangerous levels there is less wear and tear on the cooker. The New Prestige lasts longer than other cookers.

The New Prestige comes with many more advantages

- A more durable extra thick base.
- Sturdier handles with long-lasting stainless steel screws.
- A new auxiliary handle with a better grip that stays cool.
- New trivet designed for strength and greater rigidity.
- Beautiful new mirror finish.
- An exciting new recipe book.
- Six convenient sizes.

Plus all the advantages that made Prestige the most wanted pressure cooker for over 30 years in India

- Maximum cooking space with larger containers and an outer fitting lid so you can cook a whole meal in minutes.
- Double-locking lid for additional safety—prevents anyone from opening the cooker while there is pressure inside.
- Easy maintenance with service centres all over India.
- The ISI assurance of quality.

ARIES (15 April—14 May) This is going to be a busy week for you, socially. Friends and relatives will add to your share of joy. But, your work will demand a great deal of your attention. Do not be disheartened by hardships and obstacles you might face at work. Patience and courage are all you need to tide over your difficulties. There are chances that you might have to undertake a journey. Good dates: 20, 22 and 25. Lucky numbers: 1, 6 and 9. Favourable direction: Southwest.

TAURUS (15 May—14 June) A moderately successful week lies ahead of you provided you are cautious in your words and actions this week. The financial front does not look too bright, although there are chances of unexpected gains. Consequently, you are advised to exercise caution on the financial front. Try to curb your impulsiveness and refrain from taking erratic decisions. Good dates: 21, 23 and 25. Lucky numbers: 3, 5 and 7. Favourable direction: West.

GEMINI (15 June—14 July) This unfortunately is not a very lucky week for you. Exercise caution on all fronts. Pay full attention to your work and do not neglect even the most insignificant details. A new friendship will prove to be very helpful. However, do not get carried away by the friendship, but keep a close watch on your purse. This is not a good week for change or for romance either. Good dates: 20, 23 and 26. Lucky numbers: 3, 6 and 7. Favourable direction: North.

CANCER (15 July—14 August) This is a very good week for romance, courtship and marriage. So, do not hesitate to pursue matrimonial correspondence that has been pending for so long. However, a word of caution: do not take a hurried decision. For those with emotional problems, this week you will be able to rid yourself of your problems. The professional front does not look too bright, so be careful. Good dates: 22, 24 and 26. Lucky numbers: 1, 5 and 7. Favourable direction: South.

LEO (15 August—14 September) This unfortunately, is not a good week for you. Be on your guard: a friend is out to deceive you. You are likely to enter into heated debates with your superiors at work, which will not be helpful for your future. So, try to check your temper and avoid getting into controversies with people who matter. You might lose a friend because of your outspokenness. Good Dates: 21, 22 and 26. Lucky numbers: 2, 5 and 7. Favourable direction: West.

VIRGO (15 September—14 October) This is a week of mixed fortunes. Those in service are likely to face difficulties at work. But those on the lookout, are likely to find a job. Controversies and arguments are at best avoided this week, for they will not be beneficial in the long run. The health of an elderly member of the family is likely to cause you some problems. Keep an eye on your health too. Good dates: 22, 23 and 25. Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 9. Favourable direction: Northwest.

LIBRA (15 October—14 November) This is a week of success for you, so forge ahead on all fronts. There are chances of windfall gains, but the financial front is not very bright. So, try and exercise caution in dealing with property matter. This is not a particularly good week for making any changes. But, in case a change is absolutely essential, do not hesitate to consult your elders. Good dates: 21 and 24. Lucky numbers: 2, 6 and 8. Favourable direction: South.

SCORPIO (15 November—14 December) A very good week for businessmen. Do not hesitate to undertake new contracts. For those in service, this is a lucky week. Push forth your plans for chances are that they will be approved by your superiors. Your only problem this week is your health, which might give you some cause for anxiety. The domestic front will not be peaceful. This, however, is not a good week for romance. Good dates: 22, 23 and 26. Lucky numbers: 3, 6 and 9. Favourable direction: North.

SAGITTARIUS (15 December—14 January) This is a very good week for romance. Love and matrimonial matters will make steady progress. Debts and pending law-suits should not worry you this week. A word of caution: lack of funds may prevent you from implementing some of your plans. Do not be depressed, this is only a temporary phase. Good dates: 20, 23 and 26. Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 6. Favourable direction: East.

CAPRICORN (15 January—14 February) Financially this is a good week for you. Business deals will be successfully undertaken this week. Law-suits and debts are not likely to cause you any anxiety. Speculative ventures are best postponed for the moment. The domestic front will remain peaceful. A word of advice: exercise caution in dealings with members of the opposite sex. Keep an eye on your health. Good dates: 23, 24 and 25. Lucky numbers: 3, 5 and 9. Favourable direction: South.

AQUARIUS (15 February—14 March) This is not going to be a very bright week financially. So, you are advised to avoid speculation and gambling. Keep a close watch on your finances and you are likely to tide over the problems this week. Your spouse is going to be very helpful and give you some sound advice regarding your profession. Pay attention to what your spouse has to say. Good dates: 20, 21 and 24. Lucky numbers: 2, 6 and 8. Favourable direction: North and East.

PISCES (15 March—14 April) This may turn out to be a fairly good week provided you are discreet on the professional front. You might avoid getting into controversies with your superiors and keeping your associates in good humour. This, unfortunately, is not a good week for romance, so be careful of the recently developed friendship with a member of the opposite sex. Keep an eye on your health. Good dates: 23, 25 and 26. Lucky numbers: 6, 7 and 9. Favourable direction: South.

For those born between 15 September and 14 October: You are, by nature, extremely hard working which accounts for your financial affluence. Your affluence may show signs of wearing off around middle-age, but that is only a temporary phase. In an attempt to make quick money, some of you have a tendency of going in for races, gambling and buying lottery tickets. If you are a businessman, chances are that you will succeed in no time, for your intuition will carry you through the toughest of times. Those in services are likely to be associated with education, forestry, and agriculture. Your hobbies include creative arts and reading.

NEW DELHI: The name of Lalu, a dog in south Calcutta is in the voters' list to the exclusion of his master. Participating in the discussion on a private member's bill in the Rajya Sabha, Mr S. P. Mitra (Ind) said a former Chief Justice of Orissa used to feed Lalu regularly. Eventually he found mention in the voters' list as Lalu Roy but none bothered to enlist the former Chief Justice. Mr Mitra, himself a former judge of Calcutta High Court, was speaking about what he called the 'perfunctory manner' in which the electoral lists were being prepared in Calcutta—Times of India (Susmit Das, Orissa)

FEROZEPUR: Mr Suraj Parkash Mehta, an assistant in the office of the district education officer, Ferozepore, has been under suspension for about two years. He is getting 50 per cent of his salary without doing any work. Mr Sat Pal Gupta, posted as clerk in the office of the block education officer, Moga, was suspended in August last but he is yet to be charge-sheeted. According to state government rules no employee should be kept suspended for more than six months—Tribune (G. Singh Salaria, Pathankot)

JAORA: A patwari of Banwada village in Ratlam district was transferred five times in a month. The patwari, Mr Nand Kishore, was transferred from Banwada to Jaora on 5 July, only to be posted back to Banwada on 15 July. Five days later, he was sent to some other area, but was transferred again to Jaora on 25 July. He was again issued transfer orders on 29 July. Out of sheer disgust, Mr Nand Kishore has now proceeded on leave—Times of India (R. P. Srivastava, Raigad)

NEW DELHI: A young woman forced to leave her husband because of alleged dowry harassment led a demonstration outside her husband's house in South Extension on Saturday morning (22 August), demanding punishment for the treatment meted out to her. Holding aloft an effigy of her husband and waving placards denouncing "dowry-hungry dogs," the demonstrators shouted slogans for nearly an hour. As people from neighbouring houses and school children gathered round them, the demonstrators set fire to the effigy to demand justice for all wives tortured for dowry. The demonstration was organised by the Nari Raksha Samiti but in the forefront was the 23-year-old woman who wants her husband punished for the pain, she says, he has caused her—Indian Express (Kajal Chakraborty, Calcutta)

TIRUPATI: While the Harijans have been embracing Islam for some time now, a Muslim wants puja to be performed in his name at the abode of Lord Venkateswara at Tirumala. According to Tirumala Tirupati devasthanams sources, he has donated Rs 1 lakh for his name to be included in the udayasthamana seva scheme, under which a donor can have a special puja performed in his name to Lord Venkateswara every year on the day of his choice. The devasthanams peishkar said donations were pouring in and soon udayasthamana seva would be performed every day—Hindu (S. Nahar, Nilgiris)

NEW DELHI: A diminutive Mr K. C. Pandey found himself passed over during question hour in the Lok Sabha today (18 August). "I am here, sir, I have put the question," the Congress(I) member protested as a puzzled Speaker Balram Jakhar, skipped questions in the absence of several members from the House. "Please forgive me," the Speaker requested Mr Pandey informing him that he could not sight him after he had called out his name. A lady member quipped: he should stand on the bench—Indian Express (Rani Bhatia, Ambarnath)

NEW DELHI: It was "wrestler" versus "phantom" in the Rajya Sabha on Thursday (20 August) when the House was seized with a calling attention motion of fixation of remunerative prices for paddy. Addressing a hefty Mr R. Mohanrangam of the AIADMK—who was pleading the cause of the paddy farmer—the agriculture minister, Mr Birendra Singh, remarked: I would rather take him to be a wrestler than a paddy grower. Mr Mohanrangam shot back at the bald-headed minister that he too was reminded of the phantom in a film screened recently in the capital, rather than of a cultivator. A voice: Let's have an exhibition wrestling match. Minister: There are no rules here. It is all free style. Mr P. Ramamurti of the CPI(M) got up to request the chairman to instruct the rules committee of the House to draw up rules for wrestling—Indian Express (Asahai, New Delhi)

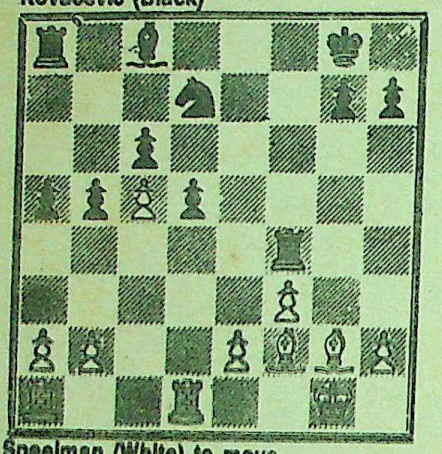
Kovacevic (Black)



Speelman (White) to move
Position after Black's 23rd move

So now we have five grandmasters. When the FIDE Congress in Malta confirmed Jonathan Speelman's title I recalled the moment eight years ago at Hastings when Jim Slater announced his plan to award prizes to the first five English grandmasters. At the time it sounded at best as a piece of benevolent wishful thinking, as England had never in its history produced even one grandmaster. Yet when Tony Miles gained the title in 1976 somehow the impossible suddenly seemed so accessible. Nevertheless, the fact that one person has the title makes it so much easier for others to acquire, and Jonathan Speelman's rise to the title was particularly impressive. His first norm came in the Philips and Drew tournament in London last April and his second a mere six months later in Yugoslavia. I can think of few who have gained the title so emphatically or in such a short space of time.

Of course there is nothing magical about the number five and I should expect to see several more English grandmasters in the coming years. Jonathan Mestel, a natural tightrope walker, has been tottering on the brink of the title for some years now. That Nigel Short will become a grandmaster is inevitable, and Bill Hartston would certainly join the club if he found enough time to play in tournaments regularly.

The crucial factor in Speelman's success has been his ability to temper his natural attacking instincts and play more soundly and positionally. I give a powerfully played game which he won in Yugoslavia en route to his title.

White: J. Speelman. Black: V. Kovacevic

bridge

Had a brilliancy prize been offered in the American trials for the next Bermuda Bowl, it might well have gone to Ron Rubin for a subtle and original defensive play in the final trial.

Dealer, North Love all

	♠ Q J 7 3 ♥ Q 8 7 5 ♦ Q 8 2 ♣ A 3
♠ K 4 2 ♥ K 9 6 ♦ A 9 4 3 ♣ Q 9 5	N W E S	♠ A 10 9 6 5 ♥ J 4 3 2 ♦ 7 5 ♣ J 4
	♠ 8 ♥ A 10 ♦ K J 10 6 ♣ K 10 8 7 6 2

The bidding went:

SOUTH	WEST	NORTH	EAST
—	—	—	No
1 ♣	dble	redble	2 ♠
No	No	2NT	3 ♥
4 ♣	No	No	No

Rubin led a low spade to his partner's Ace. A heart return looks fairly natural and would have defeated the contract, but East preferred the Jack of clubs. South won in dummy, ruffed a spade, and played King and another club, leaving West on play in this position:

	♠ Q 7 ♥ Q 8 7 ♦ Q 8 2 ♣ —
♠ K ♥ K 9 6 ♦ A 9 4 3 ♣ —	N W E S	♠ 10 9 ♥ J 4 3 2 ♦ 7 5 ♣ —
	♠ — ♥ A 10 ♦ K J 10 6 ♣ 10 8

If West exits with a low diamond, declarer can win with ♦ 8, ruff a spade, and enter dummy with ♦ Q for a discard on ♠ Q. So what can the defence do about it? Rubin made a fine play – the 9 of diamonds. Suppose now that declarer wins with ♦ Q, unblocking the 10, ruffs a spade and leads ♦ 6: West can go up with the Ace, blocking the second entry to dummy.

Alan Truscott, in the New York Times, made much of the fact that this defence was played on the first board of the match. Personally I have always found it easier to be alert on board 1 than on board 72!

Many of the stamps issued in Austria during the 1920s were in distinctive designs strongly influenced by both the Art Nouveau of pre-war Vienna and the new Art Deco. Elements of both can be seen in the high values of a long series issued in 1922-24. The portrait, symbolising the Austrian republic, owes its sinuous lines and flower-like truncation to Art Nouveau, but Art Deco provides the geometric side-panels and the angular numerals. The design was the work of Wilhelm Dachauer, who later became rector of the Vienna Academy of Fine Arts and continued to design stamps for Austria until his death in 1951. Another of his stamps, one of a series issued in 1926 to raise funds for children's charities and featuring scenes from the Nibelung legends, is reproduced on a recent 3-schillings stamp which marks the centenary of the artist's birth in 1881.

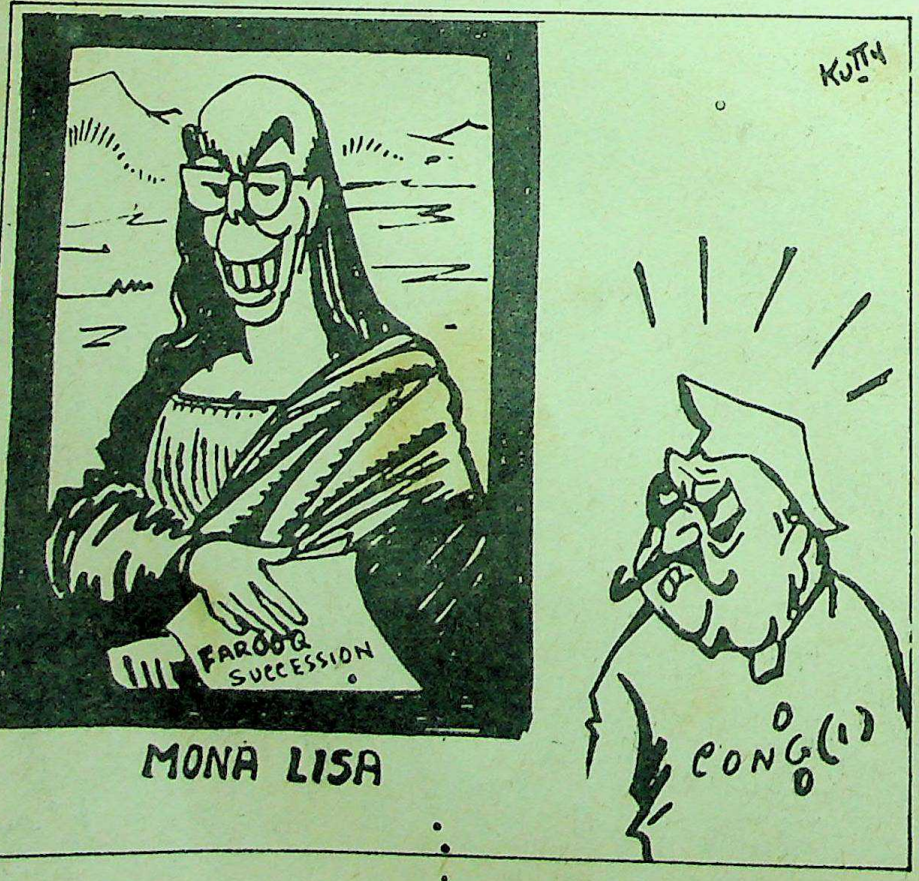
SHARAD PAWAR's 'UNITY' DREAM

SHARAD Pawar, the newly elected president of the Congress(U) had a hectic time in Delhi: he spent all of his precious time in wooing the Janata party president Mr Chandra Shekhar, pacifying the fiery George Fernandes and befriending Mr H. N. Bahuguna. Mr Pawar had apparently told Mr Chandra Shekhar that he was willing to merge his Congress(U) with the Janata party. What was the outcome of his meeting with Mr Fernandes? Mr Pawar made it clear that he was ready to merge his party with the Lok Dal but he finds it rather difficult to work with Chaudhury Charan Singh. After the discussion, however, Mr Pawar looked perfectly happy and satisfied. Not only that, he was convinced that it would not be all that difficult to get along with Chaudhury Charan Singh. Before Mr Pawar left Delhi he made it a point to see Mr Bahuguna. He had even told Mr Bahuguna that he was prepared to cooperate with him and was ready to finance him whenever the need arose. In the meantime, Mr Pawar has rechristened his party as the Congress(S). While clarifying the meaning of "S" he expressed his gratitude to Mr Raj Narain: after all it was Mr Raj Narain who declared in July 1979 that "S" stood for "secular".

CONG(I) LEARNS THE RULES FROM BJP

MR Chiman Shukla, BJP leader and former Janata party MP went on a 20-day-long fast in Rajkote with the demand that Mr Magan Sonpal, a small-time grocer who was once a BJP supporter but had defected to the Congress(I), should resign his membership and contest once again on a Congress(I) ticket. He claimed that this was in the tradition of Gandhian socialism and would establish a moral code. Mr Shukla got a tremendous response—even from the Congress(I) high command. Government circles in Delhi sent instructions to the Gujarat CM, Madhavsinh Solanki, to save Mr Shukla at any cost. Finally, the state Congress(I) and Mr Shukla reached an agreement: Mr Sonpal would be asked to resign. Incidentally, Mr Sonpal, after switching camps has cleared the debts of his sister and also purchased a piece of land. Delhi's political circle is now asking a very vital question: Why aren't the Congress(I) leaders implementing the same rule in the Parliament for members who have defected to the Congress(I)?



LOBBYING POLICEMEN

DELHI police have been operating without a deputy commissioner (traffic), since the first week of August, 1981. Mr P. S. Bawa, who was the DCP (traffic), has been elevated to the post of additional police commissioner, for the Asiads. So the post of the DCP is lying vacant. The reason for not being able to fill up the post yet seems to be the endless political manipulations and manoeuvrings. A certain DCP who has been working in the Delhi police headquarters has been trying to grab the post, immediately after Mr Bawa was promoted. In fact, he was almost certain that this prize post would go to him. But soon a rival DCP from one of the six districts of the capital appeared on the scene, equally keen to bag the post. Both of them are now lobbying in Delhi for the post. One of them is supported by the powerful Congress(I) lobby close to the police commissioner Mr P. S. Bhinder, and the other one is being backed by several bureaucrats of the home ministry. The sufferer in this power game is none other than the traffic department which is still working without a DCP.

SWAMY: A FRIEND INDEED

SUBRAMANIAM Swamy, the outspoken Janata party MP is in for good days. He secured the support of the seven Janata party members of the Lok Sabha while contesting for the post of deputy leader of the Janata Parliamentary party against Mr Ravindra Verma. Mr Swamy, however, was beaten in the final count. But Mr Verma secured only four votes from the Lok Sabha: those of Mr Madhu Dandavate, Mrs Premila Dandavate, Mr Chandra Shekhar and, of course, Mr Verma himself. The defeat, however, could not dampen Mr Swamy's spirits. Mr Swamy is going on a visit to Israel in October. He will, of course, meet Israel's Prime Minister Begin. But that is not the real coup that Swamy has achieved. On the same trip, he will go on to meet the PLO's Yasser Arafat! Which is unique. Normally, Arabs do not allow a visitor to even enter their countries if that person has been to Israel.

The Judiciary: intimidated through circulars

EXCLUSIVE

By KULDIP NAYAR

Circulars have come to acquire rather unpleasant associations among judges and lawyers. The Janata government under Mr Morarji Desai issued one saying that new appointees to the High Courts and the Supreme Court should stop drinking on joining the bench. Mrs Gandhi's government later issued another to lay down that temporary judges must accept the principle of transfer to any High Court in the country before they were considered for a permanent appointment.

Recently a letter, which may be called a circular, came from the Supreme Court proposing the elimination of oral arguments in certain preliminary—mostly miscellaneous—matters. Instead, two judges would go over the written argument circulated to them and decide whether to allow an oral argument at all. In situations where even one of them felt that it should be allowed, it would be.

The first two circulars shocked the nation because one showed the judges in a bad light and tried to interfere in their private lives and the other tried to pressurise the judiciary. But more than that was the people's suspicion that the executive was trying to subordinate the rule of law to suit its own whims. The latest circular—the Supreme Court insists on calling it a letter—would not have created the storm it did if the Supreme Court's intentions were not doubted. The feeling among lawyers is that it is only the beginning and that at a later stage oral hearings may be excluded even in regular appeals.

Not many people can take exception to the elimination of oral hearings in petitions relating to extension of time in paying court fee, fixation of an early hearing, transfer of a matter to another court, consolidation of cases on the same issue and so on. These are minor matters which now take up nearly 40 per cent of the Supreme Court's time. The practice of hand written argument is normal in Britain and America, whose legal procedures we generally follow. In fact, an oral argument is rarely allowed in those countries—it was done in the Pentagon papers case and even there arguments were restricted to half an hour for each side.

In India lawyers, even when told by the bench that the points raised are irrelevant, continue to argue as if the purpose is to impress the client. And, for a simple matter, which does not take even five minutes in a law court, a senior advocate charges Rs 1,100 over the table. It is on Mondays and Fridays that such matters are slated before the Supreme Court and senior advocates have four to five such cases each day.

Every Prime Minister, beginning with Nehru, has pointed out how prolonged hearings have defeated the purpose of justice. Among the remedial suggestions mooted has been the reduction of arguments. These days hundreds of cases are filed and one finds that the arrears of cases in the Supreme Court are about 50,000 and in the High Courts more than eight lakhs. Any step taken to scale down this accumulation should be welcome.

The common man has to go through so many layers of litigation that he is eventually physically, mentally and financially exhausted and both parties are in such dire straits so as to be unable to pay for a court decree. A Supreme Court judge said the other day that by the time a dispute was finally settled, the invariable prospect was that one of the parties might not be alive to hear the verdict. In fact on this issue, no one can be opposed to ways to quicken the pace of justice.

The reason why the Supreme Court circular became suspect was the sequence of events prior to it. Many things have taken place in the last two years which suggest relentless pressure by the executive on the judiciary. First Mrs Gandhi wanted the Chief Justice of all High Courts to be transferred. Then she approached the Chief Justice of India to give the executive blanket permission to transfer High Court judges and recently her hand-picked law commission issued a questionnaire suggesting a bifurcation of the Supreme Court. The later circular, welcome in some ways, came at a time when the public was concerned over the series of the steps Mrs Gandhi has been taking to shackle the legal system.

Even then the circular would have been discussed on its merit had it not been issued on the eve of elections to the Supreme Court Bar Association. No senior advocate, much less the leaders of the profession, Mr A. K. Sen, Mr Ram Jethmalani and Mr Govind Mukhoty, who were contesting the elections themselves, could have admitted that the points raised by the Supreme Court were worth discussing. Elections, of whatever nature, create a populistic atmosphere. The denouncement of the circular went down well with the bar hence no speaker at the meeting of the bar association dared to say anything in favour of it even though some say privately that if a judge could not appreciate the point made in a written argument he would not do so even in an oral hearing.

But one also gets the feeling that the Supreme Court was waiting for an opportunity to hit back because of the battering it has been receiving at the hands of the bar for a long time. The Supreme Court judges discussed the circular at a meeting and some reportedly mentioned how the bar looked for every opportunity to besmear the image of the judiciary. This was quite evident from some of the observations made in the reply sent to the bar.

One observation of the Supreme Court was: "If the bar has at its heart the future of the Indian judicial system and the rule of law, unrestrained criticism of the judges must at all events be avoided." Why did the judges generalise so sweepingly? The Supreme Court also regretted "the tone and language" of the bar's letter which was in no way worse than the ones it had addressed earlier to the Supreme Court.

The circular in fact underlines the growing distance between the bench and the bar and how they are hurling allegations and counter-allegations at each other. There is a tendency to win points at the expense of a good relationship. The remarks made against the judges during the discussion of the circular reflect the thinking of many lawyers. One leading advocate said that counsel "felt himself lucky if he found a judge who had read a High Court judgment in an appeal, leave aside the appeal itself." Another lawyer said that "the type of judges we have today" could not give justice on the basis of only written arguments. Surely, this is not a way to build either a healthy judiciary or, for that matter, an independent bar.

Feuding for power

Your cover story, Split in the family by Shubhabrata Bhattacharya (11 April), was absolutely marvellous. It was an eye-opener to those readers who did not know much about the Gandhi household affairs. It caught the reader's attention right until the very last word. I personally used to have great admiration and affection for Dhirendra Brahmachari. It was disgusting to know that instead of sticking to teaching yoga, he seems to be more interested in meddling with the affairs of that family.

The treatment meted out to Maneka was extremely unfair. Certainly, the humiliating manner in which her luggage was searched and the way in which her son was attempted to be separated from her, is a downright uncouth way of treating anyone, and more so a woman. How could Mrs Gandhi forget the service Maneka had rendered her party through Surya magazine during the days of the Janata rule? And those were the days when neither Rajiv Gandhi's name nor face was too familiar. Therefore it is amazing that today he, more than Maneka Gandhi, is enjoying political support from the Congress(I).

All said and done, I for one, certainly admire Maneka for her guts. There is absolutely nothing wrong if she has political ambitions. And it is admirable that even after being thrown out of the house, she has still spoken of being loyal to her mother-in-law. I wish Maneka all the best and hope to see and hear a lot more from this intelligent; courageous young woman.
Suresh Kumar, Kanpur

If you asked Mrs Gandhi why Maneka left 1, Safdarjang Road, she would probably say that "there is a foreign hand behind it."
K. V. S. Prasad, Hyderabad

Tears rolled down my cheeks when I read of Maneka Gandhi's plight. I am sure even Mrs Gandhi herself must have experienced a tug or two at her heart. Does Mrs Gandhi not realise that Maneka is surely closer to most Indians than her other daughter-in-law, Sonia who is after all a foreigner? I look forward to more articles on the subject.
K. Buchi Raju, Rourkela

The Gandhis seem to have maintained the tradition of our country by following the age-old custom of the mother-in-law fighting with the daughter-in-law.
Manish Sinha Ray, Calcutta

Surely, minimum decency demanded that Mrs Gandhi should at least have searched her daughter-in-law's luggage herself rather than got Mr Dhawan or Dhirendra Brahmachari to do so.
Swadhin Sahoo, Behrampur (Orissa)

Those political opportunists should have found some other people to humiliate instead of picking on a young widow. Is this the way in which the leaders repay their debts to someone who has helped them in their time of need?
T. Shenga, Gangtok (Sikkim)

The statement of Mrs Gandhi, referring to Maneka's different background was indeed shocking. Has she forgotten that not so long ago, she herself went against her father's wishes by marrying a Parsi and thus revolted against that very "background" of which she now appears to be so proud? But at the same time, could she, as the Congress(I) leader, have acted any differently?
R. K. Koul, Kashmir

What a marvellous example Mrs Gandhi has set before the nation! Now if all the mothers-in-law start throwing their bahus out of the house, can she dare to raise her voice against it? Today she has sacrificed her own daughter-in-law at the altar of politics. Who knows, some day she might sacrifice her own nation too.
Pramod K. Sahoo, Rourkela

Mrs Indira Gandhi's actions ought to go down in history to illustrate the ill-treatment of the daughters-in-law at the hands of their mothers-in-law during this period. Was our Prime Minister so scared of the young Maneka that she had to literally throw her out of the house? She should have realised that this can prove fatal to her politically, with Maneka gaining all the public sympathy.
S. Harikrishna, Bangalore

Your cover story was shocking. If our Prime Minister can treat her daughter-in-law so badly, can you imagine the plight of other young women? The so-called aristocratic upbringing of our Prime Minister was very evident from her treatment of her dead son's widow. It also does not behove well of Mrs Gandhi to talk of "family background" in this scientific age.
S. Narang, New Delhi

Your cover story was a very well-presented article. The Prime Minister may know how to deal with the nation's problems but she certainly does not know how to tackle her daughter-in-law and other domestic problems.
S. P. Murugappan, Trichy

It may happen that sympathy for Maneka Gandhi will far surpass Mrs Indira Gandhi's fabled charisma, and the former will become a political force to reckon with. It is a good thing that Maneka Gandhi has got out of the fettered and confined house of the Prime Minister.
Ram Sewak Singh, Samastipur

The photographs that accompanied the cover story were excellent and very moving. They will stay ingrained in the minds of the readers for a very long time to come. Mrs Gandhi ought to have controlled her 'Nehruvian' anger and behaved more like a mother than a political being. Maybe the grandson will be instrumental in restoring peace between the two women.
K. Govind, Hyderabad

After reading the article, I have no doubts that Mrs Gandhi is a first-rate trouble-shooter. She had already established enmity with Mrs Vijayalakshmi Pandit, Nayantara Sehgal, Mrs Amteshwar Anand, and now her own daughter-in-law, Maneka. In all these, she has sacrificed everything, even her family's prestige, for the sake of power. It was high time that a ruthless person like Maneka reminded 'Queen Indira' that she is ruling a democracy and not a princely state. This ugly incident has effectively highlighted Mrs Gandhi's own intense obsession with supreme power. My sympathies are totally with Maneka and Dumpy. Good luck to them.
R. Gururaj, Madras

Maneka Gandhi who merely exercised her fundamental right to expression and speech was thrown out of the Prime Minister's house and that too at night. At the same time, the Prime Minister continues to wipe the tears of the women who throng to her 'palace' with grievances against their mothers-in-law. Also, the Prime Minister's statement about "different background" was in very poor taste and implied that Maneka has a "poor family background." Better sense should prevail on the Prime Minister and she should withdraw her words before it is too late.
S. Mazhar Husain, Secretary, All India Congress Committee, New Delhi

Mr Shubhabrata Bhattacharaya was not impartial in reporting the Maneka episode. It has been felt that he was trying to capture public sympathy for Maneka by pointing out matters not worth mentioning at all. Rajiv Gandhi is accused for keeping silent through the feud. This is not because he is afraid of Maneka but it shows how much more mature he is than Sanjay. Laxman's cartoon was superb indeed!

It is not very difficult to realise that enemies of Mrs Gandhi are working behind the scene and they desperately want to tarnish the image of the Prime Minister and the Nehru family. To some extent these elements have succeeded in their attempts by instigating Maneka to come out in the open against Mrs Gandhi.

If Maneka carries on the tussle with Mrs Gandhi, she will soon realise that the loser will not be Mrs Gandhi but herself.

You are lingering far too long on the same episode of the Maneka-Mrs Gandhi quarrel. Give the readers some other news now.
H. R. Sridhara, Bangalore

Your cover story was very unbalanced and tilted too much in favour of Maneka Gandhi. When examined in the proper perspective, it is quite clear that Maneka is merely a headstrong upstart. She has tried to use the Nehru-Gandhi family as a springboard for her political ambitions. Mrs Indira Gandhi did the right thing by cutting her down to size and ousting her from the family.
H. M. Sinha, Imphal

Let us not forget that Maneka Gandhi was staying in the house of the Prime Minister of the country. It was unbecoming of her to indulge in surreptitious activity that ran against party interests. Mrs Indira Gandhi only took the one step available to her in those circumstances and that was to ask her to leave the house.
Subrat Das, Bhubaneswar

Your unending reports on the family feud are becoming progressively monotonous. There is nothing new in this drama. By reporting about it, you unnecessarily give it undue importance.
Krishnadas Karmakar, Adampur (Punjab)

There is a limit to the readers' tolerance. We wouldn't mind if SUNDAY turns fortnightly, but please stop giving us the same story over and over again.
R. Sasidharan, Kerala

The photographs that accompanied the cover story were a little theatrical.
Abdul Haleem Khan, Bilaspur

The cover story struck me as being very lopsided and malicious. It reads more like a defamation campaign against Mrs Indira Gandhi and Rajiv Gandhi. By taking up the crusade for Maneka Gandhi, the writer has exonerated her of all faults. His assessment of the split was aimed at projecting Maneka as innocent as the proverbial lamb. But in the process, he forgets that it always takes two to create a quarrel. And his portrait of Mrs Gandhi is definitely distorted. The entire episode was a shrewd political manoeuvre on Maneka's part and it should be seen for what it is. In such a situation, Mrs Gandhi could not possibly have housed a political adversary. There is no other truth to this story. Anyway, the most we can do is indulge in guesswork. Nobody can know the facts for certain; but to applaud one at the expense of the other does not speak of a level-headed, balanced judgment.

Lopsided secularism

This is with reference to the letters published in the Opinion page (11 April) under the heading Post-mortem. I was surprised to read the lopsided reaction to M. J. Akbar's report: The Pune riots: Revenge for Meenakshipuram (14 March).

Firstly, having read the letters, I went back to the article and found that M. J. Akbar could not have been more honest and unbiased. I can understand that in north India there was some cause for Hindu-Muslim animosity as a result of festering reminders of the holocaust that was partition. But in the south, Hindus, Muslims and Christians have always lived in amity. I remember, when we ran out of Hindu festivals, we would join in the others' festivities. Even as a teenaged daughter of an orthodox brahmin family, I was never deterred from attending a Catholic school. Our next door neighbour, Mrs Mazharuddin, would give the first share of sweets to me. Honestly, till coming northwards in 1978, I had not come across a single case of religious bigotry. And if there was any, it was not due to the secular majority. We as a secular country, should do our bit to deny the non-secular minority from vitiating the atmosphere.

My sincere congratulations to M. J. Akbar and SUNDAY.
Lalitha Sarma, Allahabad

It was shocking to read an Opinion page full of bitter personal attacks. I missed M. J. Akbar's original sin, but I can feel how successfully he has stung the ever-so-tolerant secular Hindus!

From Jamshedpur, through Varanasi, Aligarh, etc. I am personally indebted to the writer for reminding me almost every week of the true state of the country I belong to.
S. S. Chaudhuri, Calcutta

I would like to ask Mr C. R. Ravichandran (who wrote in the Opinion page) how much longer do the Muslims need to 'prove' that they are, indeed, Indians first?
Md Jalil Ashraf, Biharsharif

Taken for a ride

In the Calcutta Book Fair of 1979 I had registered my name (No. 1291 dated 9 March 1979) for the 10 volumes of Visvaparichaya to be published by Nabapatra Prakashan, Calcutta. A few days before that the Statesman also carried an advertisement by the publisher asking for registration of subscribers. After much irksome prodding and enquiries spanning over 9 months, the publishers informed me (by a circular dated 12 December 1979) that the first volume would be brought out within 3 months and subsequent volumes would follow without delay.

When nothing happened for another 9 months, I wrote to them on 24 September 1980 and also enquired at the stalls set up by the publishers in the Calcutta Book Fairs 1981 and 1982. I did not receive any reply or satisfactory answer. Three years after registration, not a single volume has been published to this day. I think I would be echoing the sentiment of other registered subscribers that we have been taken for a ride and that there is a certain deliberate, mischievous motive in keeping the publication in abeyance so far. It looks like misappropriation of public money and I am writing to warn bibliophiles not to fall into similar traps.

A timely warning

The special report, Drugs that can maim the unborn child by Mrs Vimal Balasubrahmanian (11 April) was an excellent article. Dr B. Palaniappan, Prof. of Obs. and Gynae. at the Kilpauk Medical college, Madras, has conducted a notable research and controlled study. The conclusions he arrived at were that the hormone (HPT) drugs are unreliable and dangerous for pregnancy tests and totally useless for "secondary amenorrhoea not due to pregnancy." This conclusion was given as early as in 1978. It is high time we fought for the total ban of these oestrogen-progesterone combine drugs.
V. Anupama, Cannanore (Kerala)

Forget about the 'small print,' the drug companies just don't print any warning at all on the samples and literature that is supplied to the doctors.
Jyotindra Nirmal, Bombay

The government should make it obligatory for all manufacturers of these drugs to print all the warnings in a very bold print. Otherwise, the drugs should be banned. And why is it that the doctors recommend these drugs?
A. S. Johar, Gauhati

Thanks to Vimal Balasubrahmanian for the article. These days there is a phobia among young couples to step into the chemist's shop and ask for these hormone drugs, with the hope of getting an unwanted child aborted. None of them are aware of the dangerous consequences.

The special report, Drugs that can maim the unborn child by Mrs Vimal Balasubrahmanian (11 April) was an excellent article. Dr B. Palaniappan, Prof. of Obs. and Gynae. at the Kilpauk Medical college, Madras, has conducted a notable research and controlled study. The conclusions he arrived at were that the hormone (HPT) drugs are unreliable and dangerous for pregnancy tests and totally useless for "secondary amenorrhoea not due to pregnancy." This conclusion was given as early as in 1978. It is high time we fought for the total ban of these oestrogen-progesterone combine drugs.
V. Anupama, Cannanore (Kerala)

Forget about the 'small print,' the drug companies just don't print any warning at all on the samples and literature that is supplied to the doctors.
Jyotindra Nirmal, Bombay

The government should make it obligatory for all manufacturers of these drugs to print all the warnings in a very bold print. Otherwise, the drugs should be banned. And why is it that the doctors recommend these drugs?
A. S. Johar, Gauhati

Thanks to Vimal Balasubrahmanian for the article. These days there is a phobia among young couples to step into the chemist's shop and ask for these hormone drugs, with the hope of getting an unwanted child aborted. None of them are aware of the dangerous consequences.

COVER STORY

Another Nuclear Blast At Pokhran ?

Villagers have been told that they may have to vacate their homes for a few days in May. Strict security has been clamped down over an area about 20 kilometres from Pokhran in Rajasthan where India's first nuclear device was tested. SHUBHABRATA BHATTACHARYA went to the area and returned convinced that a nuclear explosion of a far more sophisticated nature than the first one could take place. Preparations have been in progress for nearly a year, and we may see the culmination of the efforts soon.

Pokhran, the sleepy subdivisional town of Rajasthan's Jaisalmer district (on the edge of the Thar desert) located 171 km northwest of Jodhpur, may soon be back in the news. It gained a special place on the map when the country's first peaceful nuclear explosion went off there on 18 May 1974. Perhaps in May this year, Pokhran may again be in the headlines for similar reasons. For the past one year, army units posted in the vicinity of Pokhran have been engaged in activities similar to the ones carried out before the 1974 blast. The villages around the proposed test site are agog with stories of how preparations are being made to blast another nuclear device.

A large area in the desert near Pokhran has been turned into a field firing range of the army since 1971. Mock desert-warfare exercises and artillery firing exercises are carried out by the army units in this area. The site was chosen sometime after the 1965 Indo-Pak war and in 1969 two villages, Malka and Kala, were evacuated to make way for the field firing range. Later, four more villages—Naotala, Etah, Taorki and Sudhia—were also similarly evacuated around 1971. The residents of these six villages were paid adequate compensation and resettled in the surrounding areas. The 1974 explosion was carried out near the abandoned Malka village which is located about four km away from Loharki, a village on the Ramdeora-Nachna road.

When we reached Pokhran after reading reports that American satellites had spotted some activity similar to preparations for a nuclear blast in the area around the last test site, we learnt that it was not Pokhran but Loharki which should have rightfully hit the headlines in 1974 for being the spot nearest to the test site. Ten km from Pokhran lies Ramdeora, a place of pilgrimage for the local people, both Hindus and Muslims. It derives its name from Baba Ramdeo, a fifteenth century saint, whose samadhi is located there. At Ramdeora, one road branches off towards Bikaner and another goes to Nachna. Loharki is 20 km to the west of Ramdeora.

We reached Loharki after an arduous drive on the desert road which was covered at many places by sand blown onto it from the desert. There are no villages between Ramdeora and Loharki, located on the road. The first building that one sees in Loharki is a middle school (imparting education up to class eight) which has been built with funds provided by CASA (Christian Association for Social Action). We went to the school and enquired from the teachers if Loharki was the village which had been closest to the 1974 blast site. The villagers looked at us suspiciously. "Why don't you talk to the pradhan (headman), Gulab Singh?" So, we walked through the burning hot sands towards the pradhan's house, located in the centre of the village. On the way, the schoolboy accompanying us proudly pointed out the village well. Water is a scarce commodity in the Jaisalmer desert and a village which has a sweet water well is very rare. (Many villages in this area are named after the type of wells. On the road between Jodhpur and Pokhran, we came across villages with names like "Meethi Beri" and "Khari Beri," denoting sweet water and salt water wells. Beri in the local language means a well.) Had the well in Loharki been affected by radio-activity, we asked the villagers who were drawing water from the well. They said no. The atomic energy people periodically carry out radioactivity tests on the well, we were told. The schoolboy told us that no one in the village had been affected by the 1974 blast and this was the view of the village elders as well.

Gulab Singh was the pradhan of Loharki when the 1974 blast took place and he continues to be the pradhan even today. He was re-elected in the recent panchayat elections, held a few months back. And he displayed every sign of being a good politician by giving evasive replies to all the questions put by us. Yes, Loharki was the village nearest to the test site; he did not know anything about the present plans of the government; the army periodically visits the village, but no indication has been given by the army about any possibility of the village being evacuated for a nuclear blast. At this point, another villager, who was sitting in the pradhan's house, intruded. "Even in 1974 there was no prior warning," he said. Gulab Singh frowned. "You have come from Delhi. Please go and ask the government there what the plans are. Why do you bother us?" After this, Gulab Singh started giving us statistics about the famine situation. In spite of dismissing our questions on the nuclear blast, the villager-like simplicity of Gulab Singh was not lost. "You are our guest, you must have a cup of tea before you leave. Please understand our limitations. But we must not fail in our duty towards our guests." So, we sat down to drink tea with the pradhan. In the meantime the news of journalists from Delhi having come to the village had spread. Some more villagers had come to Gulab Singh's house. Describing the famine of the area, Gulab Singh said, "The people here are very hardy. They can face any difficult situation. Do you know that once for seven continuous years there were no rains. When the rains came in the eighth year, our children who were around ten years old were scared and surprised at the strange phenomenon they were seeing for the first time in their lives." As we were leaving Gulab Singh's house, some villagers followed us out.

One of them told us, "You were sitting at the same spot where (Drs) Ramanna and Sethna sat once." The villagers of Loharki know nuclear scientists Dr Raja Ramanna and Dr H. N. Sethna by name and face. They are said to have visited the village both before and after the 1974 blast. We goaded the villagers to tell us if they had noticed any fresh activity or if the army had told them to be prepared for the precautions which have to be taken before a test blast. They said that for the past one year the army had cordoned off an area between the earlier test site of Malka and Khetolai (a village on the Pokhran-Jaisalmer road) and it seemed as if another blast was going to take place. The army had spoken to the pradhan about the possibilities of the villagers being evacuated for a few days. This puzzled the villagers most because in 1974 they had not been asked to leave the village. Apparently, the proposed blast will be more powerful than the 1974 one.

The villagers of Loharki had been alerted by armymen, who landed in the village in platoon strength on the night of 17 May 1974. The villagers, who had by then got used to the army excercises in the field firing range, were told that a new kind of bomb was to be exploded in the range. They were asked to remain indoors. They were given cotton wool and advised to put it into their ears and not look out of the windows. Around 7.00 am on 18 May, there was a loud bang and the earth shook. Moments after the bang, the armymen, who had camped in the village school building at night, came out and started dancing in joy. "Hamne atom phor diya (We have blasted the atom)," they were shouting. From them the villagers learnt that the fervent activity which had been taking place in the abandoned Malka village for the past year or so had not been for oil or coal exploration, but an atomic blast.

An abandoned well in Malka had been used for the 1974 blast. The well had dried up years ago. When the army started digging in that area and teamloads of scientists came to the site, the villagers of Loharki thought that perhaps coal or oil had been discovered in the area. No local labour was engaged. The armymen used to say, "You people could not even find water. Let's see if we can find something else."

At one stage the army officers asked the village elders as to how the villagers could be brought together to one spot without raising alarm. The elders said that whenever there was an opium-eating session, the villagers gathered together. Apparently the army was toying with the idea of gathering the villagers together at the time of the blast. But later the plan was abandoned and the villagers were just told to remain indoors. But unlike the 1974 blast, in this proposed blast, the authorities are planning to evacuate the villages. The 1974 blast was based on nuclear fission (atomic blast). Perhaps the blast being planned now will be based on the principle of nuclear fusion (similar to a hydrogen bomb).

After talking to the villagers at Loharki we drove back to Ramdeora and then on to Pokhran, from where we started driving west on the road to Jaisalmer. Our destination was Khetolai, a village 20 km away from Pokhran, which may be the nearest spot to the site of the proposed explosion. While Loharki has a mixed population (around 1,500) comprising rajputs, Muslims, bishnois and harijans, Khetolai (population around 1,000) is a predominantly bishnoi village. The villagers of Khetolai have clashed a number of times with the local army officers for the past few years. The bishnois are opposed to killings and the army officers posted in the field firing range off Pokhran sometimes go out deer hunting. The area abounds in deer, peacocks, sheep, goats and of course, camels. Deer hunting is prohibited by law and taking advantage of this legal position, the bishnois of Khetolai have been waging a campaign against the army officers. There are, however, other reasons for the villagers of Khetolai to be annoyed with the army. Many people in Khetolai pick up the used shells from the field firing range and sell them as scrap. The army continuously lodges complaints with the local police against the villagers of Khetolai on this score. And the tussle goes on.

As per the information given to us by the villagers of Loharki, the proposed site for the nuclear explosion is located off the old site near Malka and the Khetolai village. The villagers of Khetolai confirmed that a portion of the field firing range near the village had been cordoned off with barbed wire for the past year or so and that at night lights could be seen from the site. There was also the droning sound of machine, perhaps a drill, heard in the night. In the desert, it is extremely difficult to work in the day. Apparently some activity is going on in the area cordoned off by the army. The villagers of Khetolai said that in case their cattle strayed into the notified area they are able to get them back with a lot of difficulty. If anyone loitered into the notified area by mistake, the armymen give the person a beating.

From all indications, a site near Khetolai is being prepared for an unusual event. From past experience, the villagers near the field firing range off Pokhran say that the activity taking place in the prohibited zone of the desert is similar to the activity noticed before the 1974 blast. Nuclear explosions, unlike political rallies, are not much-trumpeted events. They are undertaken under the cover of strictest security. But with the advancement of technology, the space satellites are able to "see" all activities on the face of earth through their infrared "eyes." And one American satellite has recently "seen" some such activity in the vicinity of Pokhran. A Pentagon report on this has been leaked and published in an American daily, the Atlanta Constitution, recently. In all likelihood, the present glory

Unrealistic pricing hits drug production and investment

Drug prices are under Government control for the past two decades. And since the last 10 years they are fixed according to a clearly defined, rigid pricing formula. Not only the prices of all bulk drugs but also the price and profit margins of each and every finished formulation are controlled. On top of this, there is a ceiling on the overall profit a company can make. This three-tier control ensures that no company can overcharge or make exorbitant profit or increase prices without the prior approval of the Government.

No control on cost

Although prices are controlled, there is no control on the costs of inputs which have escalated sharply (see table). The price control order provides for periodic revision in drug prices on the basis of increases in cost of production but there is no adequate administrative machinery to deal expeditiously with hundreds of price revision applications. And by the time prices are revised, costs have increased further, rendering the approved prices uneconomic.

Inordinate delay

Inordinate delay in price revision is not the only problem. What is even worse is that when prices are finally approved they are inadequate and far below what is warranted by the cost of production and even the Government's own pricing norms. This is because actual costs are not taken into account; several legitimate costs are arbitrarily disallowed.

Furthermore, the mark-up allowed is inadequate and unrealistic. Under the pricing formula the consumer price of a drug is arrived at by adding a percentage mark-up to its factory cost. Mark-up is not profit; it is to cover costs not included in factory cost, such as freight, distribution charges, trade discount, selling expenses and manufacturers' margin.

Under the old formula mark-up was a maximum of 75% of factory cost for certain drugs and 150% for others. This has now been reduced to 40% for some drugs, 55% for a second category and 60%-100% for a third, although in no area have costs gone down. The break-even mark-up for most companies is around 75%. When costs are going up and prices all round are rising, drug prices cannot remain the same without adversely affecting investment, production and availability of drugs and medicines.

Sharp decline in profitability

The drug industry like any other industry, must have a fair return to enable it to pay a reasonable dividend and to plough back for new investment and increased production. But cost escalation without timely price adjustments has sharply eroded margins to levels well below those prescribed by the Government. The position today is that very few companies are able to get even a modest return. Obviously, there is something basically wrong with the policy itself.

The impact of cost escalation on the profitability is clearly demonstrated by a study of the balance sheets of 20 leading companies by the Economic Times Research Bureau. These 20 companies, together account for a total drug sales of Rs.474 crores in 1980-81 or about 50% of the entire production of the organised sector of the industry. The study showed that although sales increased by 9.5% in 1980-81 over 1979-80, profit before tax dropped as much as 25.2%. Retained profits for the year recorded a sharp decline of 22.5%.

The financial viability of several companies has been severely hit. Some established units are already in the red; others are rapidly moving in that direction.

Shortage

Naturally, this has adversely affected investment and production. New investment has slowed down. Shortages of several essential medicines, which were occasional in the past, have now become frequent and wide-ranging. Other factors have aggravated the situation: scarcity of critical raw materials and packing materials; inadequate and irregular supply of canalised drugs; power cuts and labour unrest.

HOW DRUG PRICES COMPARE WITH OTHER PRICES

	Wholesale price index
	All commodities	Drugs & medicines
1970-71 (base)	100.0	100.0
1975-76	172.9	118.7
1978-79	186.4	136.1
1979-80	212.3	135.2
1980-81	256.9	137.6

A policy for growth, not stagnation

The aim of the policy-makers was to encourage investment and production. But the policy has produced the opposite effect. Our Prime Minister has recently called for removal of all policy constraints and procedural handicaps that prevent optimum utilisation of the country's productive potential. But the drug policy does not encourage more production to prevent shortages.

Another look at the policy is long overdue. It is crippling a vital industry. It has caused shortages and hardships to the consumer. It has also pushed up the country's import bill.

In the year of productivity we need a drug policy that encourages growth, more production and greater availability of drugs and medicines to the consumer.

MARK-UP IS NOT PROFIT

Mark-up is meant to cover costs not included in factory cost: namely, freight, marketing and distribution costs, trade discount and manufacturers' margin. The mark-up which was 75% for some drugs and 150% for others in 1970 has been slashed to 40%, 55% and 60%-100% under the DPCO 1979, although in no area have costs come down.

of Loharki may soon be shared by Khetolai as well.

But will it mean anything to the villagers of Khetolai? When we reached the village in the afternoon, our throats were parched. We had drunk sweet water at Loharki and we asked for some drinking water from the villagers at Khetolai. A bucket full of brownish, brackish water was brought. Khetolai stores rainwater for drinking round the year. There is no well in the village. As we drank the brackish water, sitting in the building of the local cooperative, our eyes fell on a tattered poster on the wall. It was a poster of Jawaharlal Nehru with the orignal Congress symbol of the twin oxen and a plough. The slogan on the poster read, "Desh ki pragati mein sajhedar baniye, Congress ko vote dijiye (Become partners in the nation's progress and vote for the Congress)." A villager proudly told us that the poster was a remnant of 1962 elections. The nation has certainly progressed in the past 20 years. Khetolai may soon be the village nearest to the site of a nuclear experiment. But progress seems to have bypassed Khetolai. Even today there is no proper drinking water. And Khetolai is certainly not an isolated example. Yet, the people still fondly retain the old Nehru election poster, urging them to do something which they have failed to do this far.

Fission and fusion: the difference

Each of the two atomic bombs dropped on the Japanese cities Hiroshima and Nagasaki in August 1945 had a destructive power of at least 20,000 tons of TNT, a chemical explosive. The total atomic casualties from these were about 200,000 and would have been higher if larger targets had been hit. The atomic bomb tested by India at Pokhran in 1974 had a destructive power of 15,000 to 20,000 tons of TNT.

Compared with the atomic bomb, a thermonuclear bomb, generally called a hydrogen bomb, is far more powerful. A single hydrogen bomb can completely destroy a large city. First developed by the US physicist Edward Teller and others in 1949, hydrogen bombs have been extensively tested by the US, the Soviet Union, China, the UK and France.

The atomic bomb is based on a principle called nuclear fission, whereas the hydrogen bomb functions on nuclear fusion. In nuclear fission, an atomic nucleus (i.e., the heavy mass at the centre of an atom) splits into two pieces of almost equal mass with simultaneous liberation of a large amount of energy.

The best known nuclear fission reaction is the fission of uranium nuclei. Left to themselves, uranium nuclei rarely undergo fission, that is, they do not break apart. They split only if they are bombarded with neutrons (a particle which has no electrical charge). The neutron can be provided by a radioactive source. When a radioactive source is placed next to a piece of uranium, some of the uranium nuclei undergo fission. But a radioactive source does not provide enough neutrons to make many fission reactions take place at the same time. In a piece of uranium the additional neutrons come from the uranium fission reactions themselves.

A uranium-235 nucleus contains 143 neutrons and 92 protons. When a uranium-235 nucleus is hit by an external neutron, it undergoes fission and splits into nuclei which contain more nearly equal number of neutrons and protons. The original U-235 nucleus provides more neutrons than the split-up nuclei can use up entirely. Some of the neutrons from the original nucleus are left over after the fission reaction takes place. These extra neutrons travel through the piece of uranium until they hit other uranium-235 nuclei. Then the process of fission takes place in the other nuclei. The neutrons hit the nuclei and break them apart; more neutrons are left over from the new fission reactions. These extra neutrons hit still other uranium nuclei, and the process is repeated as long as more neutrons can hit more uranium nuclei. In such a process one reaction makes other reactions take place.

The fission of just one ounce of uranium-235 releases energy equivalent to around 600,000 kilowatt-hours. The object of an atomic bomb is to create an uncontrolled chain reaction so as to make as many atoms as possible undergo fission in a short time. The tremendous energy from the fission of one nucleus is thus multiplied a large number of times, and it is this sudden surge of energy released almost instantaneously that constitutes the explosion. A fission explosion is about 400,000 times as powerful as the explosion of an equivalent weight of the chemical explosive TNT.

In 1952, the US fired a nuclear weapon of another type—called a hydrogen bomb or thermonuclear bomb. Whereas in fission the energy comes from the breakup of a heavy nucleus, in this kind of reaction it comes from the fusing together of two light nuclei to form a heavier one. If atoms are heated to very high temperatures, their nuclei can come together. If they come together with enough force, fusion takes place. The temperatures needed to produce fusion reactions are in the range of 32 million degrees Fahrenheit. These are produced by an atomic bomb explosion which can generate as much as 90 million degrees Fahrenheit, and for long enough to set off a fusion reaction.

So a fusion bomb is built around a fission bomb. When the uranium in the fission bomb explodes, the high temperatures make the light nuclei fuse almost at the same time, producing a fusion explosion. This is what takes place in a hydrogen bomb, which uses hydrogen for its fusion reactions. There are three forms of hydrogen—light hydrogen, deuterium (heavy hydrogen) and tritium. In the hydrogen bomb, deuterium is used. Each deuterium nucleus contains one neutron and one proton. When two of the nuclei fuse, they form a nucleus of helium containing two neutrons and two protons. This fusion releases a tremendous amount of energy. The fusion of hydrogen to form helium takes place in the sun, and the heat it generates warms the earth. The hydrogen fusion reaction (H-bomb) is far more destructive than the uranium fission reaction (A-bomb). Most of the cost of a hydrogen bomb is said to be the cost of the atomic bomb to set it off.

SPECIAL REPORT

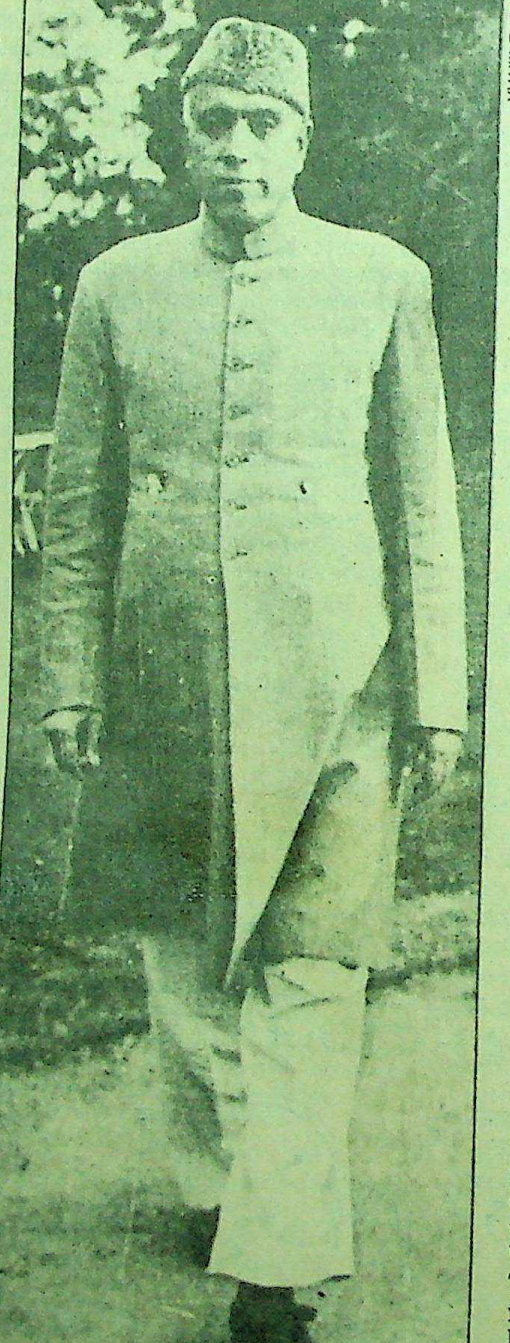
Fresh Storms Over Kashmir

The lion of Kashmir may be old, but he is still a lion, says KULDIP NAYAR who talked to Sheikh Abdullah about the new and old problems besetting Kashmir, India and Pakistan

Age has left its mark on Sheikh Abdullah. As he replied to a variety of questions for more than an hour at the chief minister's residence in Jammu, I found him rather cautious. There was a time when he would have let himself go on matters like his relations with the centre and the ruling Congress(I), and state autonomy. This time he would make only brief observations. Some of the old fire seems to have gone. He is nearing 79 and it is perhaps natural that he should be diffident to join issue with Mrs Gandhi; he does not want to go into the wilderness again. He also realises that his kith and kin have somewhat damaged his public image through their efforts to grab whatever they can while he is alive.

But the Sheikh is still committed to the basic principles of secularism and democracy which made him work for Kashmir's accession to India after the partition in 1947. And he retains his popular base, though it is a bit shrunken. He still remains much taller than any other leader in Jammu and Kashmir. He continues to be a liberal, whatever the misgivings of Mrs Gandhi, who has reportedly said that he is trying to "communalise" the atmosphere in Jammu and Kashmir. The Sheikh feels that his judgment that India's democratic system is far better than Pakistan's theocratic, feudal rule has proved correct. He does feel lonely and even isolated, and you get an impression after talking to him that he bears a grudge that India, for which he suffered onslaughts from his co-religionists, has not given him the recognition he deserves.

But when he speaks of Pakistan's annexation of some Kashmir areas—Gilgit, Hunza and Sikardu—one can see the old glint in his eyes.



ALOKE MITRA

Sheikh Abdullah: committed to secularism

Q: Sir, I was recently in Pakistan and found "observers" from Gilgit, Hunza and Sikardu attending the Majlis-e-Shoora, the government-nominated body. Is Islamabad justified in doing this?*

A: What they have done is immoral, unconstitutional and unjustified. Gilgit, Hunza and Sikardu are parts of Kashmir. It is a forcible annexation to which we do not agree.

Q: Gen. Zia said that all the three territories acceded to Pakistan in August 1947 and they were not a part of Kashmir any longer.

A: This is not true. These areas were under the suzerainty of the Kashmir ruler. They were not parts of the "Azad" Kashmir which Pakistan occupies. But they were in Kashmir, in Balitstan. The chiefs in the three territories were vassals and paid tributes to the Maharaja of Kashmir. Sometime in the Thirties, the Maharaja gave Gilgit on lease to the British who wanted it for the purpose of defending the subcontinent from the Soviet Union. Even then the civil administration, like the one in Hunza and Sikardu, was that of the Maharaja. In 1946, the British returned Gilgit to the Maharaja, who sent there one of his relations, Ganzare Singh, as the Governor. When Pakistan attacked Kashmir in 1947, Ganzare Singh was taken prisoner and subsequently exchanged with prisoners held by Pakistan.

Q: When did you come to know of Pakistan's absorption of Gilgit, Hunza and Sikardu?

A: I read of it only in newspapers after your interview with Gen. Zia appeared. The government of India never sent any word.

Q: What do you think is the solution to the Kashmir problem?

A: I think Pakistan cannot take the portion we have, nor can India the portion they have. There is no option except to hold talks. We have gone to war more than once on this question. We had to return even Haji Pir and Takwal, the points which we regained in every war after losing many lives. A bigger war, the third world war, may solve this problem but then who would be living after that war? Maybe, some in the caves might escape. Therefore, we must talk to each other, both knowing what is at stake. No government on either side can stay in power if it is asked to surrender its position on Kashmir. This has been the result of wars. They must sit across the table. In 1964, when I went to Pakistan, I felt that we were about to have a breakthrough. Gen. Ayub was willing. But unfortunately Pandit Nehru died at that time and we were back to square one.

No government on either side can stay in power if it is asked to surrender its position on Kashmir. This has been the result of wars.

Q: What can be done to improve India-Pakistan relations?

A: The two sides should have more and more contacts, editors and writers should meet, businessmen and traders should meet, students and the youth should meet. There should be an exchange of delegations. I am in favour of softening borders, I did suggest at one time the opening of the Rawalpindi route but I was misunderstood.

The people on both sides have love and goodwill towards one another. I have met some of the people who have gone to Pakistan, they were overwhelmed by the affection shown to them. Both are from the same stock. Whatever their religion, they are essentially the same type of people.

Q: Looking back, do you think you did a wise thing in merging with India?

A: Events have proved that our decision was justified because we support democracy and India is a democratic country. Whatever be the other deficiencies and difficulties, we have by and large free elections, a free press and freedom of expression, unlike Pakistan where there has been no individual freedom for many years and where a military dictatorship is entrenched. I am opposed to the countries or regimes established on the basis of religion. I recall that when I met Mr Jinnah in 1944 I told him I was opposed to the creation of a country merely on the basis of religion and I warned him that the two wings of Pakistan he was envisaging would not last long even if established. I am proved right; what was East Pakistan is now the independent country of Bangladesh.

Q: How is your equation with Mrs Gandhi?

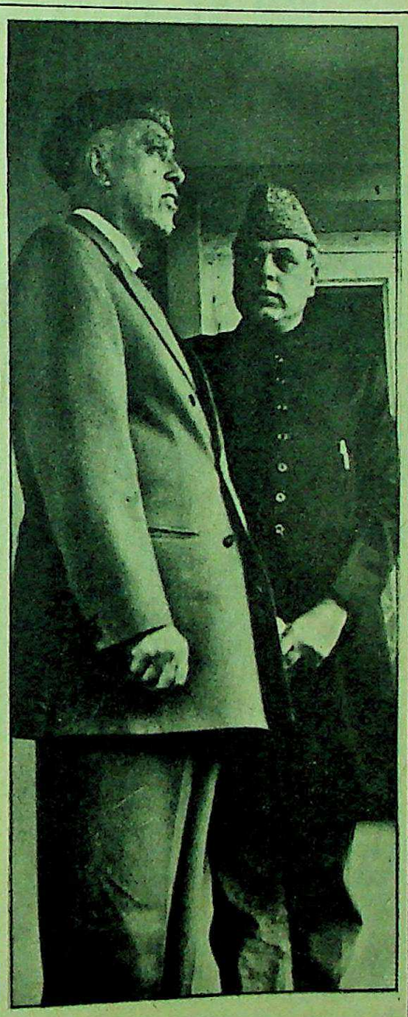
A: We have very little personal relations. I was a family member in her father's house. After Nehru's death I tried to maintain the same relations but she is a different type of person. I have no quarrel with her and I keep to myself.

Q: What has she against you?

A: She wants the state chief minister to be at her beck and call. She would like to throw me out. But I am not an Antulay or Anjaiah who sits or stands at her bidding. I am elected by my people and I am answerable to them. She thinks everyone has to play court to her. But I alone am not her target. She does not like any non-Congress(I) chief minister. She does not like the chief minister of West Bengal, nor that of Tamil Nadu. She said once that she would like the entire country to be ruled by the Congress(I). I cannot kowtow to her. And look what kind of advisers she has surrounded herself with. In any case, that is her business.

Q: Is there any attempt by Delhi to dilute Jammu and Kashmir's autonomy?

A: We have to be ever vigilant. There have been attempts which we have stalled. We are in the process of scrutinising all laws which have been extended to our state since August 1953, when our government was thrown out and Bakshi installed. Our accord of 1975 with Delhi gives us the right to reject or accept any law extended to our state after that time. Autonomy for all the states is necessary, this is the only way to keep the country together. Ours is a federal structure and the Constituent Assembly was very particular to give the states autonomy in their affairs. Today our example is being quoted by other states. There are demands in Punjab, Sikkim and Tamil Nadu for a Kashmir type status.



Ours is not a dynastic rule. He (Dr Farooq Abdullah) has an advantage. But he will have to come through a democratic process. In our state democracy has precedence, not a particular dynasty.

Religious organisations have little support in our state. There is no Hindu-Muslim problem here. We live like brothers.

Mrs Gandhi said sometime back that if the centre wanted it could make a state government fall in less than half an hour by stopping financial aid. This smacks of autocracy. The states draw funds not as a charity but as a matter of right. The Constitution has guaranteed them a share in central earnings. It does not behove a Prime Minister to hold out such threats.

Q: Recently there were instances of looting and burning of shops in Anantnag and Srinagar. Who were they and who was behind them?

A: A few students first picketed the four liquor shops in Anantnag for some days and then one day they beat up the people who were buying the liquor, ransacked the place and burnt the goods. It was spontaneous and, before the authorities could take any action, it was over. The incidents were not communal, the liquor shops happened to belong to Hindus. One liquor shop of the government was also ransacked. As regards the incidents in Srinagar, there was a call by King Khalid (of Saudi Arabia) for a hartal to protest against Israel's anti-Islamic activities. We should have ourselves given the call and held a protest meeting. But we did not get enough notice. Some students organised a procession and, as it happens in such situations, a few urchins took advantage of the opportunity and looted some shops. The administration luckily controlled the situation. One person was shot dead and 150 policemen suffered injuries. The action was swift and firm.

I do not think there was any organisation as such behind the students' doings. Some restive urchins got together and then a few spectators joined them. One should not read anything beyond that. Religious organisations have little support in our state. There is no Hindu-Muslim problem here. We live like brothers. However, one feels sad when the Prime Minister comes to the state and says that minorities are not safe in Kashmir.

Q: Would you say that in India, on the whole, communalism is increasing?

A: I do not know. My feeling is that economic considerations are coming to the fore. More and more riots are caused by economic rivalries, one community is dislodging the other and hence the clash. The administration's duty is to suppress it ruthlessly, as we

Here is how the GRS* makes the New Prestige the only totally safe pressure cooker

New Prestige

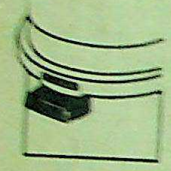
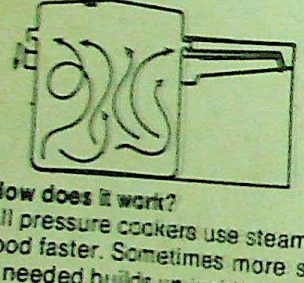
100% safe

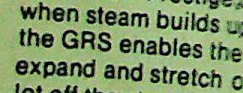


What is the GRS?
The Gasket Release System is a unique design innovation that makes pressure cooking as safe as boiling water. A slot in the lid over the rubber gasket provides a safe sure outlet for steam when it reaches dangerous levels.
The GRS makes the New Prestige the only totally safe pressure cooker.

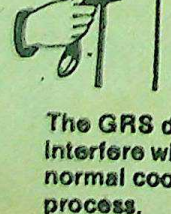


How does it work?
All pressure cookers use steam to cook food faster. Sometimes more steam than is needed builds up inside the cooker. Under normal conditions this is let off from the weight valve on the top. If this vent gets clogged with food it could lead to an eruption.

In the New Prestige on the rare occasion when steam builds up excessively, the GRS enables the rubber gasket to expand and stretch out of the slot and let off the steam downwards safely.



Why is the GRS essential?
When you replace a safety plug you may get a spurious one. This will not work in an emergency. Unfortunately you have no way of telling a genuine from a spurious safety plug. Why take a chance?
THE GRS NEVER FAILS TO WORK



The GRS does not interfere with the normal cooking process.

No, not at all. There is nothing to replace. All you do once the steam is let out is push the rubber gasket back into the slot with a spoon, clean the vent and use.

The cooker that even a child can handle — that's what the GRS makes the New Prestige.

do. Trouble which erupts in our state does not spread or last long because of our firmness. In many parts of our country this is not so. They allow things to deteriorate. But we must devote our attention to the basic problems of the people.

Q: What is the situation in Kishtiwar? Mr Venkatasubbaiah has submitted a report on the administration's excesses.

A: Who is Venkatasubbaiah? He did not have the courtesy to call on the Governor or me. He goes to the place and submits a report without even talking to us. I know that the centre wants to embarrass the state because we do not fall in line at their bidding. And he brings with him Mr Ghulam Nabi Azad who, I believe, got 110 votes in a Parliamentary election. Kishtiwar wants to become a district. We told the agitators that if we give their tehsil the status of a district, we will have to do the same to other tehsils because there too similar demands are being made. We have appointed a commission under the chairmanship of Justice Janki Nath to look into the matter. We shall abide by its decision if it says that Kishtiwar should be a district. But what pains me is the way the centre encourages agitations in Jammu and Kashmir just because we are a non-Congress(I) government. Take the case of our Chief Justice. He has been officiating for a few years. We have asked the centre many a time to tell us why he is not being confirmed and what is held against him. But we are not being taken into confidence.

Q: Why don't you play a bigger role in the country and join all-India politics?

A: Whom to join? The opposition is a divided house. They are all the time quarrelling among themselves as to who should be the Prime Minister. Some of them have no base but their ambition knows no bounds. The Congress(I) is no better except for the fact that they have a school master to chastise them. No, I am quite happy where I am and I have the satisfaction of serving my people in my own way.

Q: Is Dr Farooq, your son, succeeding you?

A: Ours is not a dynastic rule. He has an advantage. But he will have to come through a democratic process. In our state democracy has precedence, not a particular dynasty.

Q: One has heard that you may be going to the polls soon so that you finish the process before President Sanjiva Reddy lays down his office in July.

A: Why should I hold the elections now? We shall go to the polls in June next year when the six-year term, introduced during the Emergency, ends. What has the President's term got to do with our elections? If the centre tries to do anything, it would have to face a situation which it would regret.

Q: Why have you passed the resettlement bill which has evoked fears in the minds of non-Muslims in the state, particularly in Jammu?

A: Let me explain the bill to you. What it means is that those Kashmiris who went to Pakistan out of fear after March 1947 and partition, or could not return because of unsettled conditions, could come back after fulfilling the necessary conditions, one of which was a visa from New Delhi. We are committed to it under the Delhi agreement of 1948. These people are not from the Pakistani-occupied Kashmir but from Pakistan. The non-Hindus in the state have nothing to fear because they will not be uprooted. The houses or lands which they have been allotted are theirs, because they have been given the occupancy rights. I do not think many would come from the other side. Only 117 have returned since the partition. But under the law they continue to be Kashmiris and they can come to their country any time after fulfilling certain conditions.

"I am not a candidate"

"I am not a candidate. Let Dr Farooq Abdullah succeed Sheikh Sahib," Mr Gul Shah, minister for public works, who is number two in the Jammu and Kashmir cabinet, told me in reply to my question whether he was next in the line of succession.

Mr Gul Shah, who is considered a rival to Dr Farooq Abdullah, his brother-in-law, said that he had already written to Sheikh Sahib that no one after the age of 60 should be at the helm of affairs. "I am 62," he added. He did make an exception for three persons: Mrs Indira Gandhi, Sheikh Abdullah and Mr Morarji Desai. When I asked him "Why Morarji," Mr Gul Shah said, because "Mr Desai is personally honest and I do not care about Kanti, his son."

Birra: A brutal massacre

Armed landlords came in the dead of night to the harijan toli of Birra village of Gaya district, set fire to their huts and shot whoever came in their way. The toll was five dead. Reason: the harijans had dared to demand higher wages. SAUMITRA BANERJEE was at the spot within a day of the incident to piece together the story.

Photographs by KRISHNA MURARI KISHAN

It was a shrill cry that awoke Sarju Majhi. He was sleeping outside his hut in the harijan toli of Birra village (Mukhdhumpur police station, Gaya district). The time was around two am, the date 25 April. Rubbing his eyes he sat up on the mattress to find out what the noise was about. A short distance away he saw the hut of Bhagwan Majhi in flames. Thinking that the hut had caught fire accidentally he got up to help put it out. But even as he was proceeding towards Bhagwan's house he heard a sharp crack. The sound was unmistakable: it was gunfire. He stopped dead on his tracks. Instinctively he knew what was happening—the landlords of Birra and the surrounding villages of Bela and Bhagwanpur had attacked the helpless harijans. For the past several months the harijans of Birra had been threatened by the landlords for demanding more wages. They were told that they would be taught a lesson and Sarju now realised what that meant.

Turning around Sarju raced towards his house. He must flee, he thought, before the landlords caught up with him. But Sarju was too late. Just as he was rushing through the narrow door of his hut, four men armed with 12 bore guns emerged from the darkness and started chasing him. Sarju entered the hut to find his wife, Bhagia Devi, awake. She had seen the men chasing her husband and her first instinct was to save him. She rushed out of the hut and waving her arms wildly, screamed, "Don't kill my husband." She had barely taken a few steps when two bullets stopped her: one in the stomach and the other in the chest. She dropped to the ground dead. The men, whom Sarju later identified as Umesh Mahato, Baburam Mahato and Shambhu Mahato—all landowners from Bhagwanpur—then ran to another hut to look for another prey. Sarju Majhi took this opportunity to escape from the village to save his own life.

Sixty-five-year-old Bhatina Devi too faced the same fate as Sarju's wife. She had woken up hearing the cries of the people and had got up to find out what was happening. Not finding her son, Gariban Majhi, in the hut she had stepped out to see what the confusion was about. Seeing what was happening she ran into the hut, frightened. But by then she had been spotted and unable to run away like most of the other harijans, she silently waited for death.

But, perhaps, the most pathetic case was that of 14-year-old Rambhajan Majhi, Gariban's son. Rambhajan was sleeping in the hut adjoining his father's. Seeing the huts being set on fire and people running around with guns, he ran to warn his father of the danger. But before he could reach his father, he was cold-bloodedly shot dead. "He was one of the brightest boys in the village," Gariban told us.

The carnage lasted for about half an hour. At the end of this, three women—Bhatina Devi, Mahangi Devi, Bhagia Devi—and a young boy lay dead along with a number of injured. One of them a 12-year-old girl, Piyariya, succumbed to her injuries in the Patna Medical College Hospital two days later bringing the number of dead to five. A number of huts were burning when the killers left the village, having completed their brutal task. But by then the harijans had also fled, leaving a deserted and smouldering toli behind.

It was dusk when we reached the village, a day after the incident. (It had been a difficult ride. There is only one dirt track leading from Mukhdhumpur police station to Birra, a distance of about eight km. Our car, an Ambassador, had to stop a kilometre away from the village as it could not proceed any further.) By then most of the harijans had returned to the village but they were still terror-stricken. They were sitting silently in groups of about ten, huddled around a solitary kerosene lamp. "They may attack again," Chandradeo Das told us. "But even now there is nothing we can do to save ourselves." Obviously, the posse of CRP men posted in the village had not reassured them. In two of the huts mourning ceremonies were being held. There was a cluster of people outside each of these huts watching the rituals. The charred huts, a reminder of the carnage, were empty. Utensils had fallen to the floor among the ash. No one had bothered to pick them up.

Rajendra Mochi took us around a couple of burnt huts and told us how the attack took place: about 60 to 70 people (the police figure is around 30) silently surrounded the toli and started setting fire to the huts. As the harijans, like trapped animals, started rushing out the shooting began. It was indiscriminate: there were no fixed targets and there was no one in particular they wanted dead. Their only aim was to kill anyone they could train their guns on. As a result, old women, who could not make a fast getaway, became the victims. The harijans had to pay a costly price for having demanded more wages to fill their hungry stomachs.

Why had the harijans been mercilessly killed? The origins of this violence can be traced back to November 1981. In Birra, there are about 50 harijan families (kuanrs, bhuiyas, telis, dusads and mushahars). The majority of the landowners, however, are the koiris (a backward caste) and not the bhumihars, as is the case in the adjoining village of Bela. In Bhagwanpur, too, the caste and class composition is the same as in Birra. Most of the harijans of Birra worked in the fields of koiri and bhumihar landowners in Birra, Bela and Bhagwanpur, for a kg of wheat/paddy a day and the produce of five kathas of land at every harvest (halwahi). But unlike in most villages of Bihar, in Birra an attempt was being made to organise the harijans—in this case under Ishwar Mahato (a Naxalite leader according to the police) who came from the same area. He convinced the poor peasants that they should, rightfully, ask for more and finally last November the peasants of Birra refused to harvest the crops until the landlords agreed to pay them more. This, naturally, put the landlords in a fix. If the crops were not harvested on time, they would rot.

The harijans of Birra

'Naxalites responsible for carnage'

Ramashray Prasad Singh, Bihar's industry minister tells SUNDAY

Q: What led to the attack on the harijans?

A: It is very enigmatic. That is what we would also like to know.

Q: Was it because the harijans had demanded more wages?

A: That would be stretching things a bit too far. The dispute took place last year and it was amicably settled. There is no reason why the harijans should be attacked for this. Besides, there is another mystery. Those who have been killed are not from the houses that have been burnt. I think this was done to create terror and tension.

Q: If it was not the landlords who indulged in the carnage, then who do you think did it?

A: It is difficult to say who did it. But I think a third force is responsible for this.

Q: Like the Naxalites?

A: Yes, I think so. Since last year tension has been simmering in that area, but the Naxalites had been unable to capitalise on it. So they took recourse to this in order to create more tension between the landlords and the peasants.

Q: Do you have any particular leader in mind when you talk of the Naxalites?

A: I would not like to comment on this.

Q: How were you received by the harijans when you visited Birra?

A: I was received very cordially. The harijans took me around their huts, showed me all the spots where they had been attacked and spoke very sincerely to me.

Q: Some of the harijans I met in Birra told me that they thought that you favoured the bhumihars because you are a bhumihar yourself.

A: That is 100 per cent baseless. I am the people's representative and I especially look to the interests of the weaker sections of the people.

Q: Could this carnage have been avoided?

A: From what I gathered from the villagers and from officials of the area I think that the incident occurred so suddenly that it took everyone by surprise; no one had foreseen it. I am not aware if the harijans had, in the past, made complaints to the police.

Q: Have any steps been taken to see that an incident of this type does not recur?

A: I think the government has taken ample measures in this regard. A number of precautionary measures have been taken.

lords and the harijans failed and finally the labour department of the government of Bihar intervened and a compromise was reached: instead of one kg of wheat/paddy, the harijans would be given one and a half kg of wheat/paddy and the produce of eight kathas of halwahi land. (This, incidentally, speaks volumes for the labour department of the Bihar government: it is surprising that labour officials should suggest this solution when the minimum wages under the Bihar Minimum Wages Act for agricultural workers in Gaya stipulates that each worker be paid two and a half kg of wheat/paddy and be given 15 kathas of halwahi land.)

The harijans were happy with even this paltry increase; but not so the landlords. They were angry that harijans had had the audacity to demand more than what they got. It was around that time that the harijans started being threatened. As Bindeshwar Ram, a harijan who belongs to Birra told us: "They kept saying 'Tum log to dekh lenge (we will teach you a lesson,).' " But in spite of these threats, most of the landlords kept to the terms of the agreement and paid the workers their dues. However, there were exceptions: the few who refused to give the harijans their due of halwahi. And this is what led to the next conflict on 1 April this year and ultimately provoked the attack.

The rabi crops were ready for harvesting but once again a few landlords refused to give them their share of halwahi. The peasants then got together on 1 April and forcibly harvested some crop from Gopal Singh's fields in Bela and took it away. Said Mahadev Majhi: "We are poor and halwahi means a lot to us. Since the landlords were not willing to part with it we decided to take it on our own. Had the landlords not refused to give us our due we would never have done it." But this was the spark that ignited the simmering tension that had been building up since last November. The landlords felt threatened and in the early hours of 25 April they decided to teach the harijans a brutal lesson.

The government, however, has been peddling a different theory. Mr Ramashray Prasad Singh, Bihar's industry minister (his constituency is Mukhdhumpur and he reached the scene of the carnage within hours of the incident) in an obvious bid to give the entire incident a different colour has pinned the blame for this on the Naxalites (see interview). According to him, the harijans had been attacked not by the landlords but by a section of Naxalites who wanted to create tension between landlords and landless peasants so that they could capitalise on the situation. This explanation does seem a bit far fetched. But the government has been prompt in announcing ex-gratia payments of Rs 5,000 to the members of the deceased families and Rs 1,000 each to the injured persons. But will this heal the scars the incidents have left behind and make the harijans feel more secure?

SPECIAL REPORT

Carnage in Calcutta

In what must be the worst killings the city has seen since the pre-partition riots, heavily armed mobs beat up and burned members of the Ananda Marg in broad daylight on Calcutta's south-eastern fringe. The day's toll was 17; the immediate cause seemed to be the public's anger with the Margis whom they accuse of childlifting. BARUN GHOSH, who reached the spot even while the bodies were burning, reports on the gruesome tragedy.

When the residents of Calcutta woke up on Friday 30 April they could hardly imagine that it was going to be a day of shame for them. Between 6.45 am and 8 am armed mobs battered to death, mutilated and then set on fire 11 men and two women of the Ananda Marg at three spots along a one kilometre stretch of Ballygunge in south Calcutta right before hundreds of onlookers. At least ten others were injured—of whom four died later in hospital and six were battling for life till we went to press. The day's toll was 17 killed; nothing like this had ever happened before in Calcutta.

It all began at the Ballygunge station on Calcutta's south suburban railway at 6.45 am when a group of people chased and assaulted some Margis, including a woman, who were escorting a number of children along the station platform. "No sooner had two saffronclothed sadhus including a sanyasini (nun), disembarked from a local train, than the trouble started," says a bewildered 15-year-old Pagla, a street urchin who stays permanently on the Ballygunge station platform. "I saw more than ten young men, most of whom wore soiled shirts and trousers, dragging two sanyasis out of the platform. On the railway track they started beating them mercilessly." When a shopkeeper tried to intervene he was told to mind his own business. "If you interfere, we will kill you first," one of the assailants warned. As the shopkeeper withdrew, the assailants resumed beating their victims who cried for help till they were unconscious. But nobody went to their aid.

Leaving the Margis on the railway track, presumably thinking that they were dead (they were actually seriously injured) the youngmen—who were carrying sticks, iron rods, bamboo poles and cans of petrol—shifted to the Bijan Setu (a flyover spanning the railway tracks) some 200 yards away. At this stage a small Government Reserve Police contingent which had arrived at the spot took the bodies lying on the track to hospital. But they did not dare to proceed any further.

And on Bijan Setu, all hell broke loose. (The flyover is named after an engineer, Bijan Kumar Basu, who was killed in the late Seventies while trying to resist a gang of dacoits who had raided the coach in which he was travelling). "It was at around 7.10 am that some ten young men came running on to the bridge and intercepted two taxis," says Subhankar Das, who has a *pan*shop close to the bridge. From his account it appears that having stopped the taxis, the assailants dragged out the occupants, all of whom were Margis, and started beating them with rods and bamboo poles. When the victims fell to the ground they were showered upon with bricks and stones. Then they were doused with petrol from the cans the assailants carried and set on fire. The faces were set on fire first, presumably to make identification of the victims more difficult. By that time a small police party had reached the place and fired three rounds to scare away the murderers. But it failed to achieve any results and the police retreated seeing the menacing mood of the assailants.

Now over 3,000 people were watching the macabre drama being enacted. The police, however, managed to rescue one of the victims who was later sent to hospital. In the confusion some local residents saved another—Doyamoy Brahmachari (22). He was taken to a nearby house, helped to change into ordinary clothes from his saffron robes and taken to the Kasba police station—some 200 yards away from the scene of violence.

Doyamoy told the police at Kasba thana that he was from the Simla ashram of the Ananda Marg and had come to attend a convention of the Margis at the Tiljala headquarters beginning on that day. He and eleven other Margis who stayed overnight at the Marg's regional centre further south at Jodhpur Park (where Anandamurtiji, their leader, has been staying for some time), were travelling in two taxis towards Tiljala. When the taxis reached Bijan Setu, the taxi drivers told the occupants that they had taken a wrong turn. But barely had the drivers changed direction, when a group of armed people surrounded the taxis. First they pelted stones at them. Then when the taxis stopped they dragged out the occupants and virtually lynched them. Doyamoy was in the second taxi.

When this correspondent reached the spot at around 8.10 am he saw eight bodies scattered all over the bridge, their eyes gouged and their skulls smashed. The bodies were badly charred with smoke still curling up. One more body, burnt and mutilated, was lying under the bridge—apparently, it had been thrown from the bridge. Ten minutes later, inspector general of police Satyabrata Basu, city police commissioner Nirupam Som, SP 24 Parganas Sadananda Chakrabarty and some two dozen senior police officials arrived. But by then the damage had been done.

Just as one armed mob was beating up the Margis on Bijan Setu another group had intercepted three taxis carrying 11 Margis at Talbagan near the Bondel railway level crossing, half a kilometre from Bijan Setu on the same railway line. The Margis had hired the taxis at Howrah station and were proceeding to Tiljala by the only other approach road. In a repetition of what was happening on Bijan Setu, the mob stopped the taxis by pelting stones, dragged out their occupants, beat them up with rods and bamboo poles, poured petrol on them and set them on fire. Four of them died, burnt beyond recognition. Others were luckier: with gaping wounds and severe burns they could be rescued by the police in the nick of time. Recalling the incident, one of the survivors, Miss Jayashree Bhattacharya, 16, a student from the Ananda Marg's school in Purulia, says: "They were all over the place chanting 'burn them, burn them'. They even ripped off the robes of the sanyasinis (nuns). There was blood all over the place. I thought I'd die."

Earlier, two women Margis travelling by a rickshaw with a child, were intercepted thrice in the vicinity of Bijan Setu and were threatened. But fortunately nothing serious happened to them. Says IG Satyabrata Basu: "Nothing like this has ever happened before in Calcutta."

The immediate cause of the mob fury seems to be the rumours about childlifters that had been circulating in the area since some local residents intercepted on Bijan Setu two sanyasinis of the Ananda Marg travelling in a rickshaw with two children two days earlier. The sanyasinis, later identified as Papiya Moitra and Juthika Ghosh, both from the Ananda Marg's centre in Purulia, were then taken to the Kasba police station. They claimed that the children accompanying them were the inmates of one of the Marg's 1,000 orphanages. The police, however, were not convinced and held them in custody.

Who could the killers be? Their deed cannot be explained away solely as a manifestation of mob frenzy against childlifters. The murderers were far too well organised with sticks, iron rods, bamboo poles and cans of petrol. And they struck almost simultaneously at three different places. The rumour that childlifters were on the prowl had of course gripped the area, where the massacres took place, for the last few days. But there hardly was any provocation for ordinary citizens to turn killers. The brutality clearly bore the stamp of professional hands. The killers apparently knew of the Margi convention at Tiljala and had placed themselves at both the approaches to the ashram to intercept the incoming Margis.

The first reaction of the Margis was to blame the CPI(M) for the murders. The reason, of course, is that relations between the Margis and the CPI(M) are very strained. Once earlier a group of Margis tried to break into the CPI(M) state headquarters in Calcutta and, according to the CPI(M) leaders, if the Margis had succeeded they would have killed some of the top men in the party. Later, Margis claimed that some CPI(M) activists tried to assassinate their guru Anandamurtiji now camping in Calcutta. Inspite of this bitterness, it does not sound very probable that the CPI(M) would go after the blood of the Margis, especially with the Assembly election just over a fortnight away. Indeed it was the CPI(M) which had earlier turned down a suggestion from the centre that the Ananda Marg organisation be banned.

If it is not the CPI(M), who else could have killed the Margis? One opinion holds that the massacre might be the result of internecine quarrels in the Ananda Marg itself. The head of the Margis, Anandamurtiji, jealously guards the secrets of his organisation and is very severe with those who break away from it. On the other hand those who had broken away could have decided on a pre-emptive strike.

Yet another view is that the crime is the handiwork of the Congress(I) or one of the many central intelligence agencies operating in West Bengal. These sections argue that Mrs Gandhi, having failed so far to either impose President's rule in West Bengal or postpone the Assembly elections, was taking one last chance to create chaos and finally have her way.

But whatever may be the motives or the identity of the killers, one stark fact stares the people of West Bengal in the face. They now have to share the shame of many other areas of the country which have seen brutal massacres in the last few years. And in terms of brutality the massacre of the Margis sets a new and horrifying record.

Is religion still the "sigh of the oppressed creature?"

Fifth Column

TARIQ ALI

We are confronted today with a great paradox: on the one hand science and technology have soared to unimagined heights in almost every field of endeavour. On the other there is a new type of religious revivalism which is gaining ground and has already assumed a political shape in three worlds: the West, eastern Europe and the Third World. Man has reached the moon. Space rockets have circled some of the planets. They have beamed back their discoveries and we have watched in silent awe on our television screens. This year is the centenary of Darwin's death. What supreme irony that it is celebrated in the United States by an almost successful attempt to ban his teachings from schools. This is spearheaded by a movement known as the creationists, who want the world's most technologically advanced country to return to the primitive Biblical absurdities of the Book of Genesis.

"Religion," wrote Marx, "is the sigh of the oppressed creature, the heart of a heartless world and the soul of soulless conditions." This is certainly true in its essentials. We can describe the Catholicism of the El Salvadorean peasant or the Islam of the factory worker in Lahore within the old framework. There is, however, a newer and more sinister aspect. Is the "born-again Christian" in the United States with his two cars, wallet full of credit cards and his house in the country an "oppressed creature?" Clearly not. Are the hordes of Anglo-American youths searching for nirvana by attaching themselves to south Asian mystics the same as the Latin American toilers? I have nothing against a bunch of old rogues setting out from south Asia and using their mumbo-jumbo to make money. Why not? After all the European missionaries of old, who landed on alien shores did not merely "liberate souls." They also deprived their victims of all their worldly possessions.

The revival of religio-political intervention has taken three forms. In the United States the so-called moral majority played a very significant role in ensuring Reagan's election victory. The absence of a political party based on the working class (itself a reflection of the backwardness of the American workers) made such a response to commercially organised religion inevitable. There was no alternative pull from any direction.

In Poland, the Roman Catholic church expressed the hopes of a people deceived for three decades by the promises of a party calling itself "communist." The Polish Pope turned out to be a useful acquisition for those who wish to uphold the status quo on a global scale. His main function has been to preach restraint to the oppressed. This ideological offensive is, of course, based on strong material interests. The church has its own bank, it invests money in safe countries such as South Africa and is one of the largest owners of property in the world. The Italian Communist Party refuses even to withdraw Italy from NATO if it ever wins power. It is hardly likely to nationalise the assets accumulated over centuries by Papal oppression.

Iran offers us the horrifying picture of a primitive confessionalism in full swing. We all celebrated (and rightly so) the fall of the Pahlavi dynasty and its network of torture. Few, if any, thought that a despotic monarch would be replaced by a religious autocracy. We tended to ignore or gravely underestimate the ideological hold of religion. We used to quote from Khomeini's tract on Islamic government. Could an old cleric who dealt with such burning issues as the buggery of an old donkey by a poor Muslim really run the country? He has done so now for three years. The conditions of donkeys may well have improved but everyone else have improved but everyone else appears to be suffering. The Iranian people lost 60,000 lives in order to overthrow the Shah. Their reward so far has been a medieval religious monstrosity, 70 per cent inflation, four million unemployed. If you drink beer you can be whipped in public. If you are a woman you are not allowed to bathe at beaches reserved for men (and this in Iran), if you are addicted to drugs you can be lined up against a wall and shot dead, if you are a Kurd or a Turcoman or a Baluch and you insist on your rights you can be confronted by a bloodthirsty Ayatollah Khalkhali and a firing squad.

We know all this is happening, but many on the left remain silent and in Iran the pro-Moscow Tudeh Party supports Khomeini. They, too, will be at the receiving end of the Islamic whip despite their support. Khomeini's cadres gained control of the movement by utilising the failures of Arab nationalism and communism. Egypt and Kampuchea were the examples most frequently used by the clerics to damage and weaken the left. The battle is not yet over. The bazaar petty-bourgeoisie who once idolised Khomeini and imagined they had found a cure, are now disgusted by the irrationality of what is taking place. They wait patiently for the coup d'etat, the workers find themselves under constant surveillance by the Islamic watchdogs in their factories. The mood is one of growing bitterness accompanied by resignation. The army is strong after its successes on the Iran-Iraq front. Its generals are being actively courted by the CIA. Whatever else happens after Khomeini we would venture to predict that there will not be a return to Islamic archaism.

In an age where few political leaders are prepared to swim against the stream, it is worth ending with a quotation from that staunch secularist, Jawaharlal Nehru, whose words remain as apposite today as when he first wrote his autobiography, that in itself should provide room for thought by those who have succeeded him: "The spectacle of what is called religion, or at any rate, organised religion, in India and elsewhere has filled me with horror and I have frequently condemned it and wished to make a clear sweep of it. Almost always it seems to stand for blind belief, reaction, dogma and bigotry, superstition and exploitation and the preservation of vested interests, and yet I know well that there was something else in it, something which supplied a deep inner craving of human beings, how else could it have the tremendous power it has been...I realised the hold it had on such large numbers of people. It (Catholicism) offered, as Islam and Hinduism, a safe anchorage from doubt and mental conflict, an assurance of a future life which will make up for the deficiencies of this life. I am afraid it is impossible for me to seek harbours in this way. I prefer that open sea, with all its storms and tempests. Nor am I greatly interested in the after life, in what happens after death. I find the problems of this life sufficiently absorbing to fill my mind..."

SPECIAL REPORT

Operation Kunj Bihari

The outlawed Peoples Liberation Army chairman, Th Kunj Bihari, who had taken over the PLA after the arrest of the charismatic leader, N. Biseshwar Singh, was killed in a recent army operation in Kadampokpi on the outskirts of Imphal. TIRTHANKAR GHOSH visited Imphal for this on-the-spot report

Th Kunj Bihari

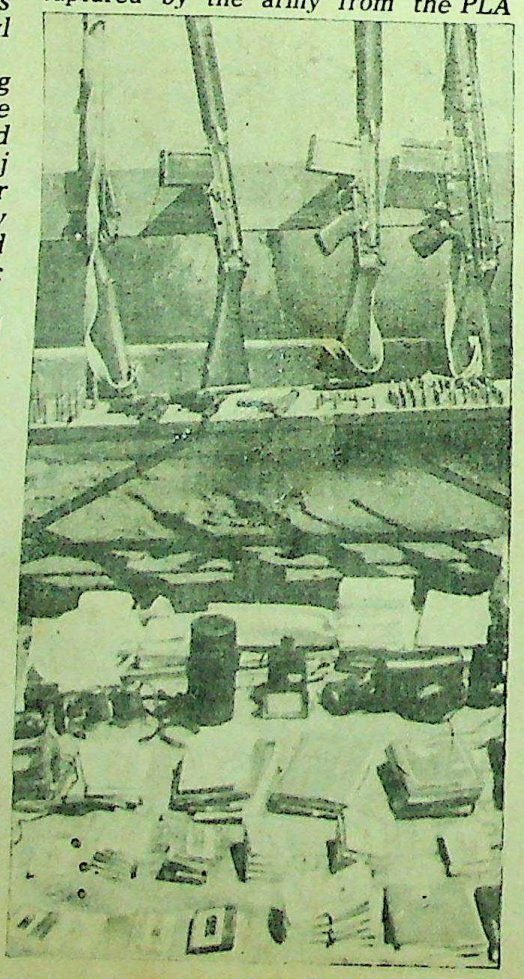
"Kunj Bihari, your time is up." Pointing his stick at the lean Manipuri youth, Brigadier Som Jhingon, commander of the Phantom Brigade in Imphal cannot help taking pleasure in the words he has just uttered. The Brigadier cannot believe his own eyes: before him stands the outlawed Peoples Liberation Army (PLA) chairman, Th Kunj Bihari, who had been eluding the army for the last ten months. Suddenly, the Brigadier awakes with a start. "I shouldn't be dreaming such nonsense," he mutters, shaking his head. His eyes fall on his bedside table clock. It is only 4.30 in the morning and the beginning of another day: 13 April 1982. It will be another day of strategy and planning; another day of war against insurgents like the PLA in an apparently peaceful Manipur.

At the security conference meeting with the state government officials the day before, the Brigadier had confided in others of his hunches about Kunj Bihari. "He is coming closer into our hands. We should be getting him any moment now," the Brigadier had promised. Did he have any specific intelligence, the others had asked. No, the Phantoms' commander could feel it in his bones. "My men and I live insurgency day in and day out. We should know..."

"Target One-zero," says the voice identifying himself on the phone at 6.55 am on the morning of 13 April. "Yes?" answers Phantoms' Brigade-Major Virender Saxena, sensing the excitement in the voice of his source reporting movements of PLA extremists around Imphal. PLA insurgents have been camping for the last two days in Kadampokpi Khunao village, says One-zero. Even before the conversation can end, the major slams the phone down and runs to his commander, Brig. Jhingon, with the news. Together they locate the oval-shaped village, 10 km south of Imphal. There should be no delay in contacting the enemy. The army unit nearest to the village, Lt Col Pinaki Basu's 14 Bihar Regiment, one of the youngest regiments in the Indian army, would be used for the operation.

Lt Col Basu had just finished his PT and was sitting in the sun outside his hut. At 7.02 his telephone jangled. It was commander Jhingon with a short, precise order: "Prepare two columns to move out immediately." Where to, asked Lt Col Basu. "We will let you know soon," said the commander. Within a minute, Major Saxena was on the line with detailed instructions:

Guns, cassettes and a camera captured by the army from the PLA



"Proceed to Kadampokpi. Cordon the village and engage the enemy. Extremists believed to be hiding there!"

Only one route was open to the short, stocky Lt Col. He had to reach his destination in double-quick time; PLA members never stay in one place for more than a couple of days. For all he knew, the extremists might just then be moving out of the village. The shortest route to the village was by the Bishenpur road. Lt Col chose his men with care: they would have to live up to the Phantom Brigade motto: "What devil dares." His men, meanwhile, said a silent prayer of thanks: the weather was good, the terrain wellknown to the regiment (the men had patrolled the area many times). All that they wanted was luck, the soldier's best friend. With that they moved out of the base—their base, an old discarded airstrip, better known as the Tulihal airfield.

Parking their vehicles in an open space on the outskirts of the village, Lt Col Basu gave instructions to his Major, O. P. Deswal, to cordon the village. By 8.00, the Biharis (as the Bihar Regiment men are known to their army colleagues) had formed a cordon and were closing in on the village. The men had to be vigilant, for all around the village, almost like a hedge surrounding a compound were clumps of bamboos, impenetrable in most places. Within were clusters of huts around pokhries (little ponds). This is an ideal guerrilla country for the insurgents as it is easy to give the army the slip by moving about from one cluster of houses to another—while the armymen search one group of huts, the rebels can escape from the others.

Four groups were formed to flush out the rebels from within the cordon. Young, turbaned, about-to-be-married Capt. Ajit Singh was ordered to lead his assault team from the west. Little did he realise that his group would have to bear the brunt of the PLA "suicide squad" whose members engage the enemy in battle so that the leader can make good his escape.

The double-storied house where the PLA insurgents were hiding and (right) Maj-Gen Nayar directing operations

Crouching low, moving forward on his knees through the watery paddy fields, Capt. Singh thought he saw a glint of a rifle barrel in the window of a double-storeyed house to his left. Before he could figure out what it was, bullets whizzed past Capt. Singh and his men. Almost from nowhere emerged a lone Manipuri in T-shirt and jeans, firing from his SLR rifle. He took a shot at the young army captain and got him in the head. But before Capt. Singh lost consciousness, the Manipuri was wounded by him—he had taken aim dazedly at the running figure, and fired a volley of bullets. The youth could not go far: he was caught by those manning the cordon. The men in the assault team, meanwhile, tried to drag Capt. Singh's body to safety but they could not do so since the PLA, from their vantage position on top of the house, kept up a steady barrage of bullets around the body.

But Subedar Ramdhari Tiwari was determined to extricate his captain's body. Rising, Tiwari rushed forward in the direction of the house. Before he could reach the house, he saw a youth in shorts coming out with his hands raised in surrender. Tiwari moved forward to arrest him. Suddenly, the sound of a bullet cracked the silence and Subedar Tiwari fell dead, shot at almost point-blank range from an extremist hiding in the house. The surrender drama was a ruse and it had achieved its purpose: an armyman had been killed.

When Lt Col Basu was informed of the casualties (which he in turn relayed to his headquarters), he decided to clear the house of the extremists. He ordered his men to surround the house. Cornered now, two more rebels came out shooting their guns. But they were soon captured and taken to an interrogation centre set up in a shed opposite the double-storeyed house.

At the headquarters, Brigadier Jhingon was getting worried. He felt it his duty to be beside his men but before he moved out he ordered two columns of another regiment—the Rajputana Rifles—under Col Yash Bhatia, stationed about 10 km away from Kadampokpi village to move to the encounter site. Brig. Jhingon added that he would be on the spot to direct operations.

Soon after, the Brigadier contacted the GOC (Nagaland and Manipur), Major-General V. K. Nayar, at his headquarters in Zokhama, 40 minutes by helicopter from Imphal. Could the General send his chopper to Tulihal airstrip for ferrying a few casualties to the army hospital at Zokhama, the Brigadier asked. "Yes and I am coming myself with the chopper," said the Major-General.

The Brigadier pulled on his black driving gloves, picked up his stick and drove out of his headquarters in his Jonga with the siren blaring and red light flashing. He was in Kadampokpi by 8.30. As he got down from his Jonga he was a little troubled as he heard no firing: Had the insurgents escaped the cordon? With that disturbing thought the Brigadier was taken to the interrogation centre. Stunned, he heard that the PLA members were from the headquarters unit (a mobile unit, while the 17 others around Imphal are stationary ones). There were nine more members who had been camping in the village for the last two days.

His men were on to something big because the PLA members would not reveal the names of their leaders. Among the armymen, the excitement was mounting. The insurgents had moved out from the double-storeyed house to somewhere in the east in the village. Accordingly, the Brigadier asked Col Bhatia to strengthen the Bihari cordon in the east. It was around 10 and the GOC himself arrived at Kadampokpi—perhaps the first ever occasion when the topmost commanding officer was present to take charge of a counter-insurgency operation himself. Seeing the Maj-Gen. in person, the jawans were emboldened: there was no question of giving up now.

Neither had the PLA given up hope. One even tried to escape through the dragnet, firing his way out. Once again one of the Biharis bore the brunt: Sepoy Yadunath Prasad was shot dead by a bullet from the PLA extremist's gun. Suddenly, the advance combing party with Col Bhatia and the Brigadier was stopped by bullets from a cluster of huts in the east, where the insurgents had withdrawn. Once again there were the impenetrable groves of tall bamboos. But that was overcome by the armymen. They hacked a path through the dense growth and positioned themselves at about 250 yards from the huts.

With all the resources at its command, the army could have bombarded the village houses but that would have meant loss of life and property. It would be good for both sides if the extremists surrendered. So, during a brief lull in the firing, Col Bhatia shouted in English (for most PLA extremists understand English): "You are surrounded on all sides. Romeo, Lemba and Raghumani have been arrested. Surrender and no harm will come to you. I will count up to ten. Before that you must come out. One..." The countdown started. Before he could shout five, there was a volley of bullets from the huts. So it was going to be war, thought the Brigadier. Col Bhatia, however, ignored the firing and continued to count till ten. As the counting ended there was another round of firing again.

Unable to pinpoint where the firing was coming from, Col Bhatia ordered Naik Subedar Umaid Singh to run across the PLA line of fire. When Singh did that, a PLA member took aim from a window of the hut. Captain Rathore who was among the bamboos with the colonel had been waiting for this opportunity: he took careful aim and shot the PLA man from about 100 yards. The insurgent tumbled out of the hut window and fell between the hut wall and the armymen.

Despite this casualty, the PLA were in no mood to surrender. It was a fight to the finish. The only way of flushing the extremists out of the huts would be to set the huts on fire. A piece of cloth was found, ignited and thrown onto the thatched roof. In minutes the huts were ablaze. Still, the PLA men kept up the steady barrage of bullets.

The army, on the other side, were up against a problem. Recalled an eyewitness: "On one side there was the fire and the bullets. On the other, the women and children, the inhabitants of the huts, were crying and beating their breasts telling the army officers to save their lives and cattle." The army controlled the fire, evacuated the other civilians and kept up the fire against the insurgents. After about 20 minutes the roof of one of the burning huts collapsed. With that, the stray firing from the insurgents died down. There had been nine in the huts but only seven bodies were recovered. It was only the next morning that the charred bones of the remaining two were found.

Was this the headquarters unit of the PLA, the Brigadier wanted to know. Seconds before the fire could reach the lower portion of the huts, the body of the man shot down by Captain Rathore was dragged out. The Brigadier had not paid much attention to it although the face of the corpse struck him as familiar. Army intelligence men were called. "That's Kunj Bihari," they said without hesitation. But the Brigadier still had his doubts. PLA informers, swathed in women's burkhas saw the body. "Is that Raghu?" asked Brig. Jhingon, mentioning Kunj Bihari's alias. "Yes. That's Raghu, the PLA leader," the informers replied in Manipuri.

It was 12.30 in the afternoon. The end of another successful operation against the PLA by the Indian army. In the evening after all the mopping operations had been completed, the Brigadier and the Major-General took a long trip to a temple to offer prayers.

The future of the PLA

The official agencies and insurgency-watchers in Manipur have taken note of two incidents that occured soon after the death of Thoudam Kunj Bihari, 35-year-old, chairman of the guerrilla outfit, the Peoples Liberation Army (PLA). When Kunj Bihari's body was handed over to his carpenter father at his residence at Singjamei on the outskirts of Imphal next day in the evening, the youth of the locality spontaneously took out a mourning procession with the rebel leader's body. On 17 April, some PLA members still dazed by the Kadampokpi killings, secretly at a conclave at Thoubal, a village on the south of Imphal, named Khaidem Manikanta, a 25-year-old college dropout as Kunj Bihari's successor to lead the PLA. Manikanta is also a resident of Singjamei, said to be a nursery of the state's varied and disjointed insurgent groups.

While the first incident suggests that there is still lurking sympathy of the locals for the PLA, the second is an apparent indication of the PLA's desperate moves to recover from the recent reverses, specially the one they suffered at Kadampokpi where nine of their frontliners were wiped out in the four-hour army operation. In fact, the PLA had been suffering reverses for the past 12 months. Its founder and fabled hero, Biseshwar Singh, was captured by the army at Tekcham on 6 July 1981 and is now in Naini jail, UP. Before that, the number two man in the PLA hierarchy, Chorom Ranjit, was arrested. The Tekcham shootout accounted for seven of the PLA's top brass. Then came the Kadampokpi operations.

Do these setbacks signal the beginning of the end of the PLA? A lot depends on how Manikanta, the new Ojha (or teacher), trains the remnants of the PLA numbering about 250 men and steers this Maoist organisation along a proper course. Manikanta, who has read upto BA in Manipur College at Singjamei, was drafted into the PLA by Kunj Bihari in late 1978. He will have to curb the growing infighting in the setup. After Biseshwar's death, a third year dropout of Bombay IIT, Chongthom Bedamani, challenged the leadership of Kunj Bihari in August 1981. He was shot dead by unknown assailants at Imphal's Uripok area immediately after that. At present, Thanjam Subhas alias Chothe, a PLA activist within the fold is one who put up a fight against the leadership of Kunj Bihari. The guerrilla leadership is angry with Subhas as he is said to be responsible for the rape of a PLA sympathiser, Sorjubala, in March 1981. According to underground sources at Imphal, on 29 March 1982 five PLA members signed a no-confidence motion against Kunj Bihari according to an entry in a PLA diary retrieved at Kadampokpi. After the Kadampokpi shootout it is certain that the PLA is now a broken organisation. The "exploited peasants" for whom the PLA launched its Maoist liberation struggle are cool to its rhetoric. It is said that Manikanta does not have much of an ideological base and doubts are being expressed that he can hold together the PLA on the lofty ideals of Biseshwar. Said an editor of an Imphal newspaper, "Ambushes and arms-snatching are poor substitutes for mass political education." The dissidence within the PLA and its failure to politicise the peasants came as a boon to the army. The field workers of the army intelligence unit could infiltrate easily into the rebel ranks.

Central America: another Vietnam?

OF WAR AND PEACE

Lt Gen. E. A. VAS (Retd)

After decades of US paternalism, the people of Central America are struggling to come into their own. As and when they do, US hegemony, traditionally exercised through narrowly-based regimes, is inevitably challenged. The US could adopt two broad strategies to deal with this situation: support popular egalitarian movements (not all necessarily communist-led or controlled) and help them to develop democratic principles, even if this means undermining private US financial interests in the region; or, fight violence with violence, instal military governments and then help to anchor them to democratic principles. The US has chosen the second course.

Militarily, the President of USA will avoid the use of American troops, by conducting operations which will be made to look like an internal upheaval so that the US can keep up the pressure on the USSR, on Poland and Afghanistan without being accused of double standards. Therefore, in the 1982 budget, President Reagan has proposed to spend a deceptively modest 26 million dollars on military aid for El Salvador and 10 million dollars for Honduras; these are small totals compared to budgets for West Asia or Africa. To help the juntas cope with their balance of payment problems, the International American Development Bank and the World Bank are being encouraged to increase lending which US representatives had opposed during the Carter period. But the President's approval of a secret CIA plan for clandestine operations to topple the Sandinista government in Nicaragua indicates that the US is embarking on a policy of active interventionism.

The US para-military plan will probably be launched in two phases. First, the use in El Salvador of surrogates—Chilean flyers for Salvador's proposed A-37 bomber fleet, Argentine infantry and Nicaraguan exiles to back up the CIA "dirty-tricks" department. In Phase II, the administration hints at escalating military action. They propose to mine the sea-approaches to Cuba and Nicaragua and to launch para-military attacks on Nicaragua with Argentine assistance. They also propose to raise an Inter-American Peace-keeping Force. The mining of seas off Cuba and Nicaragua might create conditions for a confrontation in which Cuban ships "fire" on US vessels—an event which is guaranteed to evoke public support. Alarmed Americans are openly asking whether El Salvador is going to be another Vietnam. The question reflects a mixture of popular fears: Will US aid and possibly military involvement defeat the rebels or plunge the country into a "no-win" morass? Will this be another immoral intervention, another drain on resources and young lives with painful scars on the social fabric?

Admittedly, the US has more important strategic interest in Central America than it had in Indo-China. But despite this crucial difference, the scenarios advanced for increasing military action, tend to sound like the talk heard in the Vietnam build-up years. US officials argue that if the insurgents win in El Salvador, it will lead to the overthrow of regimes in Guatemala and Honduras, and could endanger Panama and spread insurrection throughout the hemisphere. Thus, tiny El Salvador is portrayed as a crucial bridge-head to vast US strategic interests, as Vietnam was said to be the defence-line against the peril of Communist China.

Another glaring resemblance to South Vietnam is the Salvadorean regime's failure to meet urgent social needs, thereby giving cause for desperate revolutionaries. The White House argues that reforms have been launched; their limited effectiveness is due to disruption by guerrillas who want to polarise feelings to the extreme right and left. But balanced observers doubt the junta's capacity to push peaceful reforms. When the US overthows a revolutionary government for economic consideration or out of anti-communist paranoia, the local people pay a heavy price for Washington's victory. Good men and popular leaders are forced into exile and in their stead, is imposed not a moderate government but the only possible alternative, a government of the extreme right made brutal by corrupt officers with a limited vision of nationhood.

Another similarity is the role of the church. The Salvadorean Christian hierarchy, like the leading Vietnamese Buddhist officials during their war, wants to find ways to end the killing. Therefore, it urges a compromise that would inevitably give the rebels a share of government power. The White House is convinced, as it was in Vietnam, that such a compromise would lead to total communist domination. Foreign opinion about US involvement is also developing adversely as it did during the Vietnam War, and precisely because of that precedent. The non-aligned nations are asking: What is the difference between El Salvador, Poland or Afghanistan? They conclude that the two superpowers are an equal danger to peace.

But there are also vital differences and El Salvador is not Vietnam. US supply lines to Central America are short and easy. Insurgents in El Salvador do not have a sanctuary as a base; the neighbouring governments of Honduras and Guatemala are hostile. The nearest friendly regime to the guerrillas is Nicaragua which has no land border with El Salvador. Pulling out of Vietnam was costly to the US in many ways, but it is unthinkable that the US will pull out of Central America; this is the real difference. If the two-phase para-military plan fails, the US will commit its regular troops, even though it would be dangerous for the administration to do so.

There is a rule about blood in US politics: support for the President rises when the nation goes to war, but falls as soon as Americans die on the battlefield. So, the administration's alliance with Latin American juntas, though visibly fragile, cannot be halted by Congressional or public opinion unless soldiers (not American nuns, rural experts, journalists or even CIA agents) die. The Reagan administration is, therefore, making every effort to persuade US legislators and the public that a failure to beat back communist advances in Central America will threaten America's vital interests. Survival of the White House after 1984, which is by no means a certainty, may largely depend on how things go in Central America.

Gujral: speed at any cost

SPECIAL REPORT

Was 'Gujral factor' responsible for the Agra accident?

The enquiry report points in that direction, says MADHU JAIN

Was Mr M.S. Gujral, the controversial chairman of the railway board, responsible for the ghastly train accident at dawn in the Agra station yard on 27 January this year—an accident in which 63 people were killed and 27 were injured? Nobody is saying so openly. But the rumblings within the railways are growing louder. Even if the chairman didn't exactly have his foot on the accelerator, he was, according to some, responsible for this accident. It was not providence but the human factor which made all those people lose their lives.

The real question is, what is this "Gujral factor" which makes trains run on time, delivers more goods to more places, but in the process kills some people too? The Gujral factor is, in fact, the inordinate emphasis on speed for goods trains, an emphasis which sometimes makes people throw caution to the winds. The inquiry by the chief commissioner of railway safety reveals that the divisional operating superintendent of Jhansi had issued local instructions that the yards could start the trains without consulting the section controllers. This way the diesel locos need not be detained in the yards.

The chairman's expected arrival in Agra on the morning of the accident threw things—inadvertently one must add—out of gear. Thus, central railway officials were feverishly busy that morning getting the Agra yard cleared before all the big bosses arrived.

One of the puzzling aspects of this horrendous accident is the fact that the station master of Agra Cantt station gave the "line clear" for the express at 3.20 am—nearly 53 minutes before the expected arrival of the train. Normally, trains are cleared only ten to 15 minutes before the scheduled time. This proves the fact that until that time, there were no plans to start the goods train which would cross the path of the express train. Obviously, somebody changed his mind later— at precisely 3.43 am, it is reliably learned. (The collision took place at 4.13 am.) As the path of the goods train was to cut across that of the Dakshin Express at two points, a certain number of signalling manoeuvres needed to be carried out—moves which would entail a delay of nearly 20 minutes before the goods train could have cleared the last "trailing point." This, despite the fact that the Agra yard master had issued the "starting permit" for the goods train at 3.50 am.

The Agra disaster could also have been avoided—even if the driver had crossed a signal at danger, which is quite unlikely according to some railway officials—if the staff at the Agra station had fixed fog signals on the tracks to warn the driver of the express train about the approaching signals. Furthermore, if the cabin staff had reversed the points of the cross-over connecting the goods yard to the down line after sighting the approaching express, the express train would have just split open the points of this cross-over and proceeded to the station. It would have damaged the points but those 63 people would have been alive today. Says one railwayman "The chairman's guilty conscience prompted him to make a hasty statement to the press on his return from the accident site to Delhi (saying) that the driver was responsible for this accident and that the fog at Agra was not thick enough to justify the use of fog signals... He had no right to do this before an inquiry..." Some people even believe that the shock of such an accusation precipitated the driver Budhu Lal's death three days after the accident.

There is, however, a discrepancy regarding the exact time when the Dakshin Express passed the previous station, Bhandai. It is understood that Bhandai showed the train to have run through at 4.03 am. The cabin received the 'train approaching signal' at 4.05 am but—possibly due to the delay in relaying the information—Budhu Lal's log book appears to show an entry of 4.07 am. These figures are very vital since it is generally agreed that the engine's speedometer is not a reliable instrument for estimating the speed of a train. In this case, however, the speed chart stopped at 70 km per hour at the time of the impact.

If the entries at Bhandai station are accepted to be correct, and the distance between Bhandai station and Agra Cantt station being 11 km which the train covered in ten minutes, then the average speed works out to 66 km per hour. The maximum permissible speed is 100 km per hour. Going by Agra 'A' cabin timings it would work out to 87 km per hour. But if it is argued that the driver's log book was more accurate, the average shoots up to 110 km per hour. This is not possible because it is unlikely that the driver would suddenly pick up speed when he had a scheduled halt. It is possible that the driver's watch showed different timings.

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Another significant discovery is the fact that the train's guard, Shri Husia, did not fill any station-to-station timings in his log book from Jhansi—this is a gross dereliction of duty since there is now no way of cross-checking either the driver's or the station master's entries.

The goods cabin incharge and the yard master now claim that when they saw the Dakshin Express approaching they tried to reset the track for the express towards the station, but it was too late. Was it their intention to let the train collide into anything standing on the passenger platform? Since the goods yard track was connected to the path of the express, the train veered towards the goods yard instead of carrying on straight towards the Agra Cantt station—resulting in the head-on collision.

There is yet another possibility which may have led to the accident. Since the signal for line clear had been given nearly 53 minutes earlier, it is suspected that the goods cabin staff might have thought that the Dakshin Express had already gone past. Consequently, they took their time to clear the goods train. The railway signals round Agra, which are still kerosene-lit, have often been criticised by the drivers, but little has been done to improve matters. When it is being claimed that visibility was poor because of the fog, why did the station master, Agra Cantt, not place fog signals before the outer signal, as per station working rules? That morning, the entire north Indian region was covered with a dense fog until noon. The detonators attached to the railway line burst whenever an engine goes over them—warning the driver that he is nearing a station signal. Mr Gujral's coverup about the fog not being thick enough to warrant fog signals does not ring true. The railway minister in fact stated in Parliament that it had to be investigated further.

If the departure of the goods train was planned by holding the Dakshin Express at signals, the two cross-overs leading from the goods yard to the down line (2) (see diagram) and from the down line to the up line (1) would be as shown. In such a configuration if the driver of the Dakshin Express crossed his signal at danger, his engine would have split open the points (A) of the cross-over (1) before colliding with the goods train. But this did not happen, a fact which proves that this cross-over was set for the express to proceed further towards Agra Cantt station on the down line. Normally, the next cross-over's position should have been the reverse of what is shown (B) if it had been correctly set for receiving the express on the platform. But this had been closed to set the passage for departure of the goods train—perhaps after throwing back the signal of the Dakshin Express. The yard staff's claim does not stand to reason. If they had sighted this train and had wanted to save the accident, they would have thrown open cross-over (2), which governed the movement of the express into the goods yard, rather than cross-over (1). In such an eventuality, the express would have just burst this cross-over and proceeded towards the station instead of colliding with the goods train.

Another question being asked is: was the commissioner for railway safety who conducted the inquiry into the Agra accident, pressurised? It is said that Gujral told him to tone down the report. Consequently, the commissioner did not admonish the railways for not accepting his earlier recommendation prohibiting the movement of any train across the path of a train due to be received at a station. Moreover, the commissioner proposed the theory that just at the time of passing the signals, both the driver and his assistant fell asleep momentarily and ignored the signal aspect. This is highly improbable because the statistical chance of two persons, who have both been working on such mail trains for years together, taking their 40 winks at the same time would be extremely unlikely.

Despite overwhelming evidence of the thick fog on the day of the accident, the commissioner writes that the fog was not thick enough to use fog signals—in fact, he continues, the visibility was good enough for them to have sighted the express before it approached the cabin.

Flouting rules with impunity has become the order of the day. The divisional safety officer, Jhansi, and the chief safety superintendent of central railway, P. C. Johry, have simply been transferred, the latter to Secunderabad, which he had left only a few months earlier. But, the heads of the "higher ups" have not rolled, according to a Rail Bhawan insider.

Another disturbing feature is the fact that the safety organisation is manned by non-technical personnel from the chairman-cum-member transport down to the field level. Thus, a lack of awareness of the implications of shortcut methods has increased accidents. Recommendations of the Kunjru and Wanchoo committees and lately of the Sikri committee remain unimplemented. Traffic officers, who have no technical background have always tried to get away by pegging the blame on drivers or upon technical departments.

The latest railway accident enquiry committee headed by Justice Sikri criticised the working of the present setup of the safety organisation: it was called a "refuge of rejects" from the traffic and commercial departments. It has recommended that the safety organisation should at all levels be manned by selected officers and staff from technical departments.

Mr Gujral has not yet implemented these recommendations. He has, instead, appointed two high-powered safety teams known as the "minister for railways safety teams" to carry out surprise checks on the implementation of various safety directives—which have in fact been nullified by his style of train operations and maintenance management.

Says a bitter railway official: "Unlike Jaffer Sharief (the minister of state for railways) who went to Agra to shed a few crocodile tears for those who were killed, and later picnicked at the Taj with his family, Mr P. C. Sethi should not transform himself into a 'salesman-of-death', rushing to every major scene of railway disaster and doling out money for injury or death. Gujral has made the railways a death machine..." ■

Accident committee report

The following is an extract from the report of the railway accidents enquiry committee published in May 1980:

"The general impression given was that this organisation is a refuge for unwanted persons and rejects of the departments and for accommodating employees with health or domestic problems. Both amongst officers and the staff in this organisation, the majority felt that, given the chance, they would like to go back to their parent department.

"Instances came to our notice of officers holding posts of divisional safety officers who had all along worked in the commercial department and had neither the flair nor the background for the work which they are now called upon to do. Except for a few instances, divisional safety officers were class II officers, who were on the verge of superannuation and were holding these posts on first promotion to senior scale. With their attention understandably concentrated on their impending retirement, they lacked involvement in their tasks and the drive to achieve results.

"Both at the divisional and headquarters levels on the zonal railways, our inquiry revealed that there was no system of effectively monitoring the follow-up action on recommendations made by committees of inquiry into railway accidents.

"Very little is being done by way of regular statistical studies and analyses of longterm trends of various types of accidents by the safety organisations now functioning at the divisional and headquarters levels on almost all the railways and even at the railway board level."

The tragedy is that all this will most probably go unheeded.

MEMORIES

Shobha

Shobha, the popular Malayalee who died in mysterious circums much alive in the memory of he spent seven hours w

Two living corpses, caged in darkness and subsisting on mere memories: that is what Shobha's parents have become. Their daughter might have died two years ago but time has in no way stemmed the flow of life-blood from their deep, unhealed wounds.

Shobha was the 18-year-old Tamil actress who had shot into news when her body was discovered hanging from the ceiling of her bedroom, on 1 May 1980. She had allegedly committed suicide, only three months after having married cameraman Balu Mahendra in a much-publicised garland-exchanging ceremony in a hotel. (Balu Mahendra was already married, with a wife and a son.) Though herself a Malayalee, Shobha had catapulted to stardom in the Tamil film world. Ironically, just a week before she died, she had received the Urvashi award for best actress for her excellent performance in Pasi (Hungry), from President Sanjiva Reddy.

Today, the plight of Shobha's parents—Prema and K.P.P. Menon—is pathetic. They live in a make-believe world wherein Shobha still exists. A small, brilliantly lit room in their house, is where 'Sho Mol' ('Mol' is a Malayalam endearment used for daughters) still 'lives.' This room resembles a rather garish film set. In one corner 'stands' a life-size cardboard cutout of Shobha, clad in a gaudy, green sari full of zari (brocade). Fresh jasmine flowers adorn her black hair and there is a kumkum bindi on her forehead. The bright light in the room glints off her necklace, bangles and zari, transforming her into a shimmering, resplendent figure. You almost feel as if she is looking at each visitor who walks into that room, flashing a charming smile, the white of her perfect teeth framed enchantingly by red lips. Prema leads us into the room, and with a great deal of care, 'introduces' us to her Sho Mol.

Such bizarre scenes, one always thought, were enacted strictly within the tinsel confines of the film world. When they get transposed to real life, the effect is spine-chilling. The grief of the parents is unbearable. Unbearable because it is sickeningly tangible, a live tragedy as it were. Though the manifestations of their anguish do appear melodramatic, at no time do they seem false or put on. On the contrary, one wishes there wasn't so much intensity to their pain. There is a feeling of helplessness in the face of such undimmed agony and sorrow which has taken an extremely heavy toll—emotionally, mentally, physically.

When Shobha was alive just two years ago, her mother, Prema (judging by the photographs) was a healthy, happy woman. Today, at only 41 years of age (although she looks nearer 60), she is painfully thin, gaunt-faced and lifeless. She wears only white, cotton saris and modest, high-necked blouses. Her chiselled features are bleak, her dark mouth brooding and her vacant stare unnerving. She is tired and beaten; a pathetic shadow of her former self. When her 'Sho Mol' was alive, she had lovingly attended to her tiniest need. She continues to do so even now.

The living room has 29 photographs and paintings of Shobha depicting a gamut of this budding actress's moods— gay, sullen, happy, intense, sultry, dreamy. On top of each photo is a bunch of kadambam malli (fresh jasmines and Crossandru (kanakambaram) flowers. Great care is taken to ensure that the flowers are changed daily. In each of the photographs, on Shobha's forehead, a bindi and a dash of sandalwood paste is applied. "You see she loved kumkum bindis, you could never see her without it," her mother explains. Before Prema has her meals (ever since Shobha died she sits on the floor and eats) a water-sprinkled green banana leaf is brought. Prema deposits a handful of rice and curry on the leaf which is taken to Sho Mol's room so that Sho Mol can eat in peace and privacy. Prema's mother comes out of the room gently closing the door behind her. Only then does she eat herself.

Prema spends most of her time in Sho Mol's room, which also serves as a pooja room, crammed with flowers, garlands, lamps, photographs and pictures of Gods. Sitting on the floor mat, Prema stares unbelievingly at the cut-out of Shobha. Every morning she busies herself with a ritual. She rearranges the sari, smoothing out all the wrinkles—both real and imaginary—she adjusts the flowing pallav, applies fresh kumkum on the figure's forehead and puts flowers on her hair. Finding it difficult to change the sari each day, she changes her daughter's sari once every fortnight. "Sho Mol must always look neat and beautiful. Isn't she a blossoming actress with the Urvashi in her hand?"

As Prema lives out her pitiful days in this hot airless, overbright room (so bright that it hurts the eyes) sometimes staring, sometimes talking, precious shared experiences flood back to mind. These moments are the only flashes of light in the overwhelming darkness of her life. In the privacy of this room, in the three feet that separates the inconsolable mother from the dead daughter, memories come alive.

Prema has her idiosyncracies. So does her husband, Menon, whose flesh has wasted away leaving him emaciated. All his possessions—a couple of lungis and shirts, Shobha's photographs, albums, letters, etc.—are stashed away in a large, red Samsonite suitcase kept on the floor between the drawing room sofa and the dining table. Every now and then he disappears behind the sofa and examines his treasures. He even changes his clothes there. He has rice kanji with no curry, thrice a day. Worldly possessions and comfort do not mean anything to him. He just does not care. Nor does Prema who sleeps on the sofa while her husband curls up on the floor (both of them took a vow after their daughter's death that they will not sleep in the bedroom). The luxuries and even the basic amenities of the house lie in a state of disuse and neglect. The well-furnished independent bungalow is decaying and dying slowly.

Menon's is a reckless, pitiable aggressiveness. Like most men who hate to admit crippling emotions, Menon does not talk much about Shobha's personal life. He is obsessed with the idea that Shobha's death was a case of murder not suicide. He is constantly thinking of how to avenge his daughter's death how to find evidence for his convictions. While both parents blame Balu Mahendra for the tragic turn of events in Shobha's life, Menon's virulence spurts from his belief that Balu caused a lot of pain and unhappiness to his daughter. He will never forgive Balu for this. The most frightening aspect about Menon, otherwise a sorry figure, is his fearlessness. It is the fearlessness born out of the desperation of a man who has lost everything.

As Prema spoke to this correspondent, for seven and-a-half hours, 18 years of Shobha's life tumbled out from the mother's trembling lips. She spoke softly in Malayalam, often faltering as tears took over.

Shobha made her debut in films when she was three years old. As Prema herself was a well-established Malayalee actress (she has acted in about 100 films starring with all-time greats like Sathyan and Prem Nazir), small roles came to Shobha easily. According to Prema, her daughter first met Balu Mahendra on the sets of Ragam in which she made a guest appearance as a teacher. Her first impression of him was rather unfavourable because he was strutting about barebodied on the sets. "I thought it was very indecent of him to go about like that when there were so many ladies around." However, her initial dislike gradually thawed as Balu dropped in often to the Menon house, with wife Ahileshwari and son Gourishankar in tow. Shobha was only 13 then, a vivacious sprightly girl who was adept at imitations. Her mother maintains that Shobha was a good actress mainly because she was a wonderful mimic. She used to imitate Balu—his peculiar walk with his shoulders slouched on one side and light meter in one hand. "His behaviour was always impeccable. There was absolutely nothing to take amiss."

And so the Mahendras became daily visitors to the Menon household. Ahila would sit around and gossip for hours and they would eat their meals there too. Strangely, however, they never invited the Menons to their own home. "Not that I wanted their lunch, but it indicates the kind of people they actually are," says Prema. Balu naturally became very close to the family and soon he and Shobha were working together in a number of films. He started referring to Shobha as his niece. The days when Shobha was in town (in Madras), Balu breezed into the house along with the first ray of dawn. The 'niece' soon became his 'daughter'—at first in private, then in public. Prema fished out a beautiful hardcover illustrated book of "My Favourite Fairy Tales" which Balu had presented Shobha with the inscription: "To my darling daughter from Papa, B.M." Gradually emboldened he even publicly declared that Shobha was his "daughter." In an interview with Nana magazine, he said, "I have come with my wife and two children"—meaning his own son and Shobha.

There was a time when Ahila wanted to have a daughter desperately. But whenever she broached the subject, Balu would shout her down saying, "When we have Sho, why do we need another." But the real reason, as he once confessed to Prema, was his fear that a daughter of his own might cause his love for Shobha to diminish.

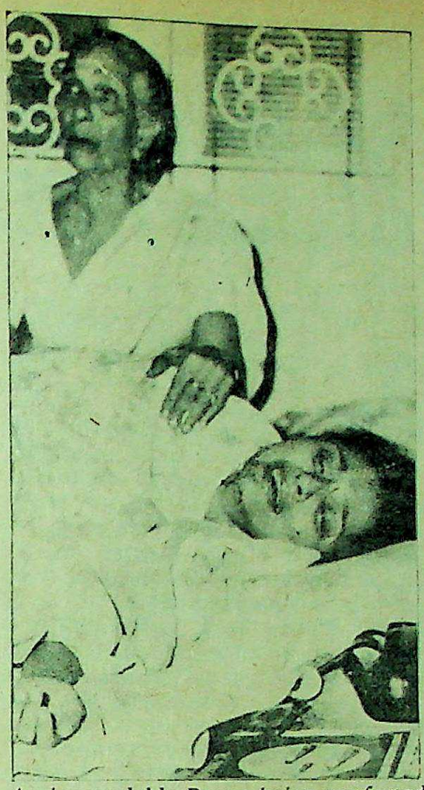
As Balu grew more and more devoted to Shobha, the Tamil film columnists had enough grist for their gossip mill and a particularly nasty item regarding the couple appeared in Mookuthi. Prema was very upset when she read this and she forbade Balu to follow Shobha around. But that did not make any difference. Apart from Prema's suspicions, all evidence points to the fact that the relationship between Balu and Shobha was intimate. At first, Shobha was Balu's friend's daughter, then his 'niece,' then 'daughter,' then girlfriend and finally wife. Strangely, right up to a few months before his second marriage, Balu wrote letters addressing Shobha as "My darling daughter," and signed "Papa"—letters which in their sordidness expose his actual feelings for her.

According to Prema, Balu used the cliched line of "My wife doesn't understand me. I have nothing to talk to her." And falling into the trap, Shobha used to tell her mother, "Poor Uncle has no one to talk to." And that Ahila was not interested in his work and so on. Gradually Shobha also turned against Ahila. But she stopped confiding in her mother after Prema chided her for interfering in Balu's marital affairs.

It was with Shobha's 18th birthday that Prema spotted a distinct change in her daughter's behaviour. "Soon Sho started becoming distant, particularly from me. She was innocent and gullible. All kinds of lies were fed to her—that I was repressive, that I wanted to grab all her money. And because I was quite strict with her, she believed a lot of things. Sho Mol and I were so close, we did everything together. Suddenly she became aloof and irritable. This was around her 18th birthday. It was drilled into her head that she would soon be a major and could do things on her own, without seeking permission. Whenever she set off for shooting, she'd always kiss me first. All these little gestures of affection, of our love for each other, stopped. It was Shobha's body but Balu's mind. She was very imitative—she began imitating Balu, his actions and his mannerisms. A girl who had read only fairy tales and comics started talking all kinds of intellectual things. When she spoke, it was as if Balu was speaking," said Prema.

Prema blames herself for precipitating Shobha's growing dependency on Balu. "The Malayalam film industry is like a family. We knew everybody there. Here it was different. We knew only Balu, so whenever Shobha got offers, I used to make it a point to check with Balu about the integrity of the producer, director, etc. I wanted to proceed carefully, but my caution had far graver consequences. Sho started relying completely on Balu. She lost all faith in my abilities—I, who had been handling her career since the time she was a child of three and now Balu's word became final."

On 22 January 1980, Balu got "married" to Shobha. There was first a press conference and then the garland-exchanging ceremony at a hotel. Prema is convinced that Shobha was caught unawares and forced into marriage. According to Prema, on that day, Shobha returned from Calicut after a spell of shooting. Barely had she reached home when Balu informed her of Yesudas' recording in the city, knowing that Shobha could never resist attending his recordings. Without even bothering to change, Shobha clambered back into the car, dragging her aunt, Rama, with her. They were taken not for the recording, but to Gemini studios where the press was waiting.



An inconsolable Prema being comforted by her mother who now lives with her

After the marriage, there was a great deal of bitterness between Balu and Shobha's parents. Prema could never forgive him and was very violent in her reaction to Balu. The relationship between parents and daughter soured. They grew distant. Soon after her marriage, Shobha stayed in her parents' house for some time. It was around this time that Prema came to suspect that Shobha was under the influence of drugs. "There were several nights when she used to thrash about on the bed. Her appetite was ruined and she lost weight rapidly." According to Prema, a doctor in Vijaya hospital who had treated Shobha over the years and who continued to do so after her marriage, was the one to inform Prema about the possibility of Shobha taking drugs.

Then one day, on 2 March 1980, to be precise, while Prema was combing her daughter's hair, Shobha suddenly told her mother to return all the money she had earned during the previous two years, because "Balu says now that we are husband and wife we must file our income tax together." Prema lost her temper and lashed out, saying, "He is not your husband, he is Ahila's. You are just his keep." When Shobha showed her thali (mangalsutra) Prema, verging on hysteria, shouted "Your thali is meaningless. Even prostitutes wear thalis in hotels to avoid suspicion. Yours has as much sanctity as that." Shobha burst into tears and hearing her cry, Balu who was in the living room came rushing in and dragged Shobha away. And that was the last time Prema saw her daughter alive.

According to Prema, Balu got a lot of leverage from this episode, claiming that she was after Shobha's money. "For God's sake, what will I do with Shobha's money? She is our only wealth. You have seen us. Do you believe we were after our own daughter's money? How can he even think like that? I lost my temper because I felt so bad that my daughter had been duped into believing that she was legitimately married."

Although Balu and Shobha had initially stayed in Atlantic hotel, they had soon taken a house in K. K. Nagar. Prema refused to step into her daughter's house, but Menon had visited his daughter there several times. "I used to hang around like a beggar outside her house, waiting to see her come and go. Sometimes I went in and talked to her. In fact, the Friday that she died, I was supposed to have lunch with her," said Menon. In fact, even when Shobha won the Urvashi award, her parents had heard the news only through a friend. When a thrilled Menon went to Shobha's house, he was told that she had already gone to Delhi to receive the award and would be back on 27 April. "That was a deliberate lie," says Menon, "because she came back on 26 April. I wanted to go to the airport and see her coming back with the Urvashi. I know I would not have been able to go near her but at least from a distance, hidden by the crowd, I could have proudly watched my own daughter coming with the prestigious award. I was deprived even of that. As nobody gave me a copy of the photograph of Shobha receiving the award from the President, I wrote to Vasant Sathe. He was kind enough to send me a copy." (It is one among the numerous photographs displayed in the living room.) Shortly after Shobha's death, Balu sent a note to K. P. P. Menon saying, "Out of human consideration, sympathy and goodwill, I am returning Shobha's things." And he made out a long list of belongings which included five bras and seven panties!

When Shobha was a little girl of five, she had to die in the arms of Prem Nazir in a Malayalam film. She portrayed the death-throes so well that at the end of the shot everybody on the sets had been reduced to tears. An overwhelmed Prem Nazir picked up the little Shobha and hugged her tightly saying, "You will definitely win the Urvashi award one day." A prophetic statement, but who could have imagined that death-throes for the beautiful, young actress would follow so soon in real life.

'Learn Kannada or get out of Karnataka'

LOUISE FERNANDES analyses the pro-Gokak agitation that rocked Karnataka recently

It need never have happened—or, at least need never have taken on the hideous proportions that it did. But, thanks to Karnataka chief minister R. Gundu Rao, who at the best of times has been known to place his foot in his mouth, April will be remembered as a month when Karnataka threatened to slip off the rails of sanity. It was not without embarrassment. Stirring the boiling cauldron of bubbling linguistic fervour which clamoured for Kannada as the sole first language of the state, were not only average politicians, whose business they say is to rouse the rabble. Indeed no. At the helm of the agitation for Kannada at the high-school level, popularly known as the "pro-Gokak agitation," were revered Jnanpith award winners, poet laureates, internationally known academicians and nationally recognised film personalities—all those, who one would expect, to have understood the dangers of lending support to the sort of cry which at its hysterical peak screeched: "Learn Kannada or get out of Karnataka."

But if men of art and letters temporarily went haywire,why blame Gundu Rao? Examine the genesis of the problem and you see a smug chief minister who promised the world to his subjects in the first flush of victory even though he was in no position to deliver the goods. A background to the root of the "language controversy" is necessary. Till 1979, Sanskrit was included as a first language in high schools in Karnataka along with Kannada, Tamil, Telugu, Marathi and other mother tongues. One consistent allegation against the Sanskrit teaching at the school level was that the standard was very low. Students generally started learning the language from the alphabets in the first year of high school—the eighth standard—and by the time they were in the tenth standard they were expected to take an examination. The students who opted for Kannada as the first language, however, would have studied the language since the first standard. Sanskrit being a difficult language it was left to students to answer questions in either English or Kannada. A small translation from Sanskrit to English or Kannada had to be done but not vice-versa. The result was that Sanskrit became a goldmine for marks. It was possible for students taking Sanskrit to score anywhere between 80 to 95 per cent. On the other hand, it was impossible to get those kind of marks in Kannada or any other language. The levels of teaching Kannada, for instance, involved at least one ancient text, grammar, etc. As a result, Sanskrit students had a tremendous advantage in respect of ranks and, incidentally, in respect of post-Matric scholarships based on the marks in the SSLC examination.

The movement to revamp the educational system to correct this anomaly had official recognition when the Kannada Sahitya Parishad, at its annual sammelan in 1976, passed a resolution demanding that the government remove Sanskrit from the list of first languages. Three years later, the Devaraj Urs government reacted by simply removing Sanskrit from the list of first languages and relegating it to a position where nobody would read it. Since the order came in the middle of the academic term, Sanskrit supporters challenged it in the High Court and got a stay order. That was the status quo when Gundu Rao took office in January 1980 and that is where Mr Rao made his mistake. That was the time when Mr Rao was accepting felicitations from all and sundry and was making a reputation for granting favours. Sanskrit scholars, taking advantage of this, feted the CM and, as expected, secured from him the promise that Sanskrit would remain on the first language list. There was no need for him to step in for according to the High Court stay, Sanskrit still remained the first language.

Predictably, public reaction was furious. It became uncontrollable and the legislature berated the CM who panicked and appointed a committee of seven language teaching experts to look into the problem. The committee was headed by Dr V. K. Gokak, a former vice-chancellor, a university teacher of English for most of his life, a renowned scholar of Sanskrit and a wellknown modern author in Kannada.

Although the government's terms of reference to the committee gives scope for recommendations, it was common knowledge that the basic intention of the government was only to settle the issue of Sanskrit and Kannada. Other languages had not appeared on the horizon at that time, and till then nobody had authoritatively demanded that Kannada be the sole first language of the state. Whatever the interpretation given to the terms of reference, in hindsight, the government's intention was not to reopen the issue. In fact, if any motives were given to the composition of the committee it was that with four out of seven being known to be in favour of Sanskrit, Gundu Rao was attempting to get the seal of approval of a committee of experts for his own decision to retain Sanskrit as the first language.

The committee's work was hampered as a result. As far as the agitators were concerned, the committee had no business to discuss the issue and Dr Gokak himself was gheraoed in Hubli. Those who demonstrated against him, incidentally (or at least some of them) are the very people who are now willing to go to jail demanding that the government accept Dr Gokak's report in full, without even changing a comma.

Gundu Rao's plan backfired when the report was published in January 1981. The Gokak committee had not only unseated Sanskrit but also made Kannada the sole first language. The government received the report and slept over it. Some people believe that they attempted to bury it knowing the effect it would have on the feelings of the non-Kannadigas who form around 22 per cent of the population in the state. But not for long. The government, in its lack of wisdom, did not publish the report and till recently English translations were hard to come by. As a result, discontented grumblings started and there was criticism in the press, especially the regional press, that Gundu Rao was playing for time so that he could find ways of twisting the report to suit his pro-Sanskrit friends. In a panic again, without examining the implications of the report in all its details, Mr Gundu Rao announced that the government had accepted the report in toto.

Then came the counter reaction from the minorities who had, as their prime mover, the irrespressible maverick Rajya Sabha member F. M. Khan. As the counter movement against the recommendations of the Gokak committee gathered momentum, Mr Gundu Rao dithered once again and, playing for time, said he would consult the legislators. He went on record in the Assembly saying that the government would examine the implications of the report on the minorities and minority languages and the modalities of implementation. Dr Gokak himself appears to have studied the problem of the minorities and their possible difficulties of studying Kannada as the first language and competing with students whose mother tongue is Kannada. He had, therefore, suggested a phased programme of implementation of Kannada as the sole first language over a period of five years commencing from the academic year 1981-82.

According to this phased programme, the compulsory teaching of Kannada, should start in all minority schools from the third standard. By the time students come up to the eighth standard, they would have been schooled in Kannada for five years. Dr Gokak's argument was that, whatever may be the minority language of the child concerned, he was growing up in an atmosphere and environment which was predominantly Kannada and therefore it would not be difficult for him after a schooling of five years to accept the challenge of studying Kannada as the first language. The minorities did not accept that. They continued their agitation. To counter that another agitation began—this time spearheaded by the so-called "intellectuals", the academicians, professors, art film directors, journalists, etc. The agitation started in Dharwar, the seat of the Karnataka university and centre of Kannada culture. Academicians in Bangalore, including former press secretary to the chief minister, L. S. Sheshagiri Rao, started hunger strikes demanding implementation of the report. K. V. Puttappa, poet laureate and Jnanapith award winner, came out with a very strong statement in favour of Kannada and even gave vent to his anger saying that those minorities who did not want to learn Kannada should get out of Karnataka.

H K RAJA SHEKHAR

Police watch helplessly as people demonstrate in the pro-Gokak agitation

All over the state there were bandhs, strikes, hunger strikes and arrests. In Bangalore, matinee idol Raj Kumar himself came out to join the agitators. Unfortunately, he added to the confusion instead of making a point. (Raj Kumar fans turned violent in Bangalore on a false rumour that he had been arrested following his speech at a public meeting. In fact, what had happened was that he had sought police protection to get out of a situation which was getting out of control since his fans were fighting among themselves to get a glimpse of their idol.) There was police firing in Chitradurga in which two persons were killed.

Gundu Rao could no longer remain silent. He announced to a tense state that his cabinet would take a decision on the matter following a round of discussions with legislators. On the evening of 19 April he announced the government's stand: a modified three language formula which, inter alia, said that Kannada would not be the sole first language although it would be a compulsory language. With the decision, the cabinet thought that the feelings of the Kannada agitators would be softened because Kannada had been made compulsory. In itself, it was an unique order because none of the kind does exist in any other state.

As matters stand, the minorities have been mollified with the proviso that minority languages will also be first languages. Pro-Sanskrit agitators have come out of the fray smiling because Sanskrit has been given second language status along with English and Hindi. ■

Congress(I) hoodlums torture Congress(I) candidate

Congress(I) youth leader takes his "revenge"

Calcutta: The one constituency in Calcutta upon which many eyes are set is Rashbehari, from where the finance minister of the West Bengal government, the outspoken economist Dr Ashok Mitra, is contesting. The Congress(I) was expected to make a special effort to humiliate the Left Front by defeating Dr Mitra even if it could not win the state. But Dr Mitra's chances improved vastly when an astonishing display of hoodlum politics laid his Congress(I) opponent low at the very beginning of the campaign.

The Rashbehari constituency has been a fiefdom of a "youth leader" of the Congress(I), Mr Lakshmi Kanta Bose, who in fact was the Indira Congress candidate for the seat in the 1977 elections. Mr Bose expected to be the candidate in this election too, but the Congress(I) high command, in an apparent effort to display a cleaner image in this election, refused to give him the nomination and instead chose a gentleman called Hoimi Basu, much to the surprise of everyone including Mr Basu himself. Mr Basu is a doctor by profession, and while he is a respected man and known Congress(I) sympathiser, he is hardly the stuff of which Congress(I) candidates are generally made. Just 24 hours after he had filed his nomination, Dr Hoimi Basu was the victim of unspeakable torture, which included stabs in the side and the back. And the assailants are widely believed to be supporters of the dejected Mr Lakshmi Kanta Bose. The Congress(I) in West Bengal is known for its civil wars and backstabbing, but this was carrying it clearly too far.

This is what recently happened to Dr Hoimi Basu, the high command nominated Congress(I) candidate. Dr Basu who filed his nomination papers to contest from the Rashbehari constituency did not know till the morning of 23 April 1982 (the day before the last day of filing nomination papers) that he was a Congress(I) candidate. At around 9.30 at night, on 23 April, Dr Basu received a telephone call from the WBPCC(I) president, Mr Anandagopal Mukherjee: "Dr Basu, why haven't you filed your nomination paper yet? All the other Congress(I) candidates have filed their papers and we are waiting for you." The phone call stunned Dr Basu. Said he: "I don't know Anandababu. I have heard of him as a leader of the Congress(I) but I don't know him personally."

The next morning, on 24 April, about 75 Congress(I) volunteers and activists visited Dr Basu at his 49 B, Hazra Road residence to escort him to the office where the nomination papers were being filed. Recalling the incident, Dr Basu said: "I did not have the money for filing the papers. All the boys who had turned up to accompany me donated the Rs 250 needed. Only then could I fill in my forms and file my papers."

Then an incident occurred which struck Dr Basu as strange. Lakshmi Kanta Bose, a Congress(I) general secretary who has been contesting from the Rashbehari constituency was also there in the office. He spoke to Dr Basu: "Dada (Lakshmi Kanta Bose knows Dr Basu well), why have you stabbed me in the back? You know I have been contesting elections from the Rashbehari constituency for a long time. Why have you deprived me of my seat?" Dr Basu was taken aback. All he could say was that he had only been told to contest by the WBPCC(I) president on the night of 23 April. Hadn't Lakshmi Bose been informed of the decision, asked the doctor. Yes, he had been informed, said Mr Bose. Then Mr Bose himself volunteered the information that he was filing his nomination papers to contest as a candidate from the adjoining Alipore constituency—this despite the fact that he had not got the nomination even for Alipore.

Dr Basu requested Mr Bose to help him out since Rashbehari had been the latter's old constituency. Could he give him the walls for postering (building walls are usually "reserved" days in advance by political parties for use during elections). "No problem," said Mr Bose.

The next morning, on 25 April, Dr Basu went to meet the WBPCC(I) president to inform him that he had filed his papers. "Anandababu was very happy," remembers Dr Basu, "when I told him that I had filed my papers. He also told me that he would be sending me the formal letter allotting me the symbol, etc. soon." Everything seemed to be going fine for Dr Basu. Later that day, he had many visitors who assured him of all help. But it is the events of the night which were to unnerve Dr Basu. At 12.30, past midnight, the doctor received an anonymous telephone call: "Sagarmoy Ghosh (who stays nearby and is also, incidentally, the editor of Desh, a magazine from the Ananda Bazar group of publications) has had a heart attack. If you do not come fast, something might happen to him."

Dr Basu who does not shirk visiting patients at night, asked who was phon-

ing. "I am speaking from Sagarbabu's residence," said the caller. Dr Basu knows the Ghosh family well and has been their family physician for years. "Sagarda is more like an elder brother to me," said Dr Basu. "Naturally, I asked the caller where Boudi (Sagarbabu's wife) was. She was by his bedside, I was told. This was quite natural. But I told the caller that it was very late at night and I had sent my driver home. Could someone come and pick me up? The voice at the other end of the line said, 'That would take time. It might be impossible to save Sagarbabu then.' Sagarda has been suffering from heart trouble but I did not think that matters would take such a turn. So I decided to take out my car and see Sagarda."

Without even putting on his shoes Dr Basu drove out. At the crossing of Lansdowne Road and Southern Avenue, a dark-coloured car overtook the doctor's Ambassador and turned to block his passage. Before Dr Basu could realise what was happening, the car doors opened and two men stepped out. One of them opened Dr Basu's car door and hit him on the back of his head. More blows followed. The dazed doctor was pushed to the middle of the front seat. One of the men took the driver's seat and his colleague joined him, sandwiching Dr Basu. One of the two (Dr Basu does not remember which one) whipped out a piece of cloth and blindfolded the physician. They then started the car, warning Dr Basu that he should not shout; otherwise he would be shot. The doctor kept quiet because he felt a steel barrel at his temple.

"I was taken to a ground floor room," said Dr Basu, "because I did not have to negotiate any stairs." There he was forced to sit down at a small table, handed blank sheets of paper and ordered to sign them. Dr Basu refused. Immediately blows were showered on him. All through the beating, Dr Basu was abused in filthy language and often threatened: "So you want to contest the elections. We shall make sure that you do not take part in elections." The two men then lit cigarettes and any protest from the doctor was answered by applying the lighted ends of the cigarettes to Dr Basu's hands and face. Soon there were blisters all over his hands. Remembering those agonising moments, Dr Basu said, "I couldn't bear the pain. I tried resisting but what could I do? Both were very strong and I was scared they would burn me more." Then one of them suddenly lunged at and pierced Dr Basu with a dagger in the stomach and back. After that Dr Basu was only too willing to comply. "I wanted to sign or do anything the two men wanted me to do because I could not bear the torture anymore," said Dr Basu.

After Dr Basu had put his signature on a number of sheets of paper and written declarations, the text of which he does not remember, he was taken to his car. Somehow, Dr Basu drove back to his house. At the entrance to the lane of his house, he slumped unconscious on the steering wheel. His head hit the horn which began to blare. Dr Basu's brother-in-law, who lives next door at 49 C, Hazra Road, woke up, rushed down the stairs to the car and found it was Dr Basu. The doctor was then taken to the nearby Shishu Mangal hospital.

On 26 April Congress(I) leaders visited Dr Basu at his residence and expressed concern over the incident. Within a couple of days, the office of Mr Lakshmi Kanta Bose was attacked with bombs by a group of hoodlums although no one could say if the hoodlums were backed by the Congress(I). And on 28 April, Mr Pankaj Banerjee, the Congress(I) rebel candidate withdrew his nomination. If anything, the entire episode has only made the chances of the Congress(I) winning the Rashbehari seat bleaker.

BIHAR

Newsman threatened

Patna: Dibyendu Banerjee, the UNI teleprinter operator at Patna, was creeding one of the last stories, when at round 11.30 pm on 24 April, three men entered the office. They did not ask any questions, ignored the operator and the peon, who were the only persons present in the office, and headed for the room of the UNI manager, Mr D. N. Jha. Finding the room empty, they returned to the operator and for the first time one of them spoke: "Where is D. N. Jha?" The operator did not find anything unusual about this. After all, he thought, these men must have come with some story which they wanted UNI to send out; often people drop in at the office at odd hours to meet Mr Jha. He simply told the men that there was no one present in office. This obviously did not satisfy them. "What is Jha's address?" one of them shouted at Banerjee. It was then that the operator realised that something was wrong. Why did these people want Mr Jha's address, he thought. Besides, why were they shouting?

It did not take him very long to find out. For, one of the men pulled out a dagger and rushed towards the operator. Fortunately for Banerjee he stopped, and this man, who described himself as belonging to the "thakur family of Bhagalapur, contented himself with leaving a message: if ever Mr Jha spoke against him to the chief minister, he would be killed. Then, the men who Banerjee later described as being "in a drunken state" picked up a portable typewriter which was lying on a table and left. As soon as they had gone Banerjee informed the Kotwali police station and filed an FIR.

Who were these three "dark complexioned and thin-bodied" men (as Banerjee has said in the FIR)? Why did they want to kill Mr Jha? And, which was this "thakur family of Bhagalpur" to which one of them was supposed to belong? "I don't know who would want to kill me and I don't have any enemies," Mr D. N. Jha told this correspondent. "As far as the thakur family of Bhagalpur is concerned the only such family which is also quite wellknown is that of Ram Kumar Thakur. I know his son Ashok Thakur."

Ashok Thakur was the stringer of the UNI and the Indian Nation in Bhagalpur before the Emergency. He was also a Youth Congress activist. He, however, did not continue for long with journalism and became more involved in politics. It is believed that he had even tried for the Congress(I) ticket for the Samastipur by-elections in 1978, but ultimately did not get it as the present Bihar CM, Dr Jagannath Mishra intervened against him. He has, since then, been trying to woo the Congress(I) leadership in Bihar.

Was there any reason for Ashok Thakur to attack Mr Jha? Though there is no evidence which points in this direction Mr Jha says, "I did not give him any lift in my life, even when he was with the UNI. But that is no reason why anyone should attack me. The only reason why anyone can associate his name with the incident is the fact that a few days back I was talking to a friend who knew Ashok Thakur. He told me that he was displeased with me."

But why had the intruders, whoever they were, said that Mr Jha would be killed if he spoke against the thakur family to the chief minister? A journalist, who knows both Mr Jha and Ashok Thakur, said that it was likely Mr Jha had criticised Mr Thakur in an informal chat with a friend. This may have been conveyed to Mr Thakur, who could have thought that Mr Jha, who is close to the chief minister, would repeat the same thing about him to the CM. This would obviously go against his interests. The police, however, have no evidence which points in this direction and are, in fact, totally in the dark about the whole incident.

Whoever the intruders are, it is clear that they actually did not want to kill Mr Jha; nor was the attack preplanned. Had it been so they would have known that Mr Jha normally does not stay in office at that hour. Besides, they would have also known Mr Jha's residential address. As one journalist said, "It was merely a threat, perhaps with the larger intent of terrorising journalists in Patna."

Impending milk famine

Dhule : A small town about 300 kms from Bombay, Dhule is the largest milk collection centre in the state—whether from the government milk scheme or other agencies. In 1982-83, 453.20 lakh litres of milk valued at Rs 1,459.38 lakhs were collected. The average per day collection is 1.26 lakh litres. Dhule, like all the other milk collection and distribution centres in Maharashtra remains literally bonded to Bombay and a few other big cities and towns. That makes Bombay by far the most "important market for the milk procured in rural areas." Bombay has three big dairies at Aarey, Worli and Kurla and on an average 9,31,507 lakh litres of milk are procured daily. An estimated 9,86,301 lakh litres are distributed daily. The government distributes whole milk at the rate of Rs five a litre, standardised milk at Rs 3.30 a litre, cow milk at Rs 3.30 per litre and double toned milk at Rs 2.10 per litre. Milk to Bombay is subsidised by the Greater Bombay Milk Scheme. The farmers are paid for cow's milk at the rate of Rs 3.00 per litre in the lean season, Rs 2.90 in transitory season and Rs 2.50 when it is in abundance. For buffalo milk, the rates are Rs 3.40, Rs 3.10 and Rs 2.90 respectively.

Shetkari Sanghatana's Sharad Joshi (46) has demanded Rs 4.00 per litre for cow's milk and Rs 5.00 per litre for buffalo's milk. He is currently organising the Sanghatana for a milk agitation that can be started at 48 hours' notice. He told a rally of nearly one lakh farmers in Dhule in the end of April, "The milk agitation is not difficult. You can sit by the side of your chula and do it. It is an utsav (festival) for giving children milk. How many days can Bombay city last without milk?" Mr Joshi continued persuasively. In the three earlier agitations for fair prices for sugarcane, onions and beedi tobacco Mr Joshi refined the technique of rasta roko, to gain his ends. In the milk agitation the farmers will not be giving their milk to the collecting centres but will feed it to their children or turn it into milk products. The potential is exciting.

This is the lean season for milk in the state and as Mr Joshi says, "We will strike when the demand is the highest, (the marriage season) and supply the lowest quantity when the supply of milk powder is low and when the farmers in all the villages are ready." The Sanghatana leader is sure that in 15 days "Bombayites will be asking Mr Bhosale where the milk is. And Mr Bhosale will have to go to Delhi and ask the Prime Minister the same question." The date on which the agitation will be launched is a top secret. "We will give only 48 hours' notice because we don't want to become sitting ducks for the government and its police. In fact, the government has said that any policeman finding out the actual date of the agitation will be suitably rewarded." The news about the strike will go from village to village in 48 hours and the farmers will strike in a peaceful manner, said Mr Joshi.

Sharad Joshi lights a lamp to commemorate the martyrs of the Shetkari Sanghatana at Dhule

Mr S. V. Bhide, a dairy economist, who has his own dairy and produces 150 litres of milk daily, says the government's figures of the cost of production are a fraud. Members of the Ashok Bassack committee floated by former chief minister, Mr Antulay, last year to look into the cost of production and distribution of milk, took figures that were totally unrealistic. For instance, they reduced the price of buffaloes to Rs 2,500 when one costs around Rs 6,000 today. The price of grass was computed at Rs 0.35 a kg as against Re one. The private trade today charges Rs 6.40 per litre, and they and the middlemen are the only beneficiaries of the government's niggardly attitude towards farmers, says Mr Bhide.

The agitation is scheduled to be held anytime between April and July as this is the lean period for milk. From 10 May, in fact, the state government will be mostly distributing double-toned powder milk. To add to the short supply, there is already a 15 per cent shortage of milk collected from Miraj and other dairies because 50 per cent of the sheds have closed down due to economic hardships. Most of the sheds are not purchasing buffaloes because of the high cost. Prices of medicines have increased by 16 per cent and labour charges are Rs 15 a day. It is a collapsing industry, says Mr Bhide. In Maharashtra, high prices have played havoc with the livelihood of farmers in Sangli, Bhandara, Warnar, Gondia and elsewhere. Around 15 per cent of the rural families in Maharashtra depend on dairying. The middlemen in the private trade make a clear profit of Re one per litre and it is strange that the government's loss runs into crores of rupees.

In the last three months, Mr Joshi has addressed more than a hundred meetings in Marathwada and the entire milk belt. The response has been tremendous and support to his demands has cut across party lines. Several Congress(I) workers have joined him in the milk agitation. He has also been supported by farmers in Punjab where Balbir Singh Rajewal and Ranjeet Singh of the Bhartiya Kisan Union (BKU), who were present at the Dhule meeting have already had an experience of stopping milk supply to cities in Punjab. As they told SUNDAY, "We stopped one crore litres of milk from reaching 10 milk plants between January and April last year. We succeeded in getting an increase of 50 paise to Re one a litre. Our demand is Rs 4.20 per litre for six per cent fat content." The BKU has extended its support to Mr Joshi and said they would stop the supply of milk to Punjab and nearby Delhi. This would have its own impact. Since this is also the season when there will be a greater demand for milkpowder, Delhi, Bombay and other cities will be greatly affected. Even for making milkpowder at least 35 per cent of milk is needed and where would that come from, asks Mr Bhide.

The Maharashtra government has so far refused to discuss the Sanghatana's demands. The government is stocking milkpowder and is depending on Gujarat to bale it out when the crunch comes. Joshi is scheduled to tour Gujarat in mid-May to appeal to the farmers not to send their milk to Bombay. He has already asked them "not to become tools and weapons in the hands of the government of Maharashtra to crush the farmers of Maharashtra."

Mr Joshi says the agitation may be for milk but "we will use this opportunity to fight for fair prices of all commodities from onions to jowar and cotton. When the prices of vegetables and fruits drop, the cities are overjoyed. They are like vultures sitting over the corpses because that is what the growers have been reduced to when prices of vegetables and fruits slump." Mr Joshi tells the farmers, "Try to understand where you are being throttled. Be wise. The prices of agricultural products are coming down and other things are going up. You can only release yourself from this unfair, unjust terms of trade if you overthrow the present economic system. Release yourself from the economic thinking of the city's economists."

"Telugu Desam can never be a threat to the Congress(I)"

Hyderabad: Bhavanam Venkata Reddy has been chief minister of Andhra Pradesh for only about two months, but he is already in trouble with dissidents and defectors joining the new regional party, Telugu Desam. That is one reason why he stoutly resisted the suggestion for a snap poll in the state. But when he talked to Syed Majeedul Hasan at his residence on 14 April he appeared quite confident and sure of himself. Excerpts:

Q: You must been very surprised at your selection as the chief minister of the state?

A: No, it did not surprise me. Although I was not aspiring for the office, I was prepared to take any responsibility.

Q: But you have never been among the top leaders of your party in the state?

A: I have been in politics for a long time. I entered the political field way back in 1946. Since then I have been with the Congress. I had gone to the jail thrice. Only thing is that I never conspired, or planned, or intrigued against any body to get a post. And yet, I have held several organisational posts.

Q: But why are you then shy of fighting Assembly elections?

A: When I had the first opportunity to go to the polls in 1955, I was below age by one year and that is why I could not contest. The next time I applied for a ticket in 1962, I was refused and in my place, my wife Jayaprada was given a ticket from a different constituency. From then onwards, she was a member of the Assembly till 1978.

Q: What do you think of the new party, Telugu Desam?

A: From the speeches of the leaders of that party right from its inception on 29 March, it is obvious that it is trying to rake up parochial and regional feelings. That will not do any good to the people of Andhra Pradesh. We have the bitter experiences of two separatist agitations and the people have suffered a lot from them. Should we suffer more?

Q: Does the party pose any threat to the Congress(I)?

A: Telugu Desam can never pose a challenge to the Congress(I) because our party has an ideological background, a history of sacrifices, and most important, deep roots among the masses. So deeply is the image of the Congress(I) impressed in the minds and the hearts of the people of Andhra Pradesh that it is not possible for anybody to take it out from the minds and the hearts of the Telugu people. Even when so many states had let down Mrs Gandhi, it was Andhra and Karnataka which stood by her.

Q: Mr N. T. Rama Rao accuses the Congress and the Congress(I) of promoting a culture of corruption in the state over the last three decades. Any comments?

A: About corruption, I can defenitely tell you that the Congress(I) is one party which has nothing to do with it. I can definitely say that our party cannot be accused of promoting corruption either in this state or in the country at large.

Q: How would you then explain the inclusion of one person in your cabinet against whom there are charges of unauthorised distribution of cement?

A: A commission of enquiry has been set up to probe the charges. We have also taken to task some of those officials who are corrupt so that it may have a deterrent effect upon the others.

Q: There is a feeling even among your cabinet colleagues that you are inaccessible. Are you?

A: No, that is not true. Many people want to meet me and tell me their problems. I organise my time in such a manner that neither their time is wasted nor mine. I go out of my residence and see hundreds of people gathered under the shamiana pitched on the lawns everyday.

Q: But some of your ministers say that even they cannot meet you without prior appointment. Isn't it rather unusual?

A: I regularly meet my cabinet colleagues. They can telephone me also to discuss important things. I am in the habit of talking to them and meeting them. Yes, I want to do all my work in an organised manner. That is all. That is the difference between me and the others.

Q: The Congress(I) in the state appears to be cracking up. Quite a few of your MLAs have joined the Telugu Desam. Isn't it a rather disturbing trend for your party?

A: I do not think that is going to effect the party very much.

Q: But it has. Or else, how would you explain the defeat of one of your party candidates in the Rajya Sabha polls? Apparently, many of your partymen voted for the opposition candidate who won.

A: I think our candidate lost because of cross-voting based upon considerations of money, caste, and other factors.

Q: And what are you going to do about those who had voted against the party nominee?

A: They are our partymen whom we can definitely advise to do better in a desired manner in future.

Q: What about your predecessor, T. Anjaiah? He still seems an angry man. Isn't his Panchayat Raj Forum a parallel political body?

A; I do not think so. In my view, Anjaiah wants the forum to be a non-political body and its object is to see that the panchayats function effectively and for the benefit of the people. We like to strengthen the panchayats.

CRICKET TOUR

Choosing the favourites

New Delhi: The Indian cricket tour to England this summer will provide the backdrop to different kinds of fireworks within the Cricket Control Board of India (CCBI). The presiding officials of the board will be looking out for googlies from Mr I. S. Bindra, president of the Punjab Cricket Association. It is rumoured that several units of the board tacitly support Mr Bindra's belief that the time has come to carry out a coup against board president S. K. Wankhede and the selection committee headed by former cricketer Polly Umrigar.

Sunil Gavaskar's boys will be fighting for more than merely the laurels on the cricket field when they battle it out with Bob Willis and Ian Botham. This summer Sunil Gavaskar's suzerainty and his prerogative to call the shots in Indian cricket are at stake, thanks to the controversy regarding Bombay allrounder Suru Nayak, the omission of a second wicketkeeper from the touring team and the lurking shadows of Mohinder Amarnath, Roger Binny and Chetan Chauhan. On Gavaskar's go-ahead, the selectors have taken a number of calculated risks and the cricket board's ruling axis (the Bombay and the South Indian associations) finds itself confronted by usurpers. The angry officials at Delhi, Railways and Punjab are also counting on support from the Services Sports Control Board and the Saurashtra and West Bengal associations. If Gavaskar's 16 play badly in summer when India plays England, then major changes in the Cricket Control Board cannot be ruled out. Gavaskar's crown could also be in danger if India does not come out on top in the series.

Everybody knows that the selectors and the Indian skipper had made up their minds on the touring party before the last Test match was to be played against Keith Fletcher's team at Kanpur between 30 January to 4 February. This was two months prior to the formal meeting of the selection committee on 1 April when the touring party was to be announced. The eleven playing at Kanpur and Sandeep Patil were certainties for the tour. That left four places to be filled. According to rumours it was understood (quite correctly) that Suru Nayak would be in the team.

At Kanpur, Gavaskar said in an interview to a sports magazine that "we need one more opener, an extra seamer and second wicketkeeper. These are musts." When journalists told him, during the Kanpur Test, that they had heard that a second wicketkeeper would not be taken to England, Gavaskar dismissed it as a rumour. But the rumour turned out to be true: Kirmani will have three amateur understudies in Yashpal Sharma, Ghulam Parkar and Dilip Vengsarkar in case he falls ill on the morning of a Test match and there is not enough time to fly out reserve wicketkeeper Zulfiqar Parkar from Bombay. Gavaskar's critics go so far as to say that this is part of the skipper's strategy to bring his Bombay teammate into the Indian side, sidestepping rivals, Bharat Reddy and Ved Raj.

There is much in the doings of our cricket selectors that defies the layman's comprehension, adding to suspicions of intrigue and politicking. For instance, there was no reason why, having decided to sack Chetan Chauhan, the selectors did not try out Ghulam Parkar in the recent home series, before sending him off to England as the third opener. Nor is it understandable why the selectors persevered with Srikanth through four Tests before they concluded that he did not have the class to open a Test innings. As far as Chetan Chauhan's preremptory dismissal is concerned, Delhi cricket circles believe that he fell a victim to cricket politics at the DDCA. He was not supported by the selector from the North Zone, Mr Vijay Mehra, who belongs to the rival group at Delhi. Similarly, Shivlal Yadav has been in and out of the Indian side, and in and out of Gavaskar's good books. In the recent past, Gavaskar had preferred Gopal Sharma to Shivlal Yadav but Sharma has had two consecutive lean seasons and seemed unreliable for a tour. The one off-spinner who dominated the last Ranji Trophy was former Indian skipper S. Venkatraghavan. The anti-Gavaskar lobby believes that Gavaskar brought in Shivlal Yadav as the younger man to checkmate Venkatraghavan's comeback bid. Gavaskar has not given Yadav long bowling spells in the past and unless he has changed his opinion about off-spinners who flight the ball, Yadav may be relegated to the secondary matches during the English tour.

While there is general appreciation on the choice of Bihar's hardworking medium-pacer Randhir Singh, the selection of Suru Nayak seems least justified. The justification for selecting Nayak revolves around the fact that he would be the only left-handed batsman in the side. But is that enough to justify his selection over two more talented all-rounders, Mohinder Amarnath and Roger Binny? As a batsman, Nayak does not have much to hold

Canadians will see live TV coverage of Everest ascent

Kathmandu: A Canadian mountaineering expedition will try to conquer Mount Everest in September this year and their step-by-step ascent will be shown daily to breakfast TV viewers in Canada. Since this is the first Canadian expedition to Everest, the Canadian TV networks are giving it a lot of publicity. Each member of the expedition will carry, apart from their climbing gear, a super lightweight video camera to record the gruelling climb. The video tapes will be taken down every day by Sherpa runners and then ferried by helicopter to the Everest Sheraton hotel, the expedition's headquarters in Kathmandu. The tapes will then be beamed from a special TV studio at the hotel to the Indian Ocean Intelsat satellite and relayed to Canada via Britain for the daily Canadian shows. A 3.7 metre dish aerial has been placed on the roof of the hotel for sending the daily recordings to the Intelsat satellite.

The whole expedition is being sponsored by Air Canada, the country's national airline, which will fly all the equipment for the expedition including those for the special television studio in the hotel. Simultaneous live television transmissions, the first of its kind, are being discussed with the BBC, French television, Japan's Nippon television and the three leading networks of the USA.

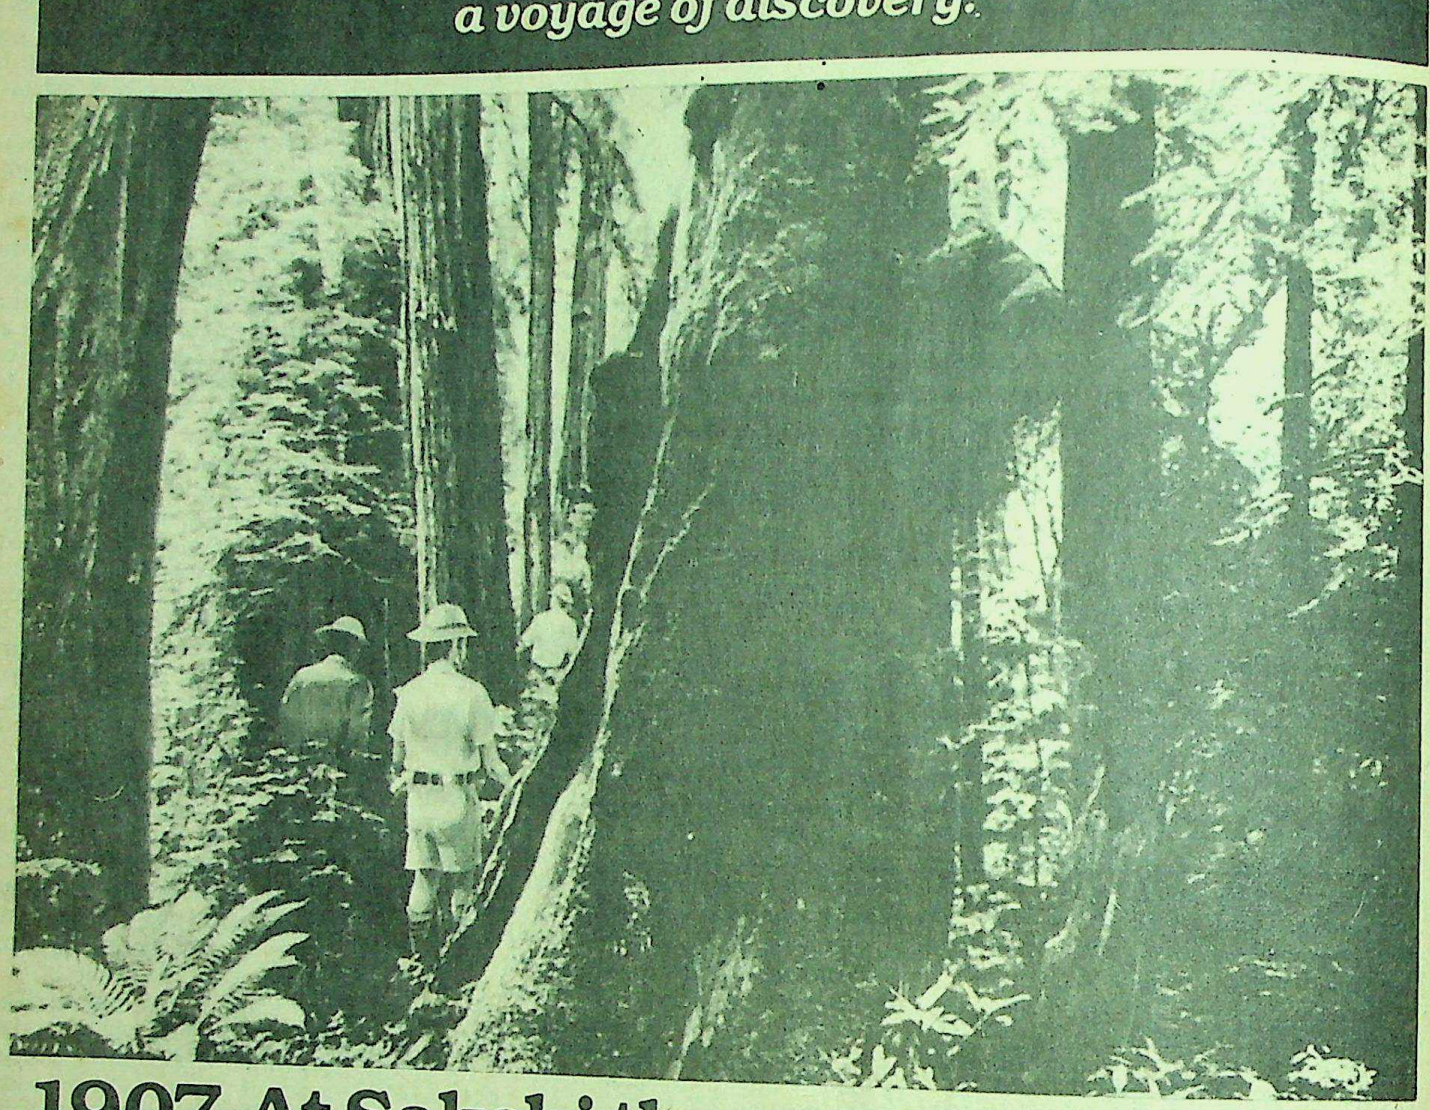
1903. Braving jungles, intense heat and untold hardship, three intrepid pioneers set out on a voyage of discovery.



1907. At Sakchi the search ends. And India's industrial renaissance begins.

It was the culmination of a dream. And in its way an expression of the nationalist spirit. It was India's first steel mill 'built with Swadeshi money' as Jamsetji Tata had wanted it to be.

It was he who had sown the seeds; selected the technical experts, funded the project and provided inspiration and direction to his sons and associates. Now, four years after his death, the search had ended. But the early years had been rough, with disappointments and failures at every step. Still they had pressed on undaunted–Dorabji Tata, Weld and Saklatvala, the first of the intrepid pioneers, spurred on by the spirit of adventure. And in time came reward.

A chimney came up, a township started to grow. And men came from the cities, the towns, the villages—the first of the Tata Steel men. Soon the first ingot was rolled.

That was how Tata Steel was born—and, Jamshedpur. By the endeavour of a fraternity of people aspiring, struggling and achieving. Today, Tata Steel is one of the country's largest and most progressive industrial enterprises—and Jamshedpur a city of opportunity. This is as Jamsetji Tata would have wanted it. For he firmly believed that the wealth which industry generates should benefit the people, enrich the nation.

against Mohinder Amarnath's guts and technique. As a bowler, he has still to prove that he can produce the unplayable ball from time to time, as Binny often does. Unless he enjoys a very special spell of luck in England, Suru Nayak will be one more passenger in the party. His selection has also become the centre of the controversy within the Cricket Control Board, for Bombay has six players in the touring side, whereas Ranji Trophy winners Delhi has only one (Madan Lal, who was kept out of the Test side for four years) and runners-up Karnataka has only two, Vishwanath and Kirmani.

The selection of the side reflects the skipper's preference Sunil Gavaskar is merely following the footsteps of Bishen Bedi. Under Bedi the Indian eleven often had five players from Delhi alone. Obviously, things will never change.

CHOLERA RESEARCH

Medical panel's partisan stand

Calcutta: The partisan attitude recently displayed by the Penal and Ethical Cases Committee of the West Bengal Medical Council raises serious questions about how Calcutta's slum dwellers can be protected when they are used as subjects for medical research. On 20 April after a ten-month delay, the nine-member panel conducted a preliminary hearing of the complaint by Dr S. Bhattacharya (secretary, Scientists' Association) against the director and deputy director of the National Institute of Cholera and Enteric Diseases for violating medical ethics in their 1975-76 cholera vaccine experiment on two lakh slum dwellers (SUNDAY, 7 March). In an interview to this correspondent after the 45-minute hearing at the council's Lyons Range premises, the complainant said he had been heckled by a hostile panel out to defend the accused. The accused doctors, incidentally, were not called for the hearing.

The council is yet to arrive at a decision but the gist of its observations at the hearing, as described by the complainant, gives an idea of its general stand that conducting an experiment on human subjects without informed consent is not unethical. One doctor on the panel equated the mass vaccine experiment with mass vaccination drives and seemed to see no difference between the two. Then came the corollary that it was not feasible to apply the norms of the Helsinki Declaration in this country. The doctor who said this also declared that the Drug Controller's permission was not needed for conducting human trials. Finally, non-medical persons (teachers at the Beliaghata schools whose students were given the experimental vaccine) should not be cited as witnesses in a "purely medical matter"?

Each of the above points gives rise to corresponding questions. First, how does the council's ethical committee openly contradict the ethical guidelines relating to informed consent issued by the Indian Council of Medical Research? Second, what authority does the council have to say that the Helsinki norms are not feasible and was it aware that India was a signatory to the declaration? Third, how can a panel with no legal experts pronounce on the legality of an experiment? Fourth, if non-medical persons who are at the receiving end of medical experiments should not give evidence on their own behalf, wasn't the council quite literally reducing them to the level of mute guinea pigs?

The panel's responses are, perhaps, partly explained by the fact that this is the first time that the council is handling a complaint against biomedical experiments by a research institute. The usual complaints to the council relate to unethical acts by individual private practitioners some of whom have been struck off the register. The panel's remarks suggest that while the council takes a serious view of malpractices on private patients, when these happen on a mass public scale they are not reprehensible.

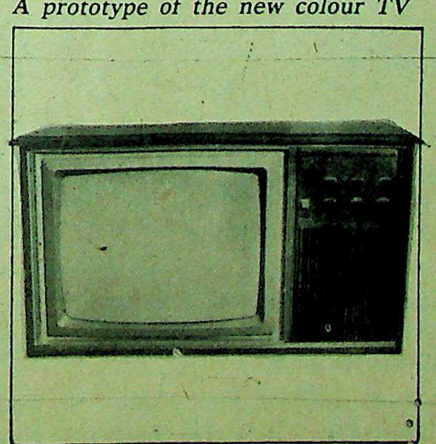
Colour TV coming soon

Calcutta: Colour TV sets costing around Rs 11,000 may be on the market by the end of the year. Telerama, a Calcutta based company, have manufactured an Indian model and the best thing about it is that 97 per cent of the components are indigenously produced. Nor does this mar the quality of the colour on the screen, which is as good as any foreign colour TV set's.

The company, a small scale joint sector unit, claims that the set is the result of a one-and-a-half year effort by a three man team of Indian engineers—all in their early thirties. While colour TV sets have been sold in India under Indian brand names before, at prices ranging from Rs 19,000 to Rs 21,000, they were largely of the knockdown and semi-knockdown variety where most parts were imported and simply assembled in the country. Their great disadvantage lay in that any repairs involving replacement of parts proved both difficult and expensive. The makers of the new colour TV set claim that their model is not only tropicalised to suit Indian weather conditions, but they have also ensured that the foreign components are available from more than one international source to avoid problems arising from changes in the government's import policy.

The Telerama set's imported parts include integrated circuits for the vertical section, the chroma section and the delay lines. The picture tube, as in all Indian TV sets, is procured through the Electronic Trade and Technology Dev. Corp , the canalising agency for the item. Altogether 15 of the 510 odd components in the TV are imported. According to a company spokesman the sets have also been tested against actual colour transmission relayed by Delhi Doordarshan.

A prototype of the new colour TV



Mr A. N. Chaudhuri, Telerama's director in charge, told SUNDAY that the production target for their colour TV sets was 1,100 sets in 1982-'83 and 2,400-4,200 sets in '83-'84, depending on when colour transmission starts in the Calcutta/Asansol area. Initially colour TVs will, it seems, have only a marginal effect on the black and white TV market—where prices range from Rs 3,000 to Rs 5,000. The projectious are that the first two years will account for the maximum number of colour TV sales, and their major sales are likely to be in Bombay, Delhi and the surrounding regions. They expect that many of their buyers will be owners of VCRs who have not bought colour TV sets because of the difficulties in getting replacements.

A demonstration of the production prototype of the colour TV set was held in Calcutta recently, where two sets, one Japanese and other Telerama, were demonstrated simultaneously. The colour reproduction in the two sets was equally good.

Probe ordered into school books purchase

Bhopal: Chief Minister Arjun Singh has announced an enquiry by the Lokayukt into what has come to be known as the "Book purchase scandal" in Madhya Pradesh, involving a senior IAS officer.

Replying to a two-hour special debate on the scandal, the chief minister told the state Assembly on 13 April that all charges regarding misconduct and corruption in the purchase of books for school libraries by the education department would be referred to the Lokayukt for an enquiry. Incidentally, this will be the first case to be officially entrusted to the newly-appointed Lokayukt.

The chief minister said that the chief secretary would also simultaneously enquire into how "some books were selected for school libraries which should not have been selected." He denied the opposition allegation that he was trying to shield the "guilty" IAS officer, Mr Ashok Vajpeyi, because of their personal friendship. Members from both sides were unanimous in launching a scathing attack on Mr Vajpeyi, the secretary of education, culture and publicity departments.

Both the ruling Congress(I) and opposition members alleged "favouriticism, irregularities and corruption" in the purchase of books worth Rs 15 lakhs by the education department this year. Many members gave instances and tabled documentary evidence which proved that publishers had supplied old editions of a number of books after changing their jackets and title pages and claimed that these were the latest editions. The government was, members alleged, cheated and charged double the original price.

Mr Vithalbhai Patel tabled instances when not a single word was changed in the books—even the errata slip was the same—which were passed off as later and costlier editions. He said that even now old editions of those books were available in the market at the old rates.

Almost all the dozen members who spoke on the subject demanded that Mr Vajpeyi should be immediately suspended and a house committee should enquire into the alleged bunglings and "misuse of public money." Mr Radharaman Bhargava (BJP), said that one-fourth of the total purchases were made from a Delhi-based and a Hapud-based publishing firm and both the proprietors were closely related to the education secretary. He alleged that two members of the selection committee "selected" their own books and 500 copies of each were purchased. While on the one hand, authors and poets belonging to the education secretary's group—Mr Vajpeyi is a poet himself—were favoured, the selection committee headed by Mr Vajpeyi summarily relected 3,873 titles in one night without even going through them, MLAs alleged.

Mr Chitrakant Jaiswal (Congress-I) regretted that while the books were purchased in the name of "acquainting school children with the works of authors and poets of Madhya Pradesh," the government purchased books of only 90 poets and writers belonging to MP. As against this, works of 190 poets and writers from outside were purchased. Many members complained that some of the books were "not fit for school children." Members read out extracts from at least one dozen books and claimed that these were obscene. When the speaker expunged one of the "obscene" extracts read out by a CPI member, one legislator quipped: "You can expunge these from the Assembly records, but what about the school libraries where children would read these?"

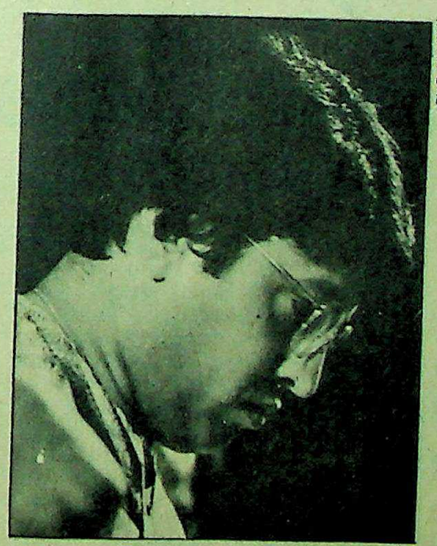
Sarod maestro protests against discrimination

Calcutta: "When I came to know that the artistes performing at the inaugural concert of the festival (of India in Britain) were paid a sum far exceeding the usual amount given by any cultural organisation in India, I was quite amazed. Whereas it gives me great pleasure and pride that the British government has honoured Indian musicians (by paying them for performing at the festival), it is also upsetting to know that the Indian government, despite adequate funds to promote culture, did not offer to pay even the regular fees which I am paid by Indian sponsors... In view of this discrimination I would like to state that I no longer wish to participate in the India Festival," wrote wellknown, handsome sarod player Ustad Amjad Ali Khan in a letter to the secretary of the Indian Council of Cultural Relations (ICCR) on 25 March 1982. The letter caused a furore and the young sarod player became the champion of the Indian artistes and musicians. He had every reason to protest: while a couple of internationally reputed Indian musicians were being paid enormous amounts for the inaugural concert the others who had been invited were being paid little for the performance.

Till the date of going to press, Ustad Amjad Ali has not received a letter from the ICCR authorities although he was told over the telephone that he would be paid for his performance in Britain. Being assured of the remuneration, Ustadji (as he is referred to by classical music lovers in India) has decided to go, after all, to play in Britain. He made sure that the others would be getting the amounts they asked for and only then would he go.



TAPAN DAS

Ustad Amjad Ali Khan: a protest

In spite of such discrimination, Ustad Amjad Ali Khan continues to propagate Indian classical music among the masses. He has established the Ustad Hafiz Ali Khan Memorial Society in 1977 which organises concerts by reputed artistes and dancers. The society is now busy setting up the Music Hall of India (a research institute of music based in Delhi, whose foundation stone was laid on 29 January 1982) which will "preserve, promote and propagate the great classical music traditions of India." Scholars at the institute will do research on the origin of the ragas. Scientists and medical specialists will study the effect of certain ragas on the human mind and body.

Ustad Amjad Ali Khan has himself started collecting the funds required for setting up the research institute by performing at different places in India for money. Even in those concerts, the tickets are moderately priced for Ustadji has two considerations in mind: popularising music and raising the prestige of the artistes in India who he considers are the "weakest sections of the society." Classical artistes must be paid for their performances because "bhukey paet par kaisey heritage rakh preserve kar saktey hain (how can one preserve one's heritage on an empty stomach)?"

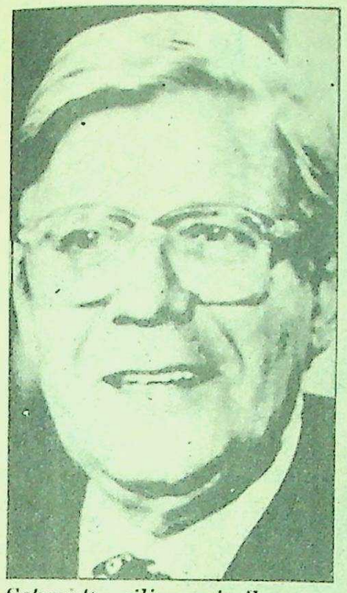
Schmidt will keep missiles in Germany



Schmidt: piling missiles

Chancellor Helmut Schmidt of West Germany has asked his Social Democratic Party to ignore the pleas for a moratorium on the deployment of new nuclear missiles in Europe. Left wingers of his party have repeatedly questioned the NATO decision on deployment of nuclear missiles. Mr Schmidt told a party conference recently: "Whoever wants to replace agreed mutual disarmament by unilateral reductions has to be told that history shows that one-sided weakness does not prevent aggression by a superior power." He also made it clear that there is no question of preventing the stationing in Europe of Pershing 2 and Cruise missiles unless the Soviet Union withdraws its "incredible armada of SS-20 rockets."

Major overhaul in KGB

In a major overhaul of the top ranks of the KGB, Soviet authorities have appointed two senior deputies to the KGB chief, General Yuri Andropov. Pravda recently listed General Georgy Isinev, 74, as the new first deputy chairman. The Red Army newspaper had on 4 April listed General Viktor Chebrikov as another deputy chairman. Kremlin watchers said they knew of no precedent for naming two people to the post and that "we are just not sure what they (the Soviets) are up to." General Andropov has held the KGB leadership since 1967 and is one of 13 members of the Soviet politburo.

US embargo on Cuba tightened

The US government has announced severe currency restrictions against Cuba." This surprising move is aimed at tightening the current trade embargo. The new rules issued by the treasury department forbid currency and credit transactions by United States citizens. These restrictions were all the more unexpected because a Cuban official had recently stated that his government was preparing for "wide ranging negotiations and agreements on mutual restraint," with the United States, especially with relation to Nicaragua.

Cypriot President turns left

President Kyprianou of Cyprus, in a political volte face, has formed an unexpected alliance with the pro-Soviet Communist Party, AKEL. Mr Kyprianou, who leads a small centre-right party had to purge his cabinet as the price for communist electoral support. The future of the British bases on the strategically important island is in peril as a result of this alignment. The AKEL is also expected to ask the President to renew his claim for more than £200 million from the British government as compensation.

Will Begin call for early elections?

Aaron Abuhatzeira, minister of labour and welfare in the Menachem Begin cabinet who was convicted of stealing government money, fraud and breach of public trust, said that he would resign. This announcement makes things easier for Mr Begin who was rather reluctant to dismiss Mr Abuhatzeira as he belonged to the Tami party on which the cabinet depended for survival. Mr Abuhatzeira, however, said he was not resigning from the Knesset (Parliament) from which he may be expelled by a majority vote only if he is sentenced to one year's imprisonment. The Tami party meanwhile set at rest all speculations by announcing that it would continue to support the government but would not refrain from early elections if Mr Begin's Likud coalition looses its majority. Observers feel that Mr Begin might call for early elections around October. Opinion polls show that his popularity is increasing.

GOOD NEWS

Sanctuary for Nilgiri mountain goat

The Tamil Nadu government has sanctioned Rs 6.42 lakhs for establishing a sanctuary for the Nilgiri tahr, a unique mountain goat now threatened with extinction. The sanctuary will be in a 78.46 sq km area in Coonoor taluk of Nilgiri district. The Nilgiri tahr, which inhabits the boulder strewn terrain of the Nilgiris, has been classified as an endangered animal under the Wildlife (Protection) Act 1972 and is included in the Red Book of the International Union for Conservaion of Nature (IUCN). According to the chief conservator of forests, Tamil Nadu, forest squads will henceforth patrol the area to prevent poaching and research on the behaviour of the mountain goat will be initiated.

Search for rare herbs

The Akhil Bharatiya Vanoshadhi Abhyas Mandal (All India Forest Medicines Study Board), led by their 85-year-old president Vaidya Raj Bapal, recently conducted a study-cum-research camp in the Abujhmarh forests in Bastar, Madhya Pradesh. The area is a storehouse of rare ayurvedic herbs and medicines. The team, consisting of leading botanists and vaidyas, identified 200 ayurvedic herbs, 20 of them, rare species.

Gall stone removal without surgery

For the first time in the country, a stone has been removed from the bile duct without surgery. This was achieved by Dr J. B. Dilawari of the Post Graduate Institute of Medical Education and Research, Chandigarh. The method followed was the insertion of an endoscope through the mouth into the stomach of the patient. This new endoscopic procedure takes only 20 minutes and requires no anaesthesia. The patient can even start eating merely six hours after the removal of the stone and can leave the hospital in two days.

Compiling knowledge

When it comes to tenacity, determination and perseverance there will be few who can match 70-year-old Binod Kanungo. For almost three decades now, he has been working on a 75 volume Oriya encyclopaedia project, covering 15,000 subjects. Literally trudging through mountains of reference material, he has singlehandedly published 30 volumes at a cost of Rs 10 lakhs with no assistance whatsoever from the government. His encyclopaedia has 3000 registered subscribers who form the main source of finance for the project. The Oriya encyclopaedia titled Jnanmandal is modelled on the lines of the Encyclopaedia Britannica. Mr Kanungo has classified and indexed reference files numbering 20,000 on every conceivable topic of human activity and endeavour. Says Mr Kanungo, "My problem is to make simple and concise notes out of the huge material." His eldest daughter Deepti (35) and three sons—Pabak (31), Deepak (26) and Alok (25)—are helping him in filing and indexing the material mostly gleaned from newspapers. Mr Kanungo feels that he has enough material to finish the remaining 45 volumes. Undaunted by this gargantuan task he has undertaken, Mr Kanungo is already on to yet another project—a four-volume encyclopaedia on the ancient culture and history of Orissa.

Khaas Baat

Amitabh Bachchan has made a final decision: he will take it easy and not work on more than five films in a year. Eventually he wants to cut down the number. Health is one of the major factors, apart from the fact that he wants quality to be the hall-mark of his films. He is now looking for "Total satisfaction as an actor, the kind of satisfaction I have yet to find."

DURGAPRASAD

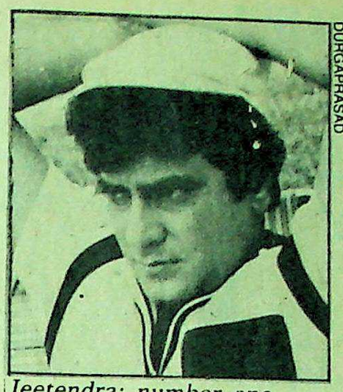
Amitabh: looking for satisfaction

What's happened to Farroque Shaikh? Recently, a young filmmaker went up to him and asked him to play a role in a film he was planning. Farooque heard him out and then quoted a price which sent the young filmmaker home. He couldn't believe what he heard. He has now decided to make the film with another actor.

DURGAPRASAD

Tina: capable of much more

If Tina Munim continues to show the indifference she is showing to her career as an actress, she will soon have to tell a sad story. Her performance in two films released recently, Yeh Vaada Raha and Rajpur have come in for a lot of criticism from people close to her. Tina still has youth on her side. She must improve if she has to last and she must improve fast. If not, she will only be there in all those gossip magazines and the roles will stop coming in.



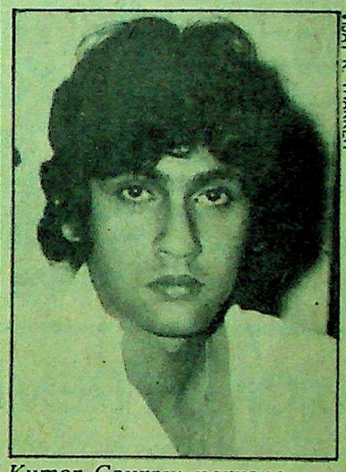
DURGAPRASAD

Jeetendra: number one

According to reliable sources the real number one is Jeetendra, not Amitabh Bachchan. There are times when there are three Jeetendra-starrers released the same day all over the country, and most of them are good runners. Jeetendra has not had a flop in a very long time. His success story has gained importance after he conquered the south. In Madras they don't start a film in Hindi without consulting Jeetendra. It is only when Jeetendra rejects an offer that it goes to someone else.

Sarika continues to slip. The last three films in which Sarika starred proved to be great disasters at the box-office and Sarika herself had very insignificant roles in all of them. Apparently, Sarika is after the money and the big banners and is not very concerned about her career as an actress. Ask Sarika why she is slipping and she says, "I am not slipping. Who told you that? In fact, I am getting better roles now. Next year is going to be a very crucial year for me. So, I am keeping my fingers crossed." That's what Sarika has been saying for the last three years!

May is going to be a very important month for the career of Kumar Gaurav. His second film, in which he is playing a role which is "serious and different, a great deal different from my first film," is to be released. The film, Teri Kasam, directed by A. C. Tirlogchander. Kumar Gaurav (also known as Bunty) has some thirty films on hand and all those thirty films depend on what happens to this one film. "I was never as nervous then, as I am now. The release of Love Story didn't really frighten me. But the release of Teri Kasam, is really giving me sleepless nights," Gaurav says.



VIJAY K. THAKKER

Kumar Gaurav: nervous

There is a cold war going on between Shabana Azmi and Smita Patil and they were the best of friends once. The war started some time in 1980 and it is only becoming worse with time. Smita specially blames Shabana for loosing some very good roles. It will, therefore, be more interesting to see them act together in Artha.

Shabana and Smita: worst of enemies

RAJU UPADHYAY

DURGAPRASAD

Dr Balumathi is getting busy with the production of her third film. This talented Telugu actress has tried her hand at writing, directing and producing and is currently engaged in making a mythological film for children. We only hope that this film will not meet with the fate of her earlier ventures: Rachaitri and Okanati Ratri. Both the films were completed two years ago and are yet to be released.

So what if Saritha prefers Rajnikant as a person? She still thinks there is no one to beat Kamalahasan, when it comes to acting. Coming from Saritha, herself a wonderful actress, this is indeed a compliment to Kamal. According to the actress, Rajni needs to improve his diction, which at the moment, is quite indistinct.

South Indian film producers are angry with the film censors. About 25 films have been held up because the censors have sent them to the revising committee in Bombay. The producers are mad because the "censors are objecting to simple fights and sex scenes." What irks them is that even scenes which show a character's belief in superstition are being censored.

Jayamalini seems to be the bane of the censors. In the Telugu version of the film Jayamalini, in which she plays the lead role, there are over 70 cuts. The film has not yet been released because it is still in the clutches of the censors.

'I don't have much faith in marriage,' said Pratap Pothen when asked if he was going to be a confirmed bachelor. The question was justified, coming at a time when almost all the other actors have jumped the broom.

Seema is back in action after the birth of her baby. The first film after the delivery is in Malayalam and Seema is planning to leave for the United States around the middle of May for the shooting. The film will be directed by I. V. Sasi, her husband, and probably the most ardent fan the actress has.

MEERUT: About a dozen army dogs were used by a colonel to foil the house-grabbing move by a Congress(I) legislator here yesterday (14 April). The annexe of the local Patiala House, in which the aged mother of the colonel used to live had been allotted to the legislator who accompanied by about two dozen supporters occupied the house. The colonel, who is living in his official residence in the cantonment area, rushed to the scene and tried in vain to persuade the legislator. The colonel then brought a dozen trained dogs and let them loose in the house. Within no time, the legislator and his men were on their heels. Later the legislator alleged that the colonel was occupying the annexe illegally. However, this morning the colonel took army men and trained dogs in mufti to throw away the household goods of the legislator who accused the colonel of misusing armymen and dogs—Hindustan Times (B. B. Seth, Alwar)

TRIVANDRUM: The relay satyagraha going on here for the last four years—1484 days to be exact—by the Kerala Nadar Mahajana Sangham "ended" today, with the sipping of lemon juice offered to a satyagrahi by the Congress(I) leader, Mr K. Karunakaran. However, the relay satyagraha is "still continuing" with a member of the sangham's youth wing taking it up saying that the demands for which the agitation had been started four years ago had not been met. The satyagraha was started on 14 March 1978 demanding reservation of jobs for nadars commensurate with the percentage of the community's strength in the state's population and other such demands—Hindu (Letha Nair, Trivandrum)

SIDDIPET: The Siddipet College lecturers unanimously decided to withdraw the invigilation by the staff members. They alleged that the students appearing for the examinations have been abusing, intimidating and threatening the staff members. Student leaders say that the syllabus has not been completed due to inadequate staff. They also demanded the withdrawal of police from the college campus—Indian Express (P. Janardhana Rao, Hyderabad)

MALDA (West Bengal): Three women, suspected of practising witchcraft, were beaten to death by villagers at Mushidhap village, the superintendent of police, Mr Asit Choudhury said yesterday (11 April). Four villagers had taken ill and the people there believed that they would not recover unless the three women, all aged over 50 were done away with, the SP said—Times of India (O. P. Bajaj, Varanasi)

SIMLA: A student who received his degree at the seventh convocation of the Himachal University yesterday (14 April) turned to the audience, held up the degree and said the certificate had no value. He then displayed a paper hung around his neck which read, "university authorities, we hate you. You are playing with our lives." The vice-chancellor, Dr L. P. Singh who had presented the degree told the student that within a year, he would know the value of the degree. Among those who witnessed the incident were the union finance minister, Mr Pranab Mukherjee and the Himachal Pradesh Governor, Mr A. N. Banerji—Hindu (B. Suryanarayanan, Madras)

GADAG (Karnataka): Due to non-availability of tickets the city bus service has been stopped since 12 April. There is no possibility of resuming the service unless they get tickets from Hubli or Bangalore, it is learnt.—Deccan Herald (D. V. Srinivas, Bagalkot)

NAWADA (Bihar): A 10-year-old boy of village Sagma in Warsaliganj district and son of a college teacher was allegedly kidnapped on 16 April by a wealthy man of village Sakra and married to a 22-year-old girl, according to the police. A case has been registered and a vigorous search for the boy is on—Indian Nation (S. M. Fakhrullah, Gomoh, Bihar)

NEW DELHI: An inquiry by the Central Bureau of Investigation has been ordered into the reported presence of human hair in a lunch packet and dead insects in the pudding container of a passenger on board a domestic Indian Airlines flight last December and serving of rotten omlette on a Calcutta-Delhi flight in January this year. This was announced in the Lok Sabha today (16 April) by Mr A. P. Sharma, minister for tourism and civil aviation—Statesman (R. Sekar, Calcutta)

PHAGWARA: Beware, before you open doors to a woman at night. One Jeeta of Beer Dhandoli village let a seemingly helpless woman in, who said she wanted to stay for a night. And along came a gang of armed men. They robbed the kind hostess of gold and cash worth Rs 20,000. Panchayat's have asked villagers through public announcements not to open doors at night to any unknown woman—Indian Express (Shandil Prabhu, Solan)

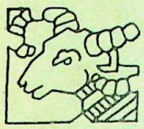
Sunday week

Beginning 9 May

By AMRITLAL



ARIES (15 April—14 May) This should prove to be a successful week for you, on the whole. The domestic front will remain calm and be a source of joy and inspiration for you. A lucky week for those in service: chances are that you will be promoted this week. A special word of suggestion to businessmen: this week your prospects are good, so do not hesitate to enter into new deals. A letter will bring good news. This is not a good week for romance. Good dates: 11, 12 and 13. Lucky numbers: 1, 2 and 5. Favourable direction: South.

TAURUS (15 May—14 June) Except for the cloud looming over your domestic front, this will prove to be, by and large, a favourable week for you. Prospects are bright for businessmen. However, a word of advice: do not take unnecessary risks. For those in service, this is a week of opportunities. Make every effort to push forth your plans and you will be crowned with success. Keep a watch on your health. Romance is not well signified. Check extravagance. Good dates: 9, 11 and 13. Lucky numbers: 3, 4 and 8. Favourable direction: East.

GEMINI (15 June—14 July) This is a week of mixed fortunes. You will have good reasons to feel nervous and anxious. The attitude of friends and members of your family may worry you. You are likely to feel lonely in the course of the week. Friends and relatives will shun you. However, do not get depressed. This is a very good week for romance. So seek the love and happiness you have been missing, from your beloved. Watch your health closely this week. Good dates: 12, 13 and 15. Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 6. Favourable directions: Southeast and Northwest.

CANCER (15 July—14 August) Financially, this is a pretty favourable week for you. You will be in a position to repay most of your debts. This is not a good week for making drastic changes. However, in case it is absolutely necessary for you to make changes, make sure that you consult your elders before making any moves. Do not get upset if you are opposed by members of your family. Look forward to a letter that will bring good news. Good dates: 9, 12 and 15. Lucky numbers: 3, 6 and 9. Favourable direction: West.

LEO (15 August—14 September) An excellent opportunity lies in store for you towards the end of the week. Take full advantage of it and you will have luck smiling on you. This will be a very lucky week for you. Your plans are likely to be praised by those in authority. If you are in business, lucrative deals are coming your way. Friends and relatives will rally around and keep you busy during the evenings. Watch your health. Check extravagance. Good dates: 9, 11 and 13. Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 7. Favourable direction: North

VIRGO (15 September—14 October) This is a week of bright prospects for those involved in matters of the heart. Your partner will be extremely understanding, so do not lose time in making the proposal you have in mind. The professional front looks bright. Luckier ones among you may get a promotion. Businessmen, too will make rapid progress. However, a word of warning: do not enter into controversies or disputes. Watch you health and check extravagance. Good dates: 10, 12 and 14, Lucky numbers: 3, 6 and 9. Favourable direction: West.

LIBRA (15 October—14 November) This may turn out to be a rather disappointing week for you. Your current assignment may fall through. A new undertaking may not yield the results you have been expecting. Do not feel unduly worried if you have to depend on your friends to a very large extent. Relatives, may not be very dependable this week. A word of advice: try not to depend too much on others, but be determined and brave the crisis with fortitude. Good dates: 11, 13 and 15. Lucky numbers: 1, 4 and 8. Favourable direction: East.

SCORPIO (15 November—14 December) A week of excellent opportunities awaits you if you are involved in creative pursuits. Do not hesitate to launch a new venture: it will turn out to be successful. Young ones among you are advised to take initiative and plunge forth. Financially, this is a lucky period for you: you will be in a position to repay your debts. A letter towards the end of the week will bring you good news. Check extravagance. Good dates: 9, 12 and 15. Lucky numbers: 3, 6 and 9. Favourable direction: Northeast.

SAGITTARIUS (15 December—14 January) This week you will be bothered by innumerable problems. A journey may help solve some of your problems. Others are advised to let your intuition be your guide this week. This is a good week for creative artists. A new assignment will keep you busy and help you win the praise of those in authority. The domestic front will remain peaceful. However, do not take too many liberties with your sweetheart. Good dates: 9, 10 and 14. Lucky numbers: 5, 7 and 9. Favourable direction: Southeast.

CAPRICORN (15 January—14 February) Most of your pressing problems are likely to be solved this week. Moreover, your efforts will be crowned with success. However, a word of warning: your enemies will be very active this week, so be on your guard. The financial front does not look particularly bright. You may have to make fresh loans. However, the domestic front will remain calm and be a source of joy and inspiration for you. Romance is well signified this week. Good dates: 10, 13 and 14. Lucky numbers: 1, 5 and 6. Favourable direction: West.

AQUARIUS (15 February—14 March) A week of mixed fortune is in store for you. Unwise investment may lead to financial losses. On the other hand, those involved in matters of the heart are likely to have a very pleasant time this week. Your partner will be complying and make this a happy week for you. Elders and those in authority are going to treat you with respect. Children will turn out to be very demanding. Caution: do not lose your temper. Check extravagance. Good dates: 12, 13 and 15. Lucky numbers: 3, 7 and 8. Favourable directions: South and Northeast.

PISCES (15 March—14 April) Pisceans, keep a sharp watch on your health this week. The domestic front is going to pose severe problems for you. You are going to have some very serious misunderstanding with your spouse. Do not lose your temper, but deal with the situation tactfully, the storm will pass. Those on the lookout for work may find a job. Others will be praised for your efforts. Check extravagance. Good dates: 9, 11 and 14. Lucky numbers: 1, 3 and 9. Favourable direction: East.

For those born between 15 April and 14 May: Most of you are born with a strong sense of independence. Consequently, you are attracted towards business rather than the services. You make successful businessmen especially when your business deals with paper, publishing houses, jute, cotton, silk or items of luxury. Success comes to you easily, but you have a tendency of taking undue risks. As a result; you frequently suffer from financial losses. It is not surprising if you run into enormous debts. However, debts are not a permanent feature and you repay them with an uncanny regularity.

You have famous brothers; but the strongest influence in your life comes from your mother. Your versatility takes you far in life. Although few of you have a smooth beginning to your career.

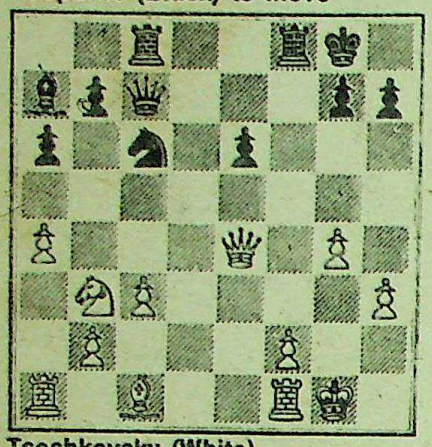
Chess

Kasparov (Black) to move



Tseshkovsky (White)

Having written last week about Kasparov's joint victory in the Soviet championship, I began to think it a little unfair to have published one of his losses, so today justice will be done.

Kasparov's dynamic style of play is particularly impressive when he adopts the Sicilian Defence. His marvellous feel for the initiative tells him exactly when he can switch to the counter-offensive and the sharp tactical nature of the positions suits him. In the following game he demonstrates the power of the freeing move P–Q4, which as anyone who has read the good books will know is the classic counter-thrust in the Sicilian. The trouble is that in practice you tend to get lumbered with an isolated queen's pawn for nothing and a sudden revulsion for chess books. The point to be grasped is that P–Q4 is only a legitimate move when White's position has in some way been weakened or overextended. Kasparov shows good timing and devastating accuracy in the ensuing counter-attack.

White: Tseshkovsky Black: Kasparov
Sicilian Defence

1 P–K4	P–QB4	4 NxP	N–QB3
2 N–KB3	P–K3	5 N–QB3	P–Q3
3 P–Q4	PxP	6 P–KN3

A solid if conservative system. The only trouble is that Tseshkovsky's intentions are neither solid nor conservative.

6 . . .	N–B3	9 P–QR4	O–O
7 B–N2	B–Q2	10 QN–K2
8 O–O	B–K2

Embarking on a plan which smacks of artificiality. Normal would be R–K1, B–K3 or even P–QN3.

10 . . .	R–B1	12 P–R3	Q–B2
11 P–QB3	P–QR3	13 P–KN4	P–Q4!

Justified by the weakening effect of White's last move

14 PxP	NxP	15 BxN

If White is not going to admit that his 13th move was stupid he must play this.

15 . . .	PxB	16 N–B4	B–QB4

Black cannot protect his QP, nor does he want to. Its disappearance will give his pieces the scope they are looking for.

17 N–N3	B–R2	18 QxP	B–K3!

A beautiful move, forcing White to open the KB file against his own king. With the peeling away of White's kingside defences, pawns become irrelevant.

19 NxB	PxN	20 Q–K4

After 20 QxP+ K–R1 White would have no good way to parry the threat of Q–N6+. Now he plans to meet the check with Q–N2, but he is in for a surprise. (DIAGRAM)

20 . . .	RxP!	22 Q–N2	BxR+
21 RxR	Q–N6+	23 K–B1

A last desperate attempt to exchange the queens. If 23 K–R1, then 21 . . . Q–Q6 22 QxB R–B1 23 Q–N2 R–B8+ 24 K–R2 Q–Q3+ 25 Q–N3 R–R8+ winning the queen.

23 . . .	Q–K4!

Decisive. If 24 QxB R–B1 or 24 KxB R–B1+ 25 K–N1 Q–K8+ 26 K–R2 R–B7.

24 B–B4	QxB	26 Resigns.

MICHAEL STEAN

Bridge

So many unexpected things happened on this deal from the final of the world championship that I think of it as the 'however' hand.

Dealer, South Game all

	♠ A 4 ♥ A 10 8 7 6 2 ♦ Q ♣ J 10 9 7
♠ Q J 7 3 ♥ 4 ♦ 6 5 4 3 ♣ 8 6 5 4	N W E S	♠ K 10 9 8 2 ♥ J 5 3 ♦ A J 8 2 ♣ 2
	♠ 6 5 ♥ K Q 9 ♦ K 10 9 7 ♣ A K Q 3

Most players would be happy to open One Club on the South hand. However, in the match between America and Pakistan Levin preferred 1NT and the bidding continued:

SOUTH	WEST	NORTH	EAST
Levin	Nisar	Solodar	Nishat
1NT	No	2 ♦	No
2NT	No	3 ♥	No
4 ♣	No	4 ♠	No
5 ♣	No	6 ♣	No
No	No

North's Two Diamonds was forcing Stayman. The players did well to finish in clubs, for if the trumps are 3-2 Six Clubs is a better spot than Six Hearts, which always fails against a spade lead.

Instead of leading a spade, West chose a heart. This sort of lead has a habit of killing partner's Q x x or similar. Now it presented South with 12 tricks: he has only to draw trumps and lead a diamond. However, Levin miscounted his tricks and after two rounds of clubs he played a diamond and sustained a ruff. According to Phillip Alder's report in the Bulletin, Levin left the table at the end of the session still unaware of his error.

At the other table South again declined to open One Club and the bidding went:

SOUTH	WEST	NORTH	EAST
Zia	Rodwell	Masood	Meckstroth
1 ♦	No	1 ♥	1 ♠
3 ♥	3 ♠	4NT	No
5 ♦	No	6 ♥	No
No	No

North's 4NT was, I would say, amateurish: the contract will not depend on Aces. East did lead a spade, so it was a 'flat board'.

President and Mrs Reddy: enjoying the last few days in office

PRESIDENT GOES SIGHTSEEING

PRESIDENT Neelam Sanjiva Reddy is finally reconciled to the inevitable: he will not serve a second term in office. So as the search for his successor is on (various names from R. Venkataraman to B. D. Jatti are being mentioned), he is making the best of his remaining few days in office sightseeing. He came to Calcutta on 28 April without any official engagement. He spent the day visiting the traditional pilgrimage spots like Dakshineswar and Belur and even took a look at the Botanical gardens!

BIJU WILL QUIT LOK DAL

ALTHOUGH Mr Biju Patnaik has been readmitted to the Lok Dal, can there be any real reconciliation between him and Chaudhury Charan Singh? The answer is a definite no but both of them are maintaining a tactful silence on the issue for the time being. Mr Patnaik is quite certain that the Chaudhury will expel him from the Lok Dal soon after the forthcoming Assembly elections. Mr Charan Singh, on his part, is equally certain that Mr Patnaik will not give in to him and will definitely not ditch Mr Chandra Shekhar. It is evident that Mr Biju Patnaik will join the Janata Party soon after 19 May. In such an eventuality, the Orissa unit of the Janata Party will be the most embarrassed, for its leaders had declared with great fervour at the Ahmedabad session of the unity talks that they would be ready to join hands with anybody except Patnaik. Mr Samarendra Kundu (former union minister and Janata leader in Orissa) had, at that time, also threatened to quit the party if Mr Biju Patnaik was taken in.

KESRI'S BLUFF CALLED

MR Sitaram Kesri, AICC(I) treasurer and union minister, has been particularly vocal in his criticism of Maneka Gandhi since the saas-bahu conflict came out in the open. He has been consistently maintaining that Maneka played no part in Sanjay's political life and that the opposition is using her for their own ends. Last month, while he was holding forth at his vitriolic best in the central hall of Parliament, someone at last managed to put him in his place. It was Janata Party president Chandra Shekhar who cut him short with these words: "Why do you talk such nonsense? What use does the opposition have for a fight between the mother-in-law and daughter-in-law? If you don't keep quiet now, I will have to reveal all those things that you used to tell me against Indira Gandhi and Sanjay during the days of the Janata government. Shall I repeat those very words with which you used to abuse Sanjay and his mother?" Mr Sitaram Kesri was dumbstruck and quietly left the place without uttering another word.

SONDEEP SHANKAR

Kesri: vendetta against Maneka

FREE FOR ALL AT CONG(I) MEETING

ON the eve of the Lok Sabha byelection in Bayana constituency of Rajasthan, the state government has gone all out to win over the people of Dholpur which forms an Assembly segment of the constituency. It has decided to make Dholpur into a full-fledged district. For this announcement which was to be made by chief minister Shiv Charan Mathur, a meeting was organised on 15 April, at which former chief minister Jagannath Pahadia was also present. He could not be left out of the meeting as the byelection was necessitated by his resignation as MP on becoming chief minister. But just as he got up to speak, the supporters of Mr Mathur and Congress(I) MP Rajesh Pilot started heckling him. Mr Pahadia could not finish his speech. The meeting ended in a free for all between the pro-Mathur and pro-Pahadia groups. If this is the state of affairs in the ruling party then will the creation of any number of new districts help?

REWARDED FOR MISCONDUCT

WHAT happens to Youth Congress(I) functionaries who fall foul of the law but still remain in the good books of the party leadership? They get kicked upstairs. Mr Jagdish Sehgal was recently removed from the presidentship of the East Delhi Youth Congress(I) district committee after he had been arrested for trying to occupy a piece of land at Shahadra at gun point. At the Delhi Youth Congress(I) meeting on 24 April addressed by Mr Rajiv Gandhi, president Ghulam Nabi Azad announced that Mr Sehgal was being appointed to a higher post: he was being made general secretary of the Delhi Youth Congress(I)! The meeting was also marked by very vocal display of disaffection with party affairs. Mr Rajiv Gandhi had to sit and listen to party workers saying that they were being "treated like bonded labour." The president of the Sadar district committee added, "We have been betrayed. Please save us from being sold."

Bird watching was my scene, until I learnt to Tingle with them.

Mugpot.

When a poor guy slogs harder than the rest for the Eco paper, the guys at college call him "Mugpot".

The girls never smiled at me or gave me 'The Look'. They'd turn their backs on me...and sniff.

The only girl who ever spoke to me was my sister.

But her friends wanted my notes. Oh, yes, they wanted my notes alright. Her friends never asked me, they'd ask her. I was so fed up.

I took up the next best thing. Birdwatching.

Kingfishers and humming birds.

One day, while watching Bul Buls, my life changed.

My eyes were glued to the binoculars, when something entirely different came into focus.

Two neat numbers were strolling down the road towards my house. One of them was my pesky sister. The other...whew! The other was a Number 12. (If you've seen Bo Derek, you know what I mean.)

I ran inside, drenched myself with after shave (Brut!). And my arms being terribly under-nourished, I rolled my sleeves down.

A cry of 'Mugseee' shrilled out. My voice quavered out an answer. Then the girls were in the doorway. "Mugsy, my friend wants to borrow..."

"Hi!" said The Vision.

My hands were wet and my heart was on its worst behaviour. "You look ill," said The Vision, and the notes slipped out of my hands and scattered over the floor.

"Why, I'm fine," I said, trying to growl from the pit of my stomach.

"But you do look feverish," The Dream insisted. Just then my sister left the room. The 'Dream' leaned towards me and whispered, "Say, I know something that will really perk you up...

"Have you ever Tingled?"

I almost choked. Was I hearing things. "Ting...Tingle...heh...heh ...well. I'd love to." My throat felt like sand-paper.

My sister returned and they whispered among themselves. I saw my sister nodding vigorously. She went to the fridge and returned with three chilled bottles of Tingler.

"Hey!" I said, "that stuff is strictly for the birds and the weight-watchers."

"It's for everybody," the girls purred. "And you're going to Tingle."

"Now, take a sip, and concentrate on your tongue." I took a longish sip, and felt the delicious flavour of chilled, tangy lemons... mmm...lovely.

"Don't swallow. Swirl your tongue around. Right! Can you feel it? Huh? Can you feel the Tingle?"

I rolled my tongue around...and a million bubbles popped against my palate...and then I felt it. A Tingling sensation spreading slowly all over. It was Wow! In sheer excitement, I burst out:

"I'm Tingling!"

"Keep going," she said. "Take small sips and concentrate on the flavour." I felt a gradual flow of confidence in my veins. My voice lost its quaver, and my knees didn't dance.

When we finished, Sis ran off to get another three bottles of T.

I sat there like a puppy looking deep into the eyes of "12".

And then, (Heaven must look kindly on me), the lights blew out.

Thank God for power failures.

Lime-Lemon
Artificially flavoured.

Get the taste that Tingles.

26 September- 2 October '82

In two years, the Congress(I)-ruled state of Andhra Pradesh—one of the most secure and stable states for Mrs Gandhi—has witnessed the rule of four chief ministers. Mrs Gandhi removed Dr Channa Reddy and inducted Mr T. Anjaiah. With charges of inefficiency piling up against him, Mr Anjaiah was given the marching orders. In came Mrs Gandhi's handpicked man, Mr B. Venkataram. And in less than 200 days, the Prime Minister found that her choice had been a wrong one. Why are chief ministers being changed so often? Was the change in the Andhra Pradesh leadership effected because of the impending Assembly elections? SUNDAY correspondents piece together the downfall of Bhavanam Venkataram and analyse the political implications. Page 16

EXCLUSIVE

By KULDIP NAYAR

A government should not glorify a language

What the chief ministers of Hindi-speaking states are trying to do may be good for Hindi but not for the country's emotional integration. Their zeal for greater use of Hindi in their own areas may create an unfavourable reaction in non-Hindi states. And even if their intentions are honest they may unwittingly divide the country into Hindi-India and non-Hindi India.

The effort is a sequel to a closed-door meeting of the chief ministers of Madhya Pradesh, Rajasthan, Bihar, Haryana and Himachal Pradesh—all of them have Hindi as their official language—earlier this year. Mr Vishwanath Pratap Singh, the then UP chief minister, was the host and the meeting was held in New Delhi. The purpose was to adopt "a policy" on the use of a uniform type of Hindi in government work in Hindi-speaking states. (The minutes of the meeting were not made available to even a Lok Sabha member who asked for them in a question on 31 March this year.)

Very few can object to the meeting's decision that "simple and easily understandable terms be used in government work." In fact, the Hindi terms coined—thanks to the followers of Dr Raghuvira, a Hindi zealot, who died nearly two decades ago—are so Sanskritised that they are beyond the comprehension of the common man. The Hindi equivalent of computer is so long that the time taken in writing or speaking it is enough for a computer to work out a difficult proposition.

The meeting's decision to set up an officer-level committee of Hindi-speaking states for adopting uniform Hindi in government work is also unexceptionable. However, it is a duplication of work because the Hindi directorate in the home ministry and the office of the official language commission in New Delhi are spending much time and money in doing the same thing. While introducing Hindi in various government departments, they are evolving terminology and appropriate equivalents. (There were more central government servants doing work in Hindi during the Janata period than today).

Where the meeting has gone grievously wrong is in its recommendations which go beyond the language issue. The meeting has recommended that "the question of naming roads etc., after the names of eminent writers be considered." Apart from the fact that the practice of changing names of roads is a foolish exercise, the recommendation, if implemented, may demarcate the country even roadwise, each state having roads by the name of the literary figures of its own official language.

Another recommendation in fact dilutes the language policy followed so far. It wants the use of Hindi for correspondence among Hindi-speaking states to be "made effective." The formula devised during the prime ministership of Shastri—and non-Hindi states vigorously agitated for it—was that any state or, for that matter, any individual was free to address a state or the centre in English or Hindi and that the reply would be in the language of the letter sent. A Hindi-speaking state should be free to send its communication to other Hindi-speaking states in English (there are officials from non-Hindi states). If only Hindi is used in Hindi-speaking states for all purposes, non-Hindi states can also gang up against this practice.

And for the meeting to decide that "all posssible steps be taken for making the Third World Hindi Conference in Delhi a success" is to play with fire. The Tamil Nadu government's association with the World Tamil Conference was bad enough, for Hindi-speaking states to follow suit would be worse. Their action can have wider repercussions because fears about the imposition of Hindi can revive. Imagine all states holding world conferences for their languages.

A government should have nothing to do with a conference to glorify a particular language. It is a chauvinistic act and can lead to pitting one state against another or one segment of a population against the other since there are different linguistic groups in every state. The very idea of a meeting of chief ministers of only Hindi-speaking states was ill conceived. Nobody thought of its implications: suppose non-Hindi states were to have a meeting to formulate a policy on the use of the other official language, English. Even if Hindi-speaking states have a uniform policy on Hindi, how does that help Hindi or the country as a whole?

I have always held that the greatest harm to Hindi has been done by zealots of Hindi. They spoilt things when the non-Hindi population was coming round to accepting Hindi. All over the south thousands of people were learning Hindi with official encouragement in the late Forties and Fifties. Mr Rajagopalachari, who became India's first governor-general, was in the forefront of the movement for spreading Hindi. Dakshini Pracharik Nidhi, with Mahatma Gandhi's blessings, did a commendable job and continued to do so long after India won freedom.

Then came the Hindi agitation in the mid '60s in UP and elsewhere in the north. As a reaction to that came the anti-Hindi agitation in the south. Hindi received a setback from which it is yet to recover. Many private institutions in the south have begun teaching Hindi and thousands have again started learning the language. Now, again Hindi zealots are spoiling their cause by holding meetings like the one held in Delhi.

True, Hindi has to replace English one day, not because Hindi is superior to other regional languages but because it is understood by the majority of Indians. In a democracy where numbers count, a language of the few made "national" cannot but make a mockery of the system. But Hindiwallas have missed the bus; now they must wait till the non-Hindi population is ready to adopt Hindi. Exclusive attempts to "push" Hindi will only further harm Hindi.

Tussle between Azad and Rajiv Gandhi

Dharam Vir Jayner

Rajiv Gandhi and Azad: disagreement

Ghulam Nabi Azad, the new deputy law minister, and Mr Rajiv Gandhi have had their first tussle, it is reliably learnt. The disagreement concerns Capt. Davar, a service officer, who had resigned and joined the Indian Youth Congress(I) as its press adviser. Mr Gandhi had wished to appoint him as the joint secretary of the organisation. This, however, was strongly opposed by Mr Azad, president of the IYC(I) who, apprehensive of losing his influence in the IYC(I), did everything he could to thwart the move. The result: Capt. Davar now finds himself in an innocuous post, assisting Mr Arun Nehru at the Sanjay Gandhi Memorial Trust. The first round, it seems, has gone to Mr Azad.

Parthasarathi planned PM's tour

While the foreign office and the PM's secretariat are officially responsible for the planning of Mrs Gandhi's tours abroad, the visit to Moscow is being handled by Mr G. Parthasarathi, the adviser, foreign affairs although he is not a signatory to the Official Secrets Act, Mrs Gandhi's programme in Moscow has been worked out between the ubiquitous Mr Parthasarthi and the Soviet ambassador in New Delhi.

IB makes a faux pas

The top brass of the intelligence bureau have received a dressing down from the Prime Minister because of their failure to correctly report the antecedents of a newly inducted union deputy minister. After the swearing-in ceremony of 2 September, Mrs Gandhi learnt to her dismay that one of the new deputy ministers was having an affair with an Indian lady who acts as the honorary consul for a small Indian Ocean republic, in New Delhi. Though the two are not formally married, they have entered into a contractual marriage popularly known as maitri karar at Ahmedabad (where such "marriages" are common). There is nothing wrong in this kind of a relationship, except that a minister cannot be expected to truly adhere to his oath of office and secrecy when the woman in his life has open links with a foreign country.

RSS to control two newspapers in MP

The Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS) has decided to directly control all newspapers which formally back the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP). It plans to begin this process in Madhya Pradesh, where the BJP is certain it will be able to snatch power from the Congress(I) in the 1985 elections. It is with this end in view that the party leadership has selected Bhopal as the venue of their annual session at the end of this year. The newspapers in question are: Yugdharma, a Hindi daily published from Jabalpur and Raipur and Swadesh a Hindi daily published from Indore, Bhopal and Gwalior. Though many BJP and RSS leaders are shareholders of the companies which run the papers, the papers are running at a loss. The RSS leader, Mr Bala Saheb Deoras, has posted one of his most trusted lieutenants to oversee the running of the papers. The lieutenant does not have an official designation, nor is a member of the company, but his authority over the finances, and editorial management will be paramount.

IAS vs IPS in Maharashtra

The IAS bureaucrats in the home ministry, government of Mahrashtra, seem to be locked in a power struggle with the top brass of the Indian Police Service (IPS) in the state. Though the centre has directed that the seniormost officer of the IPS cadre in the state be appointed as the director general of police, a post created in Maharashtra from 1 July 1982, no one has yet been appointed. The two persons eligible for this position are Mr Nagarkar, head of the home guards, who is due to retire from the police force in October 1982, and second-in-line is Mr K.P. Medhkar, presently the inspector general of police. The hitch is that the rank of director general of police is equivalent to that of a secretary. The bureaucrats in the home ministry do not favour this idea as their importance in the law and order controlling machinery would decrease. The IAS officials have been opposing the creation of this post for over a year, and now that it has been created they are delaying the appointment.

Changes in PM's secretariat?

The recent cabinet reshuffle does not seem to have satiated Mrs Gandhi's zest for the game of musical chairs. She is reportedly contemplating some changes among the senior bureaucrats in her secretariat. Dr P.C. Alexander, the principal secretary to the PM, is being tipped for a gubernatorial assignment. His place is to be taken by Mr Abid Hassan, presently the union commerce secretary.

Press Bill examined

I am filled with admiration for your bold cover story, Mr Bihar CM, please jail us for this issue (22 August), against Dr Jagannath Mishra's misguided tirade against the press. The manner in which the Bill was carried through the Bihar Assembly and the Editors Guild team's discussion with the chief minister, totally reveals the exact stuff that Dr Mishra is made of. The Bill is not merely anti-press, it is anti-people too. In your fight against it, you have full support from all the freedom loving people of the country. Let there be no letup.
Kamal Laddha, Bangalore

By a single issue of your magazine, you have managed to rouse the conscience of thousands of SUNDAY readers. We are spellbound.
K. A. Balakrishnan, Madras

The Press Bill is yet another evidence of the extent to which the ruling party fears and hates the press—the only organ of the mass media largely independent of government control. It is only the press which is relentlessly exposing the corruption and ineptitude of the country's 'leaders.' The President must refrain from giving his consent to the Bill, for it would amount to signing the death warrant of parliamentary democracy in India.
Sourish Bhattacharyya, New Delhi

Your cover heading was a brilliant satire on the entire Press Bill, and it has become the talk of the town here in Patna. You must also comment on Mrs Gandhi's unholy alliance with 'Lord Jagannath.'
Gyan Prakash, Patna

Forgive him Lord, for he knows not what he does!
Unnikrishnan Nair, Cuttack

The report from the Editors Guild was a magnificent piece of journalism, though I'm quite certain that the jaundiced eye of Dr Jagannath Mishra will find a 'yellow' hue in it. Your team of writers have done a great service to the readers by providing us a bit of the Bihar CM's stench.
Sanjay Somani, Calcutta

On going through the cover story one could immediately realise what exactly it is that the Bihar CM is after. We are totally with the journalists.
N. Sharma, Rourkela

Congratulations to SUNDAY. Please carry on your crusade against the Mishras of this nation, resolutely. We are all with you.
S. Rao and S. S. Rao, Calcutta

Being a student of journalism, I have learnt from SUNDAY's cover story heading what exactly we can expect from politicians like Dr Jagannath Mishra.
Tish K. Malhotra, New Delhi

Is the Bihar chief minister trying to prove that the pen, in fact, is not mighter than the lathi?
R. K. Bhowmik, New Delhi

Is it a Press Bill or a 'suppress Bill'?
Malay Nath, Barrackpore

Obviously, Dr Mishra has moved the Press Bill because he is convinced about one thing—that he is fit to be described only in unprintable words.
N. Madhavan, New Delhi

Your cover story synchronised with public opinion. It is publications like yours, which have been regularly exposing the CM's misdeeds that will go into the bad books of Dr Mishra.
Shambhu Tiwary, Jamshedpur

Will your challenge provoke the chief minister to respond? But surely, you should have dared the 'Empress' herself rather than her minion, for she certainly knows and supports what her sycophants do.
A. K. Rakshit, Bombay

What Dr Mishra has lost sight of,is the fact that journalists in a democratic country cannot and should not operate as timorous sycophants in deference to the wishes of the ruling party. Eternal vigilance as the price of liberty is indeed a time-tested truth. Similarly, a wide-awake press in a democratic country, which is never afraid to call a spade a spade, actually acts as a safety valve for safeguarding its very democracy. If it were not for a free press, President Nixon would not have left after Watergate; Mr Antulay would have remained solid as a rock in Maharashtra, despite his ignominous trusts.
Sushil Kumar Ganguly, Serampore

Does Dr Jagannath Mishra want to figuratively blind the eyes of the pressmen as his men literally did to the prisoners of Bhagalpur?
R. Ventakeswaran, Kancheepuram

Dr Mishra's corruption is like cancer in the terminal stages. No medicine or operation can cure the disease.
K. Sen, Calcutta

There are good newsmen and there are bad newsmen, just as there are good chief ministers and bad chief ministers. It is highly unfair to condemn the entire press for the faults of perhaps a few journalists. Instead of wasting his time on the Press Bill, why doesn't Dr Jagannath Mishra tackle the millions of problems facing his state?
Pushpa Tiwary, Ranchi

Under the Constitution of India, every individual has the fundamental right to express his or her opinion freely. So, any attempt to gag the free and independent press in a democratic country, is sheer injustice.
V. L. Narayana, Howrah

Dr Mishra cannot stand the press for the simple reason that it stands in the way of perpetuating corruption and nepotism. As it is, the Indian press is subjected to various pressures from the government like the government advertisements and the allocation of newsprint quota. Despite this, our press is doing its duty well, much to the chagrin of those at the helm of power. The exposures of Antulay's misdeeds and of the Kuo oil deal are testimony enough. Therefore, it will be a blatant injustice if the Press Bill is allowed to come through.
Buddhadeb Chattopadhyay, Burdwan

Mrs Gandhi's defence of the Bill is an indication of her grand conspiracy against a press which does not sing her praises. SUNDAY should have exposed her connection more in the cover story.
Jose Vincent K. J., Secunderabad

Mrs Gandhi should have made Dr Jagannath Mishra the minister for information and broadcasting. With a man like him at that post, the press would have been instantly gagged and then she could have had peaceful sleep at nights.
Pankaj Singh, Sahibganj (Bihar)

It is very clear from the extracts of the report of the Editors Guild, that Dr Jagannath Mishra, the hon'ble chief minister of Bihar, is a first rate liar. So much so that he ought to be immediately awarded the 'Bharat Ratna' for delivering blatant lies.
Asok Kr Biswas, Hooghly

The only thing I regret about your cover story is that it is a little belated. Had the journalists reacted as vehemently and protested as violently as they are doing now, when the Press Bill was introduced in Tamil Nadu, we would have had no reason to lament now.
M. S. Vaidyanathan, Madras

Who says there is inefficiency in Bihar? The Press Bill was passed through the Assembly in just four minutes!
S. P. Bakshi, Patiala

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

It is about time our government realised that the journalists are the voice of the people, and the voice of the people can never be crushed. Dr Mishra and his colleagues will have to pay dearly for this measure.
M. S. Salim, Aligarh

No one knows better than Mrs Gandhi that Dr Jagannath Mishra is leading one of the most corrupt and inefficient Congress(I) governments in the state. The controversial Bihar Press Bill is very obviously, merely a measure to gag the press. I hope the pressmen of this country take the advice of Mr Arun Shourie that was published in SUNDAY's cover story and carry on, with added strength, the functions of investigations and exposures. We, the masses, are with you completely.
Sandhya Swain, Cuttack

If the Bihar chief minister wants to seal the borders of Bihar for any magazine that writes against his government, he must also realise that this is the surest way of launching large-scale smuggling of those magazines into the state.
Pathia Par, Patna

Mr Arun Shourie's expose of Dr Mishra, in your cover story, is astounding. It bares the web of lies and deceit in which the chief minister has enmeshed himself.
Lt Col S. K. Mushran (Retd), Lucknow

That was a remarkable exposition on the Bihar Press Bill. The report by Saumitra Banerjee and the extracts of the Editors Guild report, gave a very clear picture of why the Bill was thought of in the first place, and of its frightful implications.
O. P. Bajaj, Varanasi

The journalists deserve wholehearted support and admiration for their concerted fight against the massive onslaught by the government on the freedom of the press and on democracy.
R. P. Choudhury, Chandigarh

Dr Jagannath Mishra is guilty of attempting to murder—to murder the Fourth Estate. Is it not clear that Mrs Gandhi and Co. are creeping towards dictatorship?
Ranbir Pahwa, Ludhiana

In this politically corrupt nation, many more SUNDAYS are yet to be born. Press Bills like this one, trying to subject the media to tubectomy, will try unsuccessfully to hammer in nails on the coffin of democratic India.
Dr C. Madhusudan, Coimbatore

An ambassadorial task

Dr Subramaniam Swamy's article, China's return to religion, (15 August) was very interesting. Whether Dr Swamy brainwashed the Chinese leaders, or whether they were genuinely impressed by him, it certainly resulted in a coming closer together for the two peoples. The young politician has done a wonderful bit of work — much better than even our ambassadors!
M. J. Edwards, Bangalore

It was a wonderful feeling to get a detailed view of our neighbouring country, which since 1962, had become 'so near and yet so far' for us. Dr Swamy gave a thrilling report of his experiences and we felt as if we were rediscovering that great land.
E. N. Murthy, Berhampur (Orissa)

Dr Swamy's article covered some very important aspects of our largest neighbouring country. Once we realise why exactly our relations with China had soured, regaining harmony will be much simpler. Dr Swamy has given us a fresh view of this nation. Chinese pragmatism in both its politics and economics, is worth eulogising, and it is about time we took a cue and reviewed many of our fallacious policies and ideas.
B. L. Saha, 24 Parganas (West Bengal)

The article contains valuable information regarding the changing trends in China, but your heading for the piece was very misleading. China has certainly not gone back to her old religious faith. To a certain extent, there is religious freedom in every socialist country and China too guarantees this in her new Constitution. One cannot forget, however, that religion in a socialist state is quite different from religion as it is practised in a capitalist state. Under capitalism, god too becomes a commodity to be cashed in upon.

In India itself, we have seen how foreign money flows in, under the name of religion and how it has affected our economy. Here, religious leaders freely indulge in politics, win elections and even become rulers. The framers of China's new Constitution are too well aware of this danger. So, while making religious freedom a fundamental right, they clearly state that no religious affairs may be dominated by any foreign country. Communism in religious terms is nothing other than the realisation of god's justice on earth; it stands against exploitation in every form — including the exploitation in the name of religion — and instead, promotes equality among all, putting an end to injustice. Thus, spiritual happiness in a communist country is pure and untinged by selfish gains.

Multinational games

The report, The name of the game is profiteering (15 August) by Ajai Mishra and Syed Kamaluddin, exposes brilliantly the game that the multinational drug companies are playing at the cost of the lives of the Third World people.
Jagajjiban Satapathi, Jatni (Orissa)

The article was very timely and informative. However, it must be realised that the doctors in India are prescribing these drugs because there are no substitutes of these drugs available here yet. Neither our government nor the multinationals show any inclination of bringing these new, safe drugs into our country. It is for the government now to take the adequate steps to ban the use of these harmful drugs and to get in the new drugs here. If a small government like that of Bangladesh can take bold steps in modifying its drug policy., it is a matter of surprise that our government has not been able to do so yet.
Dr C. P. Das, Bhubaneswar

A balanced view

Mr Ranjit Sau's column on the economy, New Delhi is curbing inflation the wrong way (22 August) has made an extremely valid point: that, when the Western method of economics has not solved even the West's problems, it will certainly not solve India's problems. However, what is our alternative? For the past three decades, India has followed "Socialist" economics, but we seem to have merely got into deeper and deeper trouble, resulting, ironically, in the IMF loan. Will just blaming the Western system put an end to our difficulties? It is very necessary, at this juncture, that we in India must take a very balanced view and not get carried away by ideologies.
Sujash Kumar, Calcutta

Lack of dignity

It is clear from Ms Madhu Jain's article, The new crusaders of Hinduism (22 August) that the 'Operation Homecoming' launched by the Vishwa Hindu Parishad, is a basically coercive movement. Although there might be some truth in the stories that Arab money is behind the conversion of harijans to Islam, the root cause of this is the lack of human dignity that the harijans face in Hindu society.
Bimalendu S. Dutta Roy, Cuttack

Admirable cool

It was with great pride that I read your report, Col S. P. Wahi: The man who kept his cool (22 August). It is very heartening to know that we have people of the stature of Col Wahi in our country, at such important posts today, who can take control of crisis situations

COVER STORY

WAR AND PEACE

Chapter Two

Maneka Gandhi, for the first time since she left 1 Safdarjang Road, threw an open challenge to Rajiv Gandhi when she declared in a meeting in Amethi on 19 September, that she would contest the next Lok Sabha elections from this constituency. SHUBHABRATA BHATTACHARYA, who toured the Amethi and Rae Bareli constituencies with Mrs Maneka Gandhi, says that the reception she received from the people was rousing, and as things stand, the advantage definitely lies with Sanjay Gandhi's widow

On 18 and 19 September, Maneka Gandhi challenged Rajiv Gandhi and his principal aide, Arun Nehru, in their respective dens. She extensively toured the Amethi and Rae Bareli Lok Sabha constituencies, which were formerly represented by the late Sanjay Gandhi and Mrs Indira Gandhi, respectively. And the response which she evoked in the people of the area toured by her, showed that at the age of 26, she certainly has emerged as the youngest major political entity in the country. Had the Amethi byelection been held after 26 August 1981, Maneka could have thought of contesting. But the byelection was held in June 1981, when she was yet to achieve the statutory minimum age of 25 to contest the elections. Seeing the reception which she got in her late husband's constituency, one thing is certain—Maneka has come of age and if she were to contest the next Amethi elections, her chances of success could be rated as being fair.

The Amethi visit of Maneka Gandhi marks the zenith of the succession battle in the Nehru-Gandhi household. As things stand today, Maneka certainly has stolen a march over Rajiv. All the resources of the state are available to Rajiv, like they were to Maneka's late husband, Sanjay. Like Sanjay, Rajiv too has been clearly declared to be the heir-apparent by Mrs Indira Gandhi. But Rajiv does not seem to have been able to show the political acumen of his younger brother. And that is not his fault; in the Nehru-Gandhi household, right from 1970, Sanjay was being slowly groomed for public life whereas Rajiv was the gentle wage-earner, flying turboprop aircraft for the Indian Airlines. The flying accident of Sanjay in June 1980 suddenly saw the mantle fall on Rajiv's shoulders. He gave up flying very reluctantly and had it not been for Maneka's age factor, which necessitated the holding of the Amethi elections in June 1981, Rajiv would have preferred to continue serving the Indian Airlines a little longer, while dabbling in politics as a learner, which he had started doing from August 1980. The Amethi elections saw Rajiv emerge victorious with a massive mandate. He entered active politics. But till today, he has not been able to fill Sanjay's void either for his mother or in the party.

Maneka, on the other hand, had been closely associated with Sanjay's activities for a long time. During the Janata days, when the family was being persecuted, Maneka's Surya India became an effective mouthpiece of the Congress(I). Even these days, Rajiv Gandhi has remained the "gentle" member of the household, judiciously keeping himself away from the hustle and the bustle of political life. So, today, when Maneka is challenging Rajiv, the first advantage she has over him is the fact that she has been closely associated with politics and politicians longer than Rajiv. Another advantage which Maneka cashed in on at Amethi and Rae Bareli was the fact that Rajiv Gandhi and Arun Nehru have distrusted most people who had been trusted by Sanjay Gandhi. So, in Amethi and Rae Bareli, Maneka had a ready bank of people who had been given importance by the party and the government during Sanjay Gandhi's days and who feel neglected today. Even if they are out of power, certainly their past importance has given them a certain amount of public relations value. The people being propped up by the present powers that be are mostly novices, whereas the experienced hands, who are out of the limelight today, are handy for Maneka Gandhi.

After her two-day tour of the two constituencies, Maneka has announced that she is going to seek elections from Amethi in the next Lok Sabha polls. On the first day of her tour she did not make any such claim. But after seeing the success of the first day's tour, on 19 September, she started making direct attacks at Rajiv Gandhi and announced that she was going to seek elections from Amethi. "Maneka ne lalkara hai, Amethi kshetra hamara hai (Maneka has declared that Amethi is her area)" became the main slogan of her followers from 19 September. Till the previous day, the oft-repeated slogan "Maneka tum sangharsh karo, hum tumhare saath hain (Maneka we are one with you in your struggle)" was heard. On 19 September, a new slogan was added to the political lexicon of Uttar Pradesh.

While Maneka has certainly emerged as a major political personality, her brand of politics is not yet clear. In her meetings, the Congress tricolour is used. Is her organisation an offshoot of the Indian National Congress? Till now no policy statement has come from her to show that the Sanjay Gandhi Vichar Manch has any political colour. The five-point programme of the late Sanjay Gandhi, which is the rallying point of the Sanjay Gandhi Vichar Manch, was essentially a programme of social action which had been taken up by the Youth Congress in 1976, during a period when there was internal Emergency in the country and hardly any political activity was visible. Sanjay Gandhi's political ideology was only once made clear, in his interview to Mrs Uma Vasudev in Surge, which was published in the pre-Emergency days. In that interview Sanjay Gandhi had made it clear that he did not agree with a lot in the Congress ideology. He had openly criticised the public sector, which had been the brainchild of his late grandfather, Jawaharlal Nehru. Later in a public meeting at Calcutta in early 1976, Sanjay Gandhi had criticised the people who branded themselves as being either "left" or "right." He had said that he was a centrist. Will Maneka also take a similar stance?

The crowds which this correspondent saw on the entire route through which Maneka Gandhi's impressive motorcade passed in the Rae Bareli and Amethi areas are a testimony of her mass appeal. Seeing her popularity one has to accept her as a political personality. But what is her brand of politics?

If the masses were to turn up for Maneka the way they are doing at every place she goes, then a very disturbing sign in the national polity becomes visible. Are the people endorsing Sanjay Gandhi's line of "no left, no right"? Are they supporting the emergence of personality-oriented politics, as distinguished from policy-oriented politics? The present impasse is certainly the result of the growing lack of political organisation at the grassroots level. Apart from the left parties, limited to certain regions of the country, there is little political organisation among other parties. This is perhaps the reason why a non-political trade unionist like Datta Samant is able to catch the imagination of the workers in Bombay. Dacoits have been there since ages, but a phenomenon like Chhabiram (who was shot dead some months back) is unprecedented in the villages. The void created by the lack of political organisation is being filled up by anyone who is able to successfully catch the imagination of the people.

The Rajiv vs Maneka battle has entered an interesting phase. For the present, the score is advantage Maneka. And the way the people of Rae Bareli and Amethi have given a rousing reception to Maneka, it seems that Mrs Gandhi need not be blamed for promoting hereditary politics. The people seem to be loving every minute of the game.

Maneka comes of age

UDAYAN SHARMA reports on the receptions Maneka Gandhi got in Amethi and Rae Bareli on 18 and 19 September

"While floods and poverty have hit your region, your present Member of Parliament is busy with foreign tours. I hope he will return before the flood waters recede. I know that after my visit to this constituency, development work which had been neglected for the past two years would be stepped up." With these words Mrs Maneka Gandhi, daughter-in-law of the Prime Minister, fired her first direct salvo at Mr Rajiv Gandhi who is the elected representative from the Amethi Lok Sabha constituency. She came and she conquered—but not because of her policies or her personality. She went back a victor because of over-reactions, lies and false promises made by the ruling party. It is entirely due to the Congress(I) that Maneka Gandhi has won the preliminary rounds against the ruling party without doing anything much. She has no political programme (she herself admits that the five-point programme is a social programme) and she is yet to prove that she can match Mrs Indira Gandhi's political astuteness and sharpness. Even so, she has secured a political victory over Mr Rajiv Gandhi. Maneka Gandhi is prepared for a long-drawn political battle, while the Arun Nehrus and the Siddhartha Reddys are not. On her two-day visit to the Amethi Lok Sabha constituency on 18 and 19 September she exposed that the efficiency of Rajiv Gandhi's confidants was simply over-estimated. During her hectic tour of the constituency, Maneka Gandhi travelled over about 220 kilometres of bad roads. When she arrived at Amausi airport in Lucknow on the morning of 18 September from Delhi, she was welcomed by at least a thousand slogan-shouting and dancing Sanjay Vichar Manch boys.

They took her to Lucknow city in a motorcade consisting of nine buses and 50 cars, numerous tempos and Matador vans. This was Maneka Gandhi's first visit to Lucknow after her ouster from the PM's house. She had been thrown out of 1, Safdarjung Road when she had attended the Lucknow convention of Sanjay faithfuls on 28 March. The massive motorcade slowly inched towards the city while her young supporters chanted: "Indira tujhe nikali hai, desh tujhe apnayega. (Mrs Gandhi has thrown you out but the whole country welcomes you)."

When she left Lucknow at about 2.00 pm the same day, her motorcade included 55 cars, a number of Matador vans and four jeeps. Her first stop was at Mohanlalganj in Lucknow itself, where she was welcomed by a cheering crowd led by Jhabbu Raja alias Shivendra Bakshi Singh. She then went to Jais to address a public meeting. In between Jais and Mohanlalganj, she was forced to stop at Satyanarayan Tiwari Vidya Mandir, Sanjay Shiksha Sangh, Nigoha, on the border of Rae Bareli district, Harchandpur, Kathwara, Gangaganj, ITI industrial area in Rae Bareli, Rae Bareli textile mills workers' office, Fursatganj, the Sanjay Bal Mandir at Fursatganj, Uttar Pradesh Anusoochit Jati Seva Sangh office in Naseerabad, Gram Sabha, Mohana and several other places. Everywhere she was welcomed and cheered by the poor villagers. All the schools situated near the route had declared an unofficial holiday to welcome Maneka Gandhi. Surprisingly, most of the teachers of these schools were leading the processions. No one could have imagined that she would get such an enthusiastic response from the crowds. During the brief stopovers, she always started her speeches with an attempt to win over the simple villagers. Said she, "I came here first to you as a bride to seek blessings. Today, I return to you as a widow asking for your support and strength." With these words she stormed through the Amethi Lok Sabha constituency.

Jais must have been an experience for her because, according to two senior journalists from Lucknow, who have covered elections in Amethi in the past two decades, the attendance at the public meeting was unprecedented. Jais is a small locality with a population of not more than three or four thousand people. Most of the people who had gathered there had come from adjoining villages to hear the PM's bahu. She told the cheering crowds that the "Congress of Nehru and Mahatma Gandhi has now been turned into a party of goondas and smugglers. One person tried to end the misery of the local people but the local people have only got a helipad after his death which you can neither use nor eat."

She then pointed out one by one the projects which had been initiated by Sanjay Gandhi which have been neglected after his death.

She had a dig at the Prime Minister herself when, while referring to the foundation stone laid by Mrs Indira Gandhi for the Sanjay Memorial Hospital at Munshiganj on 1 Septemper, she said: "The foundation stone had been laid once before in June 1981. But no progress has been made even after the second foundation stone was laid for setting up the hospital."

What is the cause of so much resentment against the ruling party in this VIP constituency? The reasons are very simple. Just before the June 1981 Lok Sabha byelections, the local people had high expectations from the ruling party. But Rajiv Gandhi's victory from Amethi has not changed things: thus far little has been done for the people of Amethi. Inspite of all the promises and well-advertised plans and schemes, nothing concrete has come about. Perhaps, Mr Gandhi is to blame. He committed a blunder in placing Siddhartha Reddy incharge of his constituency. The local people are not ready to accept sermons and the bureaucratic approaches of Mr Reddy or Mr Arun Nehru, the other Rajiv Gandhi aide. Their disenchantment with this setup has proved to be a boon in disguise for Maneka Gandhi. One the other side, firebrand Maneka loyalist Akbar Ahmed has worked hard in the constituency over the last two years. He has toured Amethi and has been successful in establishing Sanjay Vichar Manch offices in every village of the area. And Mrs Maneka Gandhi's successful tour has proved the political acumen of Akbar "Dumpy" Ahmed.

The second day of her tour was different: her mood had changed. During the tour, her supporters, for the first time challenged Rajiv Gandhi to face the people of Amethi. She began her second day with a public meeting at Gauriganj. There was a marked difference in the speech too. For the first time, she directly attacked her brother-in-law. She mentioned that their Member of Parliament was busy with his foreign tours when floods were ravaging the region. She covered 110 kms and stopped at Paniyar, Musafirkhana, Kasimganj, Jagdishpur, Jafarganj and Inhona. Huge crowds welcomed her everywhere.

It was like a homecoming she told everyone. She got a rousing reception at Inhona where Chowdhary Azhar Hussain had engaged four sets of bands and about a hundred riflemen. There were ear-piercing sounds of crackers everywhere. Thousands of local Muslims welcomed her with songs and dances. She criticised the government in every public meeting and asked them to support her fight against persons in power.

There were three main features of her visit. Azhar Hussain was the first person who asked the gathering at Inhona, "Hath uthao kaun-kaun chahta hai ki Manekaji Amethi say chunav ladain (All those who want Maneka Gandhi to contest elections from Amethi, raise your hands)." Mr Narayan Dutt Tiwari had done the same thing for the late Sanjay Gandhi at Fursatganj in 1976. Maneka Gandhi told everybody during her meetings that she has started offices everywhere in Amethi constituency to receive reports of peoples' problems in the area. And a new slogan was heard. It was a change from the earlier slogan of "Indira nay nikala hai, desh tujhe apnayega." The new slogan heard at Munshiganj was "Maneka nay lalkara hai, Amethi kshetra hamara hai (Maneka has said, 'Amethi is ours')." She has given clear hints that she will contest from this constituency in the next elections. Mrs Maneka Gandhi will march in protest against the Criminal Penal Code amendments and the Bihar Press Bill in Patna on 3 October. The war between Maneka Gandhi and Rajiv Gandhi is now clearly on.

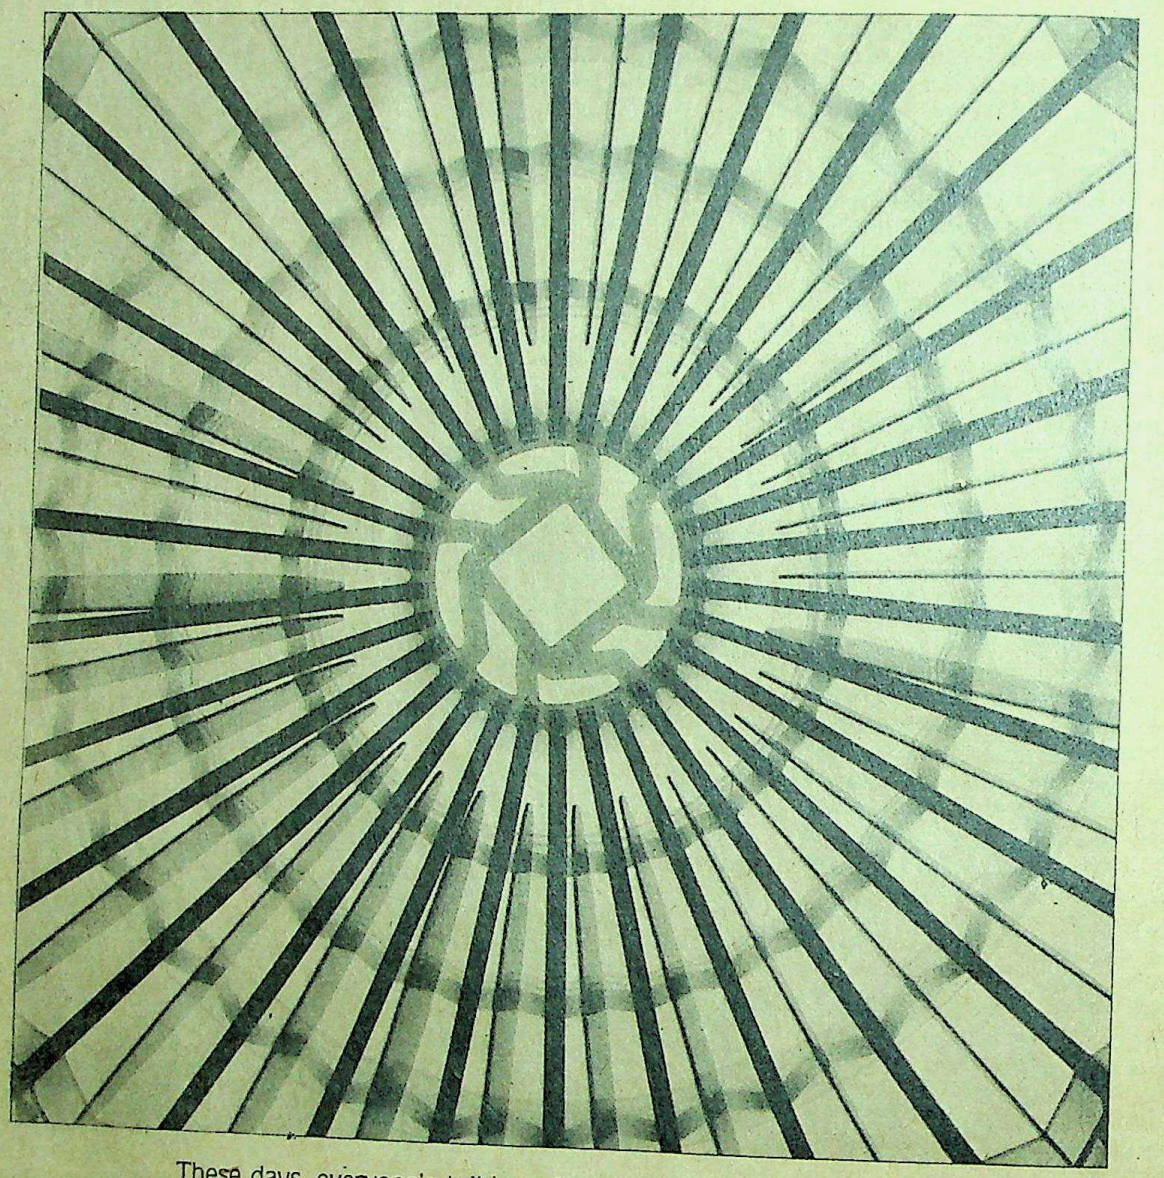
When every manufacturer of electronic components says his product is best, which one do you believe?



These days, everyone's talking of quality control.

And when they're not talking of quality control, they're telling you how long they've been around.

When it comes to the crunch, none of these things matter.

What matters is the quality of the product that comes out.

At Keltron, quality control is not just a phrase to impress you with.

It's a way of doing things.

At Keltron, checking begins even before the raw materials enter the factory. To make sure only the best is used.

Then each and every component of each and every component is tested at each and every stage of production. Then the whole component is tested for quality before it leaves the factory.

In fact, we wouldn't have it any other way. Neither would our foreign collaborators. Because we export quite a lot of components.

If ever you're coming this way, drop in at our factory. See for yourself how we make our components.

After all, seeing is believing, isn't it?

Resentment against Mrs Gandhi is growing

By KEWAL VARMA

While ruling their vast empire, India's Moghul rulers always faced a dilemma: should they have strong subedars to run the provincial governments or weak subedars? The emperors who were sure of their own power, opted for strong governors who could provide stable administrations. Insecure rulers, on the other hand, appointed weak subedars, whose administrations tended to be anarchic, causing misery to the people. Weak Moghul emperors feared that strong subedars, finding the seat of power unstable, would declare UDI (unilateral declaration of independence) and conspire to wrest power from the emperor in Delhi.

Independent India's first Prime Minister, Jawaharlal Nehru, was confident of his own position, and the chief ministers in the Congress-ruled states—Bidhan Chandra Roy, Govind Ballabh Pant, Pratap Singh Kairon, Sanjiva Reddy, Morarji Desai and later Y.B. Chavan—were leaders in their own right. They did not need Delhi to prop up their governments. The chief ministers played a crucial role in the succession battle that took place after Nehru's death, in making Lal Bahadur Shastri the Prime Minister. After Shastri died at Tashkent, the chief ministers had an even bigger hand in Mrs Gandhi's emergence as the PM. In fact, during the initial days of Mrs Gandhi's prime ministership, a group of chief ministers and a few leaders of the Congress, known as the Syndicate, guided her actions. But within a short while, Mrs Gandhi used her political skill, courage and populism to out-manoeuvre them and establish her supremacy. But even then, there still remained a few chief ministers who were leaders in their own right, and who would not act at the PM's bidding: Kamalapati Tripathi followed by H. N. Bahuguna in UP, Mohanlal Sukhadia in Rajasthan, Brahmananda Reddy in Andhra and V.P. Naik backed by Y.B. Chavan in Maharashtra.

But after the 1969 split in the Congress, Mrs Gandhi's confidence in her position seemed to have been eroded: she was uncertain and immensely suspicious of her own colleagues. Therefore, in order to make her position more secure, Mrs Gandhi consciously set about destabilising some of the chief ministers who thought they were in their positions, not by the grace of Mrs Gandhi but by virtue of their own power-base. One by one, all such chief ministers were deposed on one pretext on another. By the time the Emergency was declared in 1975, only one independent chief minister remained: H.N. Bahuguna. But within a few months of the Emergency being declared, even he had to leave office.

When Mrs Gandhi was defeated by the Janata in 1977, some of the men she had set up were the first to desert her. As she is never tired of remarking in private conversations on politics, "Who else but Sanjay stood by me?" (It is a separate point, that today she wants to wipe out all traces of Sanjay's legacy, in order to ease the succession for her elder son.) Once back in power after the Lok Sabha polls in 1980, Mrs Gandhi made absolutely certain that no one with any claims to power in his own right, became the chief minister of a state. Dr Channa Reddy apparently entertained such illusions and had the temerity to celebrate his birthday in a big way. The Prime Minister raised her little finger and Dr Channa Reddy was no longer the CM of Andhra Pradesh.

The selection of chief ministers in 1980 was left mainly to Sanjay Gandhi. With the exception of Mr Darbara Singh, not a single Congress(I) CM in the country had been tried and tested in politics. In the process, even the well-established caste equations were ignored. Next to loyalty, the only other criterion for a potential chief minister was that he should have no independent power-base of his own. From that crop of chief ministers, only Mr A. R. Antulay tried to spread his own wings, and it is well-known that Mrs Gandhi was not unduly upset when he had to leave.

It is precisely because Mrs Gandhi does not like any chief minister to have his own political base that she does not give a chance to the state legislatures to elect leaders freely. Similarly since she does not want any chief minister to feel obliged to any other person except herself for getting the post, the final choice are always her's. Her consultations in this regard with others is only a formality. The only other person who is privy to her decision-making process is her son, Rajiv. If a normal democratic process of decision-making is not followed, subjective likes and dislikes determine the choices. It is no wonder that her choices are proving to be wrong. A number of chief ministers selected in 1980 had to go: Jagannath Pahadia, T. Anjaiah, B. Venkataram, V. P. Singh and A. R. Antulay. Even Sripati Mishra who was selected only a few weeks ago as chief minister of UP is proving to be a flop. Because the number of persons consulted are so few, Mrs Gandhi cannot get to know their antecedents. For instance, only after the announcement was made, Mrs Gandhi learnt that Mr B. Venkataram is a member of the Upper House.

Mrs Gandhi's style of functioning has created a situation of permanent instability in the states. The chief minister's authority is totally eroded. Ministers ignore their chief ministers, visit Delhi and after clearance from the Prime Minister's house take decisions — all without the knowledge of their chief ministers. Chief ministers cannot include men of their own choice into the cabinet without the clearance of Delhi. They cannot even change the portfolios of their colleagues. For instance Mr Shiv Charan Mathur, chief minister of Rajasthan, submitted his proposals for a cabinet expansion about three months ago. But these proposals have not yet been processed by the PM's aide, M. L. Fotedar. When these will reach the Prime Minister's table is anybody's guess. Result: there is a total breakdown of law-and-order in the Hindi belt. Maharashtra was the best-administered state in the country but its government was taken unawares by the policemen's strike. The administration has become callous towards the problems of the people. If Mrs Gandhi still wins elections, it is only by default. If Mrs Gandhi's personality cult still holds good it is because the people believe in one God, and not in many Gods.

The resentment against this style of functioning, within the party, is growing albeit slowly. When Mr T. Anjaiah was removed, Mr Narain Dutt Tiwari went to Hyderabad to get the consensus of the party legislature. The party passed a one-line resolution which said that "it authorises Mrs Gandhi to select the leader." Mr Tiwari wanted to add these words "in accordance with the consensus expressed by the members," but he was not allowed to do so. This time over 50 legislators, in a signed memorandum to the Prime Minister, said, "The honour of 60 crores of Telugus cannot be bartered away on the streets of Delhi." The trend is dangerous and one has to wait and watch.

SPECIAL REPORT

Is Andhra Pradesh slipping out of Mrs Gandhi's hands?

TOOSHAR PANDIT and SYED MAJEEDUL HASAN report on why the state has had four chief ministers in three years

It was a few minutes past 8 pm on Saturday 11 September when one of the Prime Minister's aides, M. L. Fotedar, after several attempts, finally got through by telephone to the chief minister of Andhra Pradesh, Bhavanam Venkatram Reddy at his Hyderabad residence. The CM was away since midday touring parts of Mrs Gandhi's constituency: Medak. The major industries minister, M. Baga Reddy, Mrs Gandhi's major domo for the constituency too would have been with the CM. But responding to summons which he received late on the previous night, Baga Reddy had left for Delhi by the morning flight. He was not the only one to be called to Delhi. Already half of Bhavanam Venkatram Reddy's 34-member cabinet, the APCC(I) president C. Dass, and a number of other important party leaders had reached Delhi, most of them without even bothering to inform the CM that they were going. So, when the call came from Delhi, Bhavanam Venkatram Reddy was not surprised. Indeed, he was expecting it. And the message was that he should come to Delhi as fast as he could.

Bhavanam Venkataram, was in any case planning to go to Delhi on Monday 13 September to ask for funds to finance the state's drought relief plans. More than one-third of the state was affected by drought and money was urgently needed to stave off famine in the affected areas. The summons meant advancing his departure by a day. For the officers preparing the note for the CM on the nature and extent of the drought, it meant working extra hours to complete it before the CM's departure. By the time Mr Venkatram arrived in Delhi at around 11 am on Sunday 12 September, rumours of his dismissal were doing the rounds in the capital. Mrs Gandhi had already met several Andhra leaders, including two former chief ministers K. Brahmananda Reddy and T. Anjaiah. And the choice for Bhavanam's likely successor appeared to have narrowed down to just two people: revenue minister N. Janardhan Reddy and a MP from Kurnool and former finance minister of the state K. Vijaya Bhaskara Reddy. At that stage Mr Venkatram could hardly do anything else but resign to his inevitable fate.

Normally, Mrs Gandhi avoids party meetings on Sundays unless it is very urgent. That Sunday, however, while she met a number of Andhra Pradesh leaders to discuss the political situation there, she could not find any time for Bhavanam Venkatram, waiting at Andhra Bhavan, to be called by her. The pattern is familiar by now. When Dr Channa Reddy fell foul with her she treated him similarly; when she decided to get rid of Anjaiah she kept him waiting. And now it was Venkatram's turn. Finally, after waiting for about 30 hours, Bhavanam Venkatram could get to see Mrs Gandhi for about 10 minutes in the afternoon of Monday 13 September. During his conversation, Mr Venkatram could hardly detect anything, let alone think that Mrs Gandhi was planning a change in the Andhra Pradesh leadership. She talked mostly about the drought in Andhra Pradesh, how to fight it, what the CM's problems were in implementing the party programmes, and how best the party could fight the Assembly elections in February 1983. The party affairs were discussed only casually. She even remonstrated the ministers and party leaders from Andhra for crowding in Delhi. "Why are they here?" she asked the CM. "Tell them to go back and be with the drought-affected people," she counselled.

Mrs Gandhi, wiser after her experiment with Venkatram was, of course, playing her cards this time close to her chest. It was she, who, bypassing the normal democratic process had foisted Bhavanam Venkatram, a political lightweight, on Andhra Pradesh to succeed Anjaiah. Bhavanam Venkatram had neither the political support nor the administrative competence to offer the leadership that he was expected to. Worse, he had hardly any say in selecting either his cabinet or in matters relating to party organisation. His deputy was named by Delhi and so was his entire cabinet. Again, Delhi chose C. Das to succeed Kona Prabhakara Rao as the APCC(I) president even though he had been suspended by the APCC(I) for indulging in anti-party activities. Indeed, the first thing that C. Das did on becoming the party president was to withdraw the suspension order against himself. So, if Bhavanam Venkatram Reddy had failed to deliver the goods, the fault clearly lay with Mrs Gandhi. She might not admit this in public but deep down in her heart she knew that the folly was hers. And with elections round the corner she could hardly afford the luxury of a blundering and basically an inactive person as the CM of a state which had been with her even in her darkerst days. At the same time she did not want to give the impression that she had hustled Bhavanam Venkatram out. That would be owning up the guilt. And that she surely was not prepared to do. But her mind was made up almost the day the Telugu filmstar N. T. Rama Rao launched his Telegu Desam, on 29 march, a month after Mr Venkatram had taken over as the CM. One consideration which weighed in favour of Mr Venkatram, while being selected as the CM was that as his wife was from the economically powerfully Kamma community, he would be able to win over the Kammas, who were smarting under neglect and appeared to be turning against tthe Congress(I). Keeping them within the fold of the Congress(I) was important for the party because much of the money for the party coffers came from them. But Mr Venkatram lost that advantage and with it his weight with Mrs Gandhi when N. T. Rama Rao, a Kamma, launched his party and immediately attracted the Kammas to his fold. Worse still, Bhavanam Venkatram had no answer to his one-time classmate, N. T. Rama Rao. In all his 200-day tenure as CM, Mr Venkatram could not organise a single major rally anywhere in the state to effectively combat the steady advance that Rama Rao was making. By itself the Telugu Desam hardly looks a match for the formidable Congress(I) in Andhra Pradesh: till now its influence is limited to the Kamma community and the coastal region only. But Rama Rao looms larger than life in Andhra Pradesh more by default: through the incompetence of and the frictions within the ruling party.

Mrs Gandhi was understandably disturbed by this. But this time she did not want to rush things. One reason was that she did not want to interrupt the Assembly session once again. Anjaiah was dismissed in the middle of the session of the Assembly. To facilitate his dismissal, Anjaiahwas asked to adjourn the Assembly sine die after the motion of thanks on the Governor's address had been adopted. His successor Bhavanam Venkatram Reddy had an Assembly session in March for a brief period to get a vote on account budget passed. And Mrs Gandhi decided to let him present the annual budget for which the Assembly was summoned on 9 July and continued till 9 September with a brief break in between.

But even as the budget session was in progress, she was talking with her advisers on Andhra affairs—union ministers Pranab Mukherjee, R. Venkataraman and P. V. Narasimha Rao—as to what should be done next. Indeed, she was willing to listen to anybody. She would talk to her industries minister N. D. Tiwari, petroleum minister P. Shiv Shanker, the AICC(I) general secretary, G. K. Moopanar—and even K. Brahmananda Reddy, once her bitter enemy. The first hint that she was thinking of a change in leadership in Andhra came when she asked Pranab Mukherjee and Narasimha Rao to look for a successor to Bhavanam Venkatram Reddy, after her talks with former Andhra chief ministers Dr M. Channa Reddy and K. Brahmananda Reddy in Delhi in the middle of August.

And, yet till the last moment she sought to give an impression that in selecting and new CM—the fourth in 3 years—she was not imposing her will on the people of Andhra Pradesh but was actually acknowledging the wishes of her partymen from that state. It was to conjure up an illusion that an elaborate drama had to be staged. So elaborate was the drama that one would have thought that Mrs Gandhi was taking precautions against an impending coup. Could not the change in leadership wait for another week or so till she returned from her trip to Moscow? But the way things were handled would make one think that heaven would have fallen if the change did not take place before Mrs Gandhi left. Look at the scenario. As soon as the state Assembly adjourns prominent Andhra Congress(I) leaders rush to Delhi. The finance minister, Pranab Mukherjee, even before he has briefed his colleagues in the cabinet adequately about his mission abroad and almost from the moment he returns from Washington, is preoccupied with just one thing: discussing the future of the Congress(I) in Andhra Pradesh. Indeed for about a week at least three other senior ministers of Mrs Gandhi's cabinet—P. V. Narasimha Rao, R. Venkataraman and P. Shiv Shankar—seem to be doing little else. Even in Moscow, Narasimha Rao makes himself available for consultations by telephone. And, the matter is so urgent that 19 out of the state's 34 ministers have to be in Delhi for days together at a time when Andhra is facing one of the worst droughts. These extraordinary proceedings defy reason and are just mindboggling.

All this for what? Even as the show was being put up, Mrs Gandhi had already made her choice. It was the 62-year-old MP, K. Vijaya Bhaskara Reddy. He was in the running for the office of the CM following the dismissal of Anjaiah. But, this time he was so sure about being promoted to the office that he stayed back in Hyderabad till the drama reached a climax on 14 September. If the other contender, N. Janardhan Reddy, had the spotlight on him for a time, it was because Mrs Gandhi wished it to be so. Janardhan Reddy, who was an MP for about six years between 1972 and 1978, of course, had some powerful supporters both among the union ministers advising Mrs Gandhi and in her secretariat and if their will had prevailed he certainly would havebecome the chief minister. But his standing with Mrs Gandhi apparently is not that high: she preferred Bhavanam Venkatram Reddy as successor to Anjaiah. This time also Janardhan Reddy really did not stand a chance. He was fighting just a mock battle he was not aware of, but it suited Mrs Gandhi eminently.

Depend on the Congress(I) for entertainment. Even after Pranab Mukherjee formally informed Vijaya Bhaskara Reddy at around 2 pm on Wednesday 15 September that he was the high command's choice for the office of Andhra CM, the drama did not end. Reaching Hyderabad the next morning, union defence minister R. Venkataraman who had been assigned to see through the rest of the formality at the Andhra Pradesh Congress(I) legislature party meeting, suddenly decided to ascertain the views of the Congress(I) legislators as to whom they would like to succeed Bhavanam Vankatram Reddy. There was really nothing to ascertain: Vijaya Bhaskara Reddy who had arrived in Hyderabad the previous evening from Delhi was already receiving the treatment from his partymen that only a CM could expect. Nevertheless, Venkataraman's exercise delayed the CLP(I) meeting by two hours; it was scheduled at 10 am but actually held a little after noon. In another 35 minutes Mrs Gandhi's wishes received legitimacy as Vijaya Bhaskara Reddy's name was proposed by outgoing chief minister Bhavanam Venkatram Reddy as the Congress(I) legislature party leader and N. Janardhan Reddy, T. Anjaiah and C. Das got to their feet one after another in support of the proposal. The election, predictably, was unanimous.

However, this drama was not without its irony. From the moment he was elected as the CLP(I) leader, Vijaya Bhaskara Reddy had been telling people that he had been elected "democratically" and that he would be free to choose his cabinet. He would, of course, seek the counsel of the central leaders but the cabinet he was going to have would be according to his choice. Vijaya Bhaskara Reddy was to leave for Delhi on the morning of 18 September with his list of ministers to get it approved by the high command.

First Vishwa Kannada Sammelana

(JAN 3–9, 1983)

THE GREAT CONFLUENCE OF A GREAT PEOPLE

In a few months from now, the curtain will rise on one of the greatest events in the history of Karnataka – the first Vishwa Kannada Sammelana. Kannada, one of the oldest languages, has contributed significantly to the cultural heritage of our country. Kannadigas have spread far and wide in the country and abroad and made for themselves a name in the fields of literature, science, dance, music, theatre, cinema, journalism – in fact in all areas of human endeavour. For the first time all these great minds will come together to spread the fragrance of the glorious heritage of Karnataka.

The royal City of Mysore, the venue of the first World Kannada Conference, is getting dressed up to welcome the lovers of Kannada from all over the world. A rich fare of programmes is being finalised for this week-long conference. This conference will trigger a number of projects of permanent nature to help the people of Karnataka fulfil their aspirations.

January 3–9, 1983 it is "ON TO MYSORE CITY" for all Kannada lovers.

WELCOME TO THE FIRST WORLD KANNADA CONFERENCE

When he reached the airport to catch the flight at around 12.20 pm he was told that the Airbus by which he was to travel would have to be searched before it could take off, as an unidentified person claimed over telephone that there was a bomb hidden in the aircraft. That would delay the departure of the flight by a couple of hours.

Hearing this Vijaya Bhaskara Reddy decided to turn back and get his list approved over the telephone. He was particularly keen that the swearing-in ceremony be held at 1.30 am on Sunday, 19 September as astrologers thought this was the most auspicious time for him to take over. Normally, he would have been sworn-in the day he was elected the CLP(I) leader. But, though the Governor, K. C. Abraham, cut short his holiday in Kerala and returned to Hyderabad on the night of 15 September anticipating this possibility, the swearing-in ceremony was put off, because the three days following 16 September were ruled out by the astrologers as inauspicious. Apparently, Vijaya Bhaskara Reddy could not get his list approved over the telephone and was advised to take the evening flight to Delhi, which he did. As a result, the swearing-in ceremony had to be postponed by another day—till the morning of Monday 20 September. Most of the Congress(I) leaders including some 15 ministers of the outgoing cabinet aspiring for a berth in the new cabinet, however, knew better. And so they left for Delhi ahead of Bhaskara Reddy to lobby for their respective cases. So much for the freedom of a Congress(I) CM.

When Mrs Gandhi promoted Bhavanam Venkatram Reddy to the office of the CM she must have expected him to improve the Congress(I) image which had been badly mauled by internecine quarrels and scandals during the tenure of Dr Channa Reddy and his successor, Anjaiah. Bhavanam Venkatram Reddy could neither remove the stigma of corruption nor restore harmony in the party. The success of minority groups of party legislators in manipulating the ouster of both Dr Reddy and Anjaiah with active encouragement from the high command had created a number of power centres, all gunning for the same target: the office of the chief minister. So, when the plum went Venkatram's way, many influential leaders who had their eyes set on the office felt cheated. If they did not make any noise at that time it was because their instinct for survival took precedence over their ambitions.

Hardly was the ink dry on their solemn pledge of support, when intrigues and infighting began to undermine Venkatram's position. This came out rather sharply, when in March, the Congress(I) candidate M. A. Hashim, who was the home minister in Anjaiah's cabinet lost to the opposition candidate, P. Babul Reddy, of the Janata Party at the Rajya Sabha polls, despite the Congress(I) having a massive majority in the legislature.

N. T. R: a threat to Mrs Gandhi

All the while Bhavanam Venkatram Reddy could do nothing; he silently suffered the humiliation. Indeed, even at that early stage one could see that he had neither any control over his ministers or the partymen. Having gained their berths in the cabinet on Delhi's dictates, the ministers did not feel obliged to the CM. They knew too well that Venkatram was powerless to discipline them as long as their mentors in Delhi backed them. As a result, Andhra Pradesh appeared to be run by 34 ministers instead of one. Bhavanam Venkatram accepted this state of affairs. What else could he do? Wasn't he the chief minister at the gesture of Mrs Gandhi? Further, he did not command any significant following among the partymen. This sense of insecurity led him to follow the maxim: live and let live. And to do that he withdrew into a shell. He became inaccessible to both partymen and the public. Worse, he lacked any initiative or drive.

All this taken together presented a picture of total confusion. Things came to such a pass that every Congressman, to whichever faction he belonged (there are six distinct factions), were convinced that with a leader like Bhavanam Venkatram at the helm, the Congress(I) in the state was a sinking ship. There was a strong demand that he should be replaced—and as fast as possible if Mrs Gandhi wanted the state to remain with her. It was not really the fear of NTR that was at the back of the demand: the Congressmen were more concerned about the escalating tensions within the party. The present change, most Congress(I) leaders believe, should have come about much earlier, before the Congress(I) image suffered an avoidable erosion due to poor leadership to Bhavanam Venkatram.

No tears were shed at the exit of Bhavanam Venkatram. The Congress(I), as well as a large majority of people, in Andhra Pradesh would like to write off his 200-day tenure as something of a bad debt. His successor, Vijaya Bhaskara Rao, is generally regarded as a shrewd politician: he has risen from the ranks and surely knows his way to move around in the complex Andhra politics. Back in 1955, he surprised everybody when in his debut at the Assembly elections he defeated a formidable rival, N. Sankara Reddy. And, again both in 1977 and 1980, he won the Kurnool Lok Sabha seat by a handsome margin. As a finance minister from 1967 to 1970 in the K. Brahmananda Reddy cabinet, he enjoyed a reputation of being a competent administrator. By and large, his image in Andhra Pradesh is of a person who is honest, competent—and tough.

He certainly has the qualifications to accomplish the task assigned to him—that of carrying a faction-ridden party with him for a massive electoral victory for the Congress(I). Nevertheless, it is an uphill task. What makes the task even more difficult is the fact that many of the prominent central leaders are parties to factional feuds in the state. Two main factions owe their allegiance and look for guidance to P.V. Narasimha Rao and P. Shiv Shankar. Even non-Andhra leaders like Pranab Mukherjee and Narain Dutt Tewari are also said to have their own favourites.

In the circumstances, the latest shuffle, understandably has not inspired as much enthusiasm as it should have normally. The people of Andhra Pradesh have by now become so used to being ruled by Delhi—for a decade now it has had to put up with the chief ministers nominated by Delhi—that nothing encourages enthusiasm in them. The question that they are asking now is even if the new chief minister has the skill and the will to arrest the drift, does he have the necessary authority to enforce the will? Frequent changes in leadership of the Congress(I) have only helped to reinforce cynicism among the people who have been with Mrs Gandhi even in her darkest days.

To put his party back on the rails, Mr Vijaya Bhaskara Reddy would have to accomplish a lot within just about six months. A popular joke doing the rounds in Andhra is that a Congress(I) chief minister is busy in the first few months selecting his cabinet and the rest of the tenure fighting his partymen trying to bring him down. Already he has created quite a few enemies: the people whom he did not include in his cabinet. These were the disgruntled people who had brought the downfall of three successive chief minnisters: Dr Channa Reddy, Tangturi Anjaiah and Bhavanam Venkatram Reddy. And, having tasted blood once, can a tiger keep away from human prey?

'War' in the Indian armed forces?

The navy claims VSTOL aircraft as a special naval requirement for use on aircraft carriers as well as a larger share of helicopters; the army has stepped up its demand for an army aviation corps. The air force is naturally alarmed by these trends and is putting up a stiff opposition. Should the air force be disbanded and its assets divided between the army and the navy, as one army officer recently suggested? LT GEN E.A. VAS (Retired) looks into the case.

When the Wright brothers first flew their biplane in 1903, the effect was sensational. Somehow, an impression was created that the air was a new mysterious element with unknown dangers and rules. The early apostles of air power were full of romantic prophecies. As a result, a healthy evolution of air power has been confused, both by the initial glamour surrounding a flyer, and by the lack of historical perspective on the part of its exponents.

The World Wars

At the start of World War I, the major European powers each marshalled an assortment of monoplanes and biplanes manned by volunteers. Yet, air power in Britain was looked upon with suspicion and young regimental officers were discouraged by their seniors from associating with the air force for fear that it might ruin their careers. But as the impact of air power was forced on the ground forces, the army was compelled to look around for suitable air volunteers. Relatively obscure and junior army officers suddenly found themselves promoted. This roused jealousy and did not help matters as the air force has since apparently suffered from a permanent complex of having grown, like Eve, from the rib of an army, Adam.

Naval aviation was dominated by the Royal Navy (RN) which developed seaplanes for an anti-submarine role. The first effective aircraft carrier only appeared after World War I, which had left the victorious powers with ruined economies, a large surplus of aircraft and young airmen eager to make flying a career. But there was no real air force higher command. After World War I, the naval air arm in Britain was subordinated to the Royal Air Force (RAF). It was not until 1937 that the error was remedied and the Fleet Air Arm was again brought fully under Admiralty control.

India had several RAF squadrons after World War I but none of these were officered by Indians. Public demand for the admission of Indians in the air force was conceded by the British but was slow to be implemented. By the commencement of World War II, only one Indian squadron had been raised and trained for army cooperation in the North-West Frontier.

At the start of World War II, air power was no longer anciliary; it was a force to be reckoned with. Irrespective of which service was involved, it was clear that efficient command depended upon personalities, planning and communications. It was also evident that the use of aircraft, like any other weapon, without a doctrine was meaningless. Once again, the lack of air power theorists was apparent. But it soon became evident that at no stage of the war was air power alone decisive; whereas its absence might be decisive, its presence could not guarantee decisive results by itself. Most air forces planned on fulfilling four roles:

- Control of the air by fighter aircraft to permit the army, navy or air force to mount operations safe from enemy air activity.
- Reconnaissance, both photographic and visual; also artillery observation.
- Transport air support to enable the movement of stores, men and casualty evacuation.
- Offensive air support at the strategic level by bombers and at the tactical level by fighter and ground attack aircraft for interdiction (the cutting-off of all routes into a battle area) and close support to ground forces.

The German Luftwaffe, to begin with, swarmed over Europe; it seemed that nothing could stop a combination of armour and air, as represented by blitzkrieg tactics. Air Marshal Goering assured Hitler that the Luftwaffe would subdue the RAF and Great Britain, thereby enabling the German army to cross the English Channel. The Battle of Britain saw dog-fights between hundreds of German and British fighters, massive 600-bomber raids on British towns and the first use of radar to direct aircraft during battle. But the Germans lost this battle, diverted their forces to capture Crete with an impressive airborne landing in which 500 transport planes were used, and then turned towards Russia. But eventually they lost air power and the war.

By now, the Indian Air Force (IAF) had expanded and attained a strength of nine squadrons. It was a tactical air force and undertook the roles of reconnaissance, combat fighting, ground support and interdiction. The IAF was solely dependent on the RAF for its supply of machines. Similarly, the Indian navy was always in a secondary and subordinate role to the RN.

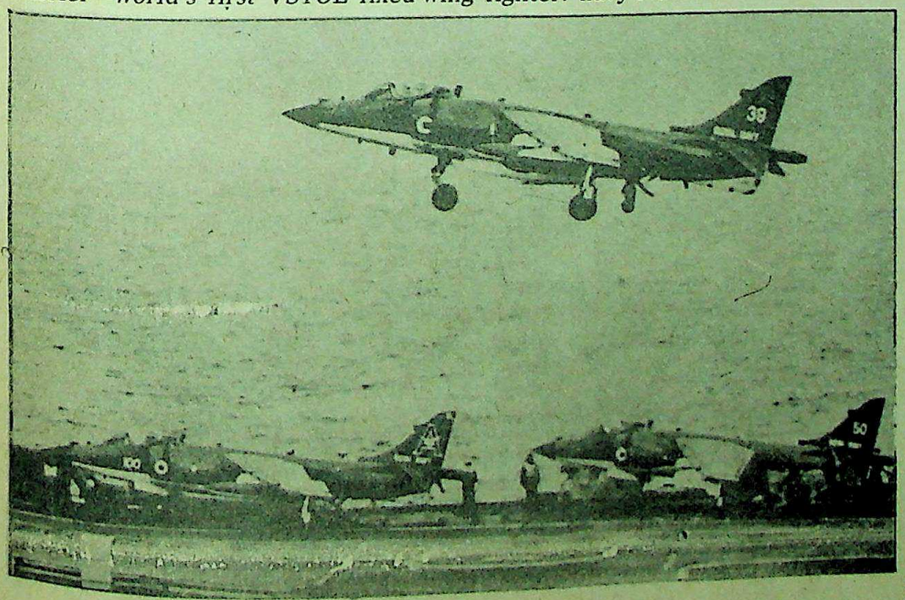
The Post-War Years

After partition, and with the division of assets between Pakistan and India, the IAF was left weaker than it was at the end of World War II. But gradually over the years, by a judicious purchase of modern aircraft and its own aircraft industry, India was able to build up a respectable air force which included several squadrons of air observation planes. These were light 2-seater aircraft of a type being used in India for spraying crops. An Air Observation squadron is an air force unit: the planes are procured and maintained by airmen, but are flown by army artillery officers who are specialised in observing the fall of artillery shells and effecting corrections by passing radio instructions to the gun positions.

After Independence, the Indian navy was left with a handful of small ships. Immediate measures were taken to purchase a cruiser and three destroyers. Later, other ships and an aircraft carrier were added to the fleet. This last acquisition was greeted with sustained opposition, which continues even today, from a section of the public and the press which proclaimed that the age of aircraft carriers was past and that India neither required this, nor could afford the luxury. Extracts from professional articles printed in Russia, America and Britain to support the view that the large aircraft carrier was obsolete, were reprinted and quoted ad nauseam at every security seminar. (These extracts omitted those paragraphs which emphasise that small carriers capable of launching jump-jets and anti-submarine helicopters are being suggested as an alternative.) Naval circles in South Block suspected that the anti-carrier campaign was being orchestrated by the IAF which was unabashedly opposed to the organisation and training of a Fleet Air Arm under naval headquarters.

The IAF's opposition was understandable. It had been ordered to hand over all maritime reconnaissance aircraft to the navy; moreover, this was the first time any other service was being allowed to enter the private preserve of the IAF. They could see the trend in other countries and they feared that this would have a snowballing effect on the army which was already thinking about a separate army aviation corps on the lines existing in Britain, America and the Soviet Union. Apart from this, these pressures on the IAF from the two sister services, coincided with the advent of technological compulsions which had occurred owing to the development of missiles. Serious doubts were being cast on the effectiveness, in the offensive role, of manned aircraft as compared with the unmanned missile. The US and USSR had already based their nuclear deterrent on the missile-carrier rather than the manned bomber which had been relegated to a secondary role. Then again, anti-aircraft missiles were making it difficult for any air force to freely exercise its traditional role of close air-support to the ground forces, interdiction or the bombardment of hostile air fields.

Harrier—world's first VSTOL fixed-wing fighter: navy's choice



Mr Jagjivan Ram, the then defence minister, correctly gauged the anxieties of the airmen. In order to assuage the air force's feelings, enable the legitimate expansion of their manpower levels, and to maintain their morale, the defence ministry wisely allotted the air force the role of manning and operating all static heavy anti-aircraft missiles that were then being procured and deployed for the defence of airfields and vital rear areas. (The manning and operating of anti-aircraft guns and light mobile missiles for the defence of tactical targets in the forward areas, continued to remain with the army and navy respectively.)

Inter-service rivalries were postponed by the Indo-Pak war (1965). From the air force's point of view, the war was inconclusive. Air support on both sides was largely tactical with a proportion of aircraft attempting counter-air operations against each other's airfields to reduce the quantum of hostile air power available to support the tactical battle. No attempt was made to gain local air superiority in any sector. But it was significant that the Indian manufactured Gnat fighter was more than a match for the Pakistani manned US Sabre jets. Regrettably, the Indian navy had very little dramatic action. INS Vikrant was in the dry dock when hostilities commenced; this was to become additional fuel for the aircraft-carrier critics, who proclaimed that "the navy s white elephant should be scrapped."

The next Indo-Pak war (1971) was fought on two fronts. In the east, the air force achieved complete air supremacy over Bangladesh. On the western front, IAF fighter-bombers carried out effective strikes on Karachi port and oil installations, and provided tactical support against Pakistani ground forces; this was devastatingly effective in the Rajasthan desert. The navy's performance was outstanding. Rocket ships of the Western Fleet sank two Pakistani destroyers and damaged a third off Karachi. The Eastern Fleet sank a Pakistani submarine and sealed off the sea routes to Bangladesh while aircraft from the carrier bombed the major ports preventing any port activity. The admirals were so elated that one of them even assured the public that the navy was "ready to sink the US 7th Fleet" when it sailed into the Bay of Bengal.

Growing Air Force Fears

But the euphoria of war could not conceal the lack of rapport between the air force on the one hand and the navy and army on the other. Again it was evident that the military lacked well-analysed concepts and a comprehensive theory on air power acceptable to all three services.

While the Air Observation squadrons had converted to helicopters, many other technological advances had been occurring over the years and these were generating a profound effect on the tactical doctrine. Vertical and Short Take-Off-and-Landing (VSTOL) aircraft had reached a high-performance level; Advance Warning and Control Systems (AWACS) aircraft could now effectively double the performance of a limited number of aircraft in a given zone; and combat helicopter units had come into extensive use in Vietnam and elsewhere.

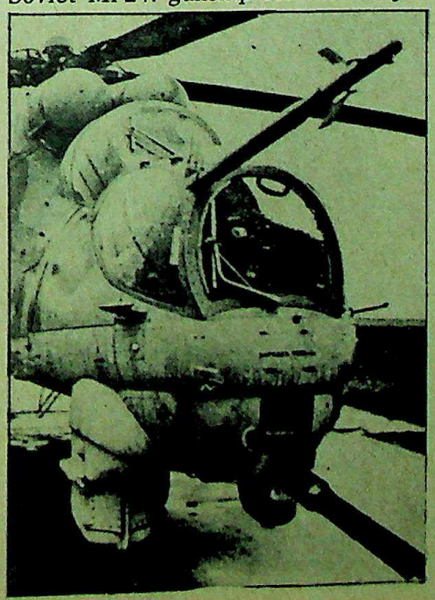
The army and the navy agree that the procurement and employment of AWACS aircraft is an air force responsibility. (These planes are very expensive and only two or three would be required. Thus the IAF would spend a huge slice of its budget and not increase its total aircraft strength.) The navy claims VSTOL aircraft as a special naval requirement for use on short-deck carriers. It also claims a larger share of helicopters, both for communication purposes and also as an anti-submarine weapon. Meanwhile, the army stepped up its demand for an army aviation corps: a requirement that is not only based on historic evolution, as witnessed in all progressive armies of the world, but also on the inevitable outcome of the advent of the combat helicopter. During the Indo-Pak war (1971), a dashing corps commander in Eastern Army had used unarmed helicopters with unorthodox abandon in Bangladesh, moving infantry and guns behind the Pakistani defences to disrupt their communications, demoralise the defenders and hasten their collapse. The generals were so enthusiastic that one of them boasted that "considering what we did spontaneously with unarmed helicopters, if the army had gunships and a deliberate plan, we could have overrun Pakistan in one week."

Quite understandably, the IAF was deeply upset by these trends, more so because then the Israeli air force had suffered very high losses of aircraft from Egyptian-manned Russian SA-6 and -7 missiles in the Israeli-Arab war (1973), emphasising the vulnerability of aircraft in the traditional close support role. Then again, satellite photography had made strategic reconnaissance aircraft obsolescent. Some army wits suggested that the IAF be disbanded "as an economy measure, and its assets be divided between the army and navy who could be made responsible for the security of the skies above them."

The air force was alarmed by all this and attempted to counter these moves at every available opportunity and by all possible means. Senior officers, during official talks, no matter what the subject matter of the talk, made it a point to introduce the topic and emphasise that, whilst rich and self-sufficient countries like the Soviet Union or America could afford to have separate air forces for their armies and navies, and also maintain a strategic and tactical air force manned by airmen, India which had to import all its major requirements, and had limited resources, should count every paise it spent. Therefore, the most cost effective method would be to have all the air resources pooled into one air force manned by airmen which could then make available whatever was needed to the other two services without loss of efficiency. This argument based on economy was their strongest card. Unfortunately, one very senior air force officer took the argument a step further and spoilt it all. Whilst lecturing to an inter-service audience at Staff College, he pleaded that defence spending was too heavily weighed in the army's favour. He recommended that the annual budget be proportionately distributed to each service based on their respective manpower levels: a suggestion so patently unscientific that it provoked much amusement. (Anyway, if taken seriously, the suggestion would have been most unfavourable to the air force.)

In 1974, the army formally presented its case for the creation of an Army Aviation Corps. Whilst so doing, it accepted that the air force should continue to man and operate all fixed wing aircraft, but claimed that the army should take over all helicopters, thus assuming sole responsibility for the roles of short-distance communication flights, casualty evacuation and artillery observation. The army also wanted a proportion of the existing helicopter fleet to be converted into gun-ships and reorganised into combat units designed to be used offensively or defensively in a ground battle. (All the equipment required to do this can be fabricated in India.) Whilst the army's case was being examined by the defence ministry, selected air force officers made desperate moves to cultivate Mr Sanjay Gandhi and win him over to their cause. The electoral defeat of the Congress and the installation of a Janata government upset their calculations in that direction.

Soviet Mi-24: gunship for the army?



Defining the problem

When the Army Aviation Corps papers were put up to Mr Jagjivan Ram who had been reappointed defence minister in the new government, he requested the air force to give their comments on the army's proposals. He then constituted a special committee composed of the three seniormost secretaries. The committee was asked to study the proposals and give its recommendations to the government. The secretaries functioned like a minor Supreme Court; they gave an opportunity to the two services to present their arguments and spent over a month listening to both sides. One member earned the reputation of sleeping through it all; another apparently listened to everything attentively but understood nothing; the third is reported to have heard and absorbed every word, but pretended that he had understood nothing. The net result was that no decision has been taken till today. This is not exceptional. A committee is not fertile ground for the growth of strategic or tactical concepts that must flow from dispassionate professionals who should consider technical, economic and military factors, devoid of emotional or other extraneous aspects.

Genuine inter-service cooperation arises from a joint consideration at all stages of operational planning: conception, discussion and execution. This can best happen when the services are made to live and work together. (This is the rationale for the National Defence College, the Defence Staff College and the National Defence Academy being inter-service institutions.) The first principle of close air support, therefore, demands that operational army and air headquarters be located alongside each other. Unfortunately, we have located our air and army headquarters at all the command levels in widely separated stations. (In Eastern Command, for example, one is at Calcutta and the other at Shillong. The problem of coordinating air support for Sikkim, Arunachal Pradesh, Nagaland or Mizoram is by no means simplified by such locations of headquarters.) Some have suggested that this had been deliberately encouraged by Mr Krishna Menon, when he was defence minister, as an anti-coup measure, to prevent the air force and army from getting too close together. If that be so, then it has worked admirably. Huge investments of public money have taken place to establish these various headquarters and it is too late to remedy this defect by changing locations now. Because of this basic defect, the success of any joint army-air venture is usually effected more by the good fortune of personal relations between individual army and air force commanders, than on any institutionalised system. The services have tried to improve matters by the establishment of cells from the air force with army field headquarters wherever necessary. In spite of this, army officers complain that their legitimate demands for close support in war are sometimes not met promptly at critical junctures in battle. They consider the situation unredeemable as the same defects prevail during ideal peacetime training conditions.

However, it would be unfair to blame the air force for the short comings of the system; it would also be naive to believe that these matters will somehow be solved by raising an Army Air Corps. Economy demands that an improvement be made by a dispassionate analysis of the problem and reorganising the system with improved equipment and serious training, to enable a quicker response in a fast moving battle situation, whether this be for photographic and visual reconnaissance, interdiction or close offensive support. All these tasks are performed by fixed-wing aircraft; the army, whilst agreeing that economic considerations are of paramount importance, has therefore, accepted that these responsibilities continue to be shouldered by the air force. The army, however, sees no justification for the air force continuing to be responsible for the maintenance and operation of the helicopter fleet employed in the roles of artillery observation, communication flights, casualty evacuation and the proposed gun-ships.

The air force admits that the army could be trained to operate and maintain the helicopter fleet, but consider that it would be uneconomical for them to do this as it would only be duplicating the existing facilities required to maintain such a fleet. If the army can accept that fixed-wing close support continue to be provided by the air force, then why should there be this clamour for helicopters? Surely, economic considerations should prevail; surely, the better solution for the proper utilisation of this expensive equipment is through joint training and planning in peace time? The air force is looking after the Air Observation squadrons, even though these are manned by army officers. Surely, the army can accept the same arrangement for its proposed gunships. It would be unfortunate if the army was to blindly follow the navy's wrong example.

The air force still regrets that the navy has a Fleet Air Arm. It believes that this would never have happened if the navy had lost its case for an aircraft carrier. Having acquired that "white elephant", it was unavoidable that the navy has to organise its own air arm and take over the procurement and operational maintenance of all their fixed-wing aircraft and helicopters. The Harrier jump-jet's performance in the Falklands war has added weight to the navy's arguments for an expansion of the Fleet Air Arm in that direction. This further distresses the air force who believe that the high costs of a jump-jet, which is a specialised weapon that may never be used in a future war, will eat into the limited overall defence budget and, therefore, restrict the procurement by the air force of other allpurpose fighter bombers which would have enhanced the overall air power of the nation and would have been a powerful back-up support for either the navy or the army in a future war; the IAF is convinced that this would be a more practical and cost-effective expenditure of Indian money.

These suggestions by the air force are pertinent and touch two crux problems that face our military planners. Firstly, there is need for a chief of defence staff to oversee the three chiefs and bring dispassionate profesional balance and wisdom when the three have a disagreement over concepts and budgetary allotments; it is fallacious to believe that this can be resolved by a committee of secretaries. (This whole business of the need for a chief of defence staff is a separate issue which is not being dealt with in this article.) The second problem, which is relevant to this debate, is: Where should we fit the proposed armed helicopter combat unit in the military order of battle? Must this be an army unit? Why can this not be an air force unit manned by the army, as is the case with the Air Observation squadrons? To answer these questions will require a brief review of the evolution of military organisations.

SA-6 missiles that crippled Israel

The Changing Rhythm of War

Man is eternally inventive. No sooner does he perfect a successful system of waging war, than the urge to eliminate the danger he has created compels him to develop yet another pattern of fighting. Invasions of villages by armed bands gave rise to forts; siege warfare perfected battering rams; mass infantry was overcome by horsed cavalry who in their turn were subdued by firearm—so it goes on. Success in one form of attack always calls forth a kind of defence which will compel a change to another strategy and different tactics; these terms refer to the conception and execution of war and their choice will characterise the pattern of any fighting. Strategy conceives of how an enemy may be defeated; tactics decide the means by which this conception is executed. Strategy prepares an army for battle; tactics designs how the battle will be fought. The government's decision to provide armed helicopters to our forces is a strategic decision; the decision on where to fit the armed helicopter in our battle order is also a strategic one; the organisations and systems evolved for its subsequent employment would be a tactical decision.

The choice of tactics is directly influenced by four factors: terrain, weather, the enemy himself and weapons. These factors are variable which is why the tactics used in war are constantly changing and why warfare is so uncertain. It is easy to see how terrain may influence tactics. Fast armour tactics cannot be employed on the rugged mountains of north India or in the jungles of east India. The wide open western border affords Pakistan with opportunity to carry out land-grabbing surprise attack tactics. The quick-moving armed helicopter is the best anti-tank defensive weapon to counter this and gain time whilst the conventional defences are mobilised. (This establishes the justification for the employment of armed helicopter tactics in the defence, though it does not, by itself, help one to decide whether this weapon should be employed by the air force or the army.) Weather effects modern armies, for men and materials can be made to function poorly by extremes of cold, heat or rain. The third element effecting the choice of tactics is the character and habits of the enemy. With a bold enemy you can be cautious; if he is timid you can be daring; if he is overconfident you can surprise and humble him.

That weapons, the fourth factor, play a decisive part in the choice of tactics, requires no emphasis. If a man is armed with a rifle and another with a pistol, the former would prefer to fight at a distance, for the superior range of his rifle would give him an advantage; the man armed with a pistol, would attempt to reduce this superiority and would try to crawl forward as close as possible before opening fire. Individual weapons can drastically change the character of tactics; the weapon with superior range invariably becomes the fulcrum of tactics. Thus, all things being equal, should an army be equipped with bows, spears and swords, their tactics would be shaped around the arrow; if armed with cannon and muskets, then around the cannon. The relative values of bows and muskets is easy to assess. However, the matter becomes more complicated when one tries to compare tanks and artillery. Paradoxically, even though an artillery gun may have a much longer range than a tank's gun, the fulcrum of tactics shifts to the tank and not artillery. This happens because of the factor of mobility.

Mobility

Having studied the various factors and decided on the tactics and weapons desired for the conduct of war, the military is still left with the problem of correctly organising the army to fulfil a given tactical plan. As range is the dominant characteristic of any weapon, so speed and mobility are the characteristics of offensive or defensive operations. Movement has been called the "soul" of war. An army which moves quickly can always anticipate the actions of a less rapid opponent; it can, therefore, bring more men and weapons into action at any decisive point, even if inferior in overall numbers. Thus, the basic problem in organisations is to arrange that a number of men can move and act with the greatest possible speed. Just as tactics is decided by the dominant weapon, tactical organisations are decided by the fastest moving element in the group.

Since an elephant, over long marches, had about the same speed as a foot soldier, so for centuries in India, tactical organisations were built round the foot soldier. The first radical change in mobility came with the taming of the horse and its use in war. Our ancestors could not see the need for change until our elephants were repeatedly overwhelmed by horses; firstly by those used by Alexander and later by the Turks; a gap of many centuries during which our ancestors incorporated horse cavalry but apparently learnt nothing and forgot nothing. However, it should be noted that this was a tactical lapse not in the choice of a weapon but in understanding the function of mobility in reshaping organisations. The invention of the tank brought about another radical change in mobility. As its power of movement was greater than that of the foot soldier or the horse or artillery, existing military organisations had to be remodelled around it.

Thus, there are three basic questions facing our planners today: firstly, will the armed helicopter, as a weapon influence future tactics? The answer is "yes;" the fact that our government is introducing this weapon is proof that there is wide agreement on this strategic issue. Secondly, as we are going to have armed helicopters, where do we fit these in our battle order? There are two broad alternatives: keep them as an air force unit which is manned by army crews and employed by the army; or evolve a new organisation for the ground forces around this new fulcrum of tactics—an army unit manned and commanded by soldiers. This decision is also a strategic one, but it cannot be answered with assurance, without asking and answering the third question—a tactical one. Does the introduction of this weapon warrant the re-modelling of units around the air cavalry concept? The answer is "yes." It is this answer which effects the answer to the second strategic question.

A Rational Concept

Concepts must flow from a dispassionate professional consideration of technical, economic and military factors; the sole aim is victory in war for the survival of the nation, and not inter-service or civil service one-upmanship. The navy needs its aircraft carriers and the fixed-wing aircraft and helicopters that operate with its fleets. The IAF must retain full control over all other fixed-wing aircraft and the roles that they perform for the army; the profesional skills that air force pilots bring to such tasks cannot be matched by parttime army pilots.

The fast-moving armed helicopter is not merely a carrier; it is the best defensive weapon to gain time over a widespread sector whilst conventional defences are activated. Technology enables the same force to be used also as a reconnaissance force or an offensive force. In the former role, it could watch a wide front. In the offensive role it can jump the ditch-cum-bund defences and other tank obstacles which have been constructed all along the international border of Pakistan and, thus, act as a deterrent to any future aggression from that direction. An offensive helicopter force must consist of a combination of artillery observers, infantry to hold a bridge-head across an obstacle and armed helicopters to beat off hostile counter attacks until the main ground forces link up. The armed helicopter will, therefore, be the fulcrum of tactics on the Western Front; new ground organisations will have to take shape around this element. Because of these considerations, it becomes unavoidable that the armed helicopter be integrated into the army battle order, which must be indivisible in close combat.

The question of whether all the remaining air force helicopters which perform the tasks of communication, artillery observation and casualty evacuation, should also become the army's responsibility is of minor consequence; those are merely carriers. No strategic or tactical considerations are involved in that decision which can be postponed till time decides which service can control this most economically. (By the same analogy, the army's Parachute Brigade is not interested in piloting the planes (carriers) which fly them into their dropping zone. But once they jump out, they need their own organisations for command reconnaissance, defence and attack—this must be indivisible. Similarly, the air force should not fear that the border security force or police will begin asking for an independent air arm; there can be no strategic or tactical justification for this.) But we cannot delay the organisation and training of the new combat helicopter units. It would be naive to believe that if these recommendations are implemented today, we can guarantee that the new helicopter units will be tactically effective tomorrow. Everything will depend on how old units are reshaped and reorganised around this new fulcrum of power. This requires time professional clarity of thought and intellectual honesty if it is to be done efficiently.

Our ancestors could not understand the function of mobility in reshaping organisations and, therefore, neglected horse cavalry in favour of the elephant until it was too late. This neglect is not historically exceptional. The British, who were pioneers in the concept of the tank and naval support aircraft, neglected both weapons after World War I; it was others who used them to advantage as fulcrums of power. Our military ancestors, though brave individuals, also never seemed to grasp the crucial value of weapons to tactics. The Marathas had gun foundries established in 1739, but the tactics of their army remained of a heterogeneous character. While they accepted new arms they did not relegate the old ones to a secondary position. Consequently, the weapons used by their soldiers represented all stages of development, and some of them were relics of the early stone age; one finds slings and arrows being used along with firearms in 1761. In fact, Indian rulers of that time saw the strategic value of cannon and firearms, but seemed unable to reorganise their tactics around the new fulcrum of firearms. An inability to appreciate the crucial value of mobility and weapons to tactics is a tactical lapse. Are we going to repeat history and fail to reorganise our tactics around the new weapon of the mobile armed helicopter? ■

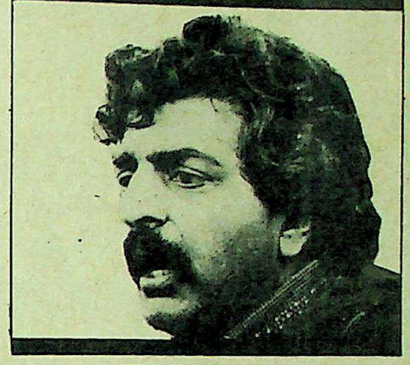
'Things have not changed in Pakistan'

Fifth Column



TARIQ ALI

"Things have not changed in Pakistan. The army remains in complete control. The existence of Pakistan is not needed by the people of Pakistan. It is needed by a tiny Punjabi-dominated ruling class, which comprises the army chiefs and the bureaucrats." These words were spoken by a former chief minister of Pakistan's border province of Baluchistan, who now lives in exile in a leafy London suburb. The Baluchi triumvirate consisted of Khair Baksh Marri, Ataullah Mengal and Ghaus Bux Bizenjo. Marri is now based in Kabul, Mengal is in London, while Bizenjo remains in Pakistan. The first two have lost hope in a solution which is dependent on the existing socio-political structure of Pakistan. Bizenjo, increasingly reviled and isolated, continues to argue for a federal Pakistan.

And yet there can be little doubt that history's strange decision, whereby the country's smallest province (in terms of population) has produced its most advanced politicians, bothers the military regime much more than stray terrorists.

Mengal admits that it is now endgame. He argues that the Baluchis will not be satisfied till they have won all their rights: "Till Liaquat Ali Khan's assassination, the bureaucracy had not decided how to run the country. Their dilemma was simple: how to retain colonies that would not challenge the central authority of the powerful military-bureaucratic complex that was beginning to establish itself. For Baluchistan, it (Pakistan) was always an uncomfortable state. Kalat did not agree to accession. However, after the chicanery that led to a merger with Pakistan, we decided to adjust ourselves to the new situation. What was the result? The entire bureaucracy treated the Baluchis as traitors. The mistrust was phenomenal and it was initiated by the ruling stratum. They flooded non-Baluchis into the province. They discriminated against us on every level.

"When I was in Mach jail in Baluchistan I noticed a remarkable fact. A prison warder is the lowest-paid employee of the government. There were 120 warders in the prison. Only 11 were Baluchis! If anyone had stated this, he would have been dubbed a traitor. The Kalat Scouts have only two Baluchis in them and the Sibi Scouts have none. The officers are from Punjab and the soldiery is from the NWFP (North West Frontier Province.) Today, if you land at Quetta airport you will find that 95 per cent of the police are from outside."

Mengal speaks calmly, without demagogy and with an anger that is repressed. His case is unanswerable. He regards the Bhutto period as the last chance there was for a satisfactory solution but he believes that Bhutto retreated under a series of external and internal pressures and finally signed his own death warrant by sending in the army to occupy the recalcitrant province. There were heavy casualties on both sides. An even more dramatic death was that of democracy: the army used Baluchistan to take over the entire country. According to Mengal: "When Marri, Bizenjo and I, met General Zia after our release from prison in 1977 we came to the conclusion that there was no change whatsoever. Today, in Baluchistan you will come across a military fort every 50 miles. Sibi, Dera Bugti, Kuzdar, Kalat are all full of military HQs. Their attitude to the people is that of conquerors. All these years we had been hoping that the East Pakistanis would one day prevail and minority rights in the West would be protected. Then came Bangladesh and there was no protection left. We had one last hope. We thought that the West Pakistani rulers would assimilate the lessons of Bangladesh. Today, we realise that this was an illusion. We have come to the firm conclusion that we cannot live honourably in the present setup in Pakistan."

> "After the merger with Pakistan, the Baluchis tried to adjust themselves to the new situation. What was the result? The entire bureaucracy treated the Baluchis as traitors. The mistrust was phenomenal and it was initiated by the ruling stratum."

During the guerrilla war in Baluchistan, special commando units were formed to hunt down Baluch oppositionists throughout the country. The operation was headed by a military-fascist Brigadier Bashir based in Quetta. It was Bashir who ordered the killing of Mengal's eldest son, Asadullah. The young Mengal was trapped and shot dead in a side street in Karachi. Mengal was heartbroken, but says: "I've lost so many sons in Baluchistan, so another is dead." Brigadier Bashir was never reprimanded. He left the army after the Baluch leaders were released. Bashir regarded this as a betrayal and wanted Marri and Mengal to be hanged. He was rewarded by being made chairman of the Ghee corporation, where he sits today getting richer by the day.

A fortnight ago there was a knock at Mengal's front door. It was the neighbours who told him that his car had been set on fire. The blaze was subdued before it spread to the house. A few days after this episode his children were assaulted in broad daylight on a street near where he lives. When the local police asked Mengal whether he had any enemies, the Baluch chief replied: "Yes, the government of Pakistan." It could, of course, be yet another racist attack on an Asian family. These are, after all, only too common. But the suburb where Mengal lives is not known for such attacks. The possibility remains that these acts constituted a warning to the former chief minister from his traditional political opponents.

ORISSA FLOODS

How relief operations were mismanaged

The state's Congress(I) politicians made merry while the people suffered, reports PRASHANT PATNAIK, after touring the flood-affected areas

"Do you know the cause of this flood which has created havoc in Orissa? It is the curse of Chhabirani, wife of journalist Naba Kishore Mahapatra, who was raped and killed on the banks of Biluakhai river just two years back. It took two years for her tears to swell and create havoc for the people and the government who have silently tolerated the criminals," said Rasalata Mishra, a 40-year-old widow of Kamasasan village, which has been completely devastated and washed away by the huge breach on the embankment of Kathjori at Daleighai in Cuttack district, when this correspondent visited the village on 5 September. Then, pointing her finger towards Biluakhai river, Rasalata continued, "That was the riverbed where Chhabirani was raped and there is Biridi village. The waters have completely washed away the village." Rasalata's eyes were full of tears. Three starving daughters were pestering her for food and her 11-year-old son was shivering with fever.

Since 30 August, when flood waters entered her village, she and her children had been without food and shelter. Rasalata's was not an isolated case; the other villagers too had faced the same fate, waiting every day for relief to reach them. Even six days after the flood waters had swept their village, no relief or medical aid had arrived. The politicians of Orissa were obviously too busy to bother themselves with mundane matters like these. And keeping in pace with Orissa's corrupt government, the person who has been put in charge of flood relief operations of this area is Nanda Mohanty, who is allegedly involved in the Chhabirani murder case. Bhagaban Mishra, a cook in Raghunathpur primary health centre, "When a person like Nanda Mohanty is put in charge of relief operations, is it possible to expect aid to reach the people?"

This was not the only charge against Nanda Mohanty. Villagers complained that most of the relief material meant for distribution in the flood-affected areas of Daleighai was being diverted, at Nanda Mohanty's insistence, to Biridi and few other surrounding villages where Mohanty has political interests. This is just one instance of how flood relief operations in Orissa are being mismanaged.

Unprecedented floods played havoc in Orissa from 29 August when 25 rivers in the Mahanadi and Rushikulya systems were in spate due to heavy rainfall in the catchment areas. The floods affected eight out of Orissa's 13 districts, and 8,000 villages spread over 24 sub-divisions and 100 blocks were flooded, causing misery to about a crore of people. According to official estimates, however, only 52 lakh people have been affected. Again, though the government claimed that 150 people had died due to the floods, an extensive tour of the flood-affected areas proved that the toll was at least 500. While people of the villages located near embankments could take shelter, others whose homes were in low-lying areas were not so fortunate. The only places they could rush to were distant highways, which were under ten to 15 feet of water. A number of villages have been completely washed away by the floods; one can only locate a village from its surroundings.

The Orissa government received the flood warning a day before the floods came. Mr J. B. Patnaik, Orissa's CM sent an SOS to the army, air force and the West Bengal government for sending rescue and relief teams. The following day, air force helicopters arrived to begin rescue operations. Yet, in spite of the timely help, even 15 days after the floods, thousands of people in flood-affected areas, staying on river and canal embankments exposed to the sun and the rain, had attacks of pneumonia and gastro-intestinal diseases. Why? The reason is that the government had totally mismanaged the flood relief operations and corrupt politicians were busy indulging in petty rivalries by diverting aid to only those areas where they had political interests. For instance, though the state government had promised emergency relief for seven days to 52 lakhs of flood-affected people, till the time of writing, only about half of them had received any aid. One reason for this was the wrong placement of officers in key positions. Mr D. P. Bagchi, registrar of cooperative societies and Mr A. K. Roy, chairman of the forest corporation, were incharge, at Bhubaneswar airport, of coordinating food-dropping operations. Both these officers have had little or no experience in this field. Nor were they as familiar with the topography of the flood-affected areas. As a result, these two officers did not get the cooperation of the revenue and food and civil supplies departments which usually do such emergency relief work. Besides, while the IAF was prepared to airdrop food to the flood-affected areas, the state government officials failed to supply them with sufficient quantities of foodstuff nor could they determine clearly the spots where food had to be airdropped. Since all land routes had been cut off, the only way of reaching food to the marooned people was by airdropping it.

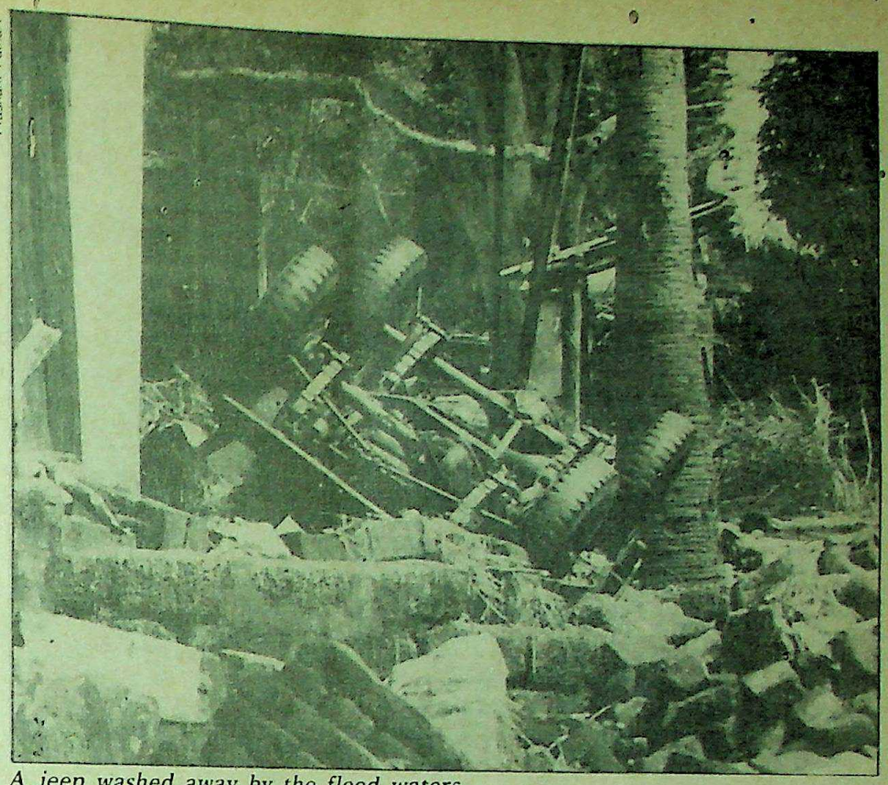
The IAF had put five helicopters at the disposal of the Orissa government, besides two helicopters which had been provided by Oil India. But, on most occasions, the helicopters were doing sorties transporting politicians and VIPs to the flood-affected areas, instead of carrying out relief operations. Such was the situation, that at one point of time, some air force officials, exasperated at the irresponsible behaviour of the politicians and state government officials, complained to the union deputy minister of defence, Mr K. P. Singh Deo. On 2 September, the army after receiving an SOS from Cuttack loaded six speed boats onto an IAF helicopter but had to unload it as quickly to make room for a minister who wanted to visit the flood-affected areas. When this happened thrice, each time the cargo of speed boats had to be unloaded at the arrival of VIPs who were given priority by the state government officials, this was brought to the notice of Mr Singh Deo. The speed-boats were finally airlifted after the minister's timely intervention. Said one IAF personnel to this correspondent, "We are more interested in helping the people than entertaining politicians and VIPs."



Prashant Patnaik

A jeep washed away by the flood waters

The experience of the army personnel was even worse. On receiving an SOS from the Orissa government on 29 August, 260 armymen from the Engineering and Signals Division rushed to the state with 33 power-boats and ten rowboats to carry out relief and rescue operations. Brigadier Sukhinder Singh of the 120 Infantry Battalion was in charge of coordination and liaison between the Orissa government and the army. The state government officials were to contact the army units by six o'clock every morning and provide them with relief materials and guides to take them to the flooded areas for conducting relief operations. But, according to the army officers this correspondent met, it was routine for the state government officials to contact the army control only around 11 am, when nearly half the day was wasted doing nothing.

To add to this already mismanaged situation, the Congress(I) leaders of the state decided to distribute relief material according to political considerations. For instance, when rescue boats were urgently required in Daleighai in Cuttack district, Mr Gangadhar Mahapatra, the education minister of Orissa, decided to send the boats instead to Kanas in Puri, which was relatively less affected, simply because he represents that area. Similarly, Kujang, an area represented by Lok Dal leader Dr Damodar Rout, got relief only on 8 September. There has hardly been any relief operation in this area though, till the time of writing, it is still under about 10 feet of water. Again, 39 persons in the Kokatpur area of Puri district were arrested because they complained that the officials involved in flood relief operations had issued more relief materials in Congress(I) pockets and had ignored the opposition pockets. Even voluntary organisations had a difficult time in distributing food for the marooned people simply because of the apathetic attitude of the state government. A spokesman of the Bhubaneswar branch of the Utkal Mahila Samity (affiliated to the National Federation of Indian Women), told this correspondent that the organisation had arranged cooked food for about 2,000 people and requested the officials in charge of relief operations to provide transport to carry it to the flood-affected areas. But, the government officials took no steps to help out the organisation.

While the people of the state were suffering because of the floods, some MLAs were busy making trips outside the state. Mr Bipin Das, government chief whip, whose Pipli Assembly constituency was totally submerged under water, left for Delhi along with former community development minister, Mr Krushna Charan Patnaik, to attend the swearing-in ceremony of Mr Ramchandra Rath. Mr Jagabandhu Das, a Congress(I) MLA, threw a lavish party for the press and his friends on 8 September at Pantha Nivas, Bhubaneswar to celebrate his becoming the president of the Orissa State Cooperative Bank Ltd, Bhubaneswar. The Orissa CM, Mr J. B. Patnaik, who had toured the flood-affected areas, meanwhile, thought it better to let his colleagues do as they pleased. And people continue to suffer in misery and silence.

Triumph and despair of a hockey player

Three years after Aslam Sher Khan angrily put away his hockey stick and turned his back on international competitions, the story of his life is the most candid and frank portrait we have yet had of an Indian hockey player—a modern hero continuously assaulted by officialdom, fate and his own failings. To Hell With Hockey: The life story of Aslam Sher Khan by Matin Khan (Allied Publishers, price Rs 15) is different from the general run of Indian sports books and biographies. It goes much beyond the playing field to the emotional makeup and the sociological tensions pressing upon the mind of a young boy born in a Bhopal back-alley, who discovered that the intricacies of hockey came naturally to him. This official biography of Aslam Sher Khan's life is in the same genre as Mohammed Ali's story, The Greatest. It is honest and unashamed. It is also the first book that explains exactly what is wrong with Indian hockey today. We publish exclusive extracts.

When does a man begin to live!
How does a person learn to die!

The answers depend on the meaning you give to life and to your conception of death. To me, Aslam Sher Khan, born in a kuchcha-tiled roof house in Bhopal, life has always meant fulfilment. And frustration, death. I began to live and learnt to die in the same year: 1969.

Life was a total mess. All efforts of my widowed mother had gone to waste. So had my father's training to groom me to represent India in the Olympics in hockey. I had staked a claim for a place in my hometown Bhopal's team for the National Hockey tournament at Ernakulam. I had been selected, was played at Ernakulam but was dropped in the final games just because I refused to join the 55-year-old coach of the team in bed. My baptism in the hockey arena was as sordid as it was tragic for my teenage ambition to represent my country in hockey. Like my father.

I am now 26, and during the last 10 years of my life a lot has happened in my little world. I have tasted triumph few sportsmen ever have in hockey. And humiliation. I have skyrocketed to fame and crashlanded in infamy—oscillating to and fro between fulfilment and frustration.

Generals in politics are bad. Policemen in sports even worse. I say this with a deep conviction, born out of my experience with Indian hockey. In India, hockey or any other sport is just a lucrative pastime for officials. It is a gravy train that catapults you to popularity and power faster than any other profession.

Ashwini Kumar was known more as the president of the Indian Hockey Federation (IHP) than for his policing job. Vijay Gupta, a young brilliant lawyer in Bhopal, was attracting a larger clientele because he was the honorary general secretary of the Bhopal Hockey Association (BHA).

Elsewhere in the country things of greater import were happening. Indira Gandhi had broken away from tradition, sounding the clarion for a renaissance in Indian politics for the betterment of the common man. At Bangalore, the ruling Congress party had split. But I was unaware of it. All I understood was hockey. Politics and I were still strangers. I had been called to the selection trials for the state team for the nationals at Aishbagh grounds. The coach of the state team, since dead, had toured New Zealand as a member of the Indian team. He asked me to see him everyday after play at Ibrahimpura, nerve-centre of Bhopal. Meeting at Ibrahimpura in the evenings after practice had always been the fashion for players and coaches known as Ustads. They discussed the day's play, analysed the performance of players and indulged in sports politics over rounds of tea. Anyone who was not a part of this sports syndicate found it extremely difficult to gain entry in the state team. It was also rumoured that the basis of selection to the state team was not only active excellence in hockey but passive participation in games indulged by the Ustads off the field.

I refused to believe it could be true. My father too had been a coach—a respected figure. Nearly everyone knew him and I could only consider his former teammates' interest in me as paternal; the love one has for a dead friend's son. But I was mistaken.

A day before the final selection of the team, the coach asked me to come over to his place to take the jersey which is the state colour worn by players in national tournaments. I had been told that if you are called to take the jersey personally you are on their "list" and if you do not respond to their overtures you are considered no good for the game as well. Since I understood what being called for the jersey meant, I spent a restless night, more so as I could not even tell anybody about it, especially my mother.

Bhopal is a small town. A forsaken acre close to the navel of the country on the map. A place where religious and social rigidity had established the purdah system. And adolescent urges found expression in homosexuality. The inheritance of this Pathan trait by a state ruled by women for generations is inexplicable. The intensity with which it was practised was frowned upon by parents who did not want their sons to play a passive role. A strict check was kept on young boys so that they did not make friends with older people. But then necessity, which is responsible for inventions, mothered hockey clubs as a respectable alibi to attract young boys. Here Ustads groomed talented boys to perform better on the field and in bad.

By the morning I had decided that hockey was important to me, and cycled across to his place. He gave me the jersey, praised my talent and prayers to God to make me well. Uncle Saadat found my tears unbearable too. He started taking me to the ground. Each evening saw me perched on the bar of Saadat's cycle going to the ground where I would wistfully look at the boys playing hockey. I started learning to stand again holding the handle of the cycle. Slowly my joints started responding and finally one day I found I had no pain. The first evening I started playing hockey again I remember running back home panting, deliriously happy merely because I could play again.

Father allowed me to play hockey whenever I wanted, wherever I wanted, except in the clubs. "It will keep his mind off sex," he used to tell my uncle. Sex and sports do not go together. That was his creed. He did his best to coach me from a tender age.

Our day would begin early. Even before dawn as the muezzin's call from the mosque rang out over a sleepy town calling the faithful to morning prayer, my father would wake me up. We would leave home and start running, not towards the mosque but in the maze of Bhopal's deserted streets. In the evenings he would teach me the art of dribbling and dodging, tapping, pushing and hitting the ball correctly at the Saidia school ground where among other players was Inam-ur-Rehman. "Watch Inam," my father would say, "he plays like a machine," meaning that Inam's reflexes were honed to a second. "He will be the best left-in in the world." Father was wrong. The world has only heard of Shahnaz Sheikh of Pakistan. Inam's talent was buried in the rubble of India's sports politics. My first hockey stick was selected for me by Inam at my father's request. That broken stick is still one of my most cherished possessions.

In spite of his efforts at grooming me, father never selected me to play for the school team even though he was the coach. Whenever I would ask father if I was good for the school team, his stock reply was, "You still have a lot to learn." It left me crestfallen to see that while other boys who did not play half as well were selected, I was never played. As I look back I realise that father wanted me to always be better than the team in which I played, so that my performance stood out. His old world values perhaps also restricted my selection—to avoid any accusation that a coach had selected his own son for the team. During monsoons when rains lashed Bhopal and it was impossible to play hockey, father would take me fishing. We would sit on a parcha, a stone outcropping jutting out of the water, and angle for fish the whole day. I did not like it. I wished the rains would end so that I could start playing hockey again. "Fishing will help you to play hockey better," I can still hear him say. "Watch that float bobbing up and down the water. Think of it as a ball, concentrate on it. The ball is the most important thing in hockey. Learn to concentrate on it, only on it." A bobbing float helped me to concentrate on the ball in hockey fields.

In 1966, father fell ill and was admitted in the Hamidia hospital. During the period of his hospitalisation I was called for the All India schools hockey championship. I did not want to go. I only wanted to be at my father's bedside. When he learnt that I had been called for the trials he asked me to go. "The better you play, the more I'll know you love me." Anything father said in his soft-spoken way was an order. He never raised his voice. "You only make a fool of yourself by raising your voice. You should never be angry often or nobody will pay heed to it. Learn to control anger. Only when it comes to a cinch and it becomes totally important, only then hit out and make it a fight to the finish, one way or the other." I was selected to represent the all-India schools' hockey team as a forward. When the famous hockey player Roop Singh, who was coach of the all-India schools'team, visited father in hospital and told him about my selection and praised my performance, father broke down and sobbed. A few days later he died as though he was waiting only to see my career begin.

Three years went by before I wore colours for Bhopal at Ernakulam in 1969. We had won two matches and were to play the third round next day when fate intervened. I had tried to maintain a distance from the coach after he had kissed me at Bhopal. As I sat mentally preparing for the match next day, Shahid Noor who was playing outside-left for us (he later captained Bhopal and played for India), informed me that the coach wanted to see me. The coach had a straight proposition. He asked me to sleep with him. If not, he made it clear, I would not be played, the next day or any day after that for Bhopal as long as he was the coach. The crystals of becoming an Olympian of representing my country in hockey like my father shattered into ugly, sordid fragments. So this was the bottom line, this old, dark, slimy balding coach who ordered bottoms up. I had fought arthritis because I loved hockey and borne my mother's merciless thrashing whenever I neglected the game because she wanted to live up to the promise she had made to her husband to bring me up as a hockey player. I was not played the next day. After the match I cornered him in his room. "You were my father's friend," I yelled. "You are a bastard. To hell with you. To hell with hockey," I broke the hockey stick, flung it at him and left the room.

I promised I would never touch a hockey stick again. But destiny had other little ideas for me. Other little lives, other little triumphs, and other little deaths.

After the nationals, the team was eager to be back in Bhopal. All except me. I sat huddled in a corner of the third class compartment near a window on my grimy holdall, away from the rest of the team which was gambling to while away the time. I did not give a damn to their gambling or their occasional snide remarks about me. In fact, I did not care as I would have nothing to do with them once we reached Bhopal.

The Grand Trunk Express which connects Delhi with Madras has a habit of reaching Bhopal late. That night it was unexpectedly early. I had, all along the journey dreaded returning home in spite of wanting to be with my mother who, after my father's death had become the pivot around which my life revolved. After father's death in 1966, Amma had taken over his role to provide food and shelter to the family.

The train had stopped at the outer signal. Instead of waiting for it to reach the station I quietly threw down the holdall from the train, picked up my attache case and got down. Even before the train had started moving, I took a tonga outside the railway perimeter and was on my way home. The clanging of utensils at the wayside shops heralded the end of another day. The tonga turned towards Saidia Middle School where I had once studied and played hockey under my father's guidance with boys like the great Inam. It was strange that even after giving up hockey my thoughts kept going back to it. Even before joining Saidia School we had started playing hockey in the narrow lanes outside my house. I was fortunate to start playing with a hockey stick. Others like Inam had been less fortunate. They started playing hockey with khapotas. They would climb trees in search of a branch curved at a slight angle, cut the branch and fashion it into a hockey stick.

The ball was made likewise. search would be on for a round piec of stone. Others would knead sand water and mud together into a paste A layer of the paste would be put round the stone and dried. Then would come a layer of smaller stones which were embedded to the paste, covered with another layer of paste and rounded like a ball. When it dried it would be covered on all sides with bits of cloth and put into an old stocking or vest. One of the mothers would be pestered to stitch it into a ball, and the game would be on.

Hockey has always been a poor man's game. And Bhopal has always been its cradle. Little boys would be found playing hockey in the narrow lanes of Bhopal which had running drains on either side. Since everybody contributed in making the ball or years later in buying it, everyone had an equal right to have the ball with him. This resulted in the ball being passed from boy to boy. Since the lanes were narrow, the passes had to be short. Similarly it was necessary to keep the ball glued to the stick lest it fall in the drain and the game was over till a new ball was made. This was how the short passing, ball control technique evolved in Indian hockey. It was taken from these lanes by the same boys to the year-round inter-school championships, primary, middle and high school. The best of the talent on display found a place in the state team then known as the Bhopal Wanderers, which participated national tournaments.

In spite of the clamour for traditional hockey, Bhopal was always relegated to a back seat. Perhaps, because there was nobody forceful enough to advocate the claim of its players or maybe because they were not rich enough to be considered good. Some of these boys who represented Bhopal and had been called to hockey camps for selection to the national team, made a living out of rolling bidis during the day. Others sold samosas, which their mothers prepared, in the streets of Bhopal. Some earned their livelihood from paan shops and others from tea stalls. All of them left their work in the evenings, some with permission, others without it, to play hockey. It was in their blood. So was it in mine but just now I had promised to rinse it out of my system.

On my return from Ernakulam I sought refuge from hockey in illness. Mother felt concerned for the first few days, and then one day she forced me out of bed and the house. "You will be able to get over whatever illness you have. I know you are not ill and I will not have my son turn into a pretender." I could hardly refuse going to play after that.

Every evening, I left home but instead of going to play I would visit my paternal uncle Hamid Sher Khan's house closeby. His son, Taufiq Sher Khan, had been offered admission as a player by talent scouts of Aligarh University. Getting admission as a player in the university was regarded an achievement. You did not have to pay fees and were provided all facilities for the game including full playing kits. Taufiq kept after me to accompany him to Aligarh. He felt confident that I would get admission as a player. I would not really have minded going but what prevented me from doing so was that the opening was being provided by my uncle's son. Father had always been against it. Mother even more so. She denounced making such a headway in life and termed it shooting a gun from another man's shoulder. But as the days went by I mellowed to Taufiq's persuasion and had almost decided in favour of Aligarh till I went for Friday prayers.

Friday has a special significance for me like all Muslims. In the afternoon, men gather in mosques for prayers. I have never been able to understand any other significance of this congregation except of bringing people together. To me a man's religion is very personal, like sex: prayer comes from the heart and wherever you pray, God being omnipresent hears you. Yet I continued to go for Friday prayers, especially after father's death, less for the prayers and more as a sop for my mother's feelings. Amma, a deeply religious woman, wanted me to pray at least once a week on Fridays, if not five times a day like a good Muslim should.

Generals in politics are bad. Policemen in sports even worse. In India, hockey or any other sports is just a lucrative pastime for officials. It is a gravy train that catapults you to popularity and power faster than any other profession

After the prayers as I came out of the mosque I saw a labourer cutting wood in the vacant plot of land adjacent to the mosque. His body glistened with sweat, shimmering in the glare of the afternoon sun. With every stroke of the axe his muscles came into play and stood out. Father used to cut wood occasionally to keep trim after he had given up playing hockey. Since the woodcutter's shack was near my house, I decided to keep trim by cutting wood since my hockey-days too were over. That evening instead of going to Taufiq's house I went to the woodcutter's shed. The open space in front of the shack was littered with logs of wood, cut and brought from forests to the city and sold by contractors. The logs of wood after being cut in small sizes were sold for use as firewood. The woodcutter had known my family for a long time and had no hesitation in lending one his axe. Dressed in shorts, and a sweat shirt I started axing away. I wasn't making any progress. "Swing from the right and then from the left," said the woodcutter. I took his advice and splinters of wood soon started flying in all directions.

I was so engrossed in the exercise that I did not hear a motorcycle stop on the road. "Ahmed Sher Khan's son is aspiring to be a woodcutter instead of an Olympic hockey player," I heard a half-taunting, half-serious voice and turned to face it. Perched on a log of wood behind me was Ghufran Azam, a student leader who was also a sports promoter for the local Saifia College. The college had been built by a philanthropist, Sajjad Hussain, and his son, Fakhruddin, was the secretary of the Saifia Educational Trust which was responsible for running the institution. Ghufran, who had his early schooling in Jamia Milia at Delhi was one of the first boys to have joined Saifia College. It was here that he developed a taste for politics and became a student leader. His abstemious and spartan way of life won him friends and followers, both boys and girls. To him, everybody was important and the one who mattered most was one who was genuinely in need of help, especially sportsmen. It was his effort and advocacy that prompted Saifia College to adopt the pattern of Aligarh University in sports promotion. A player who was admitted in Saifia did not have to worry about his fees; he also received a monthly scholarship and a free playing kit.

I stood sheepishly before him; eyes lowered. "I do not want to play hockey anymore," I said meekly.

"Quitters never win," he snapped, "and winners never quit. You know things have a habit of reaching me and there's no reason why you have to give up hockey, at least not with me alive. I won't let you bury your talent in frustration."

I argued with him that hockey was in the hands of clubs and every club was as bad as the other, so where could I go. "To college," was the prompt reply, "Saifia College. The clubs are bad, I agree, but they will continue to remain bad if people like us start quitting instead of fighting the system and bringing hockey back from clubs to educational institutions. I do not promise anything to you," he said while leaving, "except that you will be a brother to me, like the rest of the boys. If your game is worth it, I will see that you play."

Ghufran's acceptance as the leader by students resulted mainly from his being a man of his word. He did not make a promise but once made it, he stuck to it. He stood by the students and the students stood by him en masse. That night after dinner, I told Taufiq that I was not interested in Aligarh University but would be joining Saifia College, after which I went to Ghufran's house at Khirni Wala Maidan. Ghufran and his close friends used to patronise a small tea shop below the Moti Masjid in the evenings. It was from here, in my opinion, that Ashwini Kumar's downfall as president of the Indian Hockey Federation began. Since the 1948 Olympics, at London, in which Latif-ur-Rehman and Akhtar Hussain had represented India but not played, no player from Bhopal had found a place in the Indian hockey team. Even when the great Inam, accepted as the best inside-left ever produced by the country, was playing at his peak for Calcutta's famous club, Mohun Bagan, in the early Sixties, he had not found a place in the Indian team for the Tokyo Olympics in 1964.

Bhopal's hockey had been seething with rage at the stepmotherly treatment it received from the Indian Hockey Federation. This rage found expression in 1968 when Indian Airlines embarked on a sports promotion programme. The first on the list of its priorities was hockey. Their choice fell on discarded players who were considered the best bet and recruited. In the debut, in the Jawaharlal Nehru Hockey tournament in 1968, Indian Airlines captained by Inam and with seven other boys from Bhopal mesmerised team after team with their ball control, short passing, web weaving technique and stickwork. They lifted the trophy, shocking spectators, sports pundits and sport writers alike that such talent, though available in the country, was being neglected. The shock gave way to questions by the press and in 1968, Inam-ur-Rehman became the first Bhopal player to be selected to represent India in the Mexico Olympics, 20 years after another Rehman had been selected for the London Olympics; selected but not played in any important match. Inam's inclusion in the team was the beginning of the end of Punjab's monopoly in Indian hockey. The doors were opened to talent from other parts of the country. When Indian Airlines made attempts to recruit discarded players, Ghufran played a vital role in offering the Bhopal players to Indian Airlines. Some of these players had joined the Airlines as assistants, some others even as loaders. They joined the Airlines not because of money as the salaries were paltry compared to those offered to players in later years. They joined, as Ghufran told me that night, "because hockey is a religion to us if we have to vindicate ourselves, we have to prove that we are better than others."

I joined Saifia College next day. On the hockey field, things were not as easy as I had anticipated. The senior players took an instant dislike to me but the awe and respect in which they held Ghufran softened the hostility.

The Saifia College is affiliated to Vikram University and for the university trials in 1969, Ghufran had given his choice of players from Saifia College to the university coach, Qamar, who had represented Bhopal as outside-right and lost the berth to Kishan Lal in the Indian team to the 1948 Olympics. The list contained only one name: Aslam Sher Khan.

In the Jawaharlal Nehru Hockey tournament at Delhi, I represented Saifia College. We were staying at the National Stadium and Ghufran was the manager of the team. On my return from prayers that Friday, I found two people sitting on the cot talking to Ghufranbhai. One of them was introduced to me as K.P. Roy of Indian Airlines. He was a hefty man and looked like a wrestler past his prime. Keshav Roy, I learnt later, had captained the Indian wrestling contingent to the London Olympics. He was now a sports officer with Indian Airlines. When Ghufran told me that Indian Airlines regarded me as a potential national player and wanted to recruit me, I was so thrilled that I failed to grasp the emphasis he placed on the word "potential." I would now have a chance to play with players like Inam, Ashok, Govinda, Krishnamurthy, and fly in planes.

After Roy left, Ghufran turned to me and growled, "That man thinks he can develop you into a top player when you can walk into the Indian team any day. Don't join them yet, they will come again." In spite of my respect for Ghufran, I had apprehensions about his confidence in my talent. The newspapers next morning included my name in the Indian hockey team to tour Pakistan. I kept staring at my name in disbelief and delight. And sure enough K. P. Roy's emissaries were back. The Airlines wanted Aslam Sher Khan.

DEFENCE

Discontent among IAF men

The extravagant golden jubilee celebrations create controversy

New Delhi: There is considerable discontent, rancour and exasperation within the officers' corps of the Indian Air Force at the way in which the IAF has, since 9 October 1981, been celebrating its fiftieth anniversary, which falls on 8 October, 1982. Behind the glitter of aerial pyrotechnics by the Thunderbolts unit, static air displays all over the country, the Doordarshan TV serials and the other celebrations earmarked for the IAF's golden jubilee, the feeling among a large section of the officers and ranks is that no attention has been paid to the pressing needs of the personnel, who in fact, make the IAF a highly rated air force.

This year's Independence Day was particularly gloomy for Indian defence forces. It was expected that on that occasion, the government would announce a number of financial subsidies and other facilities for the Indian Army, the IAF and the Indian Navy. News reports published in various parts of the country last summer had strengthened the defence personnel's belief that the central government had cleared the proposals earlier finalised by the defence ministry. But the 35th Independence Day came and went, without new sanctions for the disgruntled services. Within the IAF, the disappointment crystallised into disillusionment with its golden jubilee celebrations.

Souvenirs worth Rs one crore and 40 lakhs have been already ordered by the Golden Jubilee Celebrations Committee. And word has been sent out from Air Headquarters to all IAF messes in the country to book orders for these golden jubilee mementos. But at least 50 per cent of the IAF messes in the country are presently in a tight financial situation because of the general rise in prices over the years. Feeble attempts have been made by several IAF messes to say that they do not have the resources needed to make these purchases, but their protestations have been quietened by senior officers at Air Headquarters. In August and September this year, many of these consignments were airlifted from New Delhi to messes all over the country. Some of the expensive purchases include three special dinner sets priced at Rs 3,000, Rs 6,000 and Rs 9,000. Moreover, the airlifting of these consignments for the IAF messes is being carried out under cover of official air flights on duty. SUNDAY learns that the number of IAF flights that have taken place during the last year, is the maximum ever undertaken by the airforce to a large number of the smaller and more remote air bases.

The PM and AVM Dilbagh Singh watching the IAF's firepower demonstration

One amazing suggestion made to the IAF messes, was to buy huge stocks of playing card packs carrying the golden jubilee insignia. Some messes have been told to buy as many as 500 packs in a single purchase. When these messes represented to the Golden Jubilee Celebrations Committee that they did not need to make purchases in such large quantities, the messes were advised to visualise longterm requirements and place orders to last them the next four to five years! The other talked about items are the special gifts that liquor distillers and brewers, Mohan Meakin, have made to the IAF messes. However, none of these glasses, ash trays, ice buckets and other decorative bric-a-brac has come down to the messes; the articles have disappeared somewhere along the line. Mohan Meakin went in for a special gift season for the IAF messes because they are one of the leading suppliers of IMFL (Indian-made foreign liquor) to the IAF. Incidentally, Mohan Meakin will be marketing a special, new drink dedicated to the air force.

Reviewing the activities undertaken for the IAF's golden jubilee celebrations, there is a feeling among air force officers that the year round celebrations have tied up the IAF to 12 months' publicity and public relations work. Nothing else has been done this past year because of the demands on men and machines for publicity work. The Golden Jubilee Celebrations Committee is staffed by some 50 officers, including eight Air Vice Marshals and three Air Commodores. The number extra sorties flown for the celebrations add up to a considerable expenditure in aviation fuel costs as also in aircraft depreciation. For each TV serial shown by Doordarshan every third Saturday, over the last year, hundreds of officers have been involved in arranging demonstration flights and coordinating ground activity. Each time a Doordarshan team visited an IAF base, almost the entire station would get involved in the filming operations.

Realising that the golden jubilee year has not sorted any of their own problems, many IAF personnel have lately begun to complain against the Shashi Kapoor-Govind Nihalani feature film, Vijeta. Vijeta has been made as a tribute to the IAF and when filming started last year, the movie was a favourite with the personnel. That excitement is now largely missing. Instead, complaints are made that more than Rs 80 lakhs worth of extra flying hours was undertaken by the IAF for Vijeta, in contravention of the initial policy decision, conveyed in a Government of India letter, that no extra flying effort should be put in for the feature film and that the Vijeta unit should be allowed to feature normal air force flights only.

In its eagerness to help the filmmakers, the IAF circumvented this policy decision and the majority of the sorties flown for the shooting were extra flights, undertaken outside the course of normal air force flights. Planes were also specially flown in from their bases for the filming, which was done at Pune, the Air Force Academy at Hyderabad and Jamnagar.

The 30 senior officers in the Golden Jubilee Celebrations Committee, plus the officers and ranks brought in to assist them, were posted at Air Headquarters in New Delhi, working permanently on the celebrations. During the year, these officers and men did no professional air force duty. Looking after the publicity campaign and public relations, they have spent this past year in procuring sponsors—such as the Canara Bank, the Bank of Boroda, the Syndicate Bank, the Punjab National Bank and India Tobacco Company—to print special golden jubilee calendars, buy TV time and radio spots and secure advertising hoardings for the IAF's celebrations.

The most intriguing aspect of the committee itself is that it is headed by Air Vice Marshal T.J. D'Sa, who was removed overnight from his command at the Air Force Academy, Hyderabad, last autumn because Air Headquarters had received a number of anonymous complaints against him from officers and airmen. AVM D'Sa's choice as head of the Golden Jubilee Celebrations Committee has only added to the discontent among the IAF personnel.

COMMUNAL TENSION

The Meerut riots were preplanned

Meerut: If the Shiva temple had not appeared overnight under the peepul tree and caused Meerut's recent communal riots, something else would surely have. Someone, somewhere, was making sure of this. From the desecration of the mosques to the murder of the temple priest and the mysterious consignment of 1,600 knives which arrived in the city the day before rioting began, everything seems to have been carefully planned.

As the silent, curfew-bound streets slowly return to normal, rumours and allegations rent the air and add to the tension which is still hidden under the surface calm. Among those who appear to have had a clear hand in stirring up trouble are the Imam of Delhi's Jama Masjid, Syed Abdullah Bukhari and the Bharatiya Janata Party, whose local leaders have disappeared in order to escape the arrest warrants. For a change, the local administration appears to have taken whatever precautions it was possible to take, short of arresting the Imam and the BJP leaders.

Although actual rioting began only after the temple priest was murdered on 6 September, tension began to develop in the city from 12 August when a special Janmashtami aarti was forcibly performed at the disputed temple at midnight.

Shahghasa is a predominantly Muslim area where the shopkeepers are mainly Hindu. Till early this year the so-called temple was merely a peepul tree which Hindus considered sacred and made offerings to. Then, suddenly, overnight a makeshift room appeared in which a Shivalinga was installed. Another room came up shortly in which pujari (priest) Ram Bholey (30) began to live. The sudden appearance of the temple caused a Muslim lawyer, Qazi Zaheer Ahmed, to declare that the temple could not be situated there because there was a Muslim shrine just below it, adjoining his house, under the peepul tree. This was being enquired into by a magistrate when the special aarti was performed on Janmashtami.

Tension was created as a result and four Hindus were arrested on the night of 12 August. The following day, around 500 Hindus led by Mr Mohan Lal Kapoor, former BJP MLA and Mr Brahm Pal Singh, BJP district president, picketed the Kotwali police station demanding the release of the four men. The police had to resort to a lathi charge to control the crowd and 19 more people were arrested. On the same day the BJP held a provincial divisional convention of its various units a few kilometres from the police station. At the convention, Mr Sundar Singh Bhandari, well-known for his RSS leanings, and M. P. Tripathi, state president of the BJP, criticised the administration for the arrests. The arrested men were released later that day after a delegation met the district magistrate, Mr Shambhu Nath. By then, there was considerable tension in the Shahghasa area and police patrolling was intensified and other precautionary measures, like alerting the army, were taken.

On 20 August, the magistrate who had been enquiring into the disputed "holy" spot publicised his findings. He was of the opinion that the place was sacred neither to the Hindus nor to the Muslims for till recently, there had been neither a temple nor a mazar there. As a result, a group of prominent Hindu and Muslim citizens met on 20 August and agreed that although the temple would be allowed to continue where it was, no ringing of bells or blowing of conch shells would be permitted.

The following day the Imam of the Jama Masjid is reported to have arrived in Meerut and held meetings with various Muslim groups. It was around this time that the incidents of pig meat being thrown into mosques began. About four mosques were desecrated and tension continued to mount resulting in the stabbing of a Muslim boy in Nandram Ki Chowk on 4 September. Police sources maintain that this was not a communal incident; the boy was stabbed in a fight.

In any case, the Imam returned to Meerut the next day, and made public his disaproval of the agreement reached in the Shahghasa dispute. He is also said to have met local Muslims and stirred up communal feelings. The following evening around 10 pm, crowds of rioters converged on the temple and in the melee the pujari was stabbed to death. From 4.00 am that morning, 16 areas under the Kotwali, Delhi Gate and Lisadi Gate police stations were put under indefinite curfew. On that day, however, there was no further trouble but on 8 September, when there was a slight relaxation in the curfew, there was violence as Hindus and Muslims fired at and stoned each other from rooftops. There was another stabbing incident.

From then onwards, there have been sporadic spurts of violence which have resulted in 11 people being killed, 25 being injured and 552 arrests. The violence could have been serious, had the police not apprehended the nine crates with their lethal cargo of knives, khukris, kirpans and bayonets. According to the police these weapons were meant specifically to be used in a riot; they could have no other possible use. Although a few people are being questioned in connection with the cache of arms, the police were not releasing details. Investigations are still in progress and more weapons are expected to be found.

In the areas where curfew is being gradually lifted, the predominant emotion is mistrust. Abandoned, burnt out Muslim houses can be seen in Hindu areas and the reverse in Muslim areas. What can also be seen quite clearly, is that in Muslim areas, the mistrust extends not merely to other Hindus but also to the police and the PAC (Provincial Armed Constabulary) in particular. In some Muslim areas, in fact, the violence seemed to have taken place mainly between the PAC and the Muslims. There were allegations that doors had been broken down and houses looted by PAC men.

Among those who believe that the riot was engineered, is Congress(I) MLA Manzur Ahmed who felt that communal organisations like the RSS and the Jamaat-e-Islami were interested in creating trouble for him because he stood for secularism. He was elected in 1977 and 1980 from a seat which till then had been a Jana Sangh stronghold. Some local dailies accused Mr Ahmed of instigating the riot but nobody could prove the allegations.

Meerut has had a history of communal riots. Way back in 1936 when Veer Savarkar is said to have visited the city, there was a riot. Since then, there has been a riot virtually every five years with the last major one being in 1973 which was allegedly sparked off by a cyclist colliding with a rickshawallah. One was a Muslim and the other a Hindu. It is quite easy to start a riot in this city because the population is almost equally divided. Out of 600,000 people, 45 per cent are Muslim and the rest Hindu. The atmosphere is still explosive and seems to require only a spark for the city to go up in flames again.

TAMIL NADU

Hell is a stone quarry in MP

Madras: Government legislation has once again come up short against the stone wall of rural reality—this time in Tamil Nadu. With the recent 'rescue' of 254 bonded labourers of Tamil Nadu from the stone quarries of Madhya Pradesh by a team of CID crime branch officials, the sentiment has again gained ground that legislative and executive action against the institution of bonded labour has been peripheral with only minimal impact in the hinterlands.

Over the years, hundreds of Tamilian men, women and children have been lured from their native places to the stone quarries of Raisen and Vidisha districts of Madhya Pradesh with promises of quick money, abundant food and clothing. Quarry contractors, represented by roving agents, have drummed up cheap labour from the remote, backward areas of the state with stories of splendour and riches. Entire families have consequently migrated to Madhya Pradesh. Once there, the dreams have always shattered into wretched reality as the hapless victims are trapped in a world of drudgery, deprivation and even tor-ture.

Whether it is Valiyammal, Raju or Muniyamma, the tale of woe is the same. The guillible victims were either stonecutters or farm labourers leading a misersble existence. When the agents of the contractors arrived at their villages with assurances of Rs 30 a day as wages, food and shelter, they sold their possessions and set off for Madhya Pardesh. Once at the quarry, they were given Rs three or even less—children were paid as little as 50 paise—and were accommodated in shanty towns without even the most basic of amenities.

The women were frequently raped by the contractors and their toughs. Take the case of Janaki, who had left for the quarries with her parents when she was six years old. Years later, she was married off to another bonded labourer. According to her testimony, she was repeatedly raped by the quarry contractor in front of her husband. Following complaints registered by their relatives in Tamil Nadu, a police team from Pudikottai visited the Raisen stone quarry and freed persons, including five women, in July this year. Later, another police team from Trichy rescued 20, including eight women. The police officers who conducted the rescue operations recounted to their seniors horrifying tales of inhuman suffering and cruelty.

In August this year, four cases were registered: two in Arimalam police station in Pudukottai, one in Vaiyampatti police station and one in Melur police station. Realising the dimensions of the slave trade, the CID crime branch moved in to conduct a major rescue operation. Their investigations revealed that A. L. Subramaniam and Chokkalingam (both Tamilians), contractors of stone quarries in Raisén district, assisted by their relatives in collusion with some persons in Madhya Pradesh, have been systematically conducting this inhuman trade. Cases have been filed against them under the Bonded Labour Abolition Act of 1976. A posse of two inspectors, three sub—inspectors, two head constables and two constables from the CID crime branch left for Bhopal on 6 September. With assistance from the MP police, the Tamil Nadu policemen raided the quarries in the hilly, wooded terrains of Sitarampur, Soorai, Chendura Aktar Patel, Khathir and Thapparapatri and rescued 254 people, including 84 men, 59 women and 111 children.

Under Section 12 of the Bonded Labour Abolition Act, the collector of Raisen ordered an inquiry into the cases of bonded labour in the stone quarries, The victims testified to their having been tortured, raped, starved and cheated by the contractors. They even displayed their scars and injuries as testimony to the brutalities they had been subjected to.

For the freed 254, it was a rare bid for freedom. They were brought back to Madras on 13 September by the Link Express. A stream of bedraggled labourers trickled onto the platform, exhausted and plagued by visions of a bleak future. The next day the victims were transported to their hometowns. The Tamil Nadu government has sanctioned Rs 1,000 to each of them and through the district collectors, has initiated rehabilitation proceedings. The 254 liberated workers are only the proverbial tip of the iceberg. There are scores of them who are duped into sordid captivity in quarries spread all over the country, particularly Madhya Pradesh, Andhra Pradesh, Uttar Pradesh and Haryana.

"We will not allow the culprits to escape"

Trivandrum: The Vypeen liquor tragedy in Kerala on 3 September during the Onam festivities, left more than a 100 dead and many others seriously impaired for life (SUNDAY 19 September). What is the Kerala government doing to stop such an occurence being repeated? Anita Pratap met the Kerala finance and law minister, Mr K. M. Mani, to find out. Excerpts from their conversation:

Q: What do you have to say about Vypeen liquor deaths?

A: It has to be treated like murder. It has left 65 dead and several others blind. We will not allow the culprits to escape. Police is very vigilant. We will take all measures to see to it that it doesn't happen again.

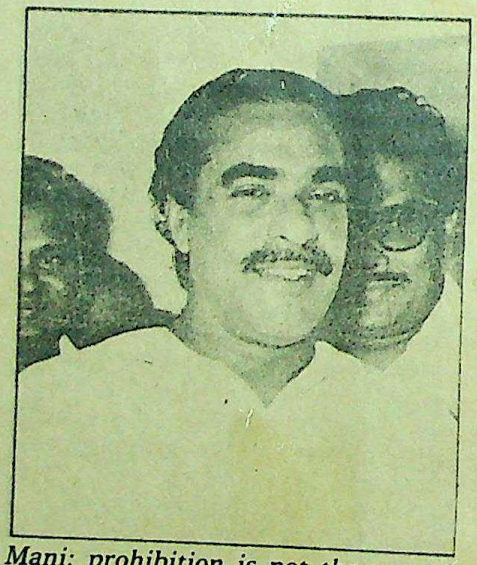
Q: When you say that "it will be treated like murder," does that mean that the perpetrators will be given the same penalty as those guilty of murder?

A: No, I don't mean that. What I mean to say is that it is very, very serious. The contractors will be blacklisted.

Q: Blacklisting does not mean much. Can you not introduce amendments in the existing laws to ensure conviction?

A: Yes, amendments can be made. It willhave to be made under the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act .

Q: What are some of the measures that your government is planning to adopt to ensure that such deaths do not take place again?



Mani: prohibition is not the answer

A: One suggestion that the government is experimenting with is bottling. At present, contractors lift arrack from the distilleries and the bottling is done by them. At this stage we have no control and it is easy to adulterate the arrack. The excise rules have to be stricter and any existing loopholes in the excise policy will have to be plugged. Stern measures have to be adopted even if it means a loss in revenue. We do not mind as we want to weed out this problem. We have to change the excise policy—it is not the fault of this government but the policy which has been existing for several years. The government is also planning to launch a massive campaign against drinking. The youth wing of the political parties will take it up as a movement. Prohibition might be a remedy but it won't solve the problem. We have to induce the people to refrain from drinking "Madhya nirodhanam (prohibition)" is not the answer "Madhya varjanam (voluntary abstinence)" is.

Q: Would you say that negligence and collusion of excise officials is responsible for this tragedy?

A: (Smiles). On the face of it, it appears excise officials were negligent. 1 September was Sri Narayana Jayanti day and liquor shops were to be closed. But they were open. As for collusion, I don't know. Anyway, I should not say anything as a judicial probe has been ordered.

Q: The spirits scandal exposed in no uncertain terms the nexus between politicians and liquor barons. What do you have to say?

A: It is not true of all politicians. I agree, some of the covntractors have strong political connections with some political parties.

A: The political parties should themselves keep away from these contractors. They should have absolutely no truck with them otherwise these liquor contractors will adulterate politics also.

Sexist attitudes thrive in St Stephen's

New Delhi: Of the 52 colleges in Delhi University, admission to St Stephen's is the cherished objective of every fresher. The college celebrated its centenary in 1981, and over the years it has acquired a sacrosanct reputation of superiority in academics, sports and the overall development of a student.

During the annual students union elections of St. Stephen's College, the issues at stake have always been cultural and social. There has never been interference by political parties and elections have been conspicuously bereft of any controversy. This year, however, the recently concluded annual students union elections, sparked off an acrimonious debate and controversy which threatens to besmirch the hallowed reputation of St Stephen's College.

For the first time in the century-old history of the college, a woman candidate, Jyotsana Kapoor of third year history honours, contested for the post of president of the students union at the annual election. There were five candidates contesting for this coveted post. The other four candidates were boys, three of them being from Ms Kapoor's class namely Tariq Shamsul Haque, Dilip Menon and Barun Mitra, and the fourth was Sange Dorji of the 3rd year B.A. pass course.

Pre-election trends tended to be primarily in favour of Jyotsana Kapoor, with Tariq Haque being a close second. Jyotsana Kapoor's election platform was different from the usual issues of better mess facilities, allocation of funds for the students union and sports. Her campaign was against the chauvinistic and often reactionary male domination of college affairs, which culminated in the notorious 'holi incident' of 1981. During the festival celebrations that year, a group of boys from outside the college entered the premises of St Stephen's and on the pretext of playing holi, they physically molested the girls present at college that day. None of the Stephanian boys assisted their fellow-students in distress and did not help in any follow-up protest. Even the reaction of principal. W. S. Rajpal and most of the staff (all with professed liberal views) was muted to say the least. (It may be mentioned here that St Stephen's College started admitting girls only since 1975, and so attitudes of male chauvinism still prevail in several quarters.)

It was against such attitudes and with a deep concern for better facilities for girls, that Jyotsana Kapoor and her supporters campaigned. For instance though there are about 400 girls out of a total student strength of about 950, there is till today no proper common-room for girls. Ms Kapoor received the support of liberal boys as well because she intended to include karamcharis and lecturers of the institution in various committees. Such an approach naturally upset the status quo of the conservative establishment of the college. Jyotsana Kapoor, a vivacious girl, who participates in anti-dowry campaigns, street-plays on social issues and student movements against oppression and exploitation, was not considered a 'safe president' by the authorities.

On the day of the elections there was a heavy turnout and the students awaited the results eagerly. When the counting concluded, Jyotsana Kapoor's election agents, Sanjoy Roy (3rd year physics honours) and Mahesh (3rd year philosophy honours), emerged jubilantly as their candidate had won by a narrow margin of five votes. The officer for the elections, Mr Bajaj, a lecturer in physics, had even signed the election notice saying that Ms Kapoor had been elected president. It was then that the chicanery of the conservative forces came into the picture.

History had been made, with St Stephen's College having elected a girl president for the first time. But the euphoria and elation lasted only for five minutes. Mohammed Amin, head of the history department, and one of the polling officers, called back Ms Kapoor's election agents and proposed a recount, alleging that three votes of Tariq Haque had been counted in Jyotsana Kapoor's favour by mistake. It was from here that the mischief originated.

Significantly when the results were originally declared, the election agents of all the four candidates except those of Tariq Haque, left the room. For the recounting, the election agents of the three other candidates were not called—a gross violation of the rules and ethics, which St Stephen's College always professes to champion. Mahesh and Sanjoy Roy naively agreed to the recount. In St Stephen's College, the preferential system of voting is followed and in the recounting Tariq Haque was declared winner on the preference votes. The whole procedure was unconstitutional as the results of the recount were signed only by Jyotsana Kapoor's agents and Tariq Ha-que's agents and not the agents of any of the other three candidates. Moreover, the paper which all the election agents had signed has now mysteriously disappeared.

The student community of St Stephen's was shocked at such blatant manoeuvring and over 600 of them signed a petition demanding a repoll. Interestingly out of the 600 signatories there were only about 200 girls. Some were even Tariq Haque's supporters. However, principal Rajpal, scornfully rejected this plea and allegedly stated that, "If I am smoking a pipe and 600 people call it a cigar, it does not alter the reality of the pipe." So all the democratic aspirations of the students were stifled. Attempts were made to impeach Tariq Haque, but, according to the constitution of St Stephen's College, the principal must grant permission for impeachment and this was not forthcoming. The three rooted candidates, Menon, Sange Dorji and Barun Mitra, suggested a compromise formula. They offered to withdraw and suggested a repoll between just the two leading candidates. However, this plea too was rejected by the authorities.

The official version at St Stephen's College is, of course, that there was no rigging and it was the premature celebrations by Mahesh and Sanjoy Roy (both now branded as 'impulsive and leftist') that led to the misunderstanding. If this was true then why has the signed paper with the original results now disappeared? If all is above board, then why do not the St Stephen's authorities honestly confess that there was a mistake in counting and so a recount had to be ordered?

MAHARASHTRA

Bill to curb Antulay's control over trusts

Bombay: Mr A. R. Antulay, the former chief minister, like the pavement-dwellers who he sought to hound out of Bombay last year, has gone to the Supreme Court to get justice against the verdict of the division bench of Bombay High Court. He has filed a special leave petition (SPL) challenging the 10 June judgement of Justices S. K. Desai and B. J. Rele, holding him guilty of arbitrary allotment of cement. The division bench held that Mr Antulay had violated the rules and procedures in respect of cement allotment and acted in an "illegal, arbitrary and capricious manner" to favour big builders who had donated to two of the trusts floated by him. Both the judges also held that there was a "nexus and quid pro quo" between allotment of cement by Mr Antulay in favour of the builders and the donations by the latter, directly or indirectly, to the two trusts. It may be mentioned that the state government though indicted by the judgement of the divisional bench, has not gone in appeal along with Mr Antulay. Perhaps, they have already spent enough on him. According to information given by Shivajirao Patil-Nilangekar, the minister for law and judiciary, in the Assembly during question hour, the government incurred an expenditure of Rs 15,000 for filing an appeal before the division bench of the Bombay High Court against the judgement of Justice Lentin in the case filed against Mr Antulay.

According to legal circles, the step taken by Mr Antulay is in the nature of a self-propelling morale booster. It will not make any material difference to the criminal cases which have been filed against him in the sessions court. The case has been filed against him by Mr Ramdas Naik for cheating and fraud and comes up for hearing on 18 October. If Mr Antulay's appeal is admitted in the Supreme Court then he can claim that the findings of the High Court are under challenge in the Supreme Court.

The Maharashtra government, however, has initiated moves to take over Mr Antulay's trusts, since for all practical purposes he is still in complete control. To facilitate the takeover, the government introduced a Bill in the current session of the state legislature to provide for taking over the management of a public trust, or of acquiring and vesting any such trust in a trustee committee and for creation of a common fund.

The statement of objects and reasons states that in view of the regulatory nature of the Bombay Public Trust Act 1950, it does not contain any provision for abolition of the rights and privileges of any person and acquiring and vesting them in a committee appointed by the government. The Bill provides that trustees can be disqualified and removed from the trustee committee if he is a minor, has been convicted by a criminal court of any offence involving moral turpitude, is of unsound mind and is so declared by a competent court, is an insolvent, has directly or indirectly any interest in a lease or any other transaction relating to any immovable property vested in the trustee committee, and so on. If the state government feels that a member has incurred any of the disqualifications, the state government may, after giving such a member an opportunity of showing cause, and after considering any such cause shown by order, remove such a person from membership. And, the decision of the state government in this regard shall be final.

All this has become necessary because Mr Antulay has refused to resign from or give up control of the trusts. The PM obviously feels insecure as long as Mr Antulay has control over the trusts which have a total amount of nearly Rs six crores. In fact, there is another touch of irony. It was the same Mrs Gandhi who used the daredevil Antulay to edge out her arch enemy, the late Mr Rajni Patel, from the controlling position of the Nehru Centre which is said to have funds running into several crores of rupees. Trusts, like the Nehru Centre represented tremendous money power besides a position of patronage.

When Mr Patel fell out of grace with Sanjay Gandhi, there were attempts to take over the Nehru Centre but the then Emergency chief minister, Mr S. B. Chavan, did not have the power to do it. The PM did not want a confrontation with Mr Patel as he was privy to a lot of things. Then came Mr Vasantdada Patil followed by Mr Sharad Pawar both of whom were friends of Mr Patel. When Mr Antulay became chief minister, things were different. According to the rules, every chief minister automatically becomes the chairman of the board of trustees. At first Mr Antulay was reluctant and so was Dr Raja Ramanna, the renowned scientist who Mrs Gandhi wanted as the general secretary of the centre. Mr Antulay was indebted to Mr Patel for past favours but his loyalty to Mrs Gandhi ultimately won and he got himself the prize post of president. Power was taken away from Mr Rajni Patel.

Getting rid of Mr Rajni Patel was easy but Mr Antulay simply refused to hand over the trusts. Several hints were made to him to resign but each time he was more vehement in protesting that he would not. In fact, according to several reports, detectives from the central bureau of investigation came to Bombay to investigate the actual amounts that were allegedly collected by Mr Antulay. Some say the figures are astronomical. It is felt that if the trusts are taken out of his control, it would be one less source of worry. Hence the Bill providing for new provisions for taking over trusts or management of trusts.

hinese to enjoy nore rights

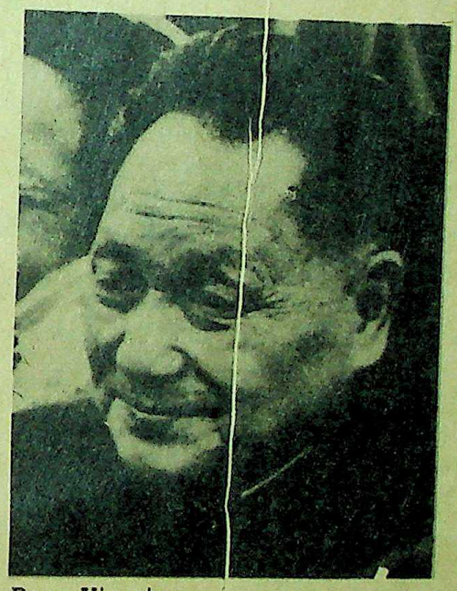
jing: One very hot afternoon in ust in Gansu province, near the ternmost extension of China's eat Wall, this correspondent ed three young college lecturers at they thought of the draft of na's new Constitution which the h Party Congress will ratify this nth. All Chinese have been cted to study the draft but only of my friends had heard of the ument and she hadn't read it. ed, during a month in Inner ngolia, Gansu, and Xinjiang pro-es, in tightly packed railway car-es and crowded hostels this cor-ondent met a few who had ered to read the newest version the rights and duties of every en of the People's Republic.

remains one of the mysteries of ese political life why the Com-ist Party pauses now and again its internal strife to issue new stitutions. The fourth since the founding of the People's Re-ic, and the third in seven years, o ne guarantees anew a galaxy of rights of which no Chinese has been certain.

e draft "defines the nature of country and the status of various es," according to Peng Zhen, chairman of the constitutional sing committee, who observes under the new Constitution na's citizens will enjoy more ts than under a capitalist sys-" The existing 1978 Constitu-which will be superseded with-month, and was once described "major event in the political life ur people," has now been dismis-as "hurriedly drafted and evant." The Chinese authorities drawn special attention to the nges in national administration. State Chairman, or Head of e, will reappear. Stipulated in , the office was abolished in after being held by Mao Zedong then by Liu Shaopi, whom Mao osed in 1967. When appointed, State Chairman will promulgate laws, ratify most senior posi-s, receive foreign dignitaries, award medals. A military coun-with its own chairman, will direct armed forces.

e 50,000 communes, the Maoist erstone of the agricultural eco-y, which were recently ham-ed in the Party's Resolution as of the Chairman's early "errors," will lose their administrative functions; these revert to the towns, as specified in the 1954 Constitution and the move will accelerate the growing independence of Chinese peasants. Article 30 of the new draft hints strongly that Taiwan and Hong Kong can become "special administrative districts." Peng Zhen has underlined this possibility during recent weeks, seeking to reassure anxious entrepreneurs in China's lost possessions, that their economic prosperity could continue under "one state, two systems."

An independent accounting office, the first for over 30 years, will attempt to deal with the rampant corruption in official life, some of whose beneficiaries are now appearing in the dock all over China.



Deng Xiaoping

But the most important difference in the new draft Constitution stems from last year's Party Resolution, with its fundamental dismissal, in effect, of Mao's contribution after 1956 until his death 20 years later. Hailed as supreme in all things in previous constitutions, and named five times in the preamble of the 1978 version, Mao is mentioned just once in the current draft. And unlike its predecessor, which considered "continuing the revolution" the main task, the draft calls on all Chinese "to carry out modernisation," a reflection of the Dengist priorities which prompted one official to explain: "When a policy works, we call it socialism. Those that fail, we call capitalism."

Past constitutional rights to put up wall posters and to strike no longer exist, a reflection of the leadership's astonishment at the public outpourings during the shortlived 1978 Peking Spring with its police style calls for Party reform.

As for personal rights, these have always been trumpeted in the People's Republic—and always denied. In 1957 a bold professor had written to Mao that "an untold number of citizens" had perished in illegal detention. He was soon proclaimed a "vicious Rightist." Since then millions of Chinese have suffered at the hands of the State. Party Chairman Hu Yaobang has estimated 100 million during the Cultural Revolution alone. Hundreds of thousands have died. There may be sceptical smiles when Chinese read the draft's Article 40, which promises compensation to those illegally treated by the State. How do you receive compensation in the after-life?

Chinese citizens can be imprisoned for several years without public trial, quite outside the provisions of the 1980 Criminal Code. A large number of women are now in a Shanghai detention centre, for instance, because they had sexual relations before they were married. Nor are sexual peccadilloes the only route to "labour under the supervision of the masses." Every significant figure in the short-lived Democracy Movement which followed Mao's death is now behind bars; most are there without trial. All have been charged with violating an earlier equivalent of Article 27 of the new Constitution, which prohibits—without defining—"treasonous and counter-revolutionary activity."

One of them, Liu Qing, has been inside since late 1979 for publishing the transcript of the trial of another dissident, Wei Jingsheng, one of the stars of Democracy Wall who maintained that without democracy China's modernisation would be meaningless. Just before he disappeared into the Chinese prison system, from which he later smuggled a lengthy diary, Liu Qing demanded that a security official tell him which laws he had violated. With a crowd of Liu's supporters listening, the officer replied: "We arrest whom we want to, that's what."

In China today it is not the Constitution but the Party which bestows and removes rights and favours. As Deng Xiaoping declared last year "everything decided by the Central Committee and Party organisations must be obeyed until further changes are announced."

Asians asked to stay on

In the wake of the abortive coup bid of 1 August in Nairobi, when Asian shops were looted and members of the community assaulted, Kenyan leaders are trying to prevent an Asian exodus from that country. A junior minister in President Moi's cabinet was apparently attempting to reassure the Asian community, when he pointed out that conditions were not any better in the US, Britain or India. Property losses amounted to $ 110 million, several members of the over 70,000-strong community were physically threatened and some women reportedly raped. Aware that the Ugandan economy was seriously affected by the departure of the Asians in 1972, President Moi himself made a statement urging insurance companies to reverse their decision against paying compensation to Asians.

European rocket fails

The failure of the first commercial space flight of the European space rocket, Ariane, is a serious blow to the European space industry. The rocket developed a fault 13 minutes after take off which prevented the launching of the two communications satellites, Marecs B and Sirio-2 which were to be put into geostationary orbit. This will undoubtedly lessen Ariane's potential clients who will now look to the American space shuttle, Columbia, whose first commercial flight is due this November. The Ariane programme is under the aegis of the European Space Agency which comprises 11 participating nations, the major contributors being France and West Germany.

The Gang of Four today

The Gang of Four, who were disgraced for the alleged excesses of the cultural revolution, are serving sentences in various jails all over China. Mr Zhang Ghunqiao, now in his mid-sixties, is said to be fighting cancer of the throat. Sentenced to death in January last year, he had refused to speak at his trial, but Chinese authorities suspended his sentence and are still hoping he will recant. Jiang Qing, 68, Mao Zedong's widow, is presently making dolls in a prison in the south-western province of Guangxo. She gets a certain sum for each doll, which she will be allowed to draw if released. Her death sentence comes up for review next year but sources say her execution is extremely unlikely. Yao Wenyuman, the extreme left-wing propagandist of the cultural revolution, is now working as a librarian in a maximum security prison near Beijing. He is serving a 20-year prison sentence. The fourth member of the Gang, Wang Hongwen who had risen to the highest positions of the Chinese leadership while still in his early thirties, is serving a life term at a labour camp in north-west China. He is the only member of the Gang who has shown "a determination to reform himself and work hard."

Brezhnev may retire soon

According to Western diplomatic sources, President Leonid Brezhnev may retire by the end of this year, possibly when the sixtieth anniversary celebrations of the Soviet Union are to take place. The Soviet leader, who has been ailing for a long time, will, according to these sources, retire with extraordinary Soviet honours in recognition of his 18-year tenure which saw the USSR achieve military parity with the USA for the first time. His likely successor is Yuri A. Andropov already a member of the Politburo.

Vietnam allows emigration

Vietnam has agreed to allow children of mixed Vietnamese-American ancestry, to emigrate. Officials said that American members of the World Church Service met the Vietnamese foreign minister, Nguyen Co Thach. The minister agreed to allow 63 children, whose claim to US citizenship has been documented through US courts, to emigrate.

Historic Scottish island saved

The tiny Scottish isle of Iona has been 'saved' by the 46-year-old British businessman, Sir Hugh Fraser, former owner of the department store Harrods. The Scots had feared that the island, where the Irish monk, St Columba, landed in 563 AD to spread the Christian faith in Britain and where several Scottish kings are buried, would pass into the hands of foreigners.

Sunday week

Beginning 26 September

By AMRITLAL

ARIES (15 April—14 May) This is a week of financial gains for you, and those of you in service will also get a promotion. For those involved in literature and the fine arts, success is certain. This is a good phase for launching new business ventures too. Take the initiative and avail of every opportunity that comes your way. Good days for romance too.

Good dates: 27, 28 and 30
Lucky numbers: 1, 3 and 5
Favourable direction: East

TAURUS (15 May—14 June) In spite of all your efforts made in your endeavours, the results will not be up to your expectations. You will have to go through a lot of physical and mental strain. You are advised to keep a tight rein on your temper this week. Take good care of the health of family members. A word of caution: keep away from romance for some time.

Good dates: 28, 29 and 1
Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 6
Favourable direction: South-east

GEMINI (15 June—14 July) Relationships on the domestic front will be strained. Be very careful in your dealings with the opposite sex. Old friends will come to your help now and will also help you in your business ventures. You will gain financially provided caution is exercised in investments. Children born under this sign will do well in examinations.

Good dates: 29, 30 and 2
Lucky numbers: 3, 7 and 9
Favourable direction: West

CANCER (15 July—14 August) You may not have the same luck in your favour as you did last week, but the good phase still continues. Apart from a minor loss, your prospects are encouraging. You will reap the benefits of your past work, but do not get complacent. Be patient in your dealings with elders in the family and superiors at work. Avoid all controversies.

Good dates: 26, 28 and 29
Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 6
Favourable direction: South-west

LEO (15 August—14 September) Your fortunes now take a turn for the better. The monotony and boredom of the last few months will come to an end this week. Your career will prosper in unexpected ways. Romance is on the cards and matrimonial plans must be taken seriously. If you have plans of making important changes this week, you must go right ahead with them.

Good dates: 27, 30 and 1
Lucky numbers: 3, 5 and 7
Favourable direction: North

VIRGO (15 September—14 October) New developments on your professional front will demand a lot of your time and energy. However, do not expect success this week. Financially, the time is not favourable either. You may have to resort to some short-term measures to tide over your pressing problems. There will be some tension on the domestic front too, so tread carefully.

Good dates: 28, 1 and 2
Lucky numbers: 6, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: East

LIBRA (15 October—14 November) Financial gains are in store for you. Interviews and correspondence must be dealt with soon. Friends will contribute greatly to your happiness. Pay attention to professional details and forge ahead. The routine that you had been following for the last few months will be broken now. Your health will show a marked improvement.

Good dates: 26, 30 and 1
Lucky numbers: 3, 4 and 5
Favourable direction: South-east

SCORPIO (15 November—14 December) A little too much stress on principles and righteousness may hinder your work this week. However, many opportunities for making long-awaited changes will come your way. Be ready to take up new challenges. You are advised not to get involved in any controversy, and not to take any decision on your own.

Good dates: 27, 1 and 2
Lucky numbers: 3, 5 and 9
Favourable direction: North-east

SAGITTARIUS (15 December—14 January) For those of you involved in the performing arts, there is travel in store for you this week. Others will enjoy a fair measure of luck and financial gains. Those in business, planning new investments, this is a favourable time. There are some marital problems signified this week, so you are advised restraint in your dealings.

Good dates: 29, 30 and 1
Lucky numbers: 6, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: South

CAPRICORN (15 January—14 February) Your career will get a boost this week, as you will benefit through someone during the early days. Do not take risks in your business affairs. You will require a lot of tact to keep peace in your personal life. The health of your family too will need a great deal of attention now. A letter will bring good tidings. Do not squander away your earnings.

Good dates: 28, 30 and 1
Lucky numbers: 3, 4 and 5
Favourable direction: North-west

AQUARIUS (15 February—14 March) Your career will make very good progress this week. In your personal life, a member of the opposite sex will bring a lot of happiness. You might have to undertake a journey which will benefit your family. Curb all extravagant tendencies for you will need the money later. Do not antagonise elders or employers.

Good dates: 30, 1 and 2
Lucky numbers: 1, 7 and 8
Favourable direction: East

PISCES (15 March—14 April) The problems that have been confronting you will be solved with the help of influential friends. For businessmen this is a very busy week since new contracts and deals are in the offing. There will be some anxiety in your personal life and ill-health of family members is indicated. A promotion for you is in the offing.

Good dates: 26, 27 and 28
Lucky numbers: 7, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: North

For those born between 15 September and 14 October: You will have to take a great deal of care of your health this year, for ailments of the stomach, skin and eyes are indicated. Your financial position will be fairly comfortable but some unforeseen and unexpected expenses are likely to occur. You will gain monetarily due to some long-term investment, so avail of the chances. In their personal life, Virgoans will face their share of problems this year. Some trouble in litigation and property matters may arise and you will have to be extra careful against deceit. Career-wise this is a good phase and those who are unemployed will find a job. Those dealing in manual work, may be accident-prone, so take a lot of care.

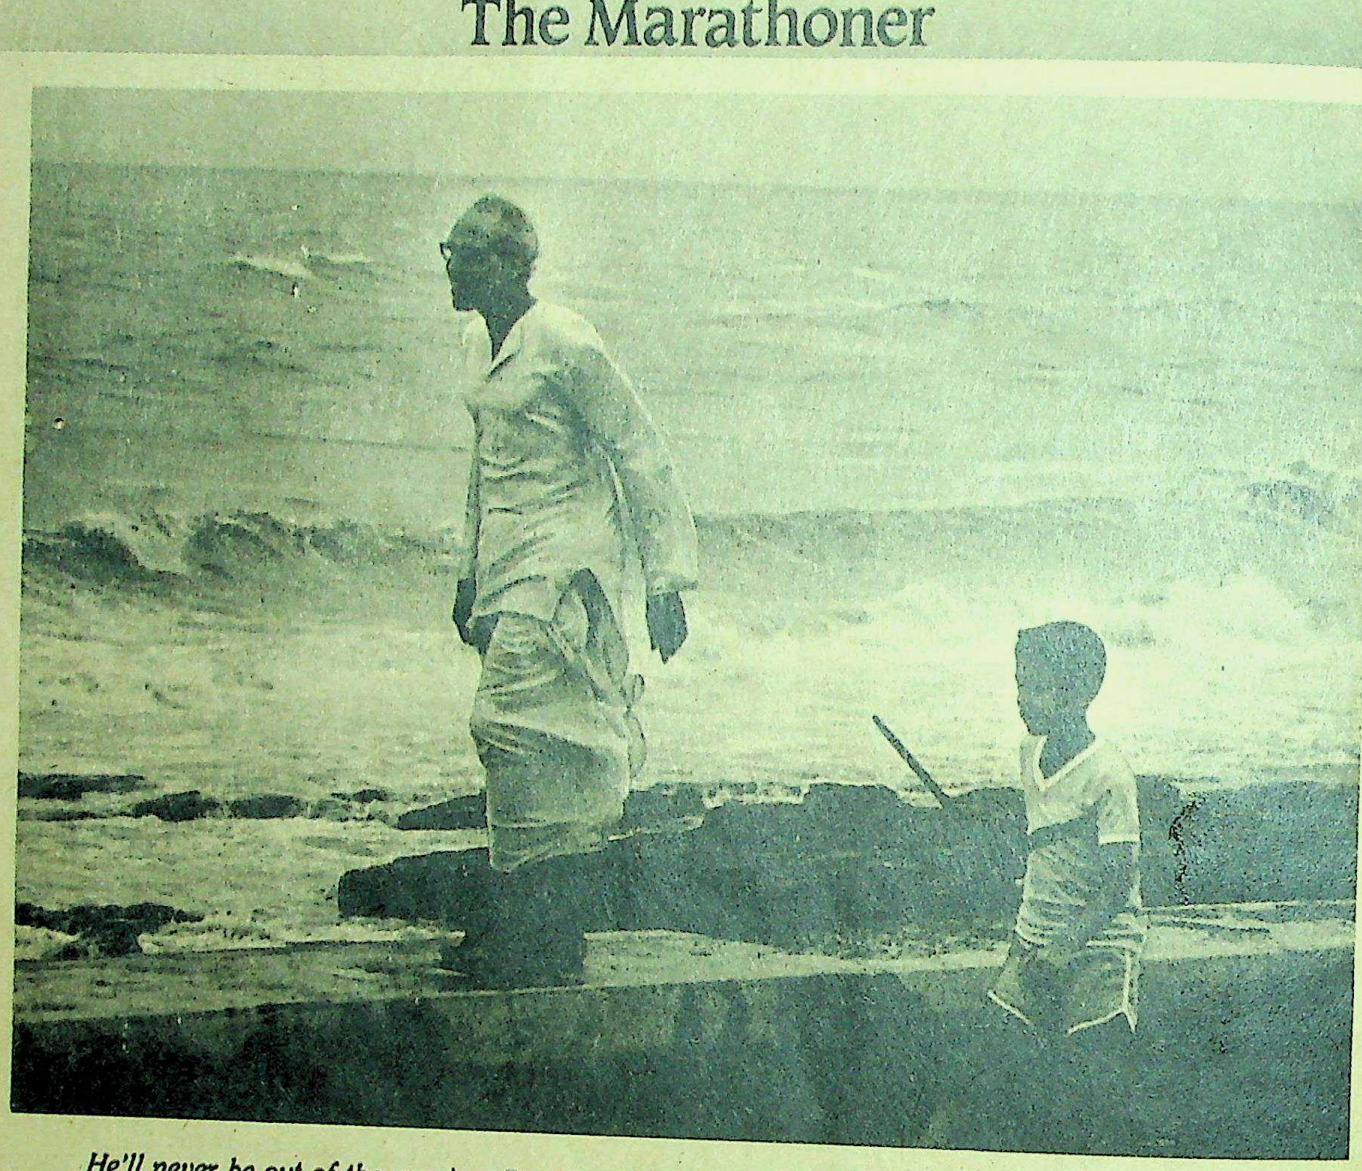
To commemorate the Asian Games, State Bank salutes the unknown and unsung sportsman.

The Marathoner



He'll never be out of the running. Retirement has not robbed him of his vitality. Only the direction has changed. □ For instance, instead of playing on the office Cricket 'eleven' he challenges his grandson to a game of Table Tennis. Instead of slogging '9 to 5' as a mere cog in a large organisation he works on his own poultry farm. Having saved for years with State Bank, he found it easy to arrange a loan to start this small but thriving business. □ He's quite a cheerful person. The only time he scowls is when you ask him his age. Or catch him with his spectacles on. Because he doesn't want to be known as 60 years old. He's only 60 years young!

Naseeruddin

There's no war between Shashi Kapoor and Naseeruddin Shah. It was just some misunderstanding during the making of Junoon that led to a break in their good relationship. They didn't meet for a very long time after the release of Junoon, and then they signed a film called Bezubaan. The two worked together in a very cordial atmosphere. According to Shashi "most misunderstandings are created by the gossip columnists. At least in this case I am sure it is a figment of their wild imagination. We have solved our problems in an amicable way. We are not children to keep on quarrelling all the time, you know."

The bad phase in Rishi Kapoor's career continues. There are no good films coming his way. In fact, there are very few, just a handful of them. Two big films Yeh Ishk Nahin Aasaan and Deedaar E Yaar are ready for release. Rishi hopes these films will work the magic he has been waiting for. There was Coolie too, the ill-fated film but in the light of what has happened the film will have to wait for one full year at least. And then there is Duniya with Dilip Kumar. All these films will take time and till then Rishi will have to wait. The release of his father's Prem Rog in which he has played one of the most significant roles of his career has still to make an impact.

Everyone is talking about Raakesh Roshan's new film, Kaam Chor. It is a film Raakesh started when he was passing through a very bad phase in his career as an actor. It was better to make his own film than to keep waiting for the roles to come. Kaam Chor which has been directed by K. Vishwanath has also Suresh Oberoi and Jayapradha in important roles. Jayapradha according to Raakesh has won the show hands down.

This young man Sunjay Dutt is unfortunately becoming a strange case. There was the bad patch in his career recently. Then he decided to change for the better but ill-luck continued to chase him. It is the woman problem all over again. Tina Munim, the love in his life for seven years, walked out on him in a surprise move and people started talking about her new affair with Rajesh Khanna and before anything more could happen film circles were rife with talk about the Rekha and Sunjay affair. Sunjay again became irresponsible and neglected his work till director S.V. Rajendra Singh who is directing him in Mera Faisla took him to task. Sunjay used to report about five hours late every day. When Rajendra Singh could no longer stand it he threatened to throw him out of the film if he continued his mad ways. Sunjay was chastened. He has changed again—for the better.

Tina: new affair

Madhavi: never grows older

Madhavi recently celebrated her birthday. But she was frightfully secretive about her age. When asked, she would look coy, smile prettily, coo and purr but no word about how old she is. She seems to have set a tradition for herself. At her birthday bash every year she makes an announcement of how she has bagged a covetous role. This year she announced that she had signed for a Hindi film Woh Kaun Hai, with Vinod Mehra.

A. Nageshwara Rao is indeed a snail. He entered the filmworld in the the Forties and completed his 200th film only recently. Whereas, Krishna who entered the film industry in 1964 has already completed his 200th film

One interesting fact came to light recently. N. T. Rama Rao started his film career with Manadesam (Our Nation). Now his latest film has been titled Nadesam (My Nation). Do the titles of the films presage his political progression? He started as a Congressman and now with his Telugu Desam party, will he become a megalomaniac?

Sri Devi has a unique quality. In the case of most actresses the rise in popularity is directly proportional to the size of their heads. They become snooty, difficult and temperamental. Not so Sri Devi. The more popular she gets, the nicer she becomes. She is more friendly and charming than she was a few years ago. She is sweet-natured not only to male actors but also to her female co-stars and that is saying something.

Sri Devi: nice

THE MINI GENERATOR

OR

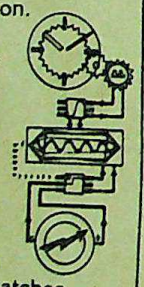
How the power needs of an analog watch have been compacted into a tiny little battery.

For a better working watch.

A pill-sized cell is the power behind your electronic watch. Throughout its life, it keeps the watch working on a highly stable power supply. If the watch is kept unused, battery life can be extended in a very simple way. All you do is pull the crown to hand-setting position, the watch stops—and the battery gets shut off.

Generating power

The battery sets the Quartz crystal piece, the LSI and the stepper motor in motion.



Powered by the battery, the crystal begins to vibrate at 32,768 oscillations per second. A trimmer helps set the vibrations to this frequency. This frequency is technically considered the most suitable for watches.

The LSI then proceeds to divide these oscillations of electronic pulses. And comes up with one very accurate pulse per second.

Urged on by the LSI chip, the stepper motor gets busy. It converts the pulse into mechanical motion. And drives the second hand through mechanical train gears—precisely once a second.

So that the hands on the conventional dial show the exact time.

This battery packs enough energy to keep your watch going, for a minimum of 2 long years. And yet, it is ridiculously light—weighing as little as 1.2 gms!

Powerful to the last

The battery helps your watch keep up its remarkable accuracy of ± 15 seconds per month. By maintaining a constant supply of energy, right until the very end. When it's time for a change, the power cell life indicator will give out warning signals, 2 to 3 weeks in advance. (While maintaining the correct time, the second hand begins to step 2 seconds instead of 1.)

For all its tiny size, the battery in your watch is a very efficient power plant. And that proves it's fit to be the one in charge!

Electronic Exclusive

- There is a wide range of 27 varieties in HMT Quartz watches for ladies and gents.
- Each HMT Quartz watch carries the irrefutable company guarantee and quality assurance.
- There are 22 showrooms all over India to service your HMT Quartz Electronic watch.
- Suitable, reasonably priced batteries are easily available at all these showrooms. (To avoid possible damage to your precious HMT Quartz watch, it is advisable to get the battery replaced only at HMT showrooms or authorised outlets.)

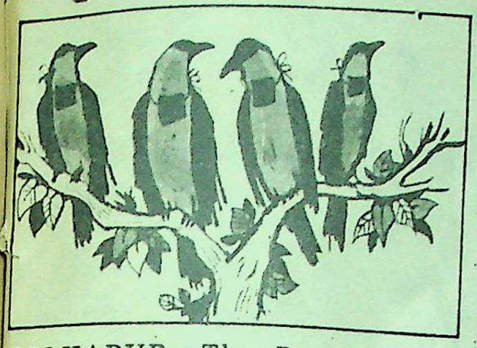
This India



KOLHAPUR: The Panchaganga cremation ground here has turned into a mourning place not merely for human beings but also for crows. On Sunday last (5 September) a flock of crows, apparently grieved by the death of one of their brood at the hands of a mongoose, refused to take any food for three long hours to the astonishment of nearly 500 persons who offered rice as a ritual to mourn their dead. The crows, perched on nearby trees, ended their "mourning" after three hours, according to the superintendent of the cremation ground —Hindustan Times (Jitender Parasar, New Delhi)

TRIVANDRUM: For the last few days, the ruling UDF and the opposition MLAs of Kerala were playing games in the evening after fighting each other in the legislature in the morning. The occasion was the silver jubilee of the state legislature. The brain behind the idea was the speaker Mr Vakkom Purshottaman. The playing fields were fringed by unusually large crowds including women and children. The wives of some MLAs participated merrily in all events, ranging from soccer matches to musical chairs. The Congress(I) chief minister Mr K. Karunakaran and the Marxist opposition leader, Mr E. K. Nayanar did not participate in any of the events, obviously because of their advanced age— Times of India (Parikshit Bhandari Jaipur)

NEW DELHI: A whopping fee of Rs 2,16,000 has been charged for designing just two chairs and two tables for the Asiad games village here according to Mr Kishore, president of the Delhi Pradesh Janata Party — Hindustan Times (S.P.Khosla, New Delhi)

NEW DELHI: Since the day the finance minister Mr Pranab Mukherjee gave in Parliament figures of the per capita foreign debt, he has been receiving cheques from several citizens covering the amount. The minister has asked his office to return the cheques assuring the senders that individuals need not worry about the foreign debt which the government would take care of —Times of India (Arbind Gutgutia, Barabanki, UP)

TIRUPATHI: The principle "music for more milk" is accepted and is being implemented at the Tirumala Tirupathi Devasthanam's 250 acre gosala. Experiments conducted abroad showed that milk production can be increased by ten to 70 percent when the milch mammals listen to melodious music. Dr Konda Reddy, the superintendent of the gosala, suggested that they implement the scheme. Loud speakers are arranged in various parts of the shed and cassettes are being played to provide the music. Presently the 85 cows are giving 500 litres of milk every day—Daily (S. Ranganathan, Kalyan, Maharastra)

RAIPUR: Mr Ram Lakhan Mishra, a gram sevak of Raipur district, was reinstated after 18 years. Mr Mishra was appointed gram sevak on 8 May, 1964. His order of appointment was in English. Mr Mishra represented to the authorities asking for a copy of the order in Hindi mentioning that the Constitution of India had provided that orders could be given in Hindi also. The then commissioner of Raipur division held his action as indiscipline and terminated his services. Mr Mishra has been making representations since then, at all levels from collector to Prime Minister. Finally on 14 June this year the state cabinet decided that Mr Mishra had not committed any act of indiscipline and ordered his reinstatement—Indian Express (P. Elangovan, Madras)

THANJAVUR: The Velankanni Basilica of Our Lady of Health has received a strange gift from a devotee a shield on which is embossed a silver wine bottle and a small silver cup. Rt Rev. Thomas Vaz, parish priest, said the donor, a woman, had written underneath the wine bottle that her husband had been a drunkard and that after a vow to Our Lady of Health he had given up drinking bringing cheer to the family—Hindu (Govindan Madurai)

MYSORE: Syed Gaffur, a watchman in the office of the divisional engineer (phones) has been organising Gowri-Ganesha festival in the office since three years. Gaffur has been a devotee of Lord Ganapati whose idol was installed by the then Maharaja of Mysore at Vinayaka in that building. The major part of expenditure on Ganesha puja is met by Gaffur—Times of Deccan (K.P. Andavan, Gobichettipalayam, TN)

SALEM: A bride walked out of the marriage hall after finding the groom to be a drunkard. On the eve of the marriage, the bride, Shanti (19) saw her husband-to-be dead drunk and decided to walk out on him—Indian Express (C. V. Balakrishnan, Coimbatore)

Game of the month: Comedy of errors

It is rare indeed to witness in modern tournament play any of the wild swashbuckling king-hunts of the past with both kings staggering round the board like a couple of drunken gladiators in search of a lion. When one does see such a game, though, and sees how badly it is played, it is tempting to ask whether those good old swashbuckling games of the past contained so many errors.

The following game would not stand up in court, but it is great fun. Just to be awkward though, I decided to point out some of the errors, but my criticism is purely academic. Without the errors the game would not have been so interesting.

1 P–K4 P–QB3 2 P–Q4 P–Q4
3 P–K5 B–B4 4 N–QB3 P–K3
5 P–KN4

Introducing a Russian idea which has recently been developed by the young Dutch master Van der Wiel.

5 B–N3 6 KN–K2 P–QB4
7 B–K3 N–QB3 8 PxP NxP
9 N–Q4 N–KB3 10 P–KB4!?

A clever pawn sacrifice to trap the black king in the centre, but he follows it up incorrectly.

10 N(4)xP 11 B–N5+ K–K2
12 B–N1?

Too slow. Simply 12 Q–K2 followed by 0–0–0 or P–B6 would have left Black in great difficulties.

12 Q–B2 13 P–B6 P–N3
14 Q–K2 QxKBP 15 P–B7

An ingenious but unsound idea. He hopes for 15 . . . QxP 16 N–B6+ K–Q3 17 P–KR3 N–R3 18 B–R2, but Black need not take the pawn at once.

15 N–K5 16 N–B6+ K–Q3
17 P–KR3 Q–N6+ 18 K–B1 QxN!

This must have come as a shock. If 19 PxQ N–N6+

19 QxN(N4) QxNP 20 P–QR4

His position is hopeless. If first 20 B–R2+ K–B4 21 P–QR4 then Black wins by 21 . . . QxR+ 22 K–N2 QxR+ 23 KxR N–B7+

20 QxR+?

Greedy. The modest 20 . . . KxP leaves him with four (!) extras pawns and the stronger attack

21 K–N2 P–B4?

Black suddenly has new problems because of the threat of B–R2+, but he could escape and win quite simply and remarkably by 21 . . . QxB+!! 22 RxQ KxP with rook bishop and his four pawns for the queen

22 Q–R4?

Now 22 B–R2+ K–B4 23 Q–K2 would leave Black in a real mess, but the farce continues.

22 Q–KB3 23 B–R2+ K–B4(diag)
24 N–N8!!

A fantastic saving grace which nearly turns the tables completely.

24 QxQ

What else? He has no check.

25 P–B8–Q+ KN–5 26 R–N1+

It is of course the most incredible piece of good fortune for Black that he is not mated in this position. If 26 N–B6+ K–B6!! and the discovered checks do not help White one iota, or 26 N–R6+ K–R4! again suddenly leaves White in the soup

26 K–R6 27 R–R1+ K–N5

Not 27 . . . K–N7?? 28 B–K5+ and mates

28 R–N1+ Draw!

An eventful game!

Bridge

Australia's leading player, Tim Seres, who is of Hungarian origin, has said for years that it pays to be pessimistic over pre-empts. Two deals from the final of the Australian Interstate championship proved him right again. This was the first:

Dealer, South Game all

	♠ 10 ♥ 8 7 5 3 ♦ A 5 3 2 ♣ K J 10 3
♠ K Q J 5 ♥ A J 2 ♦ K J ♣ 8 6 5 4	N W E S	♠ A 9 7 4 ♥ K Q 10 9 6 4 ♦ – ♣ A 9 7
	♠ 8 6 3 2 ♥ – ♦ Q 10 9 8 7 6 4 ♣ Q 2

At both tables South opened Three Diamonds. West at one table bid Four Clubs for take-out – one of the worst conventions ever devised, for partner has no room in which to express his hand. North bid Six Diamonds and East Seven Hearts, for which there was no play.

At the other table, where Seres himself was South, East-West reached Seven Spades, which is a make if nothing bad happens. But alas, South doubled for an unusual lead, and after a heart ruff at trick one West had to lose another trick and 500 points.

Soon after came this hand, with East the dealer at love all:

	♠ K Q 8 6 5 ♥ K 6 2 ♦ A K ♣ K 7 5
♠ 10 4 2 ♥ Q 5 4 3 ♦ 6 ♣ J 8 4 3 2	N W E S	♠ J 7 ♥ J 10 7 ♦ Q J 8 7 4 2 ♣ 9 6
	♠ A 9 3 ♥ A 9 8 ♦ 10 9 5 3 ♣ A Q 10

Now Seres himself was South. He doubled the opening Three Diamonds and North, after applying the old Black, quickly promoted himself into 7NT, for which there was no play. At the other table East did not open and North-South stopped in Six Spades.

The point is, of course, that when there has been a pre-empt there is always a danger of bad divisions. Apart from that, East in the first example, and North in the second, lacked intermediates.

Stamp

The youthful portrait of Queen Victoria on this ½d stamp may deceive the tyro into thinking that it dates from the early years of her reign. In fact the Queen was in her 68th year when the stamp was issued in January 1887. It was one of a series of 12, ranging from ½d to 1s, printed by De La Rue Ltd in inks which the company termed fugitive, since even immersion in cold water would cause the colours to run, rendering fruitless any attempt by the dishonest to wash the postmarks off used stamps in order to re-use them. In 1900 the colour of the ½d stamps was changed from vermilion to bluish-green

MORE MINISTERS THAN ROOMS

Jayanta Das

Sathe :minister without office

THE 2 September reshuffle, which resulted in the splitting up of some ministries and the setting up of some new posts, has created utter confusion regarding the allocation of rooms for ministers and senior officers in New Delhi. The worst affected is Mr Vasant Sathe, who has been shunted from the post of minister for information and broadcasting to the truncated chemicals and fertilisers ministry. Mr Shiv Shankar, who held the composite charge of petroleum, chemicals and fertilisers before he became the minister for petroleum, energy and coal, continues to occupy his office on the second floor of Shastri Bhavan (which houses the petroleum, chemicals and fertilisers departments) in addition to the energy minister's room at the Shram Shakti Bhavan. This has created a difficult situation for Mr Sathe. Till a proper room is furnished to suit his cabinet rank, he has decided to function from his residence.

Another person who has been badly affected by the reshuffle is Mr Mani Shankar Iyer, the joint secretary (external publicity) and the official spokesman of the external affairs ministry. Since the return of the Congress(I) in January 1980, there had been no junior minister in the foreign office. So, the junior minister's room had been occupied by a secretary-level officer and the official spokesman had been given a room close to the foreign minister's office. With Mr A. A. Rahim becoming the minister of state for external affairs, rooms had to be reallocated in the foreign office and Mr Mani Shankar Iyer has now been allotted a room in the Shastri Bhavan, half a km away from the headquarters of the foreign office at the South Block. Surely the official spokesman's presence in the South Block is essential for proper external publicity?

DANCING TO THE DURBAR'S TUNES

Sondeep Shankar

Pranab Mukherjee: love for the finer things

THE daughters of two union cabinet ministers have shown interest in learning classical dancing. This love for aesthetics among the ministers' families is being made use of by those who would like to be on the right side of the official hierarchy. So, the daughters of finance minister Pranab Mukherjee and petroleum and energy minister Shiv Shankar are much in demand at festivals of performing arts these days. There is nothing wrong with that. For, after all performing arts traditionally have grown in India under the patronage of the "durbar "

UNITY DRIVE

THE irrepresible Mr Raj Narain seems to have taken up the cudgels for opposition unity very seriously. He had invited top opposition leaders to his residence for tea on 27 August, and placed before them a formula for unity and formation of a new party; his argument is that since none of the opposition parties are carrying out any serious membership drive at present, his formula may be the right option at this time. Mr Raj Narain wants the opposition unity convention to have as delegates all those who were given tickets by the opposition parties in the last Lok Sabha, Vidhan Sabha, Zilla Parishad and Gaon Sabha elections. According to Mr Raj Narain's formula, the delegates of this convention could elect the leadership of the new party. But what he has, perhaps, overlooked is an electoral college as vast as the one suggested, would be unweildy. Secondly, none of the other opposition leaders seem to be keen on trying out his plan.

Rajiv Gandhi : no official post now?

RAJIV Gandhi seems to have shifted his preference from Arun Nehru to another aid, Arun Singh. Arun Nehru, a distant cousin of Mr Gandhi's and the MP from Rae Bareli, had been his favourite adviser for a long time. But now the limelight seems to have been stolen by Arun Singh, a schoolmate of Mr Gandhi who resigned his managerial job with a Calcutta firm last year to be an aide of the Prime Minister's son. When Rajiv and Sonia Gandhi decided to go to London to attend the Farnborough air show, Arun Singh and his wife Nina were selected to be the companions of the VIP couple. Incidentally, in September, Rajiv Gandhi will be spending more time abroad than at home. He was in the UK in the first week, and will accompany his mother to the Soviet Union in the third week. The chances of his being made an AICC(I) general secretary, in the meantime, have somewhat receded.
